Titus, first son of Vespasian, the eleventh Roman Emperor, began his reign after the demise of his father. By nature he was of a most benevolent disposition. Now Vespasian thought so much of his son's virtue that when some fostered revolt and dissension in their zeal to rule, he said no one other than his son should aspire to reign; and not without reason, for Titus, because of his virtue and perfect disposition, was respected as a loving and benevolent member of the human race. He was the most eloquent in peace, the strongest in war. He was so kind and generous that he denied no one anything; and when his friends held this against him, he answered, No one should leave the presence of the emperor in sorrow. One day, after the evening meal, it occurred to him that on that day he had done nothing for anybody, and he said: Friends, I have lost this day through forgetfulness of my benevolence. He was highly learned in the Latin and Greek tongues, and therefore held in favor the highly learned man Asconius Pedianus. [Asconius Pedianus, born at Patavium (Padua) about 2 BCE, was a Roman grammarian. He lost his sight at 73 in the reign of Vespasian, and died at 95 in the reign of Domitian. His most important work was a commentary on the speeches of Cicero, and we still possess fragments of others. They are written in a very pure language]. He warred in Judea, took Jerusalem and raised the temple to the ground. He killed six hundred thousand persons, and, as Josephus states, who was taken prisoner in the same engagement, eleven times one hundred thousand persons perished by hunger and the sword, while another hundred thousand were taken prisoners and publicly sold. On account of this victory over the Jews, Titus and his father, seated in the same chariot, celebrated a triumph at Rome, while Domitian followed them on a white horse. To this day one may still see at Rome evidences of this siege, and so the engraved candlestick and tables of laws which were taken from the Temple. He died in the same village as his father, in the forty-second year of his life, and was buried with public lamentations by all the people as though they had been deprived of a father. [Titus Flavius Sabinus Vespasianus was Roman emperor from 79 to 81 CE. He was a son of Vespasian and his wife Domitilla. He was born December 30, 40 CE. When a young man he served as a military tribune in Britain and Germany with great credit. Later he commanded a legion and served under his father in the Jewish wars. Vespasian returned to Italy after being proclaimed emperor on July 1, 69 CE; but Titus remained in Palestine to prosecute the siege of Jerusalem, in which he showed the talents of a general and the daring of a soldier. He captured Jerusalem on September 8, 70 CE, and returned to Italy in the following year, triumphing at Rome with his father. He also received the title of Caesar, and became the associate of Vespasian in the government, succeeding him in 79. His brother Domitian was accused of having designs against him, but Titus urged him not to aspire to honors that some day would be his through legitimate means. During his whole reign he displayed a sincere desire for the happiness of the people, and did all he could to relieve them in times of distress. He assumed the office of Pontifex Maximus after his father's death, and with the purpose, as he declared, of keeping his hands free from blood—a resolution he kept. He died September 2nd 81 CE, after a reign of two years, two months and twenty days, at the age of 41. Domitian, who was suspected of his death, succeeded him. Titus is said to have written Greek poems and tragedies].

Domitian (Domicianus), a brother of Titus and son of Vespasian, was the twelfth Roman emperor, and in the interval up to the time of his rule, he daily resorted to secret places of lechery and did nothing but catch flies and stabbed them with a sharp stylus. He resembled Nero and Caligula more than his father Vespasian and his brother Titus. In his earlier years he was more temperate, but he soon fell into gross vices, voluptuousness, neglect, ill temper and cruelty. He killed many distinguished persons, and also sent many into exile. However he rebuilt many buildings that had burned down, but all in his own name and without regard for the memory of their original founders. Yet he judged justly, and restored the burnt libraries at great cost. But finally, through his misdeeds, he aroused so much enmity that he fairly obliterated the names of his father and brother. He conceived the idea of calling himself a god and decreed that he be honored as such. He was finally slain in his bedchamber and his body infested with bats. He was disgracefully buried at the age of 35 in the fifteenth year of his reign. [T. Flavius Domitianus Augustus, younger son of Vespasian and born at Rome in 51 CE, was Roman emperor from 81 to 96. When his father was proclaimed emperor by the legions in the East, Domitian, then at Rome, narrowly escaped being murdered by Vitellius, and concealed himself until the victory of his father's party was decided. After the fall of Vitellius, Domitian was proclaimed Caesar, and obtained the government of the city until his father's return. During the ten years of his father's reign, Domitian lived as a private person on an estate near the Alban mount, surrounded by a number of courtesans, and devoting a great part of his time to poetry. During the reign of his brother Titus he was also not permitted to participate in public affairs, but on his death was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers. In the early years of his reign he kept strict superintendence over the governors of the provinces, enacted some useful laws, endeavored to correct the licentious conduct of the higher classes, and although he indulged himself in strange passions, his government was much better than had been expected. But he soon changed to the worse. His wars were mostly unfortunate, and this excited his fears and wounded his vanity. In 83 he undertook an expedition against the Chatti, which had no definitive outcome, though he celebrated a triumph on his return to Rome, and assumed the name of Germanicus. In 85 Agricola, whose success excited his jealousy, was recalled to Rome. From 86-90 he had to carry on a war with Decebalus and the Dacians, who defeated the Roman armies, and at length compelled Domitian to purchase a humiliating peace. It was after the Dacian war especially that he gave full sway to his cruelty and tyranny. No man of distinction was safe, unless he would degrade himself to flatter the tyrant. All the philosophers who lived at Rome were expelled. Christian writers attribute persecutions to him, but there is some doubt in this matter. At length three officers, assisted by Domitia, his wife, had him murdered by Stephanus, a freedman, on September 18th, 96].

Nerva, the thirteenth Roman emperor, was at an advanced age, elected after Domitian, and was an ordinary man of moderate habits. He placed himself on a level with the commonality and proved very useful. After everything pertaining to the empire was ruined or destroyed through the tumults of his predecessors, by his industry the actions and transactions of Domitian were nullified and repealed by the senate, and many who had been sent into exile were recalled, and the estates and property which had been forfeited were returned to them. And as he was now burdened with years and felt his end near, he took the precaution, for the common good, of adopting Trajan as his son. He died at the age of seventy-two, in the first year and four months of his reign. By approval of the senate he was given the rank of a god. [M. Nerva, Roman emperor from 96-98 CE, was born at Narni, in Umbria, in 32 CE. He was consul with Vespasian in 71, and with Domitian in 90. On the assassination of Domitian in September 96, Nerva, who had probably been aware of (and possibly involved in) the conspiracy, was declared emperor at Rome by the people and the soldiers, and his administration at once restored tranquility to the state. He stopped proceedings against those who had been accused of treason, and allowed many exiled persons to return to Rome. At the commencement of his reign he swore he would put no senator to death; and he kept his word even when a conspiracy had been formed against his own life by Calpurnius Crassus. Though virtuous and humane, he did not possess much energy and vigor. Nerva was aware of his own weakness, but showed his noble character and good sense by appointing as his successor a man who possessed both vigor and ability to direct public affairs. Without regard to his own family he adopted as his successor M. Ulpius Trajanus, who was then at the head of an army in Germany. Nerva died suddenly on January 27, 98 CE, at the age of 65].

Trajan, by birth a Spaniard, and surnamed Ulpius Crinitus, was the fourteenth Roman emperor and successor to Nerva in the empire. By his reputation as a warrior, his nobility and moderation, he excelled all the other emperors; for he extended the Roman Empire far and wide. He restored Germany beyond the Rhine to its former status, and brought under Roman subjection Dacia and many peoples beyond the Danube. He retaken the Parthians, and gave the Albanians a king. He made a province of the Euphrates and Tigris, and marched as far as the limits of India and the Red Sea. Yet his conduct so commended him to mankind that up to the time of Justinian, upon election of a Roman emperor the people cried out that their choice would be as fortunate as Augustus and even better than Trajan. In addition, he was so good and magnanimous in visiting the sick and in the greeting of friends, that it was regarded as one of his failings. And thus the proverb originated, That the emperor must so conduct himself to other persons, that others will cleave to him. Honor and riches, gifts and rewards he impartially distributed among the deserving. He did nothing in his lifetime that was not for the common good. He died at Selinus (Seleucia) in Cilicia (Isauria) of diarrhea of the stomach after having reigned eighteen years and six months. His remains were brought to Rome and there buried under a column 140 feet high, which may still be seen there. [M. Ulpius Trajanus (Trajan), Roman emperor from 98 to 117 CE, was born at Italica, near Seville, the 18th of September, 52. He was trained as a soldier, and served with distinction in the East and in Germany. He was consul in 91, and at the close of 97 he was adopted by the emperor, Nerva, who gave him the rank of Caesar and the names of Nerva and Germanicus, and shortly after the title of imperator Caesar Nerva Trajanus Augustus. He was the first emperor who was born outside of Italy. Nerva died in January, 98, and was succeeded by Trajan who was then at Cologne. His accession was hailed with joy, and he did not disappoint the expectations of the people. He was a man born to command. He was strong and healthy, of a majestic appearance, hardworking and inured to fatigue. Though not a man of letters, he had good sense, a knowledge of the world, and a sound judgment. His mode of living was very simple, and in his campaigns he shared all the sufferings and privations of the soldiers, by whom he was both loved and feared. He was a friend to justice, and he had a sincere desire for the happiness of the people. Trajan did not return to Rome for some months, being employed in settling the frontiers on the Rhine and the Danube. He entered Rome on foot, accompanied by his wife, Pompeia Plotina. This lady is highly commended by Pliny the Younger for her modest virtues, and her affection for Marciana, the sister of Trajan. Trajan left Rome for his campaign against the Daci. Decebalus, king of the Daci, had compelled Domitian to purchase peace by an annual payment of money; and Trajan determined to end the payments and conquer the Daci. This war employed Trajan between 2 and 3 years; but it ended with the defeat of Decebalus, who sued for peace at the feet of the Roman emperor. Trajan assumed the name of Dacicus, and entered Rome in triumph (103). In the following year Trajan commenced his second Dacian war against Decebalus, who, it is said, had broken the treaty. Decebalus was completely defeated, and put an end to his life (106). In the course of this war Trajan built a permanent bridge across the Danube at a place called Szernecz. The piers were of stone and of an enormous size, but the arches were of wood. After the death of Decebalus Dacia was reduced to the form of a Roman province; strong forts were built in various places, and Roman colonies were planted. It is generally supposed that the column at Rome called the Column of Trajan was erected to commemorate his Dacian victories. On his return Trajan had a triumph, and he exhibited games to the people for 123 days. 11,000 animals were slaughtered during these amusements; and an army of gladiators, 10,000 men, gratified the Romans by killing one another. About this time Arabia Petraea was subjugated to the empire by A. Cornelius Palma, the governor of Syria; and an Indian embassy came to Rome. Trajan constructed a road across the Pontine Marshes, and built magnificent bridges across the streams. Buildings, probably mansions, were constructed by the side of this road. In 114 Trajan left Rome to make war on the Armenians and the Parthians. He spent the winter of 114 at Antioch, and in the following year he invaded the Parthian dominions. The most striking and brilliant success attended his arms. In the course of two campaigns (115-6) he conquered the greater part of the Parthian empire, and took the Parthian capital of Ctesiphon. In 116 he sailed down the Tigris and entered the Erythraean Sea (the Persian Gulf). While he was thus engaged the Parthians rose against the Romans, but were again subdued by the generals of Trajan. On his return to Ctesiphon, Trajan was determined to give the Parthians a king, and placed the diadem on the head of Parthamaspatēs. In 117 Trajan fell ill, and as his complaint grew worse he set out for Italy. He lived to reach Selinus in Cilicia, afterwards called Trajanopolis, where he died in August, 117, after a reign of 19 years, 6 months and 15 days. His ashes were taken to Rome in a golden urn, carried in triumphal procession, and deposited under the column that bears his name. He left no children, and he was succeeded by Hadrian. Trajan constructed several great roads in the empire; he built libraries at Rome, one of which, called the Ulpia Bibliotheca, is often mentioned; and a theater in the Campus Martius. His great work was the Forum Trajanum, in the center of which was placed the column of Trajan. Under the reign of Trajan lived Sextus Julius Frontinus, C. Cornelius Tacitus, the Younger Pliny, and various others of less note. Plutarch, Suetonius, and Epictetus survived Trajan].

Timothy (Timotheus), a disciple of Paul, the apostle, was a bishop at Ephesus. He was the son of a pagan father and of widowed mother, a woman of religious faith. He was called by Paul, and after suffering many dangers, received the martyr's crown. However, some say he suffered under Nero, and that two angels appeared to him during his martyrdom, saying, Lift your head to heaven and see. And he saw heaven open—and Jesus holding a costly crown. Jesus said, This crown you will receive by my hand. This was also seen by a man named Appollinaris, who permitted himself to be baptized; immediately after which the judge caused them both to be beheaded. [Timothy was a disciple and companion of Paul. He was a native of Lystra, or perhaps Derbe, both cities of Lycaonia. His father was a Greek, and his mother a Jew. The instructions and prayers of his pious mother, Eunice, and grandmother Lois, and the preachings of Paul during his first visit to Lystra in 48 CE (Acts 14:6) brought about his conversion and his introduction into the ministry. He had witnessed the sufferings of Paul and loved him as his father in Christ (I Tim.1:2; II Tim. 3:10). When the apostle returned to Lystra, about 51 CE, the brethren spoke highly of the merit and good disposition of Timothy, and the apostle determined to take him along with him, for which purpose he circumcised him at Lystra, to disarm the prejudices of the Jews; and he was set apart to the ministry by the laying on of the hands of the elders (I Tim. 4:14; II Tim. 1:6; 4:5). Timothy applied himself to promoting Christianity, and rendered Paul very important service through the whole course of his preaching. He was selected by Paul as his chosen companion and labored zealously. For a time he shared Paul's imprisonment at Rome. The last mention of him is in Paul's request that he go to Rome with him during his second imprisonment].

Titus, also a disciple of Paul and a bishop of the Cretans, after faithful service as a preacher, came to a blessed end; and he received an epistle from Paul out of the city of Nicopolis. [Titus, a distinguished Christian of Greek origin, was converted by the preaching of Paul, whose fellow-laborer he became. He joined Paul and Barnabas in the mission from Antioch to Jerusalem, and was subsequently sent to Corinth, where he labored with success. Paul afterward left him at Crete to establish and regulate the churches of that island. There he received the Epistle to Titus, then at Ephesus, inviting him to Nicopolis; from there he went to Dalmatia before Paul was finally imprisoned at Rome. He labored for many years at Crete and died there at an advanced age.] Crescens (Crescentius) was another disciple of Paul, and by his preaching converted many people to the Christian faith in Galatia. [Crescens (Crescentius), assistant to Paul, probably one of the 70 disciples. He was said to have exercised his ministry in Galatia (II Tim. 4:10)].

Dionysius the Areopagite, a highly renowned philosopher, together with Eleutherius the priest, and Rusticus the Deacon, was martyred at Paris in the persecution by Domitian. For when Pope Clement at the request of Peter, sent him to preach to the Gauls, and he performed the required work of the Lord with zeal, he and his associate, now ninety years of age, were flogged, spit upon, ridiculed, stretched naked upon a grill over the fire, tortured by other means, and finally beheaded in a kneeling posture. Thereafter he carried his head in his arms with the guidance of angels to the place where he finally rested. This is the Dionysius who at Athens spoke of the passion of the Lord Jesus: Either the God of nature suffers, or the whole structure of the world will be ruined. And him also, Paul the apostle afterward baptized, industriously instructed, and ordained as bishop at Athens, where he brought many persons to the Christian faith; as also in Gaul. On the ninth day of October he suffered martyrdom. Being a highly learned man, he left many excellent and enlightening writings. And as he states in one of his books, he was one of the witnesses to the demise of Mary, the mother of God. And when he there after heard that Peter and Paul, the apostles, were taken by Nero, he went there himself to see them. And thereupon he was ordained (as aforesaid) by Pope Clement. [Dionysius, surnamed 'The Areopagite' (Areopagita), because he was one of the Council of the Areopagus, was converted by Paul's preachings at Athens. There are extant several works under his name, which, however, could scarcely have been written before the fifth century of our era. This Dionysius was later confused with another of the same name, also known as Denis, the patron saint of France].

Victorinus, esteemed for his piety and miracles, and a worthy bishop of the city of Emiteina, was taken as a Christian from the city and led to the Emperor Nerva, and by his order he was hanged with his head downward in a region where stinking and sulphurous water flowed. And after he had endured such martyrdom in the name of Jesus for three days, then, so crowned (with martyrdom) he gave up his Spirit to Christ on the 5th day of the month of September. Eutyches (Eutices) and Marcus were also martyred under the Emperor Nerva; for when Aurelian saw that Domitilla, his betrothed, loved these pious men more for their faith and virtue, and Nereus and Achilleus [Nereus and Achilleus are two saints peculiar to Rome. They were the chamberlains of Flavia Domitilla, grandniece of the Emperor Domitian, and daughter of Flavius Clemens and the elder Domitilla, both of whom had suffered martyrdom for adhering to the Christian faith. Flavia Domitilla was betrothed to Aurelian, son of the consul; but her two chamberlains, zealous Christians, prevailed upon her to refuse this union with an idolater; for which cause they were beheaded, and Domitilla was at the same time put to death at Terracina]. were about then also martyred, he assigned these holy men, with the permission of Nerva, as slaves to do the ploughing on his estates. But as they were looked upon with favor by all and worked miracles, they too were finally slain on the 16th day of May. [Saints Victorinus, Maro (here called Marcus) and Eutyches lived in Italy at the end of the first century. For their faith they and Flavia Domitilla were exiled to the island of Ponza. They were afterward released by the Emperor Nerva. However, in the persecution by Trajan they suffered on various days, in various ways, and in different places].

John (Iohannes), the apostle and evangelist, brother of James (Iacobi) the Greater, and the most beloved of Jesus Christ, was called as a disciple in his younger years. They say this pious man lived until the time of Trajan the Emperor. After establishing the Asiatic church he wrote his gospel, being the last; and he confirmed what Matthew, Mark and Luke had written. And, as they say, he nullified the teachings of the Edionite heretics who falsely claimed that Christ did not exist before Mary. For John announced his godly nature, saying: In the beginning was the Word, etc. He also wrote many other things, namely, the Book of Revelation when exiled to the Island of Patmos by Domitian. After the latter's death and the nullification of his decrees, John returned to Ephesus. Up to the time of Trajan he sustained churches there with his counsel and writings. Burdened with years, he rested in the sixty-eighth year after Christ suffered. Then at ninety years he went to church early one Sunday morning and preached to the people; and he climbed into a square crypt that he had caused to be made in the church. And a great light appeared so he could not be seen. When the light disappeared his body was gone, but the crypt was filled with heavenly bread (manna). [John, apostle, and son of Zebedee, was a native of Galilee. Zebedee and his sons, John and James, were fishermen, apparently fairly well off. John and Peter followed Jesus, and were seized by the Jews when the other disciples fled. He was early at the tomb of the Jesus, and after his ascension boldly proclaimed the gospel at Jerusalem (Acts 4:13), though scourged, imprisoned and threatened with death. He is supposed to have been the youngest of the apostles. Jesus is said to have had a particular affection for him and, while on the cross, according to John's gospel, he committed his mother, Mary, to John's care. Legend relates that about 95 CE he was banished to the Island of Patmos where he had the visions described in the Apocalypse. He afterward returned to Ephesus where he lived to a very old age. The Gospel of John, the Apocalypse, and the three Epistles that bear his name, are by at least two different authors, neither of which is likely to be the John who was the disciple of Jesus (all five of these texts were written at the end of the 1st century). And only the author of the Apocalypse (whose prose is very different from the other four texts) tells us his name (John)].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) DIONYSIUS

Dionysius is depicted with his decapitated head that rests on a book he holds in both hands. The head on the book symbolizes that he sacrificed his own head for the Church of Christ. The head is mitred and surrounded by a nimbus. Sometimes the nimbus is placed not about the head, but about the place where the head originally was. St. Denis, patron saint of France, is usually thus depicted.

(B) ST. JOHN

St. John, the apostle and evangelist, is seated in the open country. His left hand firmly grips an inkpot, while with his right he is writing in a book on his lap, probably his Gospel. At his left an eagle, his symbol, is about to take flight. In the sky John sees a vision of Mary and the Child. John is depicted as young, beardless, and with flowing locks. He has a nimbus, the eagle none. This is the same John who is depicted at Folio CVIII verso, undergoing martyrdom.

Folio CX recto

The third persecution of the Christians occurred because the Christian faith spread very rapidly. Although Trajan was an emperor of singular justice and goodness, in the tenth year of his reign certain impious and wicked peoples caused him concern as to whether the Roman Empire might not suffer by secessions in consequence. Therefore he caused a third persecution of the Christians, in which many were slain; so that Pliny the Second, who governed the provinces, moved to compassion by the great number of deaths, wrote to Trajan, the Emperor, that countless thousands of people were being slain daily, who neither violated the Roman law nor committed any other misdeeds, being guilty of nothing more than singing hymns to a certain Christ, as to a god; while they considered adultery and such vices unseemly. And as a result of that Trajan was moved and decreed that the Christians should not be sought out, but that when they presented themselves they should be punished. []

Ignatius, a bishop of Antioch, the third bishop there after Peter, and a disciple of St. John the Evangelist, after having governed the church for many years, was taken prisoner at Antioch and sentenced to be thrown to the wild animals. And while being carried to Rome, on the way he fortified all Christian people in the faith with prayers or with letters, saying: So that I may find Christ, fire, the cross, wild animals, breaking of limbs, or the rending of my whole body, and the tortures of the devil may assail me, so long as I gain Christ. And when he heard the roar of the lions he said: I am the food of God, and shall be ground by the teeth of wild beasts that I may be found pure bread. Once upon a time, as he stood upon a mountain, he heard the angels singing antiphonies, and therefore he ordered that these should also be sung in the churches. In many epistles that he wrote to Mary, he greeted her as the Bearer of Christ. He died in the eleventh year of Trajan.

Ignatius, celebrated by many to this day, and the successor of Peter at Antioch, was the second that obtained the Episcopal office there. Tradition says that he was sent from Syria to Rome, and was cast as food to the wild beasts, on account of his testimony to Christ. And being carried through Asia under a most rigid custody, fortified the different churches in the cities in which he tarried by his discourses and exhortations; particularly to caution them more against the heresies that even then were springing up and prevailing. He exhorted them to adhere firmly to the traditions of the apostles, which for the sake of greater security he attested by committing it to writing. Irenaeus, who knew of his martyrdom, makes mention of his epistles as follows: "As some one of our faith has said, who was condemned to the wild beasts, 'I am the food of God, and am ground by the teeth of wild beasts that I may be found pure bread.'" He was succeeded in the Episcopal office by Heros (Eusebius, ch. 36). A fuller account of this saint is given in the writings of Anna Jameson, in which she quotes from the Peretto Legendario:

Eustathius (Eustachius) surnamed Placidus, Trajan's Master of the Soldiers, was martyred for Christ on September 20th, in this very cruel time, together with his wife Theospita, and their sons, Agapitus and Theospitus. Of his conversion one reads miraculous things. Eustathius saw a beautiful deer, between whose horns appeared a crucifix that spoke to him. And therefore he accepted baptism. [Eustace (Eustathius or Eustachius) was a Roman soldier, and a captain of the guards to the Emperor Trajan. His name before his conversion was Placidus, and he had a beautiful wife and two sons, and lived with great magnificence, practicing all the pagan virtues, particularly those of loyalty to his sovereign and charity to the poor. He was also a great lover of the chase. One day while hunting in the forest he saw before him a white stag of marvelous beauty, and he pursued it eagerly, and the stag fled before him and ascended a high rock. Then Placidus, looking up, beheld between the horns of the stag a cross of radiant light, and on it the image of the crucified Christ; and being astonished by this vision, he fell on his knees, and a voice, which seemed to come from the crucifix, cried to him and said, "Placidus! Why do you pursue me? I am Christ, whom you have until now served without knowing me. Do you now believe?" And Placidus fell on his face, and said, "Lord, I believe!" And the voice answered, saying, "You shall suffer many tribulations for my sake, and shall be tested by many temptations; but be strong and of good courage, and I will not forsake you." To which Placidus replied, "Lord, I am content. Give me patience to suffer!" The vision departed and Placidus returned home, and the next day he and his wife and two sons were baptized, and he took the name of Eustace. But it happened as it was foretold to him. His two sons were carried off by wild beasts, his wife by pirates. But Eustace dried his tears and prayed for resignation. He came to a village, and having been despoiled of all his possessions by robbers, he lived by the labor of his hands. Fifteen years later the Emperor Hadrian, requiring his services, sent out soldiers to seek him, and they found him, and he was restored to all his former honors, and again led on his troops to victory. Meanwhile his sons had been rescued from the beasts, and his wife escaped from the pirates; and, after many years they met and recognized each other, and were reunited. But Eustace was still to suffer; for the emperor commanded a great sacrifice and thanksgiving to his false gods, in consequence of a victory he had gained over the barbarians. Eustace and his family refused to offer incense, remaining steadfast in the Christian faith. The emperor then immediately ordered that they should be shut up in a brazen bull, and a fire kindled under it; and thus they perished together].

Hermes, a Roman citizen, and an illustrious official of that city, was baptized by Alexander the pope, together with his wife and children, his sister Theodosa and twelve hundred and fifty servants and their wives. In this persecution he was imprisoned, and later, on the 28th day of August he was sentenced and martyred with the sword.

Josephus the Jew, called Flavius, a priest under Matathias, the priest's son, a highly renowned historian and in many ways an enlightened man, and a leader in the Jewish wars, in the reigns of Nero and others, was taken prisoner by Vespasian and Titus when the Jewish country was taken, and he was put in honorable service; for he was a good and excellent man, who well understood Christ. He prophesied that Nero would die shortly and that Vespasian would become emperor. Now when this happened, Vespasian released him from all service, and he was afterward taken to Rome, given citizenship, and the name of the Flavian family. And with this same emperor he lived happily for fifteen years. In that time he wrote seven books upon the conquest of the Jews, and for that he earned the honor (as Saint Jerome says) of having a column erected to him at Rome. Afterwards he also wrote a book on the antiquity of the Jews, from the beginning of the world to the time of the Jewish Wars; and many other books; all of which were translated into the Latin tongue by Rufinus the Aquileian. This Josephus was born at the time when Christ was crucified, and he lived up to the time of the Emperor Trajan, and died very honorably. [Josephus, Flavius (37-95? CE), Jewish historian and military commander, was born in the first year of Caligula (37-38). A precocious student of the law, he made trial of the three sects of Judaism – Pharisees, Sadducees and Essenes – before he reached the age of nineteen. Then, having spent three years in the desert with the hermit Banus, who was presumably an Essene, he became a Pharisee. In 64 he went to Rome to intercede on behalf of some priests, his friends, whom the procurator Felix had sent to render account to Caesar for some insignificant offense. Making friends with Alityrus, a Jewish actor, who was a favorite of Nero, Josephus obtained an introduction to the empress Poppaea, and accomplished his purpose with her help. His visit to Rome enabled him to speak from personal experience of the power of the Empire, when he expostulated with the revolutionary Jews on his return to Palestine. But they refused to listen, and he, with all the Jews who did not fly the country, was dragged into the great rebellion of 66. In company with two other priests he was sent to Galilee to persuade those still fighting to lay down their arms and return to the Roman allegiance, which the Jewish aristocracy had not yet renounced. Having sent his two companions back to Jerusalem, he organized the forces at his disposal, and made arrangements for the government of the province. In the spring of 67 the Jewish troops whom Josephus had drilled fled before Vespasian and Titus. He sent to Jerusalem for reinforcements, but none came. With the stragglers who remained, he held a stronghold against the Romans, and finally, when the place was taken, persuaded forty men, who shared his hiding place, to kill one another in turn, rather than commit suicide. They agreed to cast lots, on the understanding that the second should kill the first, and so on. Josephus providentially drew the last lot and prevailed upon his destined victim to live. Their companions were all dead in accordance with the compact; but Josephus survived and surrendered. Being led before Vespasian, he was inspired to prophesy that Vespasian would become emperor, and when this was fulfilled, he was liberated, assumed the family name of Vespasian, and accompanied his patron to Alexandria. He returned to Rome, was awarded a pension, and was made a Roman citizen, receiving an estate in Judea].

Publius (P.) Statius, the Neapolitan, a native of the village of Epiroticus, flourished at Rome; and there he wrote twelve books about the Theban war, and a book about the childhood of Achilles. Also, he was rewarded for his books of Silvae with a country estate at Alba. While he was still young, he took to wife Claudia, the daughter of Apolinaris. And though he began to write the life of Achilles, he was intercepted by death.

Statius (Publius Papinius Statius) was born at Neapolis, about 61 CE, the son of a distinguished grammarian. He accompanied his father to Rome, and under his skillful tuition he speedily rose to fame. He died about 96 CE. Among his extant works are his Thebaid, a heroic poem in 12 books, embodying the ancient legends with regard to the expedition of the Seven against Thebes, and his fascinating fragment of an epic, the Achilleid. The Silvae are a miscellaneous collection of poems, many of which are renowned for their sophisticated wit.

The last sentence in this paragraph, as well as the references to the Achilleid and the Silvae, are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Martial (Marcus Valerius Marcialis) was a native of Spain, held in high esteem at Rome because of his ingenuity, and his various epigrams. He returned to the place of his birth in the time of Trajan, and there he died at an advanced age. [Martial, the epigrammatic poet, was born at Bibilis in Spain, in 43 CE. He came to Rome in 66, and after residing there 35 years, returned to the place of his birth in the third year of Trajan, 100. He lived there upwards of three years at least, on the property of his wife, a lady named Marcella, whom he seems to have married after his return to Bibilis. His fame was extensive and his books were eagerly sought, not only in the city, but also in Gaul, Germany, and Britain. He secured the patronage of Titus and Domitian, and his living conditions appear to have been easy during his Roman residence. He had a mansion in the city and a suburban villa. His extant works consist of a collection of short poems, all included under the title , nearly 1500 in number, and divided into 14 books. These epigrams are distinguished by fertility of imagination and prodigious flow of wit. From no source do we derive more copious information on the national customs and social habits of the Romans during the first century of the Empire].

Stella, also from Padua (Patavinum), not a mean poet, flourished at this time; and he had a wife named Violantilla whom he utterly loved. [Stella, a poet and friend of Statius, who dedicated to him the first book of his , the second poem in which celebrates the marriage of Stella and Violantilla. This Stella is also mentioned by Martial (6.21)].

Juvenal, a satiric poet, native of Aquinum, flourished at Rome. At the age of eighty he was taken from the city and sent to Egypt with a body of troops, not for his honor, but as a punishment. In a short time, however, he succumbed to fear and melancholy. He lived up to the time of the emperor Nerva. [Juvenal (Decimus Junius Juvenalis), the great Roman satirist, of whose life we have but few authentic particulars, was either the son or the "alumnus" of a rich freedman. Until he had nearly reached middle life, he occupied himself in declaiming. Having by his satires offended an actor of the time, who was annoyed at a passage really aimed at Paris, Domitian's favorite, the actor had the poet banished, under the form of a military appointment, to Egypt, where he died shortly afterwards at the age of 80. The only facts with regard to Juvenal upon which we can implicitly rely are that he flourished toward the close of the first century, that Aquinum, if not his birthplace, was at least his chosen residence, and that he is in all probability the friend whom Martial addresses in three epigrams. Each piece he wrote is a finished rhetorical essay, energetic, glowing, and sonorous. He denounces vice in the most indignant terms; but the obvious tone of exaggeration which pervades all his invectives leaves us in doubt how far this sustained passion is real, and how far assumed for show. His extant works consist of 16 satires, all in hexameters].

ILLUSTRATION EUSTACE

Eustace (Eustachius) Roman soldier and martyr, appears as a bearded old man wearing a fur cap and medieval robes. In his hands he holds the head of a deer, a crucifix between its horns, to symbolize the miracle referred to in the text. As a rule this saint is represented in devotional pictures as a Roman soldier, or an armed knight; near him the miraculous stag. The "Conversion of St. Eustace" is only distinguished from the legend of St. Hubert by the classical or warrior costume. The martyrdom of St. Eustace and his family in the brazen bull was not an uncommon subject in early art.

Metz (Metis), a very renowned city in Lower Gaul, was also called Mediomatricus, being the central mother of three cities located about namely, Trier (Treverim) to the north, Toul (Tullum) to the south, and Verdun (Viridinum), to the west, while Metz itself is picturesquely located to the east. The city derived its name from Metius, the Roman, who augmented and strengthened it, although he was not its builder. When Julius Caesar subdued the Gauls and besieged this praiseworthy city, this highly renowned and noble Roman, Metius, enhanced the city and surrounded it with battlements. When he came there in person he conducted the nobility through the fortresses and suburbs, and then, with great jubilation, into the city itself. He gave it the name of Metz in accordance with an inscription on a stone found beneath the surface of the earth. Some say it was called Dundunum (Dividunum), that is, Mountain of the Gods, a mountain that may be seen to the north and west. The city is located on the shores of the Moselle and the Seille (Salie). It is well populated, and a mighty episcopal city, having accepted the holy Gospel from Bishop Clement, Pope Clement's uncle, who was sent there to preach. This same Clement was the noble son of the Roman consul, and a brother of Faustinian, the father of Clement the Pope; and he was baptized by St. Peter. When Gaul was laboring under various erroneous beliefs, he was consecrated a bishop, and together with Celesta the priest, and Felice the deacon, was chosen to exalt the Christian faith in these parts. And afterwards, in honor of St. Peter, they erected a chapel called Gozzia within three thousand feet of the city. During a chase the Count of Metz came upon these men and brought them into the city. This noble city is very strong and mighty, accustomed to war and the use of arms, rich in fields, farms, vineyards, forests and moisture, and is very fertile. However, by reason of a certain contamination it was very arid for a long time. A great dragon lay hidden in the sandy region where a costly building, in the nature of a boundary mark was erected by Octavian. These parts the dragon poisoned with his breath; and in consequence the south and east gates were closed to all. But the pious Clement, who through his virtue and teachings had led the people to worship God, deprived this animal of all its poison by means of his stole; and from that moment this region has been free of all unclean animals. Later he also established St. Peter's church beyond the walls as a mistress of the entire bishopric. This church, having been exalted by the devotion of the people, was afterward consecrated to St. Stephen, and became an episcopal church. Beyond the city he established a chapel to St. John the Baptist, and in his old age a church not far removed from the city and in a position where it could be more openly appreciated; and in it he provided a crypt and a wholesome spring. Before the portal he erected an altar in honor of St. Peter, its patron. Having secured the city for the Lord and freed it of all uncleanness, and having given it a good administration for twenty-five years and four months, he gave up his Spirit to the Lord on the 23rd day of the month of November, having given renown to the city of Metz by his piety. [Metz, the Roman Divodurum, was the chief town of the Mediomatrici, and was also called by the Romans Mediomatrix. Metz is a contracted form. Still later it was called Metis or Mettis. In classical times it was located in what was called Gallia Belgica. The Mediomatrici were a people in the southeast of Gallia Belgica, on the Moselle, south of Treves. Their territory originally extended to the Rhine. Caesar describes it as one of the oldest and most important towns in Gaul. The Romans recognized its strategical importance, fortified it, and supplied it with water by an imposing aqueduct, the remains of which still exist. Under the Roman emperors Metz was connected by military roads with Toul, Langres, Lyons, Strasbourg, Verdun, Reims, and Trier. Christianity was introduced in the third century, and in the middle of the fifth the town was plundered by Attila. Later it came into the possession of the Franks, and was made the capital of Austrasia. On the partition of the Carolingian realms in 843, Metz fell to the share of emperor Lothair I as the capital of Lorraine. Its bishops, whose creation reaches back to the fourth century, now began to be very powerful. Metz became a free imperial town in the 13th century, and soon became prosperous. Having adopted the reformed doctrines in 1552 and 1553, it fell into the hands of the French and was defended against Charles V by Francis duke of Guise. It now sank to the level of a French provincial town, and its population dwindled from 60,000 to about 22,000. At the peace of Westphalia in 1648 Metz, with Toul and Verdun, was formally ceded to France. It was taken by the Germans in 1870 and ceded to them in 1871. It was retroceded to France after the First World War].

Suteonius Tranquillus, historian, advocate, and master of letters, a native Roman of a patrician family of consuls, was held in high esteem by the Romans at this time. Under emperor Hadrian (Adriano) he was beloved and regarded as very reliable because of his intimate relations with Pliny of Novum Comum. [Novum Comum, a town in Cisalpine Gaul, birthplace of Pliny the Younger (also known as Pliny the Second); also called Comensis, and now Como]. His versatility enabled him to write a brilliant work on the aforesaid 12 Caesars; and in it he makes frequent mention of historical events and practices in the time of the ancients. He also wrote an exceptional book of illustrious men, and treated of many other things. But the Emperor Hadrian finally deposed him from consular office because of his secret intimacy with Sabina, Hadrian's wife; for there was a rumor that he misused her. He lived to the time of Emperor Antoninus Verus. [Suetonius Tranquillus, the Roman historian, was born at the beginning of the reign of Vespasian. He practiced as an advocate at Rome in the reign of Trajan, and lived on intimate terms with the younger Pliny, many of whose letters are addressed to him. He was afterward appointed private secretary to Hadrian; but the emperor deprived him of this office on the ground of associating with Sabina, the emperor's wife, without his permission. He wrote many works of which the only one extant is the , of whom the first is Julius Caesar and the last is Domitian. His language is very brief and precise, but sometimes obscure, and without any affectation or ornament. He tells a prodigious number of scandalous anecdotes about the Caesars, and his work seems to reflect critically on the maxim that 'absolute power corrupts absolutely.' Because he had access to the imperial records, and was himself a contemporary of the emperors Titus and Domitian, his work is invaluable to the historian of the late Republic and early Empire].

Pliny the Second, philosopher and orator, of Novum Comum, as well as a celebrated historian, was held in honor at this time. Although he participated in the cares and affairs of the State, he so zealously concerned himself with the liberal arts, that no one, even with leisure at his disposal, could have written more. He was a talented man of ingenious mind, possessed incredible learning and great industry; and he slept little. In the summer, during his leisure moments, he lay in the sun reading books and making notes and extracts from them; for he read nothing without doing so. He stated that no book is so bad that it contains nothing useful, and held that all time is lost that is not devoted to learning. Being of this frame of mind, he produced many books—one about knightly warfare, two on the life of Pomponius the Second, twenty about the Germanic Wars, in which are collected all the wars of the Romans with the Germans; for he was in the wars in Germany. Also, eight books of doubtful sermons, and 37 books of the histories of nature, a work both broad and learned, and no less varied than nature itself. While he was in command of the fleet at Misenum, he endeavored to ascertain the cause of the eruption of Mount Vesuvius; but contrary winds prevented his return, and he was suffocated by the dust and sparks, and died at the age of fifty-six. [C. Plinius Secundus (Pliny the Elder), the celebrated author of the (which Schedel makes much use of in the) was born in 23 CE, probably at Novum Comum (Como) in the north of Italy, and there the estates of the elder Pliny were situated. He came to Rome while still young, and being descended from a family of wealth and distinction, he had the means at his disposal for availing himself of the best teachers in the imperial city. At 23 he went to Germany, where he served under L. Pomponius Secundus, of whom he afterward wrote a memoir. He was later appointed to the command of a troop of cavalry, and traveled over most of the German frontier. At the same time he commenced the history of the Germanic wars, which he later completed in twenty books. He returned to Rome with Pomponius and applied himself to the study of jurisprudence. He practiced for some time as a pleader but does not appear to have distinguished himself in that capacity. The greater part of the reign of Nero he spent in retirement, no doubt at his native place. During this period he wrote a grammatical work in eight books, entitled ('Doubtful/Ambiguous Speech') and toward the close of Nero's reign was appointed procurator in Spain. He was here in 71 when his brother-in-law died, leaving his son, the younger Pliny, to the guardianship of his uncle, who by reason of his absence, was obliged to leave him to the care of Virginius Rufus. Pliny returned to Rome in the reign of Vespasian, when he adopted his nephew. He had known Vespasian in the Germanic wars, and the emperor received him into the number of his most intimate friends. Of his manner of life at this period his nephew gives an account (3.5). It was his practice to begin to spend a portion of the night in study by lamplight at the festival of the Vulcanalia (toward the end of August), at first at a late hour of the night, in winter at one or two o'clock in the morning. Before it was light he visited the emperor Vespasian, and after executing such commissions as he might be charged with, returned home and devoted the remaining time to study. After a simple meal he would, in the summertime, lie in the sunshine while someone read to him, he himself making notes and extracts. He never read anything without doing this, for he used to say there was no book so bad but some good might be gotten out of it. He would then take a cold bath, and after a snack, sleep a little, and then pursue his studies. Such was his mode of life in the bustle of the city. In the country, the time spent in the bath was practically the only interval not allotted to study, and even this he reduced to the shortest amount of time. When on a journey he had a secretary at his side with a book and tablets. Thus he amassed an enormous amount of material, and at his death he left his nephew 160 volumes of notes, written in extremely small handwriting on both sides. With some reason might his nephew say that, when compared to Pliny, those who had spent their whole lives in literary pursuits seemed as if they had spent them in nothing else than sleep and idleness. From this material he compiled his celebrated , published in 77. He perished in the eruption of Vesuvius at the age of 56. He was stationed at Misenum at the time, in command of the Roman fleet; and it was his anxiety to examine more closely the extraordinary phenomenon, which led him to sail to Stabiae, where he landed and perished. His is his only work that has come down to us. By natural history the ancients understood more than moderns would usually include in the subject. It embraced astronomy, meteorology, geography, mineralogy, zoology, botany—everything that does not relate to the products or results of human skill or faculties. But Pliny even went beyond these limitations by digressing on human institutions and inventions, and on the history of the fine arts. In his preface he says it comprises 20,000 matters of importance drawn from about 2,000 volumes. It is divided into 37 books, and is a wonderful monument of human industry].

Plutarch (Plutarchus) of Chareonea (Cheroneus) was a philosopher and a very eloquent historian. He was a magistrate under the emperor Trajan, and at this time was held in great esteem for his intelligence and reliability. Concerning him Polycrates, in his history, states: Plutarch is a man who is truthful in his writings, and his words are all intelligible. In sacredness of custom he was so absolute that he might easily have been taken for a governor under the emperor. This Plutarch labored diligently to infuse into the emperor and his own reigning student four things: reverence for god, self-cultivation, discipline of officials, and love and protection of one's subjects. And as he was a highly learned man, he wrote many books upon various matters, namely: On Educating Children, On the Political Constitution, On Patience, On the Poet Homer, On the Moderation of Magistrates, On Musicians. (Also) apothegms which very many of our (people) knew as maxims or proverbs, and which, when he was living with Trajan on such friendly terms, he assembled with great industry as a very pleasing gift for him. In addition, he assembled broadly and elegantly the biographies of as many famous Greeks as of Romans. [The passage from the phrase 'On Educating Children' until the end of this sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. And he wrote many other things. [Plutarch, the celebrated Greek biographer and philosopher, was born at Chaeronea in Boeotia. The year of his birth is unknown. He was studying philosophy when Nero was making his tour of Greece in 66 CE, from which we may assume he was a young man. He spent some time in Rome and other parts of Italy. He did not concern himself with Roman literature until later in life. He lectured at Rome in the reign of Domitian, discharged various magisterial offices, and held a priesthood. He is immortalized by his , a series of biographies that pair a famous Greek and Roman individual (e.g, Alexander the Great and Julius Caesar), and which had a profound influence on later writers (e.g, Shakespeare) and thinkers. But he also wrote on an incredibly wide array of topics, collected under the title].

Hegesippus (Egisippus), the pious and highly learned man, (as Eusebius states) flourished at this time, and among other things wrote a history of the church from the time of the suffering of Christ Jesus to this time, setting down thoughts which he himself followed in his lifetime. [Hegesippus, according to Eusebius (4.8), "holds a distinguished rank" among the champions against heresy. "This author compiled, in five books, the plain tradition of the apostolic doctrine, in a most simple style of composition."]

Dion, philosopher, and a native of Prusa (Prusie), flourished at this time and wrote much about the empire. [Dion Chrysostomus was born at Prusa in Bithynia, about the middle of the first century of our era. He received a careful education, increased his knowledge by travel, and came to Rome in the reign of Vespasian; but having incurred the suspicions of Domitian, was obliged to leave the city. On the advice of the Delphic oracle, he put on beggar's dress, and so visited Thrace, Mysia, Scythia, and the country of the Getae. After the death of Domitian he used his influence with the army on the frontier in favor of his friend Nerva, and seems to have returned to Rome immediately after his accession. Trajan also entertained the highest esteem for him, and showed him marked favor. Dion died at Rome in 117 CE, the most eminent of Greek rhetoricians and sophists in the time of the Roman Empire. Eighty of his orations are extant, but they are more like essays on political, moral, and philosophical subjects. All are written in pure Attic Greek, and refined and elegant in style].

Basilides (Basilidas), a certain heretic, and a very smart man, concluded his life at this time. He wrote twenty three books on the gospels, and left these behind. But Agrippa, at this time the most learned among the Christians, by means of his learning, vanquished and nullified the books of the same heretic, and to his terror caused him to be laughed at by others. [According to Eusebius, Basilides was an arch-heretic, whose writings were refuted by the learning of others, including that of Agrippa Castor, one of the most distinguished writers of that day. According to Agrippa, Basilides wrote 24 books on the gospels, in which he used certain barbarous names in order to astonish those the more who are easily ensnared by such things; that like Pythagoras, he enjoined a five years' silence upon his followers; that he also taught that it "was indifferent for those that tasted of things sacrificed to idols, and were betrayed unwarily to abjure the faith in times of persecution." (Eusebius, 4.7)]

All these were martyred under Domitian:

- Enodius, martyr
- Sileas, suffered martyrdom in Macedonia
- Julian, bishop of Le Mans (Cenomanensis)
- Paul, bishop
- Saturnine (Saturninus), bishop of Toulouse
- Aristarchus (Aristarcus), martyr
- Maron, martyr
- Marcialis, bishop of (Etandensis?)
- Eutropius, bishop of Aquitaine
- Gregory (Gregorius), warrior bishop
- Eutyches (Eutices), etc.

The following were illustrious under Trajan:

- Herenius, bishop of Lyons
- Jovinus, priest and martyr, disciple of St. Dionysius
- Caranus (Carannus) of Chartres, martyr
- Lucianus of Beauvais, disciple of the blessed Peter
- Eutropius, bishop, and Euphrosyne (Eufrosina)
- Eugene of Toulouse
- Sulpicius
- Santinus, bishop of Meaux, disciple of Dionysius
- Thaurinus, bishop of York
- Theodora
- Saint Servilianus
- Sagericus, bishop of Cambrai, disciple of Dionysius

Alexander the pope was by birth a Roman. He was young in years, but mature in manners. He was successor to Pope Evaristus and in office to the time of Emperor Hadrian (Adrianus). By his skill and piety he converted many nobles to the faith, and made various laws for the conduct of the church: Firstly, that no one, under pain of excommunication, should obstruct a papal legate. Likewise, he ordered that no cleric should be accused before a temporal judge, and that only one mass is to be celebrated on a single day, and by one person. So also the wafers should be made not of leavened but of unleavened (dough). And that holy water should be kept in the churches and in the bedchambers to drive away the devil. Now, having performed countless miracles, and among these cured Balbina, daughter of Quirinus, the Roman, and baptized the same tribune with all his household, and having held three consecrations in December, he, together with Eventius and Theodorus, the deacons, was martyred on the third day of the month of May. He sat (in office) ten years seven months and two days; and the chair was vacant 25 days. [Alexander I was bishop (pope) of Rome from 106 to 115. He has been identified, without any foundation, with Alexander, a martyr of the Via Nomentana, whose feast day is May 3rd].

Year of the World 5323 | Year of Christ 124

Sixtus the pope was a native Roman. He ordained that the holy vessels and objects belonging to the holy office were not to be touched by anyone other than the person performing such office, and particularly not by any woman. And so the "corporal" should be made of nothing but linen and purest cloth. He also ordered that in the office of the mass the Sanctus should be sung. In these times, because of many slayings, few could be found who dared to acknowledge Christ, and when the Christians of Gaul desired a leader, Sixtus sent Peregrinus, a Roman citizen, there. But after these same Gauls had been confirmed in the faith, and Peregrinus returned to Rome, he was slain. Sixtus, after performing three consecrations in the month of December, was crowned with martyrdom and buried in the Vatican beside St. Peter. He sat ten years, three months and 21 days; and the papal chair was then vacant but two days. [Sixtus I was the sixth bishop (pope) of Rome (c. 116-125) and took his name on that account].

Year of the World 5333 | Year of Christ 134

Telesphorus (Thelesphorus), a native of Greece, lived in the time of Antoninus Pius the emperor. He was a man of exceptional learning and virtue. He ordained that the fast (Lent) should be kept for seven weeks before Easter, and that on the eve of the celebration of the Birth of Christ Jesus Christ, three masses should be said at night; and before the blessing of the Host, the Gloria in Excelsis should be sung. And having performed four consecrations in the month of December, and ordained fifteen priests, eight deacons, and thirteen bishops, he suffered martyrdom and was buried beside the body of St. Peter. He sat eleven years, three months and 22 days; and the chair was vacant for seven days. [Telesphorus, bishop (i.e. pope) of Rome, from about 126 till about 137, according to Irenaeus, suffered martyrdom].

Year of the World 5343 | Year of Christ 144

Hyginus (Higinus) the pope, a Greek from Athens, successor to Pope Telesphorus in the time of Emperor Antoninus Pius, wisely established order among the clergy, classifying them according to rank. Churches were not to be consecrated without the office of the mass; nor was their number to be increased or decreased without the consent of the bishop or archbishop. He also decreed that a godfather and godmother be present at the baptism or confirmation. This was a highly learned man, and he wrote an excellent epistle upon the unity and trinity of God, to be read by all Christian believers. And after he had performed three consecrations in the month of December, he died and was buried beside the body of St. Peter. After he had sat for four years three months and four days, the chair rested for four days. [Hyginus (c. 140) was the eighth pope. It was during his pontificate (c. 137-140) that the Gnostic heresies began to appear in Rome].

Year of the World 5353 | Year of Christ 154

Pius the pope, an Italian of Aquileia, lived in the time of M. Antoninus Verus the emperor, and in common with Hermas (Hermete) wrote a book entitled the Shepherd, in which an angel in the likeness of a shepherd bade him to advise all people to celebrate Easter on Sunday; and this he did. He likewise ordered that certain heretics of the Jewish faith should not be baptized. At the instance of the pious woman Praxedis, and in honor of her sister Pudenciana, at Rome, he performed consecrations in the street called Patricius, and granted pardons, receiving gifts, and often saying mass there. And there also he established a baptismal font. And for the priests' neglectful handling of the blood and body of Christ [The 'blood and body of Christ' were the wine and wafer used in the sacrament of communion]. he imposed the penance, that wherever it might fall, there they were to lick it up. After having, in the exercise of great virtue, on five occasions, consecrated nineteen priests, twenty-nine deacons and ten bishops, he died a martyr to Christ, and was buried with his ancestors. He sat eleven years, four months and three days; and the chair rested for thirteen days. [Pius I, pope from about 142 to 154, was the brother of Hermas, author of . Hermas, a disciple of the Apostle Paul, and one of the apostolic fathers, is supposed to be the same person as the Hermas who is mentioned in Paul's Epistle to the Romans (16:14). He wrote a Greek work entitled , of which a Latin translation is still extant. Its object is to instruct persons in the duties of Christian life].

Folio CXII recto

Hadrian (Adrianus), surnamed Aelius (Helius), the son of the first cousin of Trajan, fifteenth Roman emperor, of the ancient Picentian ancestry, was born at Rome of his mother Domitia Paulina. He lost his father at ten years of age, and Trajan and Caelius (Celium) were his guardians. He was so accomplished in Greek learning that some called him Graeculus, that is, the little Greek. At the age of fifteen he returned to his native city and entered the military. After that Trajan took him from his home and adopted him as his son. After he received the empire, he was counted among the best of emperors, and rightfully so. At first he was opposed to the Christians, but finally, after learning of their piety and kindness toward him, he became their particular benefactor. He was so well regarded by the Romans that he was deservedly called the father of his country; for he was liberal, brilliant, mild, learned in the Greek and Latin tongues, and well informed in the arts of music and medicine. At the request of the Athenians he made laws for them in the manner of Dracon and Solon, and gave them a remarkable library. At Rome he erected a bridge bearing his name, and in the Vatican, by the Tiber, he built a tomb, now called the Castel Sant'Angelo; and he also built many other wonderful structures. Foremost of all, he enlarged and improved the city of Jerusalem, in Judea, which was destroyed by Titus, with battlements and buildings so that within its walls he enclosed the place of Jesus Christ's suffering. He called the city Aelia (Helyam), after himself, and decreed that none but Christians were to enter it, and that no Jew was to come into it nor to be given any power there. And finally, burdened with serious illness, he adopted Antoninus Pius. He died in the twenty-second year of his reign, at the age of 72. In person he was an erect man, of handsome stature, and with a long beard. [P. Aelius Hadrianus, usually called Hadrian, Roman emperor (117-138 CE), was born at Rome in 76 CE. He lost his father at the age of ten, and was brought up by his kinsman Ulpius Trajanus (afterwards emperor) and Caelius Attianus. From an early age he studied with zeal the Greek language and literature. At fifteen he went to Spain, where he entered upon his military career; and he subsequently served as military tribune in Lower Moesia. After Trajan became emperor, Hadrian married Julia Sabina, granddaughter of Trajan's sister Marciana. This marriage was brought about through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan; and from this time Hadrian rose rapidly in the emperor's favor. He accompanied Trajan in most of his expeditions, and distinguished himself in the second war against the Dacians, was made governor of Pannonia, and subsequently fought under Trajan against the Parthians. When serious illness obliged Trajan to leave the East, he placed Hadrian at the head of the army. Trajan died at Cilicia on his journey to Rome, and Hadrian, pretending to have been adopted by Trajan, was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria, and the senate confirmed the election. Returning to Rome, he sought to gain the good will of the senate by gladiatorial exhibitions and liberal largesses, and also canceled all arrears of taxes due the state for the last fifteen years. The remainder of his reign was disturbed by few wars, and he spent the greater part of it in traveling through the various provinces of the empires. He visited Gaul, Germany, Britain, Spain, Africa, and the East, and took up residence at Athens for three years. Athens was his favorite city, and he conferred many privileges on its inhabitants. The most important war during his reign was that against the Jews, which broke out in 131. The Jews revolted in consequence of his establishment of a colony under the name of Aelia Capitolina on the side of Jerusalem, and of their having been forbidden to practice the rite of circumcision. The war was not brought to an end until 136, after the country had been nearly reduced to a wilderness. During the last few years of his life Hadrian's health failed, and he became suspicious and cruel, putting to death several persons of distinction. Having no children, he adopted L. Aelius Verus and gave him the title of Caesar in 136; but Verus died January 1, 138, whereupon Hadrian adopted Antoninus, later surnamed Pius, and conferred the title on him. In July 138 Hadrian died in his 62nd year, and was succeeded by Antoninus. Hadrian's reign was regarded as one of the happiest in Roman history. His policy was to preserve peace with foreign nations, not to extend his empire, but to secure the old provinces and promote their welfare. He paid particular attention to the administration of justice in the provinces, as well as in Italy. But what has rendered his name more illustrious than anything else are his numerous and magnificent architectural works. His mausoleum at Rome forms the groundwork of the present castle of St. Angelo (Castel Sant'Angelo). He was a patron of learning and literature, as well as of the arts. He was himself an author, and wrote numerous works in prose and in verse, all of which are lost except a few epigrams in the Greek and Latin Anthologies].

Antoninus Pius, the sixteenth Roman emperor, received the empire, together with his sons Aurelius and Lucius. He was the adopted son of Hadrian, and the husband of his daughter. On his father's side his origin was of Gaul. He ruled with such discretion and kindness that he was deservedly called the Pious and the father of his country. He was never bitter or harsh toward any person in particular, nor against people in general, and it is stated that he often said that he would rather preserve one citizen than slay a thousand enemies. He was such a just man that many kings and peoples laid down their arms at his request, and submitted their quarrels and wars to him for decisions, and followed his judgment and decision. He was a tall, handsome person, and when by reason of his tallness and age he became bent, tablets of linden wood were laid upon his chest so that he walked upright. Because of his goodness, mildness, good sense and virtue, the Roman senate pronounced him divine. At his own expense and by loans he kindly helped the Roman citizens to restore public and private buildings that the inundation of the Tiber had damaged. At last he died, as if in sleep, at the age of seventy years, at the end of a reign of twenty-two years and three months. [Antonius Pius, Roman emperor (138-161 CE), whose full name in the early part of his life was Titus Aurelius Fulvus Boionius Arrius Antoninus. His paternal ancestors came from Gaul; but he himself was born at Lanuvium, September 19, 86 CE. From an early age he gave promise of his future worth. In 120 he was consul, and subsequently proconsul of the province of Asia. On his return to Rome he lived on terms of greatest intimacy with Hadrian, who adopted him in 138. Henceforth he bore the name of T. Aelius Hadrianus Antoninus Caesar, and on Hadrian's death ascended the throne. The senate conferred upon him the title of Pius ('the dutifully affectionate'), because he persuaded them to grant to his father Hadrian the apotheosis and the other honors usually paid to deceased emperors, which they had at first refused to bestow upon Hadrian. The reign of Antoninus is almost a blank in history—a blank caused by the suspension for a time of war, violence, and crime. He may have been one of the best princes that ever ruled, and all his thoughts and energies were dedicated to the happiness of his people. No attempt was made to achieve new conquests, and various insurrections were easily quelled by his legates. His private life was beyond reproach. He was faithful to his faithless wife Faustina. He died at Lorum, March 7th, 161, at the age of 75 years. He was succeeded by M. Aurelius, whom he adopted when he himself was adopted by Hadrian, and to whom he gave his daughter, Faustina, in marriage].

Marcus Antoninus, surnamed Verus, a philosopher, was born at Rome, and reared there in the house of his ancestors. And although he was called to the high office of emperor, he went to the house of Apollonius the teacher to hear the teaching of Sextus the grandson of Plutarch. He was reared in the bosom of Hadrian, and was called Verissimus, that is, the most truthful. Afterwards, together with his brother Lucius Aurelius Commodus, he ruled the empire well for 19 years. Together they conducted the war against the Parthians with great vigor and success, and triumphed over the enemy. But soon afterwards Commodus died of a stroke and Antoninus ruled the empire alone. And although from youth fortune smiled upon him, yet good nature and learning fought within him and he was by many called a philosopher. Yet his art did not interfere with military affairs, for with great vigor and good fortune he, together with his son Antoninus Commodus, defeated and triumphed over the German Marcomanni, Squadi(?) and Sarmatians. When he was about to go to this war, but had nothing with which to pay the soldiers, he sold all his royal household goods and his wife's jewelry in Trajan's Forum. But after he returned, having defeated the enemy, he returned the money to the purchasers. Yet those who would not return their purchases were not compelled to do so. After his victories, he was generous to all for the common good. And so he released a number of countries from tribute, and moderated severe laws by the passage of new ones. For those reasons he caused himself to be loved by the people, so that he attained the name of "The Pious;" and he had no counterpart at home. Finally he died at the age of sixty-one in the 18th year of his reign. [M. Aurelius Antoninus, Roman emperor (161-180 CE), commonly called "the philosopher," was born at Rome April 20, 121 CE. He was adopted by Antoninus Pius immediately after the latter had been himself adopted by Hadrian, received the title of Caesar, and married Faustina, the daughter of Pius. On the death of the latter he succeeded to the throne, but he admitted to an equal share in the sovereign power with L. Ceionius Commodus, who had been adopted by Pius at the same time as Marcus himself. The two emperors from that point on bore respectively the names M. Aurelius Antoninus and L. Aurelius Verus. Soon after their accession Verus was dispatched to the East, and for four years carried on a successful war against the king of Parthia. Meanwhile Italy was threatened by tribes on its northern frontier. Both emperors set out to encounter the foe, and the contest was continued with varying success during the whole life of M. Aurelius, whose headquarters were generally at Pannonia. After the death of Verus, Aurelius prosecuted the war against the Marcomanni with great success. The Marcomanni and other northern tribes concluded a peace with Aurelius in 175. Aurelius returned to Rome at the end of 176; but in 178 he set out again for Germany, where the tribes had renewed the war. He gained several victories, but died in the middle of the war, March 17, 180, at the age of 59 and the 20th year of his reign. The leading feature in his character was his devotion to philosophy and literature. We possess a work by M. Aurelius entitled , in which he registered his thoughts and feelings on moral and religious topics].

The fourth persecution of the Church occurred in the time of Marcus Antoninus and Lucius Aurelius, and many were crowned with martyrdom. But after this persecution suddenly came lamentations and death, which devastated many lands far and wide, chiefly Italy, which was so depopulated that some villages and fields were left without inhabitants or homes. Nor was there a respite in arms, and wars swept over the East, Illyricum (i.e, Greece), Italy and Gaul. There were also earthquakes, sinking of cities, floods, and damage done by locusts in the fields.

Sophia, the noble woman, came to Rome with her three daughters, Faith, Hope and Charity, and by the example of their sanctity and sobriety converted many noble women to Christ. When this became known to Hadrian (Adriano) the emperor, he caused them to be brought before him. They were very beautiful and learned in the Holy Scriptures. After lengthy controversy, she ended her life in martyrdom through various tortures. And when the mother afterwards buried her daughters seventeen miles outside the city, she said in anguish, My daughters, take me to you; and immediately she rested in peace as if fallen asleep.

Seraphia, a virgin of Antioch, suffered at Rome at this time for the sake of Christ. She was taken to a dark place to be dishonored by two lascivious men; but was not molested by them. After that she was tortured with fire, and upon the order of the judge she was beaten with cudgels, and finally slain with a sword. Sabina, whom she converted, caused her to be buried on the 29th day of the month of July. [Seraphia was the Greek slave of Sabina, whom she converted. They were beheaded together, and died encouraging each other (June 2nd)].

Sabina, a very famous woman, former wife of the celebrated Valentinus, and the twelfth daughter of Herodis Metalla, was educated in the faith of Jesus Christ by the aforementioned Seraphia, and practiced works of mercy. She was executed by the sword, at Rome, because she would not sacrifice to the gods. Sabina, who had converted her, had her placed in her (i.e, Sabina's) own tomb on the fourth of the Kalends of August. [Sabina was a noble Roman matron who suffered martyrdom in the time of the Emperor Hadrian (August 29, second century). The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Quadratus, a bishop at Athens, and a disciple of the apostles and a highly learned man, again assembled the churches, which in those violent times had been dismembered through great fear. And for the protection of the Christian status, he wrote a book of faith and understanding, filled with apostolic teachings. Finally he also suffered martyrdom on the 26th day of the month of May.

Quadratus, one of the Apostolic Fathers, and an early apologist for the Christian religion, passed the early part of his life in Asia Minor. He presented his Apology to Hadrian in the 10th year of his reign (126 CE). This Apology has been long lost. Of him Eusebius writes (Ecclesiastical History 4.3; Bohn, p. 118): "But Trajan having held the sovereignty for twenty years, less six months, is succeeded in the imperial office by Aelius Hadrian. To him, Quadratus addressed a discourse as an apology for the religion that we profess, because certain malicious persons attempted to harass our brethren. The work is still in the hands of some of the brethren, as also in our own, from which anyone may see evident proof, both of the understanding of the man and of his apostolic faith.

"This writer shows the antiquity of the age in which he lived, in these passages: 'The deeds of our Savior were always before you, for they were true miracles, those that were healed, those that were raised from the dead, who were seen, not only when healed and when raised, but were always present. They remained living a long time, not only while our Lord was on earth, but likewise when he had left the earth. So that some of them have also lived to our times.' Such was Quadratus."

Quirinus, first a tribune, and then a bishop, was at this time martyred in Illyricum, that is, Slavonia, in the city of Siscia on the 4th day of the month of June. A millstone was tied to his hand, and so he was drowned. Zeno, a Roman senator, together with ten thousand and two hundred brethren, was slain in this tumult on Christ's account. [Quirinus, the Tribune, after having been converted and baptized, was condemned to have his tongue, hands and feet cut off. He was then drawn by oxen to the place of final execution and beheaded. The tale is legendary].

Achatius Primicerius was, together with ten thousand people, martyred on Mount Ararat, in Armenia, by Hadrian (Adriano) the emperor. Then, converted by the angels, they obtained victory against the enemy. When Hadrian and Antoninus learned that they had become Christians, they cried, and ordered them to be scourged; and after that they caused three-pointed spikes to be strewn on the ground for a distance of twenty stadia, [The stadium was a Greek measure of distance, approximately 600 feet, which was the distance between the terminal pillars of the stadium at Olympia; afterwards adopted by the Romans for nautical and astronomical purposes mainly. It was equal to 125 Roman paces, or 625 Roman feet; 8 stadia making a Roman mile]. for the pious ones to walk upon with their bare feet; but the angel of God went before them and gathered up the spikes, so that they would not be injured. Afterwards, in emulation of Christ, they suffered martyrdom, and their souls were taken up to heaven.

The story of the Ten Thousand Martyrs is purely legendary, and as Baring-Gould observes, it will be difficult to discover a minute particle of fact in it after we have washed out the fable. The story is to the effect that in the reign of the emperors Hadrian and his adopted son Antoninus, the Gadarenes and people of the Euphrates revolted; at which event the two emperors marched at the head of 9,000 men against the insurgents. This war is all pure fiction. The tale continues that when the emperors discovered that the rebels outnumbered them by a thousand men, they ran away with seven. But the nine thousand, of whom Achatius and others were officers, where suddenly converted to Christianity by an angel, and as Christians they rushed upon the enemy with a shout and put them to flight. The rebels fell into the lake and down precipices, and not one survived. But it was necessary that Achatius and his companions receive further instruction; so the angel carried off the nine thousand to the top of Mount Ararat, and seating himself on the perennial snow, began to instruct them; and seven more blessed spirits descended from heaven to aid in the necessary Christian instruction.

The emperors sent out scouts to ascertain what had become of those soldiers who had not run away with them. The scouts saw nine thousand black specks on the snow of Mount Ararat; and the nine thousand newly converted Christians came down to meet them and defied the emperors, who, after calling allies to their assistance, set off with 5,000,000 men to destroy completely the Christians. Messengers were dispatched to the Christians. They descended, and were conducted before Hadrian and Antoninus, who urged them to return to their allegiance; but they refused. For this reason the emperor ordered them stoned, but the stones, instead of hurting the Christians, bounded back and struck the servants of the emperors on the head. This sight so astonished the soldiers that a thousand were converted and joined the Christian band, making up the number of 10,000. Then the emperors ordered them crucified on the top of the mountain. The bodies of the martyrs were taken down and buried by angels, each in a separate grave. The church did not recognize these martyrs till Baronius drew up the modern Roman Martyrology in the 16th century.

Papias, a bishop of Jerusalem (Hierosolimitanus [The chronicler or his source mistakenly describes Papias as bishop of Jerusalem. He was, in fact, a bishop of Hierapolis (whose spelling is, at least in the first four letters, the same of Jerusalem in Latin)]), and a disciple of John the Apostle, was so highly learned that because of his art and learning, many learned men imitated him in their poetry; such as Irenaeus (Hereneus), Apollinaris, Tertullian (Tertullianus), Victorinus of Pettau (Pictaviensis), Lactantius Firmianus, and the aforesaid Quadratus. [Papias was an early Christian writer, said to have been a disciple of the Apostle John, and a companion of Polycarp. He was bishop of Hierapolis, on the border of Phrygia. He taught the doctrine of the Millennium, maintaining that there will be for a thousand years after the resurrection of the dead, a bodily reign of Christ on this earth. Only fragments of his works are extant].

Aristides, an Athenian philosopher, and formerly a disciple of Christ, sent a book, containing our teachings, to the Emperor Hadrian, as Quadratus had done. By reason of this book Hadrian was influenced to regard the slaying of the Christians as unjust; and for that reason he wrote Minutius Fundanus, the proconsul of Asia, to put to death only in case there is an accused and the offense is apparent and known. [Aristides, the apologist, is spoken of by Eusebius as follows: "Aristides, a man also faithfully devoted to the religion which we profess, like Quadratus, has left to posterity a defense of the faith, addressed to Hadrian. This work is also preserved by a great number, even to this day." (4.3; Bohn, p. 118)]

Secundus, an Athenian philosopher, was held in honor at this time. He led a Pythagorean life, being always silent. The reason of his silence was this: Once upon a time he indecently proposed intercourse to his own mother, and not knowing him to be her own son, she consented. When she learned that he was her own son, she died of shame. When Secundus noted this, he set himself a penance, never to talk to anyone again. When information of this reached the emperor Hadrian, then at Athens, he summoned Secundus; but as he could not move him with greetings, admonitions and threats, and could not induce him to forego his resolution of silence, yet wished him to answer his questions, he requested him to answer them manually. Therefore he asked him, What is God? And in answer Secundus wrote: God is an immortal being, of a stature beyond our ability to comprehend, of many forms, a manifold spirit, an unconceivable omniscience, an unexpressible light, and the highest good. There were also many other problems proposed by Hadrian to the philosopher.

Tiburtina, a city of the Latin district, to this day still called ancient Tibur, was at this time (as Aelius (Helius) Spartianus the historian states) built up on a wonderful scale through the Emperor Hadrian, rising from a village to a city. It lies 16,000 paces from Rome on the River Anio, in a low, uneven region. This city, as Strabo and Virgil would have it, had a Greek origin and aspect, long before Rome came into being. Some say its original founder was Tiburtus, brother of Corax and Catillus; for these same brothers were Thebans, who after the dispersion of the Thebans were born to their father in Italy. And afterwards they built the city in their name. Of this there is evidence in the nearby mountain, to this day called Catillus. And so the second brother Corax built another city among the Volsci. This city of Tiburtina was at one time a noble one. The ruins of great and mighty buildings still to be seen in the vicinity of this ancient city testify to its existence and past renown. In the same region is quarried the strong Tiburtine stone, so useful in the building and preservation of the city of Rome. The Emperor Frederick, surnamed Barbarossa, restored this city after it was destroyed by the Germans (Theotonicis). And so, afterwards, many popes and cardinals enlarged this same city and rendered it illustrious with many structures. From this city, the Roman Pope Simplicius and other men highly renowned for their ability and worthiness had their origin. [Tibur (Tiburtinus, now Tivoli) here called Tiburtina, was one of the most ancient cities of Latium, and located sixteen miles northeast of Rome on the slope of a hill on the left bank of the Anio, which here forms a magnificent waterfall. It is said to have been originally built by the Siculi, and to have afterward passed into the possession of the Aborigines and Pelasgi. According to tradition it derived its name from Tiburtus, a son of Catillus, who emigrated from Greece with Evander. It was afterward one of the chief towns of the Latin league, and became subject to Rome with the other Latin cities in 338 BCE. Under the Romans Tibur continued to be a large and flourishing town, since the beautiful scenery of the place led many of the most distinguished Roman nobles to build magnificent villas there, among the most splendid, that of Hadrian].

Galen (Galenus), a very learned physician, was by birth a Greek of the city of Pergamum, situated in Asia. He was a big man, had large and broad shoulders, and brown skin. He took pleasure in music and in alchemy. He was born of a wealthy and tender father, rich in knowledge of the sciences of astronomy, mathematics and the like. Through Talius, his master in medicine, he became wonderfully wise and informed. He traveled about the world to gain knowledge. He ate little for breakfast and was satisfied with bread and figs. In the evening he ate a copious meal. From youth he had an inclination to medicine, and at the age of nineteen he disputed with the disciples of Athens on the subject of medicine. He flourished in the time of the Emperor Antoninus Pius. He never came to grief or shame for a lack of medical knowledge and never erred in his prognosis. Constantinus says he wrote 150 books. He lived to the age of 87, and as some say, died at sea while on a voyage to investigate the miracles once performed by Christ. And Mundinus says: This Galen should deservedly be called the prince of physicians, for he is believed to have excelled all except Hippocrates, whose writings he interpreted with great understanding. [Claudius Galenus (the chronicler writes his name as Galienus), commonly called Galen, was a very celebrated physician whose works had a longer and more extensive influence on the different branches of medical science than those of any other individual either in ancient or modern times. He was born at Pergamum in 130 CE. His father, Nicon, who was an architect and geometrician, carefully superintended his education. In his 17th year, his father, who had up to this point in time destined him to be a philosopher, altered his intentions, and in consequence of a dream, chose for him the profession of medicine. He at first studied medicine in his native city. At 20 he lost his father, and went to Smyrna to study under Pelops, the physician, and Albinus, the Platonic philosopher. He afterward studied at Corinth and Alexandria, and was appointed physician to the school of gladiators, an office he filled with success. In 164 he went to Rome for the first time, and during a stay of four years, gained a great reputation in anatomy and medicine. He returned to Pergamum in 168, but was soon summoned by the Emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them at Aquileia in Venetia. In 170 Galen followed Aurelius to Rome, where he stayed for some years, lecturing, writing, and practicing with great success. He died in the year 200 at the age of seventy, some say; but others claim that he lived several years longer. He wrote a great number of works on medicine and philosophy, attaching himself to no particular sect. From the tenets of each he selected what he believed to be the best].

Justin (Justinus), a philosopher, of the city of Naples (Neapoli), at this time devoted much care and labor to the Christian faith. He gave Antoninus Pius and his sons a book written against the pagans. And he wrote a dialogue against Tryphon (Triphonem), prince of the Jews. And so he was also against Marcion, the heretic, who followed the teachings of the heretic Cerdon, who said: That the one Lord was good, and that the other was just, as though there were two contraries in the creation and in goodness. By his speech he also chastised Crescens, the cynic, as a glutton; but through the latter's secret cunning he was so circumvented that his blood was spilled in honor of the name of Christ.

Justin, surnamed Martyr, was one of the earliest Christian writers. He was born in 103 CE, at Flavia Napolis, the Shechem of the Old Testament, a city in Samaria. In his youth he studied Greek philosophy with zeal. He was afterward converted to Christianity. As a Christian he retained the garb of a philosopher, but devoted himself to the propagation, by writing and otherwise, of the faith that he had embraced. He was put to death at Rome about 165 in the persecution under M. Antoninus. Justin wrote a large number of works in Greek, the most important being An Apology for the Christians, addressed to M. Aurelius and L. Verus; a dialogue with Tryphon the Jew, in which he defends the Christians.

Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 4.11; Bohn, p. 126) states: "A certain man, however, by name Cerdon, who derived his first impulse from the followers of Simon, and who made some stay at Rome etc, taught that the God who had been proclaimed by the law and the prophets, was not the Father of Jesus Christ, for the latter was revealed, the other was unknown; the former also was just, but the other was good. Marcion, who was from Pontus, having succeeded Cerdon, augmented his school by uttering his blasphemies without a blush."

At page 143 of the same reference Eusebius further states: "This Justin has left us many monuments of a mind well stored with learning, and devoted to sacred things . . . There is a discourse of his, addressed to Antonine, surnamed the Pious, and his sons and the Roman senate, in defense of our doctrines. Another work, comprising a defense of our faith, which he addressed to the emperor, Antoninus Verus, successor of the preceding. Also, another book against the Greeks, in which, dilating upon most of the questions agitated between us and the Greek philosophers, he also discusses the nature of demons. In this he states with respect to the Jews how insidiously they plotted against the doctrine of Christ, and addresses the following works to Tryphon: 'But you do not only continue impenitent for your evil deeds, but selecting chosen men, you sent them from Jerusalem to all the world, declaring that the infidel sect of Christians had made its appearance, and uttering all those falsehoods against us which those that knew us not are accustomed to repeat.'"

Aquila, a Jew, and a native of the Pontus, together with Priscilla his wife were banished by the order of the Emperor Claudius, and (as some say) lived up to this time; and he was the second translator of the Laws of Moses, after the Seventy translators. He translated the books of the Old Testament from the Hebrew into the Greek tongue. He wrote to a little virgin what the prophets had said of the Virgin Mary. [Aquila, of Pontus, translated the Old Testament into Greek, probably 130 CE. Only a few fragments remain, published in editions of the of Origen].

Cerdo, the heretic, from whom the Cerdonian heresy derived its name, at this time undertook to prophesy nonsense. He said: There are two contrary origins. [The Cerdonians were a Gnostic sect founded by Cerdo, a Syrian, who came to Rome about 137, but concerning whose history little is known. Most of what the Fathers narrate of Cerdo's tenets has probably been transferred to him from his famous pupil Marcion (e.g, both of whom are said to have rejected the Old Testament and the New, except part of Luke's Gospel and of Paul's Epistles)].

Marcion, another heretic and Cerdo's disciple, was a Stoic philosopher, and, together with his master, also spoke nonsense. He said that God, the Creator of the World, is not the Father of Christ. At one time Marcion went to Rome to contend with Polycarp; and he asked him whether he knew him. And Polycarp said to him, Yes, I know the firstborn of the devil.

Among the Christian organizations of the second century the most important, next to the proto-orthodox (who would go on to form the version of Christianity that would later split into Catholicism and Eastern Orthodoxy), was the Marcionite community. It admitted all believers without distinction, seeking to lay the foundation of the Christian community on the pure and authentic gospel of Christ. Marcion found the gospel to be more or less corrupted and mutilated in the Christian circles of his time, and his undertaking resolved itself into a reformation of Christendom, which he sought to deliver from false Jewish doctrines by restoring the Pauline conception of the gospel – Paul being, according to Marcion, the only apostle who had rightly understood the new message of salvation delivered by Christ. It is a mistake to reckon Marcion among the Gnostics, for he ascribed salvation not to "knowledge" but to "faith."

Marcion was a wealthy ship-owner of Sinope in the Pontus, and a convert from Paganism to Christianity. About 140 CE he arrived in Rome as a Christian, and made himself known to the local church. Even then, however, the leading features of his peculiar system must have been already thought out. He tried to obtain acceptance for them, but encountered so much opposition that he was compelled to establish in Rome a community of his own. The new society increased in the two following decades. The earliest inscription (318 CE) on a Christian place of worship is Marcionite, and was found on a stone that had stood over the doorway of a house in a Syrian village. Many of the Marcionites went over to Manichaeism, and the sect seems to have vanished in the seventh century.

Valentinus (Valentinianus), another heretic, from whom the Valentinian heresy derived its name, also gained ascendancy at this time. They said that Christ derived nothing from the body of the Virgin, but came out of her pure, as through a pipe or reed.

Valentinus, the most prominent leader of the Gnostic movement, is said to have been born near the coast in Lower Egypt, and was brought up and educated in Alexandria. He came to Rome (c. 135-160) during the episcopate of Hyginus, flourished under Pius, and stayed till the time of Anicetus. During his stay in Rome he is said to have converted a few adherents of the Valentinian sect. Tertullian declared that Valentinus came to Rome as an adherent of the orthodox Church, and was a candidate for the bishopric of Rome, but abandoned the Church because a confessor was preferred to him for this office. The statement is questioned. Great uncertainty also attaches to his residence in Cyprus, where he is said to have definitely accomplished his secession from the Church. But it seems clear that Valentinus did not, like Marcion, break with the Church from the very beginning, but endeavored to maintain his standing within it.

The Gnostics held that God in himself is unknowable and unapproachable, but that all existences, material and spiritual, are derived from the Deity by successive emanations, or eons. Gnosticism borrowed certain elements from the current Persian philosophy, but more from the Greek doctrines connected with the Neo-Platonic ideas of Logos and Nous. Christ was merely a superior eon. Among the principal systems are those of Basilides (125-140), Valentinus (140-160), the Ophites, Carpocrates and Epiphaneus, Saturninus, Cerdo, Marcion (150), and Bardesanes (154-222). Gnosticism aimed at a different way of salvation (by knowledge) rather than by the path of faith (and, to a lesser extent, works) prescribed by the New Testament.

Theophilus, a bishop of the church of Antioch, flourished at this time. In the reign of Antoninus he wrote a book against the aforesaid heretic Marcion; and also a book against the heresy of Hermogenis; and three books against Aetholus; and he wrote many other things. []

Melito, a bishop of the church of Sardis, and a disciple of Frontinus the rhetorician, was held in great esteem at this time. He wrote a book of Christian teaching to the emperor Antoninus Marcus. This man's intelligence was wonderfully praised by Tertullian (as Jerome writes); and he says that among many of our people he was regarded as a prophet, for he wrote many prophetic works. []

Apollinaris (Appollinaris), bishop of Hierapolis, was held in high honor at this time. He wrote an excellent work for the emperor, M. Antoninus the Second; and he also wrote many things against heretics; also five books against the pagans and there are extant two others On Truth. [Although there are many works of Apollinaris preserved by various authors, those that have reached us are the following: , and . Also two , two also , and those that he afterwards wrote . (Eusebius, 4.27)]

Galen (Galenus), is represented in the dress of a doctor. He is examining a specimen of urine in a bottle—an attitude in which men of medicine were often portrayed in the Middle Ages.

Polycarp (Policarpus), a disciple of John the Apostle, by him consecrated a bishop of Smyrna, and in spiritual matters and learning a prince of all Asia, came to Rome in this year, during the episcopate of Pius; and he brought back to the faith many Christians who had been led away from it by the influence of the two heretics, Marcion and Valentinus. This Polycarp once met the aforesaid heretic, Marcion, and Polycarp called him the first-born of the Devil; for he denied that God the Creator is the father of Christ, etc. This Polycarp was burned and martyred with 12 who came from Philadelphia in the fourth persecution in the reign of M. Antoninus and L. Aurelius Commodus. As he was a very learned and pious man, he sent a very useful epistle to the Philippians. He suffered (martyrdom) on the seventh of the Kalends of February.

Polycarp, one of the apostolic fathers, was a native of Smyrna. The date of his birth and of his martyrdom are uncertain. He is said to have been a disciple of the apostle John, and to have been consecrated by this apostle bishop of the church at Smyrna. It is certain that he was bishop of Smyrna at the time when Ignatius of Antioch passed through that city on his way to suffer death at Rome, some time between 107 and 116. The martyrdom of Polycarp occurred in the persecution under the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus. As he was led to death the pro-consul offered him his life if he would revile Christ. "Eighty and six years have I served him," was the reply, "and he never did me wrong; how then can I revile my King and my Saviour?" We have remaining only one short piece of Polycarp, his Letter to the Philippians that is published along with Ignatius and the other apostolic writers.

Praxedes (Praxedis), a very holy virgin, daughter of the most blessed Roman, Pudentis, and sister of the highly renowned virgin, Pudentiana, was highly informed in the Holy Scriptures and lived in this period up to the time of Anicetus the pope. After having spent her paternal inheritance, together with that of her aforesaid sister, to sustain the poor, and having consumed all her life in watchfulness, prayer and fasting, and left all her household, consisting of ninety persons, and having buried the bodies of many martyrs, this blessed virgin also gave up her Spirit to the Lord and received the crown of righteousness on the 21st day of the month of July, on which she is commemorated. And she was buried at Rome beside her sister Pudentiana in the churchyard of Priscilla. [Praxedes (sometimes spelled, as in the , Praxedis), is a saint of unknown dates. Indeed, much surrounding her is a mystery.]

Felicitas, a very pious Roman matron, together with her seven sons, namely, Januarius, Felix, Philip, Silanus (Scylano), Alexander, Vitalis and Martial, suffered martyrdom at Rome at this time. This Felicitas, as her name signifies, was in body and soul a very blessed matron, and taught her seven sons to worship God; and so they received the crown of martyrdom; for Januarius, the first born, was beaten with rods and slain with lead; Felix and Philip were killed with cudgels; Silanus was slaughtered and killed by being hurled off a cliff; and Alexander, Vitalus and Martialis were beheaded. And finally this Felicitas, contrary to the manner of matrons, was beheaded with the sword. In these persons a great mirror of our faith is set before our eyes. Their day is celebrated on the 20th day of the month of July.

Felicitas. In the reign of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, there was a great persecution of Christians. They were deemed the cause, if not the authors, of all the earthquakes, which at that time desolated the empire, and an inexorable edict condemned them either to sacrifice or to die. In this persecution Polycarp perished in the East, and Justin in the West.

At the same time there dwelt in Rome an illustrious matron named Felicitas, a widow having seven sons whom she brought up in the Christian faith, devoting herself to a life of virtuous retirement, and employing her days in works of piety and charity. Her influence and example, and the virtuous and modest deportment of her sons, caused many to become Christians, so that the enemies of the faith were greatly enraged against her; and as she was exceedingly rich, those who shared in the spoils of the martyrs were eager to accuse her. She was accordingly cited before the tribunal of Publius, the prefect of the city, who, at first with mildness, and then with threatening words, endeavored in vain to have her deny Christ and sacrifice to the false gods. And the prefect said to her, "If you have no regard for yourself, at least have compassion on your sons, and persuade them to yield to the law." But she replied that her sons would know how to choose between everlasting death and everlasting life. Then the prefect called them all one after another before him, and commanded them to abjure Christ on pain of torments and of death; but their mother encouraged them to persevere in resistance, saying to them, "My sons, be strong in heart, and look up to heaven, where Christ and all his saints await your coming; and defy this tyrant boldly, for so shall the King of glory reward you greatly." On hearing these words the prefect was enraged, and he commanded the executioners to strike her on the mouth and make her silent; but she continued to exhort her sons to die rather than to yield. Then, one after another, they were tortured and put to death before the eyes on their mother: first, the eldest, whose name was Januarius, was scourged with thongs loaded with lead until he died; next to him, Felix and Philip were beaten with clubs; Silanus was flung from a rock; and Alexander, Vitalis, and Martial were decapitated. During their sufferings the mother heroically stood by, never ceasing to comfort and encourage them; and when she beheld them extended in death before her, she lifted up her voice and blessed God that she had brought forth seven sons worthy to be saints in paradise. Her hope was to follow them speedily; but the tyrant, through a refinement of cruelty, caused her life to be prolonged for four months in prison, in order that she might suffer a daily martyrdom of agony, hoping to subdue her spirit through affliction: but she remained firm in her faith, still refusing steadily and meekly to yield, and desiring no other mercy but that of speedily following her martyred children. At length the time of her deliverance arrived, and, being dragged from prison, she was tortured in various ways, and then beheaded; or, as some say, thrown into a caldron of boiling oil.

Ptolemy (Ptolemeus), a native of Alexandria, and a philosopher and famous astronomer, flourished after the time of the Emperor Hadrian (Adriani), and was known at this time. This distinguished man contributed more to astronomy than has been found in earlier writings. As those learned in Latin know, he also wrote many books on various subjects. He lived 88 years. Among his sayings, these are remarkable: He among men who does not concern himself in whose hands the world is, is above the world. And the following: He who is not bettered or chastised by others, through him shall others not be punished. And as you approach nearer to your end, the more should you increase your good works. [Claudius Ptolemaeus (Ptolemy) a celebrated mathematician, astronomer, and geographer. Of Ptolemy himself we know absolutely nothing but his dates (after 81-161 CE). His writings are as follows: 1. The , divided into 13 books. In treats of the relations of the earth and heaven; the effect of position upon the earth; the theory of the sun and moon, without which that of the stars cannot be undertaken; the sphere of the fixed stars, and those of the five stars called planets. The 7th and 8th books are the most interesting to the modern astronomer as they contain a catalogue of the stars. 2. , or . With this goes another small work, called , often called , from its containing 100 aphorisms. Both of these works are astrological, and it has been doubted by some whether they are genuine. But the doubt merely arises from the feeling that the contents are unworthy of Ptolemy. 3. A catalogue of Assyrian, Persian, Greek and Roman sovereigns, with the length of their reigns, several times referred to by Syncellus. 4. , and annual list of sidereal phaenomena. 5. and 6. and . These works are obtained from the Arabic. The is a collection of graphical processes for facilitating the construction of sundials. The is a description of the stereographic projection in which the eye is at the pole of the circle on which the sphere is projected. 7. . This is a brief statement of the principal hypotheses employed in the for the explanation of the heavenly motions. 8. A treatise on the theory of the musical scale. 9. , a metaphysical work, attributed to Ptolemy. 10. The great geographical work of Ptolemy in 8 books. This work was the last attempt made by the ancients to form a complete geographical system; it was accepted as the text-book of the science; and it maintained that position during the Middle Ages, and until the 15th century, when the rapid progress of maritime discovery caused it to be superseded. It contains, however, very little information respecting the objects of interest connected with the different countries and places; for with the exception of the introductory matter in the first book, and the latter part of the work, it is a mere catalogue of the names of places, with their longitudes and latitudes, and with a few incidental references to objects of interest. The latitudes of Ptolemy are tolerably correct; but his longitudes are very wide of the truth, his length of the known world, from east to west, being much too great. It is worth, however, to remark in passing that the modern world owes much to this error; for it tended to encourage that belief in the practicability of the western passage to the Indies, which occasioned the discovery of America by Columbus].

Aulus Gellius, a Roman rhetorician and famous grammarian, was renowned at this time. Among other works of his virtue, when in the winter he left Rome and went to Attica, he wrote famous commentaries that he, dividing into twenty books, assigned the title Attic Nights; and about them is written: If anyone should wish to be famous for his knowledge of Greek (Cecropia) and Roman (Latia) poetry (Camena), he should read the recommended writings of Gellus. The Attic night, never about to wasted for the light of day, clearly reveals the road to various arts.

Aulus Gellius, a Latin grammarian of good family, was probably a native of Rome. He studied rhetoric under T. Castricius and Sulpicius Apollinaris, philosophy under Calvisius Taurus and Peregrinus Proteus, and enjoyed also the friendship and instructions of Favorinus, Herodes Atticus, and Cornelius Fronto. While yet a youth he was appointed by the praetor to act as an referee in civil causes. The precise date of his birth and death is unknown; but he must have lived under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and M. Aurelius (who reigned from 117-189 CE). He wrote a work entitled Noctes Atticae, because it was composed in a country house near Athens during the long nights of winter. It is a sort of miscellany containing numerous extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on a variety of topics connected with history, antiquities, philosophy, and philology, interspersed with original remarks, the whole thrown together in 20 books, without any attempt at order or arrangement. The 8th book is entirely lost with the exception of the index.

The end of this paragraph is taken from a four-verse prefatory epigram found in a 1485 edition of Gellus' work. With its verse breaks it reads thus:

Cecropia, Latia, and Camena are poeticisms for 'Greek', 'Roman', and 'poetry', respectively

The German edition replaces the four-verse epigram at the end of this paragraph with the following sentence: "he wrote many excellent and creditable books; and they were given the title of Noctes Atticae, etc."

Origin of the Cataphrygian (Cathaphrigarum) Heresy.

At this time, under Montanus, the Cataphrygian heresy, so called, came into being. For this most evil arch heretic, Montanus, a native of Phrygia, called himself the "Spiritual Comforter" ["Spiritual Comforter" is my (Hadavas) translation of the word paraclitum ('Paraclete'), which in Christian theology refers to the Holy Spirit as advocate and counselor who has the power to console and comfort]. in the land of Phrygia. And he misled many people, and poisoned this country and the regions in the vicinity with many errors. And there he converted Prisca and Maximillia, the celebrated matrons, so that they left their husbands, and openly traveled about with him; and at his instigation they called themselves prophetesses. These heretics said that the gift of the Holy Spirit was given to them alone and not to the apostles. [Montanus was a Phrygian or Mysian by birth and was the founder of the sect known as the Montanists, or Cataphrygians. He proclaimed himself inspired by the spirit of God, frequently fell into ecstasies, and prophesied. Priscilla and Maximilla, women of remarkable beauty, became his disciples, and accompanied him in all his journeys; for in the sect of the Montanists women administered the sacraments and preached in the churches. They condemned second marriages, admitted a distinction of food, and had three fasts, which they observed very rigorously. Montanism is a somewhat misleading name for the movement in the second century that, along with Gnosticism, occupied the most critical period in the history of the early Church. It was the overthrow of Gnosticism and Montanism that made the "Catholic" Church. The burden of the new prophecy seems to have been a new standard of moral obligations, especially with regard to marriage, fasting, and martyrdom. But Montanus had larger schemes in view. He wished to organize a special community of true Christians to await the second coming of the Lord. When he proposed to summon all true Christians to the small Phrygian town of Pepuza, there was nothing to prevent his plan except the inertia of Christendom. But this was not the case in the West at the beginning of the third century. At Rome and Carthage, and in all other places where sincere Montanists were found, they were confronted by the imposing edifice of the Catholic Church, and they did not have the institutional power to undermine its foundations].

Apelles, another heretic, in Greece, said that Christ was not a god in truth, but appeared to the people in their imagination. This Apelles, the highly learned man Theodotion (Theodocion) called a most heretical man, and with his writings he scorned, ridiculed and overthrew this same heretic. Tatian (Tatianus), also named the first Christian heretic; then the Severian heretics proceeded from him; they believed that all sexual intercourse was impure.

According to Smith's Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology (Vol. 1, p. 223), Apelles, a disciple of Marcion, departed in some points from the teaching of his master. Instead of wholly rejecting the Old Testament, he looked upon its contents as coming partly from the good principle, partly from the evil principle. Instead of denying entirely the reality of Christ's human body, he held that in his descent from heaven he assumed to himself an aerial body, which he gave back to the air as he ascended. He denied the resurrection of the body, and considered differences of religious belief as unimportant, since, he said, "all who put their trust in the Crucified One will be saved, if they only prove their faith by good works."

Apelles flourished about 188 CE, and lived to a very great age. Tertullian (Praescript. Haeret. 30) says, that he was expelled from the school of Marcion for fornication with one Philumene, who fancied herself a prophetess, and whose fantasies were recorded by Apelles in his book entitled Fanervseiw. But since Rhodon, who was the personal opponent of Apelles, speaks of him as universally honoured for his course of life (Euseb. H. E. v. 13), we may conclude that the former part of Tertullian's story is one of those inventions which were so commonly made in order to damage the character of heretics. Besides the Fanervseiw, Apelles wrote a work entitled "Syllogisms," the object of which Eusebius states (l.c.) to have been to prove that the writings of Moses were false. It must have been a very large work, since Ambrose (De Paradis. 5) quotes from the thirty-eighth volume of it. (See also Tertull. adv. Marcion, iv. 17; Augustin. de Haer. 26; Epiphanius, Haer. 44.)

Tatian, according to The Catholic Encyclopedia (Healy, "Tatian." Vol. 14. New York, 1912), was,

A second-century apologist about whose antecedents and early history nothing can be affirmed with certainty except that he was born in

Assyria and that he was trained in Greek philosophy. While a young man he travelled extensively. Disgusted with the greed of the pagan philosophers with whom he came in contact, he conceived a profound contempt for their teachings. Repelled by the grossness and immorality of the pagans and attracted by the holiness of the Christian religion and the sublimity and simplicity of the Scriptures, he became a convert, probably about A.D. 150. He joined the Christian community in Rome, where he was a "hearer" of Justin. There is no reason to think he was converted by the latter. While Justin lived Tatian remained orthodox. Later (c. 172) he apostatized, became a Gnostic of the Encratite sect, and returned to the Orient. The circumstances and date of his death are not known. Tatian wrote many works. Only two have survived. One of these, "Oratio ad Graecos" (Pros Hellenas), is an apology for Christianity, containing in the first part (i-xxxi) an exposition of the Christian Faith with a view to showing its superiority over Greek philosophy, and in the second part a demonstration of the high antiquity of the Christian religion. The tone of this apology is bitter and denunciatory. The author inveighs against Hellenism in all its forms and expresses the deepest contempt for Greek philosophy and Greek manners.

The other extant work is the "Diatesseron", a harmony of the four Gospels containing in continuous narrative the principle events in the life of Our Lord. The question regarding the language in which this work was composed is still in dispute. Lightfoot, Hilgenfeld, Bardenhewer, and others contend that the original language was Syriac. Harnack, Burkitt, and others are equally positive that it was composed in Greek and translated into Syriac during the lifetime of Tatian. There are only a few fragments extant in Syriac but a comparatively full reconstruction of the whole has been effected from St. Ephraem's commentary, the Syriac text of which has been lost, but which exists in an Armenian version. Two revisions of the "Diatesseron" are available: one in Latin preserved in the "Codex Fuldensis" of the Gospels dating from about A.D. 545, the other in an Arabic version found in two manuscripts of a later date. The "Diatesseron" or "Evangelion da Mehallete" ('the Gospel of the mixed') was practically the only gospel text used in Syria during the third and fourth centuries. Rabbula, Bishop of Edessa (411-435), ordered the priests and deacons to see that every church should have a copy of the separate Gospels (Evangelion da Mepharreshe), and Theodoret, Bishop of Cyrus (423-457), removed more than two hundred copies of the "Diatesseron" from the churches in his diocese. Several other works written by Tatian have disappeared. In his apology (xv) he mentions a work "on animals" and (xvi) one on the "nature of demons". Another work in refutation of the calumnies against the Christians (xl) was planned but perhaps never written. He also wrote a "Book of Problems" (Eus, "Hist. Eccl.", V, 13), dealing with the difficulties in the Scriptures, and one "On Perfection according to the Precepts of Our Saviour" (Clem. Alex, "Strom.", III, 12, 81).

For the Severian heretics, The Catholic Encyclopedia (Arendzen, "Encratites." Vol. 5. New York, 1909) states:

Encratites

Literally, "abstainers" or "persons who practised continency", because they refrained from the use of wine, animal food, and marriage. The name was given to an early Christian sect, or rather to a tendency common to several sects, chiefly Gnostic, whose asceticism was based on heretical views regarding the origin of matter.

History

Abstinence from the use of some creatures, because they were thought to be intrinsically evil, is much older than Christianity. Pythagorism, Essenism, Indian asceticism betrayed this erroneous tendency, and the Indian ascetics are actually quoted by Clement of Alexandria as the forerunners of the Encratites (Strom, I, xv). Although St. Paul refers to people, even in his days, "forbidding to marry and abstaining from meats" (1 Timothy 4:1-5), the first mention of a Christian sect of this name occurs in Irenæus (I, xxviii). He connects their origin with Saturninus and Marcion. Rejecting marriage, they implicitly accuse the Creator, Who made both male and female. Refraining from all émpsoucha (animal food and intoxicants), they are ungrateful to Him Who created all things. "And now", continues Irenæus, "they reject the salvation of the first man [Adam]; an opinion recently introduced among them by Tatian, a disciple of Justin. As long as he was with Justin he gave no sign of these things, but after his martyrdom Tatian separated himself from the Church. Elated and puffed up by his professorship, he established some teaching of his own. He fabled about some invisible æons, as the Valentinians do; and proclaimed marriage to be corruption and fornication, as Marcion and Saturninus do, but he made the denial of Adam's salvation a specialty of his own." The Encratites are next mentioned by Clement Alex. (Pæd, II, ii, 33; Strom, I, xv; VII, xvii). The whole of the third book of the Stromata is devoted to combating a false encrateia, or continency, though a special sect of Encratites is not there mentioned. Hippolytus (Philos, VIII, xiii) refers to them as "acknowledging what concerns God and Christ in like manner with the Church; in respect, however, of their mode of life, passing their days inflated with pride"; "abstaining from animal food, being water-drinkers and forbidding to marry"; "estimated Cynics rather than Christians". On the strength of this passage it is supposed that some Encratites were perfectly orthodox in doctrine, and erred only in practice, but τὰ περὶ τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ τοῦ χριστοῦ need not include the whole of Christian doctrine. Somewhat later this sect received new life and strength by the accession of a certain Severus (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl, IV, xxix), after whom Encratites were often called Severians. These Severian Encratites accepted the Law, the Prophets, and the Gospels, but rejected the Book of the Acts and cursed St. Paul and his Epistles. But the account given by Epiphanius of the Severians rather betrays Syrian Gnosticism than Judaistic tendencies. In their hatred of marriage they declared woman the work of Satan, and in their hatred of intoxicants they called wine drops of venom from the great Serpent, etc. (Hær, xiv). Epiphanius states that in his day Encratites were very numerous throughout Asia Minor, in Psidia, in the Adustan district of Phrygia, in Isauria, Pamphylia, Cilicia, and Galatia. In the Roman Province and in Antioch of Syria they were found scattered here and there. They split up into a number of smaller sects of whom the Apostolici were remarkable for their condemnation of private property, the Hydroparastatæ for their use of water instead of wine in the Eucharist. In the Edict of 382, Theodosius pronounced sentence of death on all those who took the name of Encratites, Saccophori, or Hydroparastatæ, and commanded Florus, the Magister Officiarum, to make strict search for these heretics, who were Manichæans in disguise. Sozomen (Hist. Eccl, V, xi) tells of an Encratite of Ancyra in Galatia, called Busiris, who bravely submitted to torments in the Julian persecution, and who under Theodosius abjured his heresy and returned to the Catholic Church. On the other hand, we learn from Macarius Magnes (about 403; Apocr, III, xliii) of a certain Dositheus, a Cilician, who about the same time wrote a work in eight books in defence of Encratite errors. About the middle of the fifth century they disappear from history, absorbed, probably, by the Manichæans, with whom they had so much in common from the first.

Writings

The Encratites developed a considerable literary activity. The earliest writer in their defence probably was Tatian in his book "Concerning Perfection according to the Saviour", which Clement of Alexandria quotes and refutes in Strom, III, xii. Almost contemporary with him (about A.D. 150) was Julius Cassianus, known as the founder of Docetism (see DOCETÆ). He wrote a work "Concerning Self-restraint and Continency", of which Clement and St. Jerome have preserved some passages (Strom, I, xxi; Euseb, Praep. Ev, X, xii; Strom, III, xiii; Jerome, ad Gal, VI, viii). Concerning the eight books of Dositheus we know only that he maintained that, as the world had its beginning by sexual intercourse, so by continency (encrateia) it would have its end; and that he inveighed against wine-drinkers and flesh-eaters. Among the apocryphal works which originated in Encratite circles must be mentioned: The Gospel according to the Egyptians, referred to by Clement (Strom, III, ix, 13), Origen (Hom. in i Luc.), Hippolytus (Philos, V, vii), which contained a dialogue between Jesus and Salome specially appealed to by the Encratites in condemnation of marriage (to this Gospel the recently discovered "Logia" probably belong); the Gospel of Philip, of Thomas, the Acts of Peter, of Andrew, of Thomas, and other Apocrypha, furthering Gnostic-Encratite views.

Eusebius (Hist. Eccl, IV, xxi, 28) says that Musanus (A.D. 170 or 210) wrote a most elegant book addressed to some brethren who had fallen into the heresy of the Encratites. Theodoret (Hær. Fab, I, xxi) says that Apollinaris of Hierapolis in Phrygia (about 171) wrote against the Severian Encratites.

The final sentence in this paragraph ("Tatian (Tacianus), also named the first Christian heretic; then the Severian heretics proceeded from him; they believed that all sexual intercourse was impure") is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Folio CXIII verso

Year of the World 5363 | Year of Christ 164

Anicetus the pope, a native of Syria, was a man of excellent habits. He ordained that no cleric was to grow long hair, after the command of the apostle; also that no bishop was to be consecrated by less than three other bishops. He also ordered many other things. And after conducting five consecrations in the month of December, consecrating 19 priests, four deacons and nine bishops, he was crowned with martyrdom, and was buried on the 17th day of April. He sat 11 years, 4 months and 3 days; and the chair was vacant for 17 days. [Anicetus, pope, c. 157-168].

Year of the World 5373 | Year of Christ 174

Soter (Sothar) the pope, a native of Campania, of the city of Fundanus, lived in the time of L. Commodus the emperor; and although he moved about in many dangers, he turned his conduct to spiritual matters in spite of many temptations. And he ordained that no cloister woman should touch the choral vestment, nor put incense in the censor for use in the holy office. He is credited with an epistle written to the bishops of Italy in these matters. He also ordered that no woman was to be considered a lawful wife unless blessed by a priest after the bans were proclaimed, and who with proper ceremony according to Christian custom was given over to the groom by her parents. And he cast out many dangers from the trickeries and magical arts of wicked people who were accustomed to perform at new marriages. And after he had held five consecrations in the month of December, consecrating eight priests and eleven bishops, he died. He was buried in the church of Calistals, having sat nine years, three months, and twenty days; and at that time the chair rested twenty-one days. [Soter, pope, 167-174].

Year of the World 5383 | Year of Christ 184

Eleutherius the pope, a native of Greece, of the city of Nicopolis, lived in the time of L. Antoninus Commodus. He stated that no one, because of an increase in population, should be starved for lack of those foods to which he was accustomed. He also desired that no one should be deposed from his status, unless, on complaint, he was found guilty of a crime. In this pope's time the churches were accorded peace and rest, and the Christian name was miraculously augmented through all the earth; and chiefly at Rome, where many noble Romans, together with their wives and children, accepted the Christian faith and were baptized. This pope received an embassy from Lucius, king of Britain, asking that he and his be numbered among the Christians. And finally, after he had conducted three consecrations in the month of December, ordaining priests and bishops, he died and was buried beside the body of St. Peter on the 26th day of the month of May. After he had sat 15 years, three months, and two days, the chair was vacant for five days. [Eleutherius, pope from about 175 to 189. The , at the beginning of the 6th century, says he had relations with a British king, Lucius, who wished to be converted to Christianity. This tradition – Roman, not British – is an enigma to scholars, and apparently has no historical foundation].

Year of the World 5393 | Year of Christ 194

Victor the pope, a native of Africa, ordained that Easter should be celebrated on Sunday from the 14th day of the moon of the first month to the 21st day, which was observed by the Jews on the 14th day of the moon. This same law was afterwards confirmed by the Council of Nicaea, so that we would not be looked upon as following the Jews. This Victor was martyred and buried beside St. Peter. He sat 10 years, three months, and 10 days. Then the chair rested for 12 days. [Victor I, pope from about 190 to 198. He submitted to the opinion of the episcopate in the various parts of Christendom the divergence between the Easter usage of Rome and that of the bishops of Asia. Although the observance of Easter, the annual festival of the resurrection of Christ, was at a very early period the practice of the Christian church, a serious difference as to the day of observance arose between the Christians of Jewish and those of Gentile descent. The point at issue was when the Paschal fast (Passover) was to be reckoned as ending. With the Jewish Christians, whose leading thought was the death of Christ as the Paschal Lamb, the fast ended at the same time as that of the Jews, on the 14th day of the moon (that is, the 14th day after the appearance of the new moon; for the religious part of the Jewish calendar was concerned in these appearances of the new moon, the reports of which were made by the country people) in the evening, and the Easter festival immediately followed without regard to the day of the week. The Gentile Christians on the other hand, unfettered by Jewish traditions, identified the first day of the week with the Resurrection, and kept the preceding Friday as the commemoration of the crucifixion, irrespective of the day of the month. With the one the observance of the day of the month, with the other the observance of the day of the week, was the guiding principle. Generally speaking, the western churches kept Easter on the first day of the week, while the Eastern churches followed the Jewish rule and kept it on the 14th day. The dispute was finally settled by the Council of Nicaea, summoned by Constantine in 325.]

Zephyrinus (Sephirinus) the pope, and a Roman, was in the time of Severus the emperor, a pious man, devoted to spiritual more than to temporal affairs. Therefore he ordained that a Levite and priest should be consecrated in the presence of a cleric of faith and of laymen, which was afterwards confirmed in the Chalcedonian Council. He also ordained that the blessing of the holy blood should take place in a vessel of glass and not in a wooden one (as it did before that time); but this ordinance was afterward changed; and it was decided that the blessing should not be in wood nor in glass, but in a vessel of gold or silver, or brass. He likewise ordained that all Christians, on becoming of age, should yearly, on the holy day of Easter, publicly receive Holy Communion. Finally, after the consecration of various priests and bishops, he died in the time of Severus, and was buried on the Appian Way not far from the cemetery of Calixtus on the seventh of the Kalends of September [The phrase "in the time of Severus, and was buried on the Appian Way not far from the cemetery on the seventh of the Kalends of September" is not in the German edition of the chronicle], having sat eight years, 7 months and 10 days. [Zephyrinus was a Roman, and his election is attributed to the miraculous appearance of the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove. During his pontificate the persecutions of the Christians were redoubled by the order of the emperor Severus, and the bishop of Rome abandoned his flock, reappearing when calm succeeded the tempest. It is said that in order to cause his cowardice to be forgotten, he persecuted the heretics, excommunicated the Montanists, among them Tertullian, who joined the party of these innovators, and held the papal office until about the year 217. The date of his death is uncertain. Although the Church has decreed him the honors of martyrdom, there is grave doubt whether he shed his blood for the Christian faith. He was interred in the cemetery of Calixtus in the Appian Way].

Year of the World 5413 | Year of Christ 214

Calixtus the pope, a Roman and a very wise and pious man, during the distress afflicting the Christians under the evil emperor who had departed from his forbears, ordered the observance of a gold-fast four times a year, and the consecrations which had before that time taken place in the month of December were afterwards held quarterly. He also established a cemetery named for him, in which the bodies of many martyrs were buried. But after he had baptized the Romans, Palmachius the consul and Simplicius the senator, and Felix the nobleman, together with their households, and had consecrated many priests and bishops, he was crowned with martyrdom by Emperor Alexander on the 14th day of the month of October, having sat six years, ten months and ten days. [Calixtus I, pope from 217 to 222, was little known before the discovery of the book of the . From this work, which is in part a pamphlet directed against him, we learn that Calixtus was originally a slave and engaged in banking. Falling on evil times, he was brought into collision with the Jews, who denounced him as a Christian and procured his exile to Sardinia. On his return from exile he was pensioned by Pope Victor, and later was associated with Pope Zephyrinus in the government of the Roman Church. On the death of Zephyrinus (217) he was elected in his place and occupied the papal chair for five years. He died in 222. In the time of Constantine the Roman Church reckoned him officially among the martyr popes].

Folio CXV recto

Commodus Lucius Antoninus, the eighteenth Roman emperor, succeeded his father M. Antoninus. While carrying him, his mother Faustina dreamed that she bore many snakes, and among them a rather violent one. And she bore Commodus and Antoninus. After the latter's death, Marcus the father, caused Commodus to be tutored by good men with great care. Although Commodus had excellent Greek and Latin teachers and masters, they were of no benefit to him, for from early childhood he bore the marks of a cruel, unchaste disposition, and at twelve years of age showed signs of his future cruelty. He went to the German wars with his father, in which he spared neither shame nor tears. At last he no longer had anything in common with his father, was offensive to all men, and became useless, except for one thing, namely, that he fought against the Germans with success, but not without assistance from the Christian soldiers. When in the same wars his army suffered for lack of water, it was sent from heaven pursuant to the prayers of the Christian soldiers; and lightning struck the Germans and Sarmatians. When he returned to Rome, he relapsed into every form of wantonness and vice, following Nero in many ways. He caused many Roman senators, and chiefly the most distinguished in nobility and address to be slain; others he forbade the city, and sold their lands and their control. His body was of regular stature, his countenance drunken, his conversation indecent. He always dyed his hair, and he praised his own locks and beard to his barber. During the time of his evil life the city suffered disaster through the destruction of the library in the Capitol by fire caused by lightning. Commodus was judged an enemy of mankind, and strangled in the twelfth year of his reign. The senate and people demanded that his body be dragged by a hook and tossed into the Tiber. But afterwards, by an order of Pertinax, he was buried in the monument of Hadrian (Adriani).

L. Aurelius Commodus, Roman emperor, 180-192 CE, son of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born at Lanuvium, 161, and was thus scarcely twenty when he succeeded to the empire. He was an unworthy son of a noble father, one of the most savage tyrants that ever disgraced a throne. It was after the suppression of the plot against his life, which had been organized by his sister Lucilla in 183, that he first gave uncontrolled sway to his ferocious temper. He resigned the government to various favorites in succession, and abandoned himself without interruption to shameless debauchery. But he was at the same time the slave of the most childish vanity and sought to gain popular applause by fighting as a gladiator, and slew thousands of beasts in the amphitheater with bow and spear. In consequence of these exploits he assumed the name of Hercules, and demanded that he be worshipped as a god. In the following year his concubine, Mercia, found on his tablets while he slept that she was doomed to perish along with Laetus and Eclectus, and other leading men in the state. She immediately administered poison to him, but as its operation was slow, Narcissus, a celebrated wrestler, was introduced, and by him Commodus was strangled in his bath on December 31, 192.

The last two sentences of this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Helvius (Helius) Pertinax, nineteenth Roman emperor, was born in the village of Martis in the Apennines. By reason of his good conduct he advanced from station to station until he was crowned emperor. But he was poor, a characteristic which was then regarded as a vice; and for this he was despised. Yet he was an honorable old man, with groomed beard, curly hair, corpulent body, lordly appearance, of moderate speech, and more affectionate than good. He was finally slain in Pallacio by Julianus, the jurist, in the sixth month of his reign; for the troops and people of the court hated him. Yet the Roman populace was displeased at the manner of his death; and therefore the senate pronounced him a god. [Helvius Pertinax, Roman emperor from January 1st to March 28th, 193 CE, was of humble origin, and rose from the post of centurion both to the highest military and civil commands in the reigns of M. Aurelius and Commodus. On the murder of Commodus, he was 66 years of age, and was reluctantly persuaded to accept the Empire. He commenced his reign by introducing extensive reforms into the civil and military administration of the Empire; but the troops who had been accustomed to ease and license under Commodus were disgusted with the discipline that he attempted to force upon them, and murdered their new sovereign after a reign of two months and twenty-seven days. On his death the praetorian troops put the Empire up for sale, and it was purchased by M. Didius Julianus].

Julianus Didius was the successor to Pertinax. When the troops were carrying the head of the slain Pertinax on a pole through the city to their camp, Julianus found the body of Pertinax in the palace and caused it to be interred with great honor. Some say Julianus himself killed Pertinax and then usurped the sovereignty. Others say it was Julianus the grandson of the great jurist Julian, whose ancestors were of Milan. This man was a most evil person, and lived so shamefully that he was hated by the people and deserted by everyone. He was defeated by Severus and slain in the seventh month of his reign. [M. Didius Salvius Julianus bought the Roman Empire from the praetorian guards, when they put the Empire up for sale after the death of Pertinax in 193 CE. Flavius Sulpicianus, praefect of the city, and Didius bid against one another, but it was sold to Didius on his promising each soldier a donative of 25,000 sesterces. He held the Empire for only two months, being murdered by soldiers when Severus was marching against the city].

Severus, the Roman emperor, a native of Africa, was so well educated in Greek and Latin in infancy that he acquired a high understanding of them. When as a child he played with other children, he sat as judge and pronounced judgments, while the other children stood about him. He went to Rome where by reason of his learning he was raised from one position to another until he was chosen emperor. He was stingy, serious, and fatigued by many wars. He ruled the common people with strength and care. He was devoted to philosophy, and so victorious over the Parthians, Adiabeni, and Arabs, that he made a province of Arabia. He adorned Rome with public buildings, was moderate in his meals, poor in dress, a disposition to be fatherly, at times fond of wine, but rarely ate meat. He was handsome in person, large, wore a long beard, had gray and curly hair, a venerable countenance, and a lovely voice, and he spoke of his African country even in his old age. Finally he was subjected to many dangerous attacks, not alone in Syria, but also in Gaul and Britain, and being deserted by all his company and afflicted by his relatives, he died at Eburacum, in Gaul, in the 17th year of his reign. He left two sons, Bassianus and Geta. [L. Septimus Severus, Roman emperor from 193-211 CE, was born in 146, near Leptis in Africa. After holding various military commands under M. Aurelius and Commodus, he was at length appointed commander-in-chief of the army, in Pannonia and Illyria. The army proclaimed him emperor after the death of Pertinax (193). He immediately marched upon Rome, where Julianus had been made emperor by the praetorian troops. Julianus was put to death upon his arrival before the city. Severus then turned his arms against Pescennius Niger, who had been saluted emperor by the eastern legions. The struggle was brought to a close by a decisive battle near Issus, in which Niger was defeated by Severus, and having been shortly afterwards taken prisoner was put to death by order of the latter (194). Severus then laid siege to Byzantium, which refused to submit to him even after the death of Niger, and which was not taken till 196. The city was treated with great severity by Severus. Its walls were leveled with the earth, its soldiers and magistrates put to death, and the town itself, deprived of all its political privileges, made over to the Perinthians. During the continuance of this siege, Severus had crossed the Euphrates (195) and subdued the Mesopotamian Arabians. He returned to Italy in 196, and in the same year proceeded to Gaul to oppose Albinus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the troops in that country. Albinus was defeated and slain in a terrible battle fought near Lyons on the 19th of February, 197. Severus returned to Rome in the same year; but after remaining a short time in the capital, he set out for the east in order to repel the invasion of the Parthians, who were ravaging Mesopotamia. He crossed the Euphrates early in 198, and commenced a series of operations that were attended with brilliant results. Seleucia and Babylon were evacuated by the enemy; and Ctesiphon was taken and plundered after a short siege. After spending 3 years in the east, and visiting Arabia, Palestine and Egypt, Severus returned to Rome in 202. For the next 7 years he remained tranquilly at Rome; but in 208 he went to Britain with his sons Caracalla and Geta. Here he carried on war against the Caledonians, and erected the celebrated wall, which bore his name, from the Solway to the mouth of the Tyne. After remaining 2 years in Britain he died at Eboracum (York) on the 4th of February, 211, in the 65th year of his age, and the 18th of his reign].

Lucius, king of the English (Anglorum), son of King Coilus (Coilli) of Fustus(?), receiving the kingdom among the English or the Britians, was called by the Lord. He sent a message to Eleutherius, the pope, requesting him to enroll his people among the number of the Christians. Immediately the pope sent Fugacius and Damianus, two distinguished men, to baptize the king and his people. After receiving baptism Lucius gave over all the pagan temples for use as Christian churches. These he increased and enlarged, and then left his kingdom. He first went to Gaul and then to Upper Rhaetia, passing through the city of Augsburg (Augustam) to Chur (Curiensem); and there he brought many people to the dominion of the Lord, rested in virtue and peace, and performed illustrious miracles. His sister Emerita lived in a castle nearby, called Trimus. Through fire she earned the everlasting crown, and her day is the 3rd of December. Lucius conquered for Christ all of Bavaria and Rhaetia between the Alps. [Lucius, legendary king of Britain, is said to have been baptized by Timothy the disciple of Paul, and by solemn decree to have converted all the pagan temples throughout his realm into Christian churches, and to have transformed the sees of twenty-eight flamens (ancient Roman priests) and three arch-flamens into so many bishoprics and arch-bishoprics. According to another version of the story, Lucius sent letters to Pope Eleutherius desiring instructors in the Christian religion, and was supplied with Faganus Duvanus, who converted all Britain and then returned to Rome to give an account of their success. According to one account Lucius died childless at Gloucester and was buried there; but according to the belief of the Church of Coire in the Grisons, he made a pilgrimage to Rome with his sister Emerita, and died at Coire, where he was interred. The earliest British testimony to this extravagant story is that of Nennius (9th century), who says, "After the birth of Christ one hundred and sixty-seven years, King Lucius, with all the chiefs of the British people received baptism, a legation having been sent by the emperors of Rome and by Evaristus, the Roman Pope. Lucius was called Leuer Maur, that is, of Great Splendor, on account of the faith which came in his time." William of Malmsbury adds that the Roman missionaries Phagan and Deruvan came to Glastonbury. At Coire, the story goes that Lucius having laid aside crown and scepter, attended by his sister, crossed Gaul, passed through Augsburg, and came to the Alpine valley of the Grisons, and became the apostle of the Rhaetian Alps. The pagans cast him into a hot spring, but he emerged unhurt, and with his sister retreated to a cave. She was seized by the pagans and burned to death at Trimus, while Lucius lost his life in the castle of Martiola].

Trogus Pompeius, a Spanish historian, gained renown by his history from Belus, the father of Ninus, king of Assyria, to the reign of Julius Caesar, divided into forty-four books. Justin (Justinus), the historian, later abridged these books. [Trogus Pompeius lived in the time of Augustus. He wrote the , a history of the Macedonian monarchy, but due to its many deviations, really a kind of universal history from the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the conquest of the East by Rome. The original work of Trogus, which was one of great value, is lost. The work of Justin is merely a selection of such parts as were worthy of being generally known].

Dionysius, a bishop of Corinth, as Eusebius writes, lived in the time of Soter (Sotheris) and was a man of such eloquence and versatility that he not only taught the people of his own state and province, but also the bishops of other cities and places by his letters and epistles. Having been instructed in the teachings of the Apostle Paul, he became bishop of Corinth, and in that capacity found it easy to maintain others in office and to teach them by his writings. Of these writings he sent six for use at as many different places. Many other highly learned men lived at this time. []

Theodotion (Theodocion), born in Asia from the country of Ephesus, was a highly learned man and well versed in the Scriptures. This third translator of the Holy Scriptures lived in these times, together with the men already mentioned. In addition to his interpretation and translation he left many other writings in praise of the Christian religion. He was a disciple of Tatian before the latter fell into heresy. By means of his numerous writings he ingeniously ridiculed Apelles the heretic, because Apelles said that he did not know the God whom Theodotion worshipped. Apelles said that Christ was not in truth the Son of God, but an imaginary being. [For Apelles, see Folio CXIIIv and note ad loc].

Clement, a priest of Alexandria, and an ingenious and highly informed man, as Jerome writes, also flourished with the above-mentioned persons. He wrote many and various books as well as letters. Origen was his disciple. [Saint Clement of Alexandria, born Titus Flavius Clemens (c. 150 - 211/216), was one of the early Church Fathers and perhaps the most distinguished teacher of his age. His numerous writings, widely quoted in the Middle Ages, attempted to unite Greek philosophical traditions with Christian doctrine. Steeped in pagan literature, his ideological view of Christianity was one part Plato and two parts Bible. His student Origen succeeded him as head of the school of Christian education at Alexandria. See also Eusebius, 5.11, 6.6, and 6.13-14].

Apollonius, a Roman senator and highly educated man, suffered martyrdom in the time of Pope Eleutherius, when the churches were at peace. He preached a fine sermon in praise of the Christian faith, although this was forbidden on pain of death. He presented to the Emperor Commodus an excellent work that the emperor caused to be read at a session of the senate. Afterwards he was betrayed as a Christian by one of his own servants, and was beheaded on the 18th day April. After his death many heresies gained the ascendancy, etc.

Tertullian of Carthage, son of a centurion and proconsul, and celebrated for his learning and intelligence flourished at this time, as Jerome writes. In middle life he was the most renowned of the clergy at Rome. However, through jealousy he was so harassed with slanders and threats that he felt compelled to join the heretic Montanus; and in consequence he wrote many books against the Christian faith. He lived to a declining old age. [Q. Septimus Florens Tertullian, most ancient of the Latin fathers. Notwithstanding the celebrity he has always enjoyed, our knowledge of his personal history is very limited, being derived almost exclusively from a succinct notice of Jerome. From this we learn he was a native of Carthage, son of a proconsular centurion (an officer who acted as a sort of aide-de-camp to provincial governors); that he flourished chiefly during the reigns of Septimus Severus and Caracalla; that he became a Presbyter, and remained orthodox to middle life, when in consequence of the envy and ill-treatment which he experienced on the part of the Roman clergy, he went over to the Montanists and wrote several books in defense of those heretics; that he lived to a great age and was the author of many works. He was born c. 160, and died c. 240. The most interesting of his numerous works is his , a defense of Christianity. His writings show him a man of varied learning; but his style is rough, abrupt, and obscure, abounding in far-fetched metaphors and extravagant hyperboles].

ILLUSTRATION

Lucius and Emerita, his sister, are represented by a dual portrait, specially designed for this purpose. Bede (Historica Ecclesiastica, I, 4) states that in 156 CE, in the reign of the Roman emperors Aurelius and Verus, and in the pontificate of Pope Eleutherius, Lucius, a British king, sent a letter to the Pope praying for his assistance that he might be made a Christian; and having obtained this favor, was, together with his people, instructed in the Christian faith. To this tale the credulity of later ages has added many particulars. Ciraldus Cambrensis makes Lucius king of the Britons, and the missionaries from Rome effect the conversion of the whole population of the island. Geoffrey of Monmouth makes Lucius the son of Coilus, the son of Marius, the son of Arviragus, and agrees with Ciraldus about the conversion. Some other traditions and legends of the Middle Ages made Lucius resign his crown, travel as a missionary, with his sister St. Emerita, through Rhaetia and Vindelicia, and suffer martyrdom near Curia or Chur. The history and even the existence of Lucius are doubted by some critics. A letter is extant, professing to be from Pope Eleutherius "to Lucius, king of Britain," but it is doubtless spurious. In the woodcut Lucius appears in regal robes, and sainted. Across his right shoulder he carries three scepters, no doubt emblematical of his triune sovereignty. With his right hand he poises a shield, inscribed with his coat of arms. Here the British lion is absent, and we see only a rampant unicorn—at least a unicorn by inference. According to fable this beast has the head and body of a horse, the hind legs of an antelope, the tail of a lion (or sometimes that of a horse), sometimes the beard of a goat, and, as its chief feature, a long, sharp, twisted horn, similar to the narwhal's tusk, set in the middle of the forehead and projected forward. Hence the Latin unicornus, 'single-horned.' The medieval conception of the unicorn possessing great strength and fierceness is perhaps due to the fact that in certain passages of the Old Testament (Num. 23:22, Deut. 33:17, Job 39:9-10) the Hebrew word r'em, now translated in the Revised Version "wild ox," was translated unicornus, or rhinoceros, and in the Authorized Version "unicorn," though in Deut. 33:17 it obviously refers to a two-horned animal. Isidore 12:2, 12, tells how the unicorn has been known to defeat the elephant in combat. According to ancient tradition "The horn that is between the eyes signifies that he is the supreme king."

In heraldry the unicorn was sometimes used as a device, but oftener as a supporter, and subsists to the present day as the left hand supporter of the British royal arms. This position it assumed at the Union, the Scottish royal arms having been supported by two unicorns. In the woodcut before us the artist has depicted either a goat or the two-horned animal of Deuteronomy. But I fear we must call it a goat. Note the two horns, bent back over the neck—not the straight spiral single-horn of the fabulous animal, proceeding forward from a point between the eyes.

Emerita, sister of Lucius, is portrayed as a queen, crowned and sainted. In symbolism of her martyrdom she carries a flaming torch.

Folio CXVI recto

The fifth persecution of the Christians began in this year as a result of the anger of Severus the emperor. He was the fifth, after Nero, who persecuted the Christians; but he was constantly harassed and worried by various dangers and wars. Nor did the Roman people escape God's vengeance, for they were miraculously troubled with civil wars. In this persecution suffered those named below.

Irenaeus (Hyreneus), bishop of Lyons (Lugdunensis), was a highly learned man, and was martyred for the name of Christ. He was of great renown under Commodus. Jerome writes that he was a disciple of Polycarp, the martyr. By him he was so well instructed that he wrote five books against heresy, one against the pagans, and many other works. Finally he was placed on two hills by the emperor Severus, on one of which stood a cross, on the other an idol; and he was asked to choose between death on the cross and life through the idol. But, with the people, he came to the cross, and they were all crowned with martyrdom on the 28th day of June. [Irenaeus, one of the early Christian fathers, was probably born at Smyrna between 120 and 140 CE. In his early youth he heard Polycarp. He afterwards went to Gaul, and in 177 succeeded Pothinus as bishop of Lyon. He made many converts from the pagans and was most active in opposing the Gnostics, especially the Valentinians. He seems to have lived about the end of the second century. His only work now extant, ('Against Heresies') is intended to refute the Gnostics. The original Greek is lost, with the exception of a few fragments, but the work exists in a peculiar Latin version].

Leonides of Alexandria, father of the great Origen, was a very pious man. In the time of this persecution he suffered martyrdom. In the tenth year of the emperor Pertinax, his young son Origen determined to follow his father as a martyr, had he not been hindered by God's will (for he was useful to many people) and the concern of his mother; for when he decided openly to confess Christ on the next day she secretly hid his clothes during the night, and so kept him from the tyrants. But he urged his father to martyrdom, and, with his mother and six brothers was left in poverty; for because of their acknowledgment of Christ, the paternal inheritance was forfeited to the state. []

Eugenia, daughter of Philippus, the illustrious Roman, was a beautiful virgin, educated in the liberal arts. She, together with Prothus and Jacinthus, the brothers who left their parents, was baptized by Helenus the bishop; and thereafter, while she lived in male clothes in a monastery, she was accused of rape by a woman named Melantia (Melancia). For this reason she was brought before the judge, and was threatened with the martyrdom which had been prepared for her. But as they tore her clothes, she appeared to be a woman; and it was discovered that she was the judge's daughter; and the people were glad, but fearful; for Melantia, together with her house, was destroyed by a miraculous fire. And her parents, together with the entire household permitted themselves to be baptized. Afterwards, with her mother and the brothers Prothus and Jacinthus, she went to Rome; and by the example of their virtue they encouraged many people to accept the faith; and particularly Basilla, whom they urged to perpetual chastity. Because she would not sacrifice to the goddess Diana, she was tied to a stone and thrown into the Tiber; but the stone broke and she remained unharmed. Finally, after enduring many tortures, she was slain in prison on the day of Christ's birth. Her body was interred in her own soil, not far from Rome. [Eugenia, anciently one of the most popular saints in the Roman calendar, was the daughter of Philip, proconsul of Egypt in the reign of Commodus. She was brought up at Alexandria in all the wisdom of the Gentiles, was converted to Christianity, and in learning, eloquence and courage, seems to have been the prototype of Catherine, by whom, however, she has been completely eclipsed. According to legend she put on man's attire, and became a monk in Egypt, under the name Eugenius. Later, returning to Rome, she suffered martyrdom by the sword under the emperor Severus. She rarely appears in works of art, having lost her popularity in the period of revival].

Perpetua and Felicitas, the holy women, together with Saturninus and Secundulus, were martyred in Mauretania, in the Tiburtine city, on the 7th day of March. After the death of Secundulus in prison, they were thrown to the wild beasts and torn asunder. [Unlike nearly every other (largely legendary) account of martyrdom that comes down to us, the record of what is known as "The Passion of St. Perpetua, St. Felicitas, and their Companions" is one of the great treasures of martyr literature, a document which is said to preserve the actual words of the martyrs and their friends. Saints Perpetua and Felicitas were involved in a violent persecution under the emperor Severus in 202. It reached Africa the following year, when five catechumens were apprehended at Carthage for the faith, namely, Revocatus, and his fellow slave Felicitas, Saturninus, and Secundulus, and Vivia Perpetua. Felicitas was expecting her confinement. Perpetua had an infant at her breast, was of good family, twenty-two years of age, and married to a man of quality in the city. These five martyrs were joined by Saturus, probably the brother of Saturninus. Saturus seems to have been their instructor. He underwent a voluntary imprisonment because he would not abandon them. The father of Perpetua made every effort to influence his daughter to resume pagan belief, he being a pagan himself; but she refused. All the prisoners had visions of their own martyrdom, and they were finally condemned to death by exposure to wild beasts in the arena. Perpetua and Felicitas were exposed to a wild cow, which attacked them and tossed them about. But they regained their footing, and while they stood together expecting another assault from the beasts, the people cried out that it was enough; and they were led to the gate where those that were not killed by the beasts were dispatched at the end of the shows by the confectores ('finishers'). All the martyrs were now brought to the place of their final butchery; but the people, not yet satisfied with beholding blood, cried out to have them led into the middle of the amphitheater so that they might have the pleasure of seeing them receive the last blow. Perpetua fell into the hands of a very frightened and unskillful apprentice of the gladiators, who, with trembling hand, gave her many slight wounds, which made her languish a long time. The two women were martyred on March 7th, 203 CE].

Narcissus, patriarch of Jerusalem, lived in the time of Victor the pope and Severus the emperor. Once upon a time when the lamps lacked oil, he caused water to be poured in them, and the water became viscous, and the lamps were lighted. He was accused by false witnesses, but they were punished by divine judgment. And he went into the wilderness; and as he became aged and did not want to hold office merely for appearance sake, Alexander, the bishop of Cappodocia, was put in his place with his consent. Afterwards he was also martyred.

Narcissus was the 30th bishop of Jerusalem. The controversy about the Paschal festival had continued to divide some parts of the Eastern and Western Churches ever since the time of Polycarp and Anicetus in 158. The dispute was running high when Narcissus became bishop of Jerusalem. The Churches of Asia Minor adhered to the Jewish method of observing the festival on the 14th day of the first month; whereas all the other churches kept it on the day before the Sunday on which they celebrated the Resurrection of Christ. A synod held at Edessa by unanimous decision brushed aside the Jewish method of keeping the festival.

Narcissus is said to have performed a notable miracle. On Easter Eve oil was lacking for the lamps. Narcissus ordered water to be drawn from a well and poured into the lamps, and it worked as well as oil.

Strict discipline caused Narcissus to be subjected to slanders, which caused him to retreat to the desert where he lived a life of solitude. After many years he reappeared as one risen from the dead, and resumed his office at the people's urging.

Eusebius, Potentianus, Vincentius, and Peregrinus, very noble Roman men, were slain for their Christian faith before this time in the reign of Commodus Augustus, having first been subjected to many tortures. First these men were placed on the rack and were stretched very sharply by their tendons. Then there were very cruelly beaten with clubs. But when they still remained most faithfully steadfast in their praise of God, they were glorified [The word translated as 'glorified' is from the verb mactō, -are, which can also mean 'magnify', 'extol', 'honor', 'elevate', 'sacrifice', 'kill', 'slaughter', and 'destroy'.] to the release of their spirit on the 8th of the Kalends of October. [The last three sentences of this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.]

Julius the senator, was, together with his entire household, converted to Christ by these same martyrs, and baptized by Rufinus (Ruffinum). At the instance of the emperor they were killed with clubs. The body of Julius was buried by Eusebius. The judges sentenced him to have his tongue cut off, and when this took place, he sang the praises of God. As a result of that Antoninus was converted; and he was beheaded. Then Eusebius was beaten with leaden thongs until he rested in the Lord.

Year of the World 5423 | Year of Christ 224

Urban (Urbanus) the First, a pope and native Roman was renowned for his learning and pious life in the Year of Christ 224, under the Emperor M. Aurelius Antonius. With his exceptional learning he drew many people to the faith, particularly the excellent man Valerianus, the betrothed of St. Cecilia, and Tiburtius (Tiburcium) his brother, who afterwards suffered martyrdom with fortitude. This pope ordained that no one should be elected bishop who had not been consecrated as a priest or deacon, and that the church might take the landed estates given by the faithful for the use of all the clergy as common property, and not for the use of any one person in particular. However, there has been a departure from this rule, so great has human selfishness and greed become today. He was crowned with martyrdom on the 24th day of May, after having sat (in office) four years, ten months and 12 days. Then the chair was vacant for 30 days. [Urban I was bishop of Rome from 222 to 230; he was preceded by Calixtus and followed by Pontian].

Pontian (Pontianus) the pope, a Roman, lived in the time of the emperor Alexander in the year from the founding of the city (i.e, Rome) 974, but in the Year of Christ 228. He was a good and pious man. At the instigation of the idolaters he was banished from Rome and sent to the island of Sardinia with Philip the priest. And there, after enduring much grief and severe suffering for the Christian faith, he died. His body was brought back to Rome by Pope Fabian at the instance of the pious, and was there buried with great honor. He sat for nine years, five months and two days, and the chair was vacant ten days. [Pontian, pope, 230 to 235, was exiled by the emperor Maximus and in consequence of this sentence, he resigned September 28, 235. He was succeeded by Anterus].

In several histories one finds Cyriacus as successor to Pontian, and the statement that he left the papacy so that he might suffer martyrdom with the virgins. But calculations of time do not allow this, as the legend of the eleven thousand virgins shows. And he is said to have sat (in office) one year and three months. However, he was not placed in the register of the popes because he abdicated without the consent of the fathers.

Anterus (Antherus), the pope, a Greek, and a very good man, ordered the history of the martyrs industriously investigated and recorded by the notaries, and to be laid up in the archives of the churches, so that the memories and careers of righteous persons might not be lost. He ordained that a bishop leaving his first episcopate should not undertake another for his personal advantage or through necessity alone, but with the consent of the congregation to which he was assigned, and the approval of the pope. But some now think otherwise, and, not concerning themselves with herding their flock, consider only their personal advantage, and how they may enlarge their own revenues and wealth and increase the number of their retainers. Anterus, however, with but one bishop, went to his martyrdom, after having sat 11 years one month and 12 days. And the chair was vacant 13 days. [Anterus, also called Anteros, was pope for some weeks at the end of 235, and died January 3, 236 CE. According to ('Book of the Popes') he was martyred for having ordered a collection of the acts of the martyrs to be made and included in the archives of the church. His original epitaph was discovered in the Catacombs in 1854].

Tiburtius (Tiburcius) and Valerianus, brothers, highly renowned Roman citizens, were brought into the faith by the help of Cecilia the virgin and through Urban the pope. Afterwards, pursuant to the sentence of Almachius, the prefect of the city, they were first beaten with clubs, and finally slain with the sword, all for the name of Christ. So was Maximus, the renowned man, who kept them in prison, and who was also a Christian, also beaten to death with a leaden instrument. His body was buried with those of Tiburtius and Valerianus by Cecilia on the 14th day of April.

Cecilia, the Roman virgin, beautiful in person, and illustrious for her morals, piety and exemplary chastity, was an only daughter of her parents, who gave her in marriage, together with royal riches, to the above named noble Roman youth Valerianus. She brought him, together with Tiburtius, into the Christian faith; and by her sweet teachings and constancy she kept their minds focused on it in their endurance of martyrdom. She too, remained firm in her suffering at her father's house, which previously had been consecrated to God through Pope Urban at her request. Then when Almachius urged this Cecilia to sacrifice to idols, and her parents also tried to prevail upon her to do so, she refused, and acknowledged herself to be a Christian. Immediately afterwards Almachius caused her to be burned day and night with scalding water; but as she remained unharmed he ordered her to be beheaded. However, after the executioner had given her three strokes, he still failed to decapitate her; and as the Roman law forbade a fourth stroke, he left her half dead. In three days she divided her estate among the poor, and commended to Pope Urban those who had converted her to the faith. This very beautiful virgin suffered (martyrdom) around the 220th year of the Lord on the 22nd day of the month of November in the time of Alexander the emperor.

Cecilia, according to legend, was a noble Roman lady who lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. Her parents, who secretly professed Christianity, brought her up to their own faith, and she was remarkable for her enthusiastic piety from early childhood. According to tradition she was very much devoted to music, and invented the organ, which she consecrated to the service of God. At about the age of 16 her parents married her to a young Roman, virtuous, rich, and of noble birth, named Valerian. He was, however, still a pagan, and she converted him and his brother Tiburtius to the Christian faith. They were baptized by Urban, who being persecuted by the pagans, had taken refuge in the Catacombs. All three went about doing good, giving alms, and encouraging those about to be put to death for Christ's sake, and, after their fellow Christians' deaths, buried their bodies.

Jameson (Sacred and Legendary Art, II, 4th edition; London 1863; pp. 194-210) relates her story thus:

Now there was in those days a wicked prefect of Rome, named Almachius, who governed in the emperor's absence; and he sent for Cecilia, her husband, and his brother, and he commanded them to desist from their practices of Christian charity. But they refused. The two brothers were thrown into prison, and committed to the charge of a centurion named Maximus, whom they converted, and all three, refusing to join in the sacrifice to Jupiter, were put to death. Cecilia buried them in the cemetery of Calixtus. Then Almachius, covetous of the wealth Cecilia had inherited, sent for her, and commanded her to sacrifice to the gods, but she refused. Almachius ordered her carried back to her own house, and her bath filled with boiling water, and her to be cast therein. But it had no effect upon her. Then Almachius sent an executioner to behead her with the sword; but his hands trembled so that after wounding her with three strokes in the neck and breast, he went away leaving her bleeding and half dead. She lived for three days, in which she distributed her possessions to the poor; and she called to Urban, and desired that her house, in which she lay dying, should be converted into a place of worship for the Christians. She was buried by Urban in the same cemetery with her husband.

ILLUSTRATION

St. Cecilia, a new portrait. She wears a crown (of martyrdom) and the saintly nimbus. With both hands she holds a hornbook with inscription, introduced no doubt as a symbol of her early devotion to study of the gospel. The name 'horn-book' was originally applied to a sheet containing the letters of the alphabet, which formed a primer for the use of children. It was mounted on wood and protected with transparent horn. The wooden frame had a handle, and it was usually hung at the child's girdle. The sheet, which in ancient times was of vellum and latterly of paper, contained first a large cross – the criss-cross – from which the horn-book was called the Christ Cross row, or criss-cross-row. The alphabet in large and small letters followed. The usual exorcism – "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, amen" – followed, then the Lord's Prayer, the whole concluding with the Roman numerals.

Due to her devotion to music and the tradition that she invented the organ, Cecilia is generally represented as the patroness of music, carrying a scroll of music or a small organ, or as playing the organ.

Bassianus, son of the aforesaid Severus, and surnamed Aurelius Antoninus Caracalla, was a Roman emperor. When Severus died he left two sons, Bassianus and Geta. Bassianus was his father's successor in the sovereignty, but Geta was adjudged a public enemy and slain by Bassianus, who, in the course of a life checkered with evil, also assassinated Papinian (Pampinian) [Papinian, celebrated Roman jurist, was praefectus praetorio ('Commander of the Praetorian Guard') under the emperor Septimus Severus, whom he accompanied to Britain. When the emperor died at York, he is said to have commended his two sons Caracalla and Geta to the care of Papinian. But on the death of his father, Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office, and shortly put him to death. No Roman jurist had a higher reputation than Papinian, and he was a model of a true lawyer]. the jurist. Bassianus was even more cruel and licentious than his father, avoiding no form of evil. He took his stepmother for wife. He caused to be beheaded those who wore medicine about their throats for quaternary or tertiary fever; and so those who urinated against the pillars were condemned by him. Finally he was slain in the war against the Parthians in the 6th year and second month of his reign, at the age of forty-three. [Caracalla, Roman emperor (211-217 CE), son of Septimus Severus and his second wife Julia Domna, was born at Lyons in 188 CE. He was originally called Bassianus after his paternal grandfather, but afterward M. Aurelius Antoninus, which became his legal name. Caracalla was a nickname derived from a long tunic worn by the Gauls, which he adopted as his favorite dress after he became emperor. In 198 Caracalla, at the age of ten, was declared Augustus, and in the same year accompanied his father on the expedition against the Parthians. He returned to Rome with his father in 202, and married Plautilla, daughter of Plautianus, the praetorian prefect. He then went to Rome with his father, and on the death of the latter at York in 211, Caracalla and his brother Geta succeeded to the throne, according to their father's arrangements. Caracalla's first aim was to obtain the sole government by the murder of his brother, which he accomplished in 212. The assassination was followed by the execution of many distinguished men whom Caracalla suspected of favoring his brother, and among these was the celebrated jurist Papinian. Caracalla's cruelties and extravagances knew no bounds; and after exhausting Italy by his extortions, the provinces that he visited became the scenes of fresh atrocities. In 214 he visited Gaul, Germany, Dacia, and Thrace. In 215 he went to Syria and Egypt, and his sojourn at Alexandria was marked by general slaughter of the inhabitants to avenge certain sarcastic pleasantries in which they had indulged against him and his mother. He crossed the Euphrates and laid bare Mesopotamia. He intended to cross the Tigris but was murdered near Edessa by Macrinus, the praetorian prefect].

Opilius Macrinus, after the assassination of Caracalla, attained the sovereignty together with his son and Albinus; but as they reigned only a year and two months, they accomplished nothing memorable. They were slain by the troops as a result of discord among them. Macrinus was slain by Elagabalus (Heliogabolo) at Antioch. [M. Opilius Severus Macrinus, Roman emperor, April 217 to June 218 CE, was born at Caesaria in Mauretania, of humble parents in 164 CE, and rose at length to be prefect of the praetorians under Caracalla. He accompanied the latter on his expedition against the Parthians and was proclaimed emperor after the death of Caracalla, whom he caused to be assassinated. He conferred the title of Caesar upon his son Diadumenianus (spelled 'Diadumenus' in the), and gained great popularity by repealing certain obnoxious taxes. However, in the course of the same year the Parthians defeated him with great loss, and compelled him to retire into Syria. While there, his soldiers, with whom he had become unpopular by enforcing discipline among them, were easily seduced from their allegiance, and proclaimed Elagabalus as emperor. With the troops that remained faithful, Macrinus marched against the usurper, but was defeated, and fled in disguise. Shortly afterward he was seized in Chalcedon, and put to death after a reign of 14 months]. Diadumenianus (Diadumenus) was named Antoninus by his father and the sovereignty was publicly set aside for him while still a child. Of all children he was most favored in stature, tall in person, with blond hair, black eyes, a straight nose, a beautiful chin, and a mouth always ready to be kissed. When he first put on his regal attire he appeared so handsome that he was loved by all. [Diadumenianus, or Diadumenus, son of the emperor Macrinus, received the title of Caesar when his father was elevated to the throne in 217 CE, but was put to death in the following year about the same time with Macrinus]. And so Clodius Albinus, called an emperor in Gaul, was of noble ancestry. And after those had reigned a short time, but accomplished nothing memorable, various historians have left them by the wayside. Yet Albinus, because of his gluttony, left a name memorable among the shepherds; for, as Cornelius says, at one dinner he ate one hundred Campanian peaches, ten Hostian melons, five hundred figs, and four hundred snails. [Clodius Albinus was born at Adrumetum in Africa. Commodus, the Roman emperor, made him governor of Gaul, and afterward also of Britain, where he was at the time of the death of Commodus in 192 CE. In order to secure the neutrality of Albinus, Septimus Severus made him Caesar. However, after Severus had defeated his rivals, he turned his arms against Albinus, and a great battle was fought between them at Lugdunum, now Lyons, in Gaul, in the year 197, in which Albinus was defeated and slain].

Marcus Aurelius Antoninus [The official name of the Roman emperor Elagabalus (also called Heliogabalus)]. received the throne, and, as one says, was the son of the aforesaid emperor Caracalla by Soemias (Semiamira) his most beautiful concubine. Some say he was conceived of the common rabble. This emperor ordered his mother to attend the Roman senate, and he was the first emperor at whose instance a woman went to the senate in a man's place. He made a separate senate for the women, who passed ridiculous laws, for instance, how the women should dress, what precedence they were to have over one another, and which was to rise in the presence of the other, etc. This Elagabalus left no memory other than of his vileness and shamelessness. He made virgins pregnant, and always kept lascivious women in his house. He put away the Roman senator Sabinus, and conferred honors and offices upon evil and vile persons. Among the Roman emperors he was the first to have a silver table and vessels. And when his friends warned him to take care of himself, he answered and said, What is better than to be my own heir and that of my wife? He overwhelmed his parasites in cunningly crafted dining rooms with violets and flowers, so that some died.

A 'parasite' was an individual in the Greco-Roman world who must have somebody else's food, someone who must find a way to somebody else's dinner table. The ostensible goal was free food, but the real goal was to secure recognition—and therefore social status and a modicum of respect—from your host, an aristocratic elite who was at least one rung (often more) higher up the social ladder than the parasite.

Schedel (or his immediate source) abridges the original text, taken from the Historia Augusta (21.5), that more clearly describes the suffocating death by flowers Elagabalus devised for his banqueting 'friends': "In a banqueting-room with a reversible ceiling he once overwhelmed his parasites with violets and other flowers, so that some were actually smothered to death, being unable to crawl out to the top." (Herman Peter, trans.; Loeb Classical Library, 1924)

He also invented certain carnal pleasures; but for his foolhardiness he and his mother were slain in an uprising of the army. They say that when a prophecy had been spoken to him by some Syrian priests that he would die a violent death, he prepared cords entwined with purple and scarlet silk in order that he could put an end to his life by the noose. He had gold swords, too, prepared, with which to kill himself. [This sentence and the preceding one, taken almost verbatim from 33.2-4, are not found in the German edition]. But these were of no use. He died after having been dragged by vagabonds through the streets, plunged most foully into sewers, and hurled into the Tiber in the fourth year of his reign; [] and thus ended the name of Antoninus. [Elagabalus (Heliogabalus), Roman emperor from 218 to 219 CE, was the son of Julia Soemias and Varius Marcellus. He was born at Emesa about 203, and was originally called Varius Avitus Bassianus. While yet a child he became, along with his cousin Alexander Severus, priest of Elagabalus, the Syro-Phoenician Sun-god, to whose worship the temple was dedicated in his native city. It was from this circumstance that he was called Elagabalus. He owed his elevation to the intrigues of his grandmother, who circulated the report that he was the offspring of the secret commerce between Soemias and Caracalla, and induced the troops in Syria to salute him as their sovereign by the title M. Aurelius Antoninus. Macrinus immediately marched against him, but was defeated near Antioch on June 8, 218, and shortly afterward put to death. Elagabalus was now acknowledged as emperor by the senate, and in the following year he came to Rome. His reign was characterized throughout by the most fantastic folly and superstition, together with impurity so bestial that the particulars almost transcend the limits of credibility. He adopted his first cousin Alexander Severus, and proclaimed him Caesar. Having become jealous of Alexander, he attempted to put him to death, but was himself slain with his mother by the soldiers, with whom Alexander was a great favorite].

Alexander became emperor when Elagabalus was slain. He had a Christian mother, named Mamaea. This man was an image of virtue, and he greatly fostered the return of the common weal that had declined through the licentiousness of the previous emperor. In this were helpful to him Julius Frontinus, the great scholar, and Ulpianus and Paulus, men highly informed in civil rights. He lived without pomp or covetousness for honors, and employed prudence to such a degree that he was deceived by none. He despised money, favoritism, and jewels. He wanted to build a temple to Christ and count him among the gods. This Alexander, though crowned while still young, soon made war against the Persians, and he decisively defeated their king Xerxes. Alexander was an earnest and strict military disciplinarian, and he deposed a great number in the army; for this reason in an uprising of the military at Mainz in Gaul, he was slain in the thirteenth year of his reign. When this emperor punished someone he caused a bailiff to call out what he had often heard from the Christians: That which you do not wish to be done to you by another, you should not do. This he loved so much that he ordered it to be inscribed at street corners and on public buildings. [M. Aurelius Alexander Severus, usually called Alexander Severus, was Roman emperor from 218-235 CE. He was the son of Gessius Marcianus and Julia Mamaea, and first cousin to Elagabalus. He was born at Arca, in Phoenicia, in the temple of Alexander the Great, to which his parents had gone for the celebration of a festival on October 1st 205 CE. In 211 he was adopted by Elagabalus and created Caesar. On the death of Elagabalus in 211, Alexander ascended the throne. After reigning in peace for some years, during which he reformed many abuses in the state, he was involved in a war with Artaxerxes of Persia. Over him Alexander gained a great victory in 232. He celebrated a triumph at Rome in 233, and in the following year set out for Gaul, which the Germans were devastating; but before he could make any progress in the campaign, he was waylaid by a small band of mutinous soldiers, instigated, it is said, by Maximus, and slain, along with his mother, at the age of thirty. He was, it is said, distinguished by justice, wisdom, and clemency in all public transactions, and by the simplicity and purity of his private life].

Origen (Origenes), a native of Alexandria, son of a martyr, and a priest of the Alexandrian church, a prince among all the philosophers and theologians of his time, flourished in these times at Alexandria. From youth he was very Christian and a student of exceptional intelligence; and in the tenth year of the Emperor Severus Pertinax, during the persecution of the Christians in which his father Leonides was martyred, Origen, his young son, urged him to martyrdom. After the death of his father, Origen, according to his means, protected those who were oppressed with punishments by the tyrants, and comforted those who were led forth to their death. Afterwards he devoted himself entirely to spiritual matters and held the office of preacher. He was of such great intelligence that no tongue or scripture was unknown to him. He observed wonderful moderation in his food and drink, and held himself aloof from strange matters. He followed Christ in poverty, and for many years wandered about barefooted. Many people, emulating his virtue and Christian faith, willingly suffered martyrdom. He successfully fought against the heresies of the Ebionites, who maintained that Christ was a natural person born of Joseph and Mary, and interpreted the law according to Jewish custom. He never slept in a feather bed, and entirely abstained from meat. In his zeal for the faith he castrated himself. Because of his wisdom in the Scriptures and his strict life, Mamaea, the Christian woman, mother of Alexander, caused him to be called to Antioch, and she and her son held him in great esteem. Origen possessed so much knowledge and scriptural wisdom that seven scribes were hardly able to keep pace with him. And so he employed another seven scribes and seven well-instructed young virgins, all of whom tired under the burden of transcribing his dictation. And although Porphyry, the grim persecutor of the Christians, considered Origen an enemy, yet at times he also praised him, calling him a prince of philosophers, and stating that Origen followed all the secret arts of Plato. Jerome says that this Origen wrote six thousand books. Yet (as Augustus and Jerome state), he erred in many respects, principally in the book of princes, called Periarchon, from which the Origenian heresy originated. These heretics said that Christ in his great mercy would not only redeem mankind, but also the rebel angels. But (as some say), Origen, in a letter to Pope Fabianus, recanted the evil things that he thus set forth. Some place the responsibility for his errors upon Ambrosius, one of his opponents, who exposed his unauthorized writings. And therefore some, such as Eusebius and Rufianus (Ruffino), and others, praise Origen; and some of his writings are accepted by the churches. At last, in the Year of Our Salvation 236, he died at the age of sixty-nine and was buried at Tyre. [Origenes, usually called Origen, one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, was born at Alexandria in 186 CE. He received a careful education from his father Leonides, who was a devout Christian, and subsequently became a pupil of Clement of Alexandria. His father having been put to death in the persecution of the Christians in the 10th year of Severus (202), Origen was reduced to destitution; whereupon he became a teacher of grammar, and soon acquired a great reputation. At the same time he gave instruction to several of the pagans, and, though only in his 18th year, was appointed to the office of Catechist, which was vacant through the dispersion of the clergy as a result of the persecution. He showed a zeal and self-denial beyond his years. Deeming his profession as teacher of grammar inconsistent with his sacred work, he gave it up, and lived on practically nothing. His food and his periods of sleep were restricted within the narrowest limits; and he performed an act of self-mutilation by castrating himself, in obedience to what he regarded as the recommendation of Jesus (Matthew 29:12). At a later time, however, he repudiated this literal understanding of Jesus' words. He visited Rome but made only a short stay. Returning to Alexandria he continued his duties as Catechist, and pursued his Biblical studies. He visited Caesarea and traveled to Greece. On his return he encountered the enmity of Demetrius, the bishop of Alexandria. He was deprived of his office of Catechist and compelled to leave Alexandria. Demetrius afterward procured his degradation from the priesthood and his excommunication for the obnoxious character of some of his opinions. He withdrew to Caesarea, where he was received with greatest kindness. In the Decian persecution (249-251) he was put to torture, and though his life was spared, his sufferings hastened his end. He died in 253 or 254 in his 69th year at Tyre, where he was buried. His work, , was the principal object of attack with Origen's enemies, and the source from which they derived their chief evidence of his various alleged heresies. Of his more distinctive tenets, several had reference to doctrine of the Trinity, to the incarnation, and to the existence of Christ's human soul, which, as well as the pre-existence of other human souls, he affirmed. He was charged also with holding the corporeity of angels, and with other errors as to angels and demons. He held the freedom of the human will and ascribed to man a nature less corrupt and depraved than was consistent with orthodox views of the operation of divine grace. He held the doctrine of the universal restoration of the guilty, conceiving that the Devil alone would suffer eternal punishment].

Ulpianus (Vulpianus), the jurist, an excellent man and adviser of the aforementioned Alexander, was at this time held in great honor by said emperor because of his remarkable skill and learning. He excelled all other teachers in interpreting the words of the old law, and left behind many writings. [Domitius Ulpianus, a celebrated jurist, derived his origin from Tyre in Phoenicia, but was probably not a native of Tyre himself. The greater part of his juristical works were written during the reign of Caracalla. He was banished or deprived of his functions under Elagabalus, but on the accession of Alexander Severus, became the emperor's chief adviser. The emperor conferred on him the office of Scriniarum magister ('Master of the Records') and made him a consiliarius ('adviser' or 'counselor'). He also held the office of Praefectus Annonae ('a Roman imperial official charged with the supervision of the grain supply to the city of Rome') and was likewise made Praefectus Praetorio ('Commander of the Praetorian Guard'). Ulpian perished in the reign of Alexander by the hands of the soldiers, who killed him in the presence of the emperor and his mother in 228. His last promotion was probably an unpopular measure. The great legal knowledge, the good sense, and the industry of Ulpian place him among the first of the Roman jurists; and he has exercised a great influence on the jurisprudence of modern Europe through the copious extracts from his writings preserved by the compilers of the Justinian].

Paul (Paulus) of Padua, also flourished at this time in philosophy and jurisprudence, and was of great help to the said Emperor Alexander in restoring the commonwealth that had fallen into neglect. He also left behind various writings on jurisprudence. [Julius Paulus, one of the most distinguished of Roman jurists, was in the auditorium of Papinian, and consequently was acting as a jurist in the reign of Septimus Severus. He was exiled by Elagablaus, but recalled by Alexander Severus when the latter became emperor, and was made a member of the consilium. He also held the office of Praefectus Praetorio. He survived his contemporary, Ulpian. Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the Digest than from any other jurist except Ulpian. Upwards of 70 works by Paulus are quoted in the . Of these his greatest was in 80 books].

Julius Frontinus, a philosopher, rich in learning in all the arts, flourished with the aforesaid men of learning, gave assistance to Alexander, and also wrote much. [Julius Frontius was a Latin rhetorician who gave instructions in his art to Alexander Severus].

Tryphon (Triphonem) was a disciple of Origen and also lived at this time. A number of his letters are extant. Being a man highly informed in the Scriptures, he wrote a book of the red cows of Deuteronomy; and he also wrote on other matters. [Tryphon, probably the Jewish philosopher whose name appears in Justin's (100-165 CE) well known].

Minucius (Minutius) Felix, a distinguished orator at Rome, wrote a dialogue entitled Octavius, and also wrote against sorcerers and seers. [M. Minucius Felix, a Roman lawyer, who flourished about 230 CE, wrote a dialogue entitled , which occupies a conspicuous place among the early essays written in defense of Christianity].

Ambrose (Ambrosius), a Greek deacon, was in high esteem at this time. And although he was at first subject to the errors of Marcion, he was drawn from this course by Origen. Origen wrote many books to Ambrose at the latter's expense. This noble man of exceptional intelligence died before Origen, and was scorned by many people because, though a rich man, he did not remember his poor old friend at the time of his death. []

Folio CXVIII recto

Agapitas (Agapitus), an illustrious youth fifteen years of age, was at this time crowned with martyrdom at Prenesta the Sabine city, through the offices of Emperor Alexander. At the age of fifteen he was zealous to suffer martyrdom for his love of Christ. He was seized by the emperor and at first beaten with rawhide; after which the judge asked him to sacrifice to the gods. He was locked up in a dark stinking prison, and no food was given him for four days. After this burning coals were placed on his head. And as he was giving thanks to God, he was again whipped. Naked, and with his head downward, he was hanged and boiling water poured over his body. And while they were breaking the jaws of this Christian martyr, the judge fell from his seat and gave up his sorry soul. When the emperor heard this, he caused the body to be thrown to the lions, but the wild animals were so tame that they prostrated themselves at the martyr's feet. When the servants of vice saw this, they took away the martyr and slew him with the sword, between two pillars, on the 18th day of the month of August. His body was carried off secretly by the Christians at night and was placed in a new sarcophagus discovered by divine indication at the first mile-stone from the city.

Agapitas, a boy of fifteen, was taken and brought before the governor Antiochus, at Praeneste, the modern Palestrina, in the reign of Aurelian. He was beaten severely, and thrust into a dark and loathsome dungeon, where he was left without food or drink for four days. He was then taken forth, but when asked if he would sacrifice, he shook his head. Red hot coals were poured over his head and bare shoulders; then he was suspended by his feet, over smoke, and beaten. When nearly unconscious, he was laid on the ground and boiling water poured over his breast and belly; his jaw was broken with a stone; but he still lived.

Antiochus the governor fell off his throne in a fit, and died. News was taken to Aurelian, who ordered Agapitas cast to the lions, but the lions refused to touch him; and he was taken outside the gate of Praeneste, and his head was struck off. Although a persecution did break out under Aurelian, the greater part of this story is pure legend, and all that can possibly be admitted is that a boy was scourged, imprisoned and decapitated. According to Baring-Gould the late Acts of the Martyrs are always stuffed with tortures, exposure to fire, water, lions, none of which hurt, and all end with the martyrs losing their heads; when everything else fails, cold steel succeeds.

The last sentence of this paragraph is not found in the German edition of the Chronicle.

Martina, a very holy Roman virgin of this time, was a person of exceptional Christian faith and virtue. Because of her acknowledgment of the Christian faith she was seized by Emperor Alexander and subjected to various tortures. Being inflamed by love for her, he admonished her to worship the idols, and promised to make her his companion. But the image of Apollo fell to pieces upon her approach; for in her chastity of mind and body she had praised God. Afterwards she was beaten and laid in prison, where a great light permeated her body. And on a tablet was found written in her hand: 'Lord, how magnified are your works. You have done all in your wisdom.' After that she was placed on the rack and her limbs injured with sharp instruments. A lion was led to her, but he did her no harm. As she still remained unmoved in her faith, she was executed by the sword on the first day of January. []

Quirinus (Quiricius) the Roman, together with his mother Inclita (Iulita), and many others, were martyred on the 15th day of July in these violent times. Their history is found in the apocryphal writings. [This sentence is not found in the German edition].

Beryllus (Berillus) the Arab, a bishop of Bostra, and a highly learned man, for a while ruled his church in a praiseworthy manner. However, he finally fell into a heresy that denied that Christ existed before he became a human being. But through Origen he was led back to the truth. A little later he wrote various small works, especially some letters in which 'Secular Learning' expresses its gratitude toward Origen. There is also extant a dialogue between Origen and Beryllus in which the latter argues his heresies.

Beryllus (Berillus), as bishop of Bostra, in Arabia, according to Eusebius, attempted to pervert the doctrine of the church by introducing certain opinions foreign to the Christian faith, "daring to assert that our Lord and Saviour did not exist in the proper sense of existence before his dwelling among men; neither had he a proper divinity, but only that divinity which dwelt in him from the Father. As the bishops had many examinations and discussions on this point with the man, Origen, who was also invited together with the rest, at first entered into conversation with him, in order to ascertain what opinion the man held. But when he understood what he advanced, after correcting his error, by reasoning and demonstration, he convinced him, and thus recovered him to the truth in doctrine, and brought him back again to his former sound opinion." (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 6.33).

To get a sense of how Schedel adapts his text from his sources (i.e, what he keeps, deletes, adds, alters, etc.), compare the Latin text of the Chronicle to the original text taken from Jerome's De viris illustribus ('On Illustrious Men'): Beryllus, Arabiae Bostrenus episcopus, cum aliquanto tempore gloriose rexisset Ecclesiam, ad extremum lapsus in haeresim, quae Christum ante incarnationem negat, ab Origene correctus. Scripsit varia opuscula, et maxime epistolas, in quibus Origeni gratias agit, sed et Origenis ad eum litterae sunt. Exstat dialogus Origenis et Berylli, in quo haereseos coarguitur. Claruit autem sub Alexandro, Mammeae filio, et Maximino et Gordiano, qui ei in imperium successerunt. (Jerome, De viris illustribus; Chapter LX).

Porphyry (Porphirius), a most excellent Athenian philosopher, was in great esteem at this time; and although he was a lover of Origen, and praised him, yet he was a severely ruthless persecutor of Christianity, and heaped many derogatory and belittling arguments against the Orthodox faith, which, however, the divine Augustine refuted, although he posits a perfect trinity. And, among other things, he added the Isagoges (i.e, 'Introductions') to Aristotle's Categories (i.e, 'Categories'). [Unusually for Schedel, both the original Greek titles (transliterated) and their respective Latin equivalents (isagoges = introductions; categoriae = pr(a)edicamenta) are given for both Porphyry's book () and Aristotle's (). This is Porphyry's most influential contribution to philosophy for it incorporated Aristotle's logic into Neoplatonism. Boethius' Latin translation of Porphyry's work became a standard medieval textbook in European schools and universities, and help set the stage for medieval philosophical-theological developments of logic and the problem of universals. Scholars now believe that Porphyry's text is an introduction to Aristotelian logic in general, not a specific introduction to his . It is telling that these sentences on philosophy are excised from the German edition]. And he wrote many other things. [Porphyry, the celebrated antagonist of Christianity, was a Greek philosopher of the Neoplatonic school. He was born 233 CE either in Batanea in Palestine or at Tyre. His original name was Malchus, the Greek form of the name Porphyry (in allusion to the usual color of royal robes) was subsequently devised for him by his preceptor Longinus. After studying under Origen at Caesarea, and under Apollonius and Longinus at Athens, he settled at Rome in his 30th year, and there became a diligent disciple of Plotinus. He soon gained the confidence of Plotinus, and was entrusted by the latter with his delicate and difficult duty of correcting and arranging his writings. After remaining at Rome for 6 years, Porphyry fell into an unsettled state of mind, and began to entertain the idea of suicide, in order to get free from the shackles of the flesh; but on the advice of Plotinus he took voyage to Sicily, where he resided for some time. It was here that he wrote his treatise against Christianity in 15 books. Of the remainder of his life we know little. He returned to Rome and taught there until his death in 305 or 306. Later in life he married Marcella, widow of one of his friends, and the mother of seven children, with the view, as he avowed, of superintending their education. His learning was most extensive. His celebrated treatise against the Christian religion has not come down to us. It was publicly destroyed by order of the Emperor Theodosius. The attack was sufficiently challenging to call forth replies from over thirty antagonists, among them Methodius, Apollinaris, and Eusebius. His and are two of his most interesting works that are still extant].

Hippolytus (Hippolitus), a bishop of a certain church, wrote of the calculation of Easter and the chronology of time up to the first year of Emperor Alexander. He discovered the cycle of sixteen years and gave the opportunity to Eusebius who, concerning the same calculation of Easter, composed a cycle of 19 years. He was considered famous. He even wrote some texts, especially commentaries on the Hexameron and on the Prophets. [Hippolytus, Bishop of Rome in the first quarter of the third century. A very prolific author, he came into conflict with the Popes of his time and, consequently, had his own separate congregation. Therefore he is sometimes considered the first Antipope (thus, perhaps, the reticence of the to identify him vaguely as a 'bishop of a certain church'). When he died in 235, however, he was reconciled to the Church as a martyr. His works were wide-ranging, to say the least, and covered such areas as exegesis, homiletics, apologetics and polemic, chronography, and ecclesiastical law. His most famous work was his . In his work on the Passover (in the translation above rendered as 'Easter') he traces back the series of times, and presents a certain canon comprising a period of 16 years, on the Passover, limiting his computation of the times to the first year of Emperor Alexander. Cf. also Eusebius, 6.22].

Julius, of Africa (as Saint Jerome writes) was renowned among the historians of his time. He wrote five books of this period; also a large book on the Trinity. He sent an epistle to the great Origen, showing that the fable of Susannah is not accredited by the Hebrews. He also wrote an epistle, full of Scriptural learning, against Origen. This Julius was a sower and a lover of the Scriptures. By the use of his riches he created a remarkable library, bearing his name, at Caesarea in Palestine. Being a reliable man he was sent to rebuild the castle of Emmaus. This he afterward did; and he named it Nicopolis. [Sextus Julius Africanus was a Christian traveler and historian of the third century, probably born in Libya, and lived at Emmaus. He wrote a history of the world from the creation to 221 CE, calculating the period between the creation and the birth of Christ as 5,499 years, and antedating the latter event by three years. This method of reckoning, known as the Alexandrian era, was adopted by almost all Eastern Churches. Eusebius also gives a letter to Aristeides, and one to Origen, impugning the authority of the book of Susannah].

Fabian (Fabianus), the pope, was a Roman. When, after the death of Pope Anterus, the election of a future pope was under discussion, a dove, wonderfully white, appeared upon the head of Fabian. And after he was chosen in this divine manner, he divided his jurisdiction among seven deacons, who through notaries were to collect the experiences of the martyrs as an example for others who acknowledged faith in Christ. He also built a cemetery in honor of the martyrs. He also ordained that annually, on Holy Thursday, at the Lord's Supper, the chrism [Oil usually mixed with balm, or balm and spices, consecrated by the bishop on Maundy Thursday (the day before Good Friday) and used in the administration of baptism, confirmation, ordination, etc, according to the ritual of the Roman Catholic church, Maundy Thursday is so called from the ancient custom of washing the feet of the poor on this day, which was taken to be the fulfillment of the "new commandment" (John 13:5-24)]. should be renewed, and the old burned in the church. The heresy of Novatus originated in his time. After having consecrated 22 priests, seven deacons, and eleven bishops in the month of December, he was crowned with martyrdom, and buried in the cemetery of Calixtus. He sat (in office) for 14 years, 11 months, and 11 days, and the chair was vacant six days. His day and that of St. Sebastian are celebrated on the 20th day of the month of January. []

The first schism, or division, in these times, occurred when Novatus the priest at Rome, undertook to trouble and divide the church of God. Through greed for episcopal honors he confused matters human and divine. In order that the papacy might not pass to Cornelius, he separated from the church, and styled himself and his retainers the pure ones. He also said that those who seceded from the faith should not be again admitted, even though repentant. On this account a council was held, consisting of sixty bishops, and as many priests with their deacons, in which the words of Novatus were decreed to be false, for by the example of our Savior, forgiveness is not to be denied a penitent. And so ended the first schism of the Roman Church. []At this time also other heresies originated. Origen held those to be heretics who said man's soul does not leave his body, but in the resurrection will rise with the body. Also at this time was the heresy of the Helcesaites (Helchesatarum), who entirely ignored the apostle Paul, and said that it was no sin to deny Christ under torture if one did not do so in one's heart. []

Cornelius the pope, was also a Roman and a very highly educated man, who sent many letters and epistles to numerous persons and places. During his term, Novatus ministered outside the church, and Nicostratus in Africa. For that reason the confessors who had fallen away from Cornelius returned to the Church; and thus they attained to the names of true confessors and ministers. But Cornelius was afterwards sent into exile through the instigation of the heretics. After he was imprisoned, Cyprianus, the bishop of Carthage, sent him letters, through which he understood his friend's opposition and the reason for his misfortune. Before he was sent into exile, at the solicitation of the virgin Lucina, he removed the bodies of Saints Peter and Paul at night from places where they were hardly secure, and Lucina buried Paul on her own soil where he was slain, and Cornelius buried Peter where he had undergone his martyrdom of crucifixion in the temple of Apollo at the roots of a golden mountain on the 29th day of the month of June. This Cornelius was tortured in many ways by order of the emperor Decius, and urged to worship the idols. Finally he was slain on the fifth day of the month of May. The blessed Lucina buried his body, together with those of certain priests, at night in a sand-pit on her estate. He sat in office for two years and three days. And the seat was vacant for 35 days.

Cornelius was elected pope in 251, after the Holy See had been vacant for sixteen months. He had passed through all the degrees of ecclesiastical offices, and when offered the bishopric shrank from the burden, perhaps the dangers, it entailed; for the edict of Decius was in force against bishops and priests. He was elected by sixteen bishops, then at Rome, and they wrote to all the churches to announce his election. There was at this time at Rome one Novatian, who had been a Stoic philosopher, who finally found peace in Christianity, and was ordained a priest. For a while he remained in severe ascetic seclusion, but later became involved in a quarrel with Cornelius on matters of church doctrine—the principles of penitence and the essence of a true Church. Novatian contended that the Church had no right to grant absolution to a person who had willfully committed a mortal sin, and could only absolve sins of infirmity. Against this doctrine Cyprian wrote with wrath and eloquence, assembled a council in Africa, and condemned Novatian. On receipt of the decrees of the council and the letters of Cyprian, Cornelius convoked a council at Rome; and, in spite of the persecution then raging, it was attended by sixty bishops. This council condemned the schism and errors of Novatian.

Decius died in 251, and was succeeded by Gallus. Persecution did not cease with the death of Decius. Cornelius was banished to Centumcella (Civita Vecchia), where he died in the year 253. He is commemorated with his friend Cyprian on September 16.

The last three sentences of this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Dionysius, bishop of the Alexandrine church, a highly learned man and a disciple of Origen, the master, was ordained as a bishop at this time; and he sat 17 years. He too was of the opinion that heretics should be rebaptized. He sent very many letters; but to Pope Fabian (Fabianus) he sent one letter on the topic of penitence; and to various other individuals he sent letters on the topics of exile, death, the Sabbath, the persecution of Decius, and two books against the bishop Nepos and to Origen his teacher he sent a book about martyrdom as well as many other things.

Dionysius of Alexandria (bishop of Alexandria), called "Dionysius the Great," (c. 190-265), became a Christian at an early age, and studied under Origen. In 231 he was made head of the Catechetical school of Alexandria, and in 247 a bishop of that city. During the Decian persecution in 251 he fled to the Libyan desert, while under Valerian he was banished to Cethro in 257, returning when toleration was decreed by Gallienus in 260. He was engaged in controversy over the restoration of Christians who had lapsed during the persecution, and over the iteration of baptism by heretics. In opposing the bishops of Upper Libya, who supported Sabellianism, Dionysius over-emphasized the unity of the Godhead. Eusebius often cites him in his ecclesiastical history.

The last sentence of this paragraph in the German edition reads: "As a highly learned man he also wrote and sent out many letters to various persons on diverse subjects."—a typical abridgment/summation clearly designed for that intended audience's (the German bourgeois') taste (i.e, simple facts, light on details).

ILLUSTRATION

FIRST CHIRCH COUNCIL

(The Latin inscription reads: 'Council at Rome. 60 bishops.')

Here we have the First Council called by a Bishop of Rome. Upon the election of Cornelius to the episcopate of Rome, Novatian, a Presbyter of that church, and others protested against him on the ground of laxity of principle as to the readmission of lapsed heretics, they themselves maintaining the strict view of the case, by which, without denying that it was possible for such penitents to make their peace with God, their open reception into the Church was regarded as a sinful breach of discipline. They elected Novatian as their own bishop, but this election was not finally confirmed. Cornelius called a council of sixty bishops, and a large number of priests. Novatian was condemned, and the question concerning the lapsed heretics was decided in favor of the more moderate party. The Novatians became a distinct sect, distinguished by severity of discipline. They subsisted until the sixth century, and were called Cathari or 'Puritans' / 'The Pure Ones' (History of the Papacy, J. E. Riddle, Vol. I, pp. 74-74).

Here we see the Council in session, and we may assume that the central figure in the pontificals, with papal tiara and staff, is Cornelius. He holds an open book and is surrounded by a close group of friendly churchmen. A dove, symbolizing the Holy Spirit, hovers over the gathering.

Maximinus, emperor after Alexander, in the year from the founding of the city 987 [The German edition has the year 988]., was elected by the army and without the consent of the senate, after having waged a successful war in Germany. In early youth he was a shepherd, and for a time a guard stationed to protect his people against the inroads of thieves and murderers. He entered the army under Severus, the emperor, and was notable for his size and conspicuous for his virtue and military demeanor. He was of manly stature and earnest disposition. He stood erect and was over eight feet in height; and so he had a large foot. In speaking of tall and huge persons it was customary to say, This man requires the hose of the Emperor Maximinus. He was a heavy drinker, and is said to have consumed an amphora of wine at a single meal. But being the sixth persecutor of the Christians after Nero, he, together with his son Maximus, was slain by Pupienus at Aquileia, which he was besieging, in the third year of his reign. For those of Aquileia were against Maximinus, and so faithful were they to the Roman senate that when there was a shortage of sinews they made bowstrings from the hair of their women. To the honor of these women the Romans erected a temple to the bald Venus, goddess at Rome. [Maximinus I, Roman emperor from 235-238 CE, was born in a village in Thrace, of barbarian parents, his father being a Goth, and his mother a German from the tribe of Alani. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimus Severus by his gigantic stature and marvelous feats of strength, and was permitted to enter the army. He eventually rose to the highest rank in the service, and on the murder of Severus by mutinous troops in Gaul (235), he was proclaimed emperor. He immediately bestowed the title of Caesar on his son Maximus. During the three years of his reign he waged war against the Germans with success, but his government was characterized by oppression and violent excesses. The Roman world became tired of this monster, and the Senate and the provinces gladly acknowledged the two Gordiani, who had been proclaimed emperors in Africa; and after his death the senate proclaimed Maximus and Balbinus emperors (238). As soon as Maximinus heard of the elevation of the Gordiani, he hastened from his winter quarters at Sirmium. Crossing the Alps he laid siege to Aquileia, and was slain by his own soldiers along with his son Maximus. The most extraordinary tales are told of his physical strength. His height exceeded 8 feet, and the circumference of his thumb was equal to a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. He was able single-handed to draw a loaded wagon. With his fist he could knock out the grinders, and with a kick break the leg of a horse. His appetite was such that within one day he could eat 40 pounds of meat and drink an amphora of wine].

Gordianus attained the sovereignty after the tyrant Maximinus. This very noble man, together with his son, was chosen emperor after he had defeated the Parthians with great loss. At the age of eighty, after having been a proconsul in many provinces, he was named Africanus. This Gordianus, the father, and Gordianus, the son, were both elected emperors by the great council of Africa. Gordianus the younger was declared emperor, and he reigned six years. As Maximinus had attained the sovereignty without the consent of the senate, the latter appointed three emperors to make war against him. Of these, two, Pupienus and Albinus, were slain in the palace, leaving the sovereignty to Gordianus alone. This emperor was so well liked that he had sixty-two thousand books in his library. Finally, while returning to Rome to celebrate a triumph, he was slain not far from Rome through the treachery of Philip. He was buried with an honorable epitaph in four languages, Greek, Latin, Persian, and Hebrew. [M. Antonius Gordianus was the name of three Roman emperors, father, son, and grandson. The first, surnamed Africanus, was distinguished alike for his moral and intellectual excellence. In his first consulship he was a colleague of Caracalla; and in his second, of Alexander Severus, and soon after was nominated proconsul of Africa. After governing Africa for several years with justice and integrity, a rebellion broke out in the provinces in consequence of the tyranny of Maximinus. The ringleaders of the conspiracy compelled Gordianus, who was no in his 80th year, to assume the imperial title. He entered upon his new duties at Carthage in February, associated with his son in the empire, and dispatched letters to Rome announcing his elevation. Gordianus and his son were at once proclaimed Augusti by the senate, and preparations were made in Italy to resist Maximinus. But meantime a certain Capellianus, procurator of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the Gordiani, and marched against them. The younger Gordianus, having been defeated and slain in battle, his aged father put an end to his own life after reigning less than two months. Gordianus III was proclaimed emperor in July 238 after the murder of Balbinus and Pupienus, although he was a mere boy not over 12. He reigned six years, 238-244. In 241 he married the daughter of Mithridates, and in the same year set out for the East against the Persians. With the assistance of Misisheus he defeated them in 232, but Misisheus died in the following year; and Philippus, whom Gordianus had taken into his confidence, excited discontent among the soldiers, who at length rose in open mutiny and assassinated Gordianus in Mesopotamia in 244. He was succeeded by Philippus. In the Gordianus II and III are treated as one person].

Philippus and his son Philippus reigned five years after returning with the army from Syria and Italy in the year from the founding of the city nine hundred ninety-seven. The Christians had the first of these for emperor. However, he did not meddle with the hidden meanings of the faith, but acquiesced in them. In the third year of his reign, the one thousandth year from the founding of the City was celebrated, and the games were played which had always taken place every hundredth year, and which Valerius Publicola, after the line of Roman kings had come to an end, set up as a goal of human life. Those two, namely Philippus, father and son, were afterwards killed by the army through the treachery of Decius, the former at Verona or Bern, the latter at Rome. And they were reckoned among the gods. Philippus the younger was of so serious a disposition that he could not be moved to laughter by any manner of pastime; and the father turned away from those who were moved to laughter at any of the aforesaid games. And after Decius became envious of them they entrusted their treasures to Pope Fabian. On this account Decius became very hateful of the Christians. [M. Julius Philippus I, Roman emperor (244 to 249 CE), was an Arabian by birth, and entered the Roman army, attaining to high rank. He accompanied Gordianus III in his expedition against the Persians, and upon the death of the excellent Misisheus he was promoted to the vacant office of praetorian praefect. But he excited discontent among the soldiers, who at length assassinated Gordianus, and proclaimed Philippus emperor in 244. Philippus proclaimed his son Caesar, concluded a disgraceful peace with Sapor, and returned to Rome. In the meantime Decius was forcibly invested with the purple by his troops, and compelled to march on Italy. Having gone forth to meet his rival, Philippus was slain in a battle near Verona, or by his own soldiers. The great domestic event of his reign was the exhibition of the secular games, which were celebrated with even more than the ordinary degree of splendor, since Rome had now, according to the received tradition, attained the 1000th year of her existence (248 CE). Philippus II, son of the foregoing, was a boy of seven at the accession of his father in 244. His father proclaimed him Caesar, and three years later he received the title of Augustus. According to Zosimus he was slain in 249 at the battle of Verona, or murdered, according to Victor, at Rome by the praetorians, when intelligence arrived of the defeat and death of the emperor].

Decius, the Roman emperor, native of Bubalia in lower Pannonia, took over the sovereignty on the death of the Philippi and he burned with hatred against the Christians because of these Christian Philippi. He suppressed the civil war that broke out in Gaul, and made a Caesar of his son. At home he built baths. After having reigned two years, he and his son were defeated in the wars with the barbarians; and he sank so deep in a pool of water that his body was never recovered; and thus he was damned by a deserved judgment. He initiated the seventh persecution of the Christians after Nero, in which many pious men were slain. Here occurs a matter not clear among historians; for Eutropius writes that Decius tortured St. Lawrence the Levite and martyr, with fire. St. Lawrence flourished under Pope Sixtus. And so some extend the reign of Decius. Some say this was the elder Decius, under whom Fabian and Cornelius suffered. After this they mention the younger Decius Caesar, and say that between these two, Gallus Volusianus and other emperors reigned; and after them Valerianus and Gallienus, under whom Lucianus, Stephen, and Sixtus, the popes, and Lawrence the archdeacon, and Hippolytus were martyred; and that Gallienus was called Decius Gallienus. Some state that Decius was before Philippus, for in the life of St. Lawrence one reads of Decius Caesar and not Imperator, under whom St. Lawrence suffered. In ancient times some emperors were called Caesars, some Augusti, and some Imperators; all of which means emperor. [Decius, Roman emperor (249-251), was born in Bubalia in Pannonia. The emperor Philippus in 249 sent him to restore order in the army of Moesia; but the troops compelled him to accept the purple under threats of death. Decius still assured Philippus of his fidelity; but the latter, not trusting his assurances, hastened to meet his rival in the field, was defeated near Verona, and slain. The short reign of Decius was occupied chiefly in warring against the Goths. He fell in battle, together with his son in 251. During his reign the Christians were persecuted with great severity].

Folio CXIX verso

The sixth persecution of the Christians was carried on by Maximinus the emperor, chiefly against the clergy and the priests. After he had persecuted many unto death, he and his sons were slain by Pupienus at Aquileia in the third year of his reign; and so an end was made of his persecution and of his life.

Pontius, most holy martyr, as the historians say, converted the two emperors, the Philippi, to the Christian faith. He was the son of a Roman senator. His father's name was Marcus, his mother's Julia. While with child she went into the temple of Jupiter in which a priest was sacrificing. And he tore his garments, and in a frightened voice cried out, This woman carries in her womb one who will raze the temple to its foundations. Because of this she returned home in sorrow. And she weighted down her body that the child might not thrive; yet she bore the child undefiled. And when she undertook to slay it, the father said, Let it live, for if Jupiter is so minded, he will take revenge on his enemy himself. Pontius became highly learned, and he heard the Christians singing, Our God in heaven has ordered all things as he wishes them. The idols of the pagans are of gold and silver, etc. And Pontius abandoned the idolatrous gods and, with his father, received baptism. Upon his father's death he gave all of his estate and possessions to Pope Fabian to be distributed among the poor. Now, being a friend of the Philippi, the emperors, and this being the one thousandth year from the foundation of the City, he showed them that the great and true God in heaven should be worshipped; and they received, baptism from Fabian, and destroyed the temple. However, he was variously tortured at the instance of succeeding emperors, yet remained unharmed. But at length his martyrdom was accomplished by decapitation. [Pontius was the son of a Roman senator named Marcus, and his wife Julia. One day when she was approaching childbirth, she visited the temple of Jupiter to ask an augury concerning the unborn child. The priest predicted that ruin would befall the temple through it. The mother ran home in horror, striking herself with stones in hope of destroying the child. But notwithstanding, the child was born shortly after, and she would have exposed it had not her husband interfered with the sensible advice that Jupiter was the one concerned in the child's living, and if the child was likely to be obnoxious to him, he would have slain it. As the boy grew up he was sent to a tutor. One morning on the way to his master, when passing a certain house, he heard sweet strains of music, accompanying the words, "Wherefore shall the pagans say, Where is now their God? As for our God, He is in heaven. He has done whatsoever pleased him. Their idols are silver and gold; even the work of men's hands. They have mouths and speak not. Eyes have they, and see not," etc. And the light of conviction illumined the soul of Pontius, and he struck with hand and foot at the door, eager to hear more. Being admitted, he was led up into the chamber where the sacred mysteries were celebrated, and when the rite was over, he conversed with Pope Pontianus who instructed him in the faith. On his return home Pontius told his experience to his father, and both father and son were baptized. Upon his father's death Pontius gave his paternal inheritance to the bishop to be distributed to the poor. He saw Pontianus suffer a martyr's death, and he lived in close familiarity with the humane Emperor Philip, with whom, and his son Philip, he had many opportunities of discussing Christianity. On the accession of Valerian and Gallienus to the throne, Pontius fled to Cimella, a city near Nice in southern France. There he was arrested by the governor and exposed to bears in the amphitheater; but the bears hugged to death the men who were trying to incite them to destroy Pontius. Seeing this, the governor ordered his decapitation].

In the time of Decius the emperor, when, after many persecutions of the Christians, he came to Ephesus, he caused a temple to be built in the midst of the city; and he commanded all persons, on pain of death, to sacrifice to the idols, and to deny all other gods. And great fear of punishment seized all men to such an extent that sons betrayed fathers, and friends accused one another. In this city were seven nobles, the first and foremost in the palace, namely, Maximinus, Marcus, Martinianus, Dionysius, Seraphion, John (Iohannes) and Constantinus. These ignored the idols and hid themselves in their houses, praying and fasting. But they were accused before Decius, and now they gave their paternal inheritance to the poor, and they went into Mount Celion, intending to conceal themselves until the persecution had abated. And one waited upon the rest, and brought them bread, and thus fed, they were strengthened, and addressed one another in tears. And so, as God willed, they fell asleep. Decius then immediately ordered the cave blocked up so they might die of hunger and thirst. But afterwards, in the time of Theodosius, they were still found alive as related below.

[The Seven Sleepers of Ephesus were seven noble youths in the household of the emperor Decius, who fled from his court to a cave in Mount Celion. They were Christians, and the emperor sent persecutors after them. The mouth of the cave was blocked up, and the youths fell asleep. Some 230 years later the cave was opened, and the "youths" awoke; but they died soon afterward, and were taken to Marseilles in a large coffin. Visitors in St. Victor's Church are still shown this stone coffin].

Folio CXX recto

The seventh persecution of the Christians after Nero was carried on by Decius, the Emperor, and affected many persons in various places. When Philippus was returning homeward from the war from Verona, Decius went forth to meet him, as if to honor him, but treacherously killed him; and thus he secured the sovereignty. And Decius proceeded to Rome and let it be known that through love of the gods he had slain his master because he (Philippus) was a Christian. And he began a severe persecution against the Christians; and he killed many, among them the son of Philippus; and they suffered various martyrdoms, details of which follow.

Abdon and Senen, petty kings subject to Rome, highly renowned men from Corduba, a city of the Persians, were, after suffering in prison, taken to Rome in chains, and long subjected to various forms of torture. Then after Decius the emperor had overcome Babylonia and other countries, he marched the Christians from various regions to the said city of Corduba and killed them with various forms of martyrdom. Their bodies were buried by Abdon and Senen, Christian men. Finally they suffered martyrdom by the sword on the 30th day of the month of July.

Agatha, a Sicilian virgin of noble birth and highly renowned, was crowned with martyrdom at this time in Catania (Cathania), in Sicily, for Christ's sake. When Quintianus, the governor, learned of her reputation and heard the praises of her nobility, beauty and riches, and that she was a servant of Christ, he apprehended her and turned her over to Aphrodisia (Affrodisia), a very wicked woman. She had seven vile daughters, who for thirty days threatened her and admonished her to submit to the will of the governor. And when she would not sacrifice to the pagan gods, she was finally beaten and imprisoned, and after her breasts were cut off, and she was rolled over hot coals, she was, according to the judgment of Quintianus, slain in prison, receiving the crown of martyrdom on the 5th day of the month of February. Her body, after being anointed with herbs of incense, was buried by the faithful. And there an angel laid a tablet with the inscription: A pious obedient disposition, an honor to God, and a relief to the fatherland. Cortina also put out a fire on its mountain near the city.

The full story concerning Agatha is told by Jameson (Sacred and Legendary Art, II, 4th edition; London 1863; pp. 608-13):

There dwelt in the city of Catania, in Sicily, a certain Christian maiden whose name was Agatha. In those days reigned the emperor Decius, who had strangled his predecessor Philip; and, to make it believed by all that he had put him to death out of great zeal and for being a Christian, not from motives of ambition, this Decius sent his emissaries throughout the empire to oppress and persecute the Christians, and many were put to death. And to Sicily Decius sent his creature Quintianus, and made him king over the whole island. Not long had Quintianus reigned in Sicily when he heard of the great beauty and perfection of the maiden Agatha, and he sent to have her brought before him; and he tempted her with rich presents, and flatteries, and promises, but she rejected all with disdain. Then Quintianus sent for a courtesan, named Frondisia, who had nine daughters, more wicked and abandoned than herself, and he delivered Agatha into their hands, and he said, 'Subdue this girl to my will, and I will give you great riches.' Then Frondisia took Agatha home to her house, and kept her there for 33 days, and tempted her with great promises, and flattered and cajoled her; and seeing this availed not, they persecuted her day and night: but her heart was fixed as a rock in the faith of Jesus Christ, and all their promises and all their threats were as empty air. At the end of 33 days, Frondisia returned to Quintianus and said to him, 'Sooner shall that sword at your side become like liquid lead, and the rocks dissolved and flow like water, than the heart of this girl be subdued to your will.' Then Quintianus in a fury commanded her to be brought to him. . . . 'Abjure your master, and serve our gods, or I will have you tortured.' To which Agatha replied, 'If you should throw me to the wild beasts, the power of Christ would render them meek as lambs; if you should kindle a fire to consume me, the angels would quench it with dew from heaven; if you should tear me with scourges, the Holy Spirit within me would render your tortures harmless.' Then this accursed tyrant ordered St. Agatha to be beaten with rods; and he commanded two of his slaves to tear her tender bosom cruelly with iron shears . . . Then she was carried from the place of torture into a dark dungeon." The legend then relates how St. Peter visited her and restored her mutilated bosom with celestial medicines, and her body torn with stripes, and thereupon vanished. And Quintianus sent for her again, and finding her thus healed, he ordered a great fire to be kindled, and they bound the holy maiden hand and foot and flung her upon it; and in that moment a terrible earthquake ensued, and the people ran armed to the palace and cried out, 'This had fallen upon us because of the sufferings of this Christian girl!' and they threatened, that if Quintianus did not desist from tormenting her they would burn him in his palace with all his family. So he ordered her to be taken from the flames, and again cast into the dungeon, scorched and in miserable pain; and she prayed that having thus far suffered and proved her faith, she might be permitted to see the glory of God; which prayer was heard, for her pure spirit immediately departed and ascended to eternal glory. The Christians who dwelt in Catania came to the prison and carried away her sacred remains, and embalmed them; and they buried her with great devotion in a tomb of porphyry.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Apollonia (Appolonia), a very holy and memorable Alexandrian virgin, in these times suffered bitterest martyrdom for the sake of Christ; for when she refused to sacrifice to the idols, they first pulled out all her teeth and punished her with many scourgings. Finally they threatened to burn her alive if she would not blaspheme God. But when she saw the fire that had been prepared, she tore herself from the hands of the evil ones and sprang into it. And when the dispensers of cruelty saw that a woman had been found who was quicker to die than the persecutors were to torture, they were frightened. And she earned the crown of martyrdom on the 9th day of February. Her holy body was afterwards taken to Italy, and is contained in the cathedral church of Dordona (Derdonam) in Lombardy. []

Serapion, a native of Alexandria, a very holy man, was, in the same year, taken prisoner by the persecutors, and subjected to gruesome tortures, to such an extent that his limbs came apart; but while still alive the henchmen of the devil threw him from the highest part of his house, and so made of him a Christian martyr. His day is commemorated on the 14th of November. [Serapion was seized in his own house and after being subjected to the severest cruelties, and the breaking of all his limbs, was thrown headlong from an upper story (Eusebius, 6.41; Bohn 243)]. Justinus the priest, together with Victoria, also suffered martyrdom with great fortitude.

Meniatius (Meniacus), an Etrurian of high repute, suffered martyrdom at Florence, in Etruria, on the 25th day of October. The citizens there hold him in high regard for his piety. [With the exception of a few similar notices in later texts, nothing else is known or said about Menatius]. In this tumult, in the same country, Palentinus and Laurentinus, in their city of Aretio, together with Nicostratus, the deacon, and many others, suffered for the sake of Christ.

Victoria, a famous virgin, was espoused to a pagan. She would neither cohabit with him nor sacrifice to the pagan gods. She was beheaded with the sword at the request of her husband during the Decian persecution. [] And many others were crowned with martyrdom, and those who had taken refuge in the wilderness and the mountains, died of thirst, cold and starvation, and murder, and in many parts of the world were consumed by wild beasts.

Lucius the pope, a Roman, was elected pope after Cornelius under emperor Gallus Hostilianus. He was exiled by the emperor Volusian (Volusianus). He was released from exile after the death of the same emperor, and again returned to Rome. He ordained that two priests and three deacons should always be about a bishop, giving testimony of his life and transactions. Before being led to martyrdom at the command of Valerian (Valerianus) he left all his power over the churches to his archdeacon Stephen (Stephano). His martyrdom having been accomplished on the 25th day of the month of August, he was buried in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Appian Way after having sat for three years 3 months and 3 days. The chair was then vacant thirty-five days. [According to Eusebius (7.2), Lucius did not hold the papal office quite 8 months, when dying he transferred it to Stephen. He spent a short period of his pontificate in exile. He is referred to in several letters of Cyprian as agreeing with his predecessor Cornelius in preferring the milder treatment of lapsed penitents. He is commemorated on March 4th. His term is generally given as 252-3 CE, or 253-4 CE].

Stephen (Stephanus) the First, the pope, a Roman, and a very good man, ordained that the priests, and their Levites, should not wear the garments designed for pious uses at any other place than in the churches and in sacred transactions, so that by acting to the contrary they would not suffer the punishment visited upon Belshazzar (Balthasar), the Babylonian king, who touched the sacred vessels with unworthy hands. This pope was of the same opinion as Pope Cornelius concerning those who returned to the faith, and held that no communion was to be had with those who were rebaptized. After he had converted many to the Christian faith by his words and works, he was beheaded by Gallienus, or those who at the command of Decius persecuted the Christians; and thus he suffered martyrdom with many others of his people, and was buried in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Appian Way on the 2nd day of August. He sat (in office) seven years, five months and two days. The chair was vacant for twenty-two days. [According to Eusebius (7.2), it was Stephen to whom Dionysius wrote the first of his epistles on baptism, as there was no small amount of controversy whether those returning from any heresy whatever should be purified by baptism. Stephen held office for only 2 years, being then succeeded by Sixtus. He withdrew from church fellowship with Cyprian and certain Asiatic bishops on account of their views as to the rebaptizing of heretics. He is commemorated on August 2nd and was succeeded by Sixtus II].

Sixtus the Second, a pope, native of Athens in Greece, from having been a philosopher, became a disciple of Christ while the Decian and Valerian persecutions were still going on. This was a highly learned man, who with great industry aimed to discredit and disperse the heresies of Sabellius [Sabellius, African bishop of the 3rd century CE, taught that God exists as one person, the Son and the Spirit being but different manifestation of God; the doctrine of a model Trinity, that is, characterized by form without reference to substance]. and Nepos. [Nepos asserted there would be an earthly reign of Christ]. However, because of his preaching of the Christian faith contrary to imperial prohibition, he was accused and taken prisoner to the temple of Mars to make sacrifices to the pagan god or lose his head. And as he went to martyrdom Lawrence (Laurentius), the archdeacon, said to him, Father, where are you going without your son and servant? Sixtus answered, Son, I do not leave you. There are much greater trials awaiting you in the battle for the Christian faith. In three days you will follow me. What you have in wealth, give to the poor in the meantime. On the 6th day of the month of August there were slain with Sixtus, six deacons, namely Felicissimus, Agapitus, Januarius, Magnus, Innocentius and Stephen (Stephanus). He sat for two years ten months and twenty-three days. And the papal see was vacant for thirty-five days. [Sixtus II, Roman bishop in 257, suffered martyrdom under Valerian on August 6, 258. He restored the relations with the Eastern and African churches that had been broken off by his predecessor on the question of heretical baptism. He was succeeded by Dionysius].

Dionysius was a monk, and became a pope. He divided the churches and cemeteries at Rome among the priests; also the outlying rectories and bishoprics, so that each would be content with its own jurisdiction. He ordained that no lay or ecclesiastical tribunal should condemn any person unless he first be found guilty by credible witnesses. In his declining years he called a Council in the city of Antioch against Paul, the bishop there. And although Dionysius, because of his age, did not himself attend, yet he was represented in writing in all the transactions of the Council through Maximus. When he died he was buried in the cemetery at Calixtus. He consecrated twelve priests, six deacons and seven bishops, and sat six years two months and four days; and the chair was vacant six days. [Dionysius was pope from 259 to 268. To him fell the task of reorganizing the church after the persecution of Valerian. At the protest of some of the faithful at Alexandria, he demanded from their bishop (also called Dionysius) explanations touching his doctrine. He died December 26, 268].

Felix the pope, a Roman, lived in the time of Aurelian. He was a righteous man, worthy of every praise. He ordered that the sacrifices to the martyrs should be celebrated by the priests every year, and also that the mass was to be celebrated only at consecrated places and by spiritual persons. He also ordained that the consecration of churches take place in a festal manner and in due form, and that churches whose consecration was not remembered, or whose walls were in ruin, should be reconsecrated. After having consecrated nine priests, five deacons and five bishops, this Felix became a martyr. He was buried on the Aurelian Road to Rome on the 30th day of the month of May, in the church which he had built in honor of the Lord two miles from the city. He occupied the papal chair four years 2 months and 15 days; and then the chair remained vacant for five days. [Felix I was pope from January 269 until his death in January 274. His name is given as a martyr in the Roman calendar and elsewhere, but his title to this honor is by no means proved. He appears in connection with the dispute in the church of Antioch between Paul and Samosta, who had been deprived of his bishopric by a council of bishops for heresy. He ordered the church building to be given to the bishop who was "recognized by the bishops of Italy and the city of Rome." (, t.I, ed, Duchesne, 1886)].

Folio CXXI recto

Gallus Hostilianus and Volusian (Volusianus), his son, were soon crowned emperors. In these same times and to avenge the name of Christ, a great pestilence broke out, particularly in Egypt, at Alexandria, so that few countries, cities, and houses remained which did not suffer. These two emperors did nothing of consequence, so that no memories remain of their sovereignty except the misery of this pestilence, plague and sickness. However, they undertook a war against Aemilianus, who undertook new ventures, and in that war they were slain. But after that Aemilianus, who was of very obscure ancestry, ruled still more obscurely and was slain within the third month. The two emperors above named were slain after a rule of less than two years. [Trebonianus Gallus was Roman emperor from 251-254 CE. He served under Decius in the campaign against the Goths, 251, and he is said to have contributed by his treachery to the disastrous issue of the battle that proved fatal to Decius and his son Herennius. Gallus was, therefore, immediately elected emperor, and Hostilianus, the surviving son of Decius, was nominated his colleague. He purchased peace of the Goths by allowing them to retain their plunder, and promising them a fixed annual tribute. In 253 the Goths again invaded the Roman dominions, but they were driven back by Aemilianus, whose troops proclaimed him emperor in Moesia. Aemilianus then immediately marched into Italy; and Gallus was put to death by his own soldiers, together with his son Volusian, before any collision had taken place between the opposing armies. The name of Gallus is associated with nothing but cowardice and dishonor. In addition to the misery produced by the inroads of the barbarians during his reign, a deadly pestilence broke out in 253, and continued its ravages over every part of the empire for fifteen years. Aemilianus, the governor of Pannonia and Moesia, was proclaimed emperor by his soldiers in 253, but was slain by them after reigning a few months].

Valerian (Valerianus), the emperor, together with his son Gallienus (Galieno), reigned 15 years. While Valerian was engaged in Rhaetia and Noricum, he was elected emperor by the soldiers, and his son Gallienus was elected emperor by the Roman senate. The sovereignty and rule of these two were disastrous to the Roman name, and they deserved to be exterminated because of their misconduct and cruelty toward the Christians. And the Germans came up to Ravenna, destroying everything with fire and sword. Valerian conducted a war in Mesopotamia. He was taken prisoner by Sapor, the Persian king; and he lived there in disgraceful captivity, and he grew old with the Persians in ignoble service; for when the Persian king wished to mount his horse, he used Valerian as his footstool for the purpose, and placed his foot on his neck, and deservedly so; for when he began his reign he instituted the eighth persecution of the Christians. [Valerian (in Latin Valerianus) was Roman emperor from 253 to 260 CE. He was proclaimed emperor by the troops whom he was leading against the usurper Aemilianus. Valerian proclaimed his son Gallienus, Augustus, and first carried on war against the Goths, whom he defeated. But though the barbarians still threatened the Roman frontiers on the Danube and the Rhine, the conquests of the Persians who had crossed the Euphrates and stormed Antioch compelled him to hasten to the East. For a time his measures were vigorous and successful. Antioch was recovered, and the Persian king Sapor was compelled to fall back behind the Euphrates; but the emperor, flushed by his good fortune, followed too rashly. He was surrounded in the vicinity of Edessa by the countless horsemen of his enemy. He was taken prisoner in 260, and passed the remainder of his life in captivity, subjected to every insult that cruelty could devise. After death it was said that his skin was stuffed and long preserved as a trophy in the chief temple of the nation]. However, Gallienus, [Gallienus (260-268 CE), succeeded his father Valerian, when the latter was taken prisoner by the Persians; but he had previously reigned in conjunction with his father from the latter's accession in 253. Gallienus was indolent, profligate, and indifferent to the public welfare. His reign was long considered one of the most disastrous in the history of Rome. The barbarians ravaged large portions of the empire (and Gaul eventually seceded), and the inhabitants were swept away by one of the most frightful plagues recorded in history. This followed a long protracted famine. When it was at its greatest height 5,000 sick are said to have perished daily in Rome; and after the scourge had passed, it was found that the population of Alexandria had been decreased by two-thirds. The complete dissolution of the empire was averted mainly by a series of internal rebellions. In every district able officers sprang up and strove to maintain the dignity of independent princes. The armies levied by these usurpers, who are commonly distinguished as the Thirty Tyrants, in many cases arrested the progress of the invaders, and restored order in the provinces which they governed. Gallienus was at length slain by his own soldiers in 268 CE, while besieging Milan, in which the usurper Aureolus had taken refuge]. frightened by the public judgment of God, gave the churches peace. As he was elected emperor in his youth, he at first ruled the empire with good fortune, then soon with indifference, but finally disastrously; for in him was the thirst for power. But the barbarian people invaded the Roman country, and tyrants sprang up who ravaged what had escaped other external enemies who had been there before. This Gallienus abandoned the sovereignty and went to Milan for carnal pleasures; and he was slain in the ninth year of his reign. This occurred, as some say, with the help of Cecropius, the Duke of Dalmatia. And there his brother Valerian was also slain. The Germans marched as far as Hispania, and after many disasters, the Roman Empire was destroyed. And Postumus (Posthumus), obscurely born in Gaul, reigned by force as an emperor for 10 years. He was slain by the soldiers in a revolt. [Postumus stands second in the list of the so-called Thirty Tyrants. Being nominated Governor of Gaul by Valerian, he assumed the title of emperor in 258 CE, while Valerian was prosecuting his campaign against the Persians. Postumus maintained a strong and just government, and preserved Gaul against the warlike tribes on the Eastern border. After reigning nearly ten years, he was slain by his soldiers in 268. Laelianus was proclaimed emperor in his stead]. After him Victorinus, the Gaul, undertook to rule. He was a strong man, but given to gluttony, and took on a foreign spouse; and therefore he was slain at Cologne in the second year of his reign. [Victorinus, one of the Thirty Tyrants, was the third of the usurpers who ruled Gaul during the reign of Gallienus. He was assassinated at Agrippina by one of his own officers in 268 CE, after reigning somewhat more than a year]. After him, Tetricus, the Roman senator and governor of Aquitania, was elected emperor by the soldiers. [C. Pesuvius Tetricus was one of the Thirty Tyrants, and the last of the pretenders who ruled Gaul during its separation from the empire under Gallienus and his successor. He reigned in Gaul from 267-274 CE, and was defeated by Aurelian in 274 at the battle of Chalons, on which occasion he is believed to have betrayed his army to the emperor. It is certain that although Tetricus, along with his son, graced the triumph of the conqueror, he was immediately afterward treated with the greatest distinction by Aurelian].

Claudius, the second of that name, Roman emperor, was elected by the soldiers, and also by the Roman senate. With great slaughter he defeated the Goths who had ravaged Greece and Macedonia. His services were recognized by the Roman senate by a golden helmet and a golden column. He was a temperate and well-mannered man, devoted to justice, and able in the management of the public welfare. This man fought against two hundred thousand Alamanni not far from the sea of Benaco, in the forest of Lugano, and killed so many that hardly half their number survived. He reigned not quite two years, and died of an illness. His brother Quintilianus was elected emperor by the army, but was slain on the seventeenth day of his reign. [Claudius II was Roman emperor from 268-270 CE. He descended from an obscure family in Dardania or Illyria, and by his military talents rose to distinction under Decius, Valerian and Gallienus. He succeeded to the empire on the death of Gallienus (268), and soon after his accession he defeated the Alemanni in the north of Italy. In the next year he gained a great victory over an immense host of Goths near Naissus in Dardania, and received in consequence the surname Gothicus. He died in Sirmium in 270, and was succeeded by Aurelian].

Aurelian (Aurelianus) received the sovereignty in the year from the founding of the city (i.e, Rome) one thousand twenty-seven. He was a native of Dacia, and was celebrated in military affairs, mighty in war; yet he was of a mean and cruel nature. He defeated the Goths on the Danube in a heavy engagement, and freed the Roman empire of invasions for three years. He was the first Roman to wear an imperial crown, and he donned jewels and a golden dress, contrary to Roman custom. He surrounded the city of Rome with enlarged and stronger walls, and built a temple to the pagan god Apollo. He gave battle to Zenobia, an empress of the East, not far from Antioch, and in Gaul he freed the Vindelici from a barbarian siege. When he went to Illyricum (i.e, Greece) he was slain by his enraged secretary, between Heraclia and Constantinople. He instituted the ninth persecution of the Christians. He reigned five years and six months. Flavius Vopiscus describes his glorious triumph.

Aurelian (in Latin Aurelianus), Roman emperor, 270-5 CE, was born about 212 at Sirmium in Pannonia (modern-day Sremska Mitrovica, Serbia). He entered the army as a common soldier, and by his extraordinary bravery was raised to offices of trust and honor by Valerian and Claudius II. On the death of the latter he was elected emperor by the legions at Sirmium. His reign presents a succession of brilliant exploits, which restored for a while the ancient lustre to the arms of Rome. He first defeated the Goths and Vandals, who had crossed the Danube, and were ravaging Pannonia. He next gained a great victory over the Alamanni and other German tribes; but they succeeded, notwithstanding, in crossing the Alps. Near Placentia they defeated the Romans, but were eventually overcome by the Romans in two decisive engagements in Umbria. After crushing a formidable conspiracy at Rome, Aurelian next turned his arms against Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, whom he defeated, took prisoner, and carried to Rome. On his return to Italy he marched to Alexandria and put Firmus to death, who had assumed the title of emperor. He then proceeded to the West, where Gaul, Britain and Spain were still in the hands of Tetricus, who had been declared emperor a short time before the death of Gallienus. Tetricus surrendered to Aurelian in a battle fought at Chalons. The emperor now devoted his attention to domestic improvements and reforms. Many works of public utility were commenced, the most important of all being the erection of a new line of strongly fortified walls, embracing a much more ample circuit than the old ones, which had long since fallen into ruin; but the vast plan was not completed until the reign of Probus. After a short residence in the city, he visited the provinces on the Danube. He next collected a large force in Thrace for an expedition against the Persians; but while he was on the march between Heraclea and Byzantium, he was killed by some of his officers. They had been induced to conspire against him by a certain Mnesthius, a freedman of the emperor and his private secretary, who had betrayed his trust, and fearful of punishment, had by means of forged documents, organized the conspiracy.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not found in the German edition of the Chronicle. Flavius Vopiscus is one of the so-called authors of the late antiquity collection of imperial biographies known as the Historia Augusta ('The Augustan History').

The eighth persecution of the church occurred at the behest of Emperor Valerian, who was the eighth persecuter after Nero. He managed to torture Christians and put to death those who refused to worship the idolatrous gods. Although in the beginning he so respected the holy ones that his house was regarded as a church of God, later, however, through a sorcerer in the black arts, he was influenced to disrespect the Christian religion and to carry on this persecution, the cruelties and disorders of which, through God's judgment, were in no small measure, disastrous to the world; for not long thereafter the Germans rose and with hostile purpose marched as far as Ravenna, and devastated everything with fire and sword.

Cyprian (Cyprianus), the highly informed teacher of the church, and bishop of Carthage, after long suffering, was on the 24th day of the month of September, by order of Valerian, the emperor, martyred by beheading, by Galerius Maximus the consul, a very cruel man. And it is said that in the same city, Crescentius, Victor, Rosula and Generalis suffered with him. At first Cyprian was a pagan and of extraordinary intelligence, well endowed with many arts. In the beginning he taught oratory, and afterwards, on the advice of Cecilia, he adopted the Christian faith and gave all his possessions to the poor. He became a priest and was later made a bishop at Carthage. He rendered valuable service there through teaching, admonitions and writings for the church of Christ. His celebrated life was written in a book by Pontius, one of his priests and sharer of his exile. The head of Cyprian the martyr is held in great veneration in the Church of St. Lawrence (Laurentii) in the imperial city of Nuremberg. He wrote many books, particularly upon the unity of the churches; and he was in accord with the Roman churches that penitent heretics should not be rebaptized, but were to be restored to grace by the laying on of hands alone. [Cyprian (Cyprianus) perished in the Valerian persecution. His martyrdom is one of the most authentic and interesting in the history of the Christian church. He was bishop at Carthage, and was of the opinion that those who turned from the church through heretical error should be admitted on no condition, before they were purified from their error by baptism. This opinion was not original with him, for Agrippinus, bishop of Carthage a long time before him, assembled the bishops of Africa and Numidia, and made a decree that heretics should be rebaptized. This custom of rebaptizing has been used in Cappadocia time out of mind, as Firmilianus, bishop of Caesaria in Cappadocia, testifies in his epistle to Cyprian (Eusebius, 7.3; Bohn, pp. 256-7)].

Lawrence (Laurentius), a Spaniard, adopted son and archdeacon of Pope Sixtus, after a virtuous career suffered imprisonment at Rome under Decius or Gallienus; as well as various other forms of punishment; and there he made a blind man see and baptized Hippolytus (Hypolitum). He was scourged with a leaden instrument and the scorpion [Scorpions: Not only with smooth rods were the ancients accustomed to punish offenders, and the Christians among the rest, but likewise with knotty and prickly ones, which they appropriately named "scorpions."], and these the church exhibits. One night Valerian and Decius demanded that he worship the idolatrous gods. And he said, My might is neither sinister nor dark, but all things shine in the light. After a hard blow on the mouth, he was cruelly roasted on an iron grill over a fire of burning coals on the 10th day of the month of August; and, giving praise to God, he suffered martyrdom with fortitude. Justinus and Hippolytus buried the burnt corpse. Some say this Lawrence was the son of a duke of Spain, whom the devil carried from his cradle into the woods. When the pious Sixtus preached in Spain, he found him, with God's intervention, under a laurel tree, and, after the same tree, named him Lawrence. And he reared him and taught him with great industry. And he took him, together with Vincentius, to Rome, and made him an archdeacon. [] Sabellius was a heretic after whom the Sabellian heresy was named. They hold that Father, Son and Holy Spirit were but one person. This heresy was filled with blasphemy of God the Father, and of Christ. They denied that he (Christ) was a son of the Father on high. Out of this arose many differences and controversies in the churches in the West and East. Nor did Sabellius escape the divine judgment, and he died shamefully. [Sabellius, an early Christian presbyter and theologian, was of Libyan origin and came from the Pentapolis to Rome early in the third century. He became the leader of the strict Modalists (who regarded the Father and Son as two aspects of the same subject) whom Calixtus had excommunicated along with their most zealous opponent Hippolytus. His party continued to exist in Rome for a considerable time and withstood Calixtus as an unscrupulous apostate. In the West, however, the influence of Sabellius seems never to have been important. But in the East his doctrine found much acceptance. It was violently controverted, notably by Dionysius of Alexandria, and the development in the East of the philosophical doctrine of the Trinity after Origen was greatly influenced by the opposition to Sabellianism. The central proposition of Sabellius was that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are the same person, three names attached to one and the same being. Of his late history nothing is known. His followers died out in the fourth century].

Hippolytus (Hypolytus), a Roman patrician, was seized in the month and year in which he buried Lawrence and was severely tortured for a long time because he was a Christian. He would not worship the idolatrous gods and was beaten with clubs until the executioners became tired. At the command of Decius the emperor, Valerian, the governor caused the entire household of Hippolytus to be beheaded in his presence. Hippolytus himself was tied by his feet to the necks of wild animals, and thus cruelly drawn through thistles and thorns until he died on the 13th day of August. [Concordia and Hippolytus (258 CE) are associated as saints for August 13th. Hippolytus is said to have been a soldier converted by Lawrence who was under his charge in prison. He buried Lawrence, and being brought before Decius for so doing, boldly professed his faith. The emperor ordered him arrayed in his military dress, and then asked if he was not ashamed to dishonor his soldier's name and uniform by disobedience. Hippolytus replied that he had passed through to a higher service. Among the servants of Hippolytus was an old nurse, Concordia, a Christian. She was beaten to death with whips. Hippolytus was tied to the tails of horses and dashed over stones and through brambles until he died].

Concordia was the nurse of the aforesaid Hippolytus. To her the governor said, Beware of your life, lest you die with your lord. Immediately she answered, We prefer to die with our lord, rather than to live unchastely. And he caused her to be beaten with a leaden instrument until she died.

Romanus, the soldier, suffered on the following day at the same place. This man permitted himself to be baptized during the confession of Lawrence, in consequence of an angelic vision. Therefore the judge ordered him to be beaten with clubs; and after his confession, caused him to be beheaded on the 9th day of August. His body was taken to the city of Lucca in Etruria and there honorably buried. [Romanus was a soldier who was converted by observing the constancy of Lawrence. He sought him in prison, was instructed and baptized by him and then, confessing what he had done, was arraigned and beheaded the day before the martyrdom of Lawrence. His relics are shown at Lucca].

Folio CXXII recto

Quirinus, a Roman tribune, was executed with the sword in this persecution on the 30th day of March, after his tongue was cut out and his hands and feet were cut off on the Roman road called the Appian Way. [Quirinus, a Roman soldier, serving under the Emperor Aurelian, did not hesitate to profess and preach the Christian faith openly. He suffered martyrdom, being dragged to death by horses and his tongue thrown to a hawk].

Theodora, the virgin sister of the martyr Hermetius, was captured by Aurelian at this time and fearlessly underwent martyrdom. [Theodora was the sister of Hermes, prefect of Rome, who, with his entire household of twelve hundred people, was converted to Christianity. Her legend is contained in the apocryphal . At that time Aurelian was governor of the city under Hadrian. Hermes was persecuted and tortured because he became a Christian. When brought before Aurelian to account for her brother's great wealth, Theodora answered that their goods had been distributed among the poor, and that all she had to give to Christ was her poor weak body. The magistrate ordered her beaten and then executed].

Valentine (Valentinus), a Roman priest, after giving evidence of exceptional learning and writing, was imprisoned by the Emperor Claudius; and being asked his opinion concerning the pagan gods, said: Jupiter, Mercury, and the other gods were miserable human beings. Afterwards he enlightened the daughter of Asterius. He brought her and forty-nine persons of her household to the Christian faith. Finally, at the command of the emperor, he was severely beaten with clubs, and was beheaded on the 14th day of the month of February. [Valentine, or Valentinus, is the name of a number of saints. The most celebrated are the two martyrs whose festivals fall on February 14, one a Roman priest, the other Bishop of Terni (Interamna). The Passion of the former is part of the legend of Saints Marius and Martha and their companions; that of the latter had no better historical foundation. No argument can be drawn from either account to differentiate the two saints. Both belonged to the reign of Claudius and died the same day, and both were buried on the Via Flaminia. The association of lovers' festivals with Valentine seems to arise from the fact that the feast of the saint falls in early spring—a purely accidental matter]. Cyrilla, a daughter of the emperor Decius, and a good Christian, was also beheaded at this time with the sword, as histories state, on the 28th day of October. [Cyrilla, according to the fabulous , was the daughter of Emperor Decius, who, having put to death Lawrence, became possessed with a devil and died. This so frightened his wife as well as his daughter Cyrilla that they believed in Christ and were baptized. The wife died a few days later because of the excitement. The daughter was brought before Claudius and was executed. Baring-Gould characterizes the story as "ridiculous nonsense," and utterly unhistorical. He observes that "The Acts of St. Lawrence are a poor and foolish romance without the merit even of being interesting. Probably Cyrilla and Tryphonina (her mother) are the creations of imagination. Certainly Decius had no wife and daughter of those names."]

The ninth persecution of the church occurred at the instance of Emperor Aurelian (Aurelianus). After accepting evil counsel and sending forth letters and writings to the governors of the Roman countries and regions for the persecution of the Christians, he was visited with divine judgment from heaven, and he died disgracefully.

Geneva (Gebennarum), the highly renowned city of the Allobroges, was built in this year among the Gauls by Emperor Aurelian; and he named it Aureliana after himself. Although Gaul had freed itself of the cruelty and tyranny of the emperors Valerian and Gallienus, and for twenty years remained free of Roman domination, yet through the power of Aurelian the emperor, it was again subjugated. This city is located in Helvetii (Helveciorum) [Switzerland], and beside it is the Lusitanian Sea, out of which flows the river Rhone (Rhodanus), over which passes a lovely wooden bridge. The city is large and beautiful and has many citizens, being the industrial or mercantile center of the entire Allobrogian country. It has many fairs, and unlimited wealth is brought there. For a long time this city was under the jurisdiction of the Duke of Savoy (Sabaudie), and it is still under his rule. In this city were many celebrated men, such as Maximinus, the confessor, and Anianus [Anianus may be a misspelling for Avianus, which is the spelling in the German edition], the bishop, both distinguished for their piety and learning; also Laetus (Letus), the priest, nobly informed in the Holy Scriptures; and many others. This city is so situated that it extends upward on a mountain; and it has very fruitful vineyards. Here is also a bishop's chair. In this city Amadeus, the first Duke of Savoy, gave the Duchy to his firstborn son, and he taught him to observe spiritual ways and to pray. And between his two sons, two beautiful youths, the one a Duke of Savoy, the other a Count at Geneva, he rode into the council at Basle (Basileam), and was there crowned as a bishop of the Roman church, as is stated below.

Geneva (Gebenna), a city and canton of Switzerland, is situated at the extreme southwest corner both of the country and of the Lake Geneva. In prehistoric times a great lake city, built upon piles, which may still be seen, existed where the waters from the Alpine lakes spread out over the plain before narrowing into the channel of the Rhone. This city was the prehistoric Geneva. After the end of the period of the lake dwellings, the inhabitants established themselves on the hill on the left bank of the lake and river. When the district of Wienne became a Roman province, Geneva became a Roman city, with part of what is now Savoy dependent on it. When the empire became Christian, a bishop was appointed at Geneva. After the barbarian invasions, the city shrank to its former size, and it was now concentrated on high ground. The pagan temples were converted into Christian churches. At the top of the hill rose Saint Peter's, while Saint Victor's was built in the detached part of the town. Geneva owed its importance to its bridge over the Rhone. Geneva lay on the path of the armies marching to the conquest of Italy. Charlemagne held an assembly here in 773. During the feudal period the Burgundian kings had more to fear from the hereditary counts of Geneva than from the elected bishops. Rudolph III conferred estates on the bishops and favored them at the expense of the counts. On his death in 1032 the emperors of the Holy Roman Empire inherited his lands. Frederick Barbarossa confirmed the temporal powers of the bishop of Geneva, who became a prince of the empire, and made the church independent of the nobles of the district. The count of Geneva had a residence in the town, the old royal chateau; but he had to do homage to the bishop for the chateau and for other fiefs, though he was the sole direct ruler of Geneva. But the Genevese were always characterized by their passion for independence, and attempted toward the end of the 13th century to create a municipal organization of their own. They were able to play off against one another the rival rulers of the district.

In Maurienne, a remote district of the country, there presently arose a count who came to be known as the count of Savoy and was on bad terms with both the count of Geneva and the bishop. His nephew, Amadeus the Great, declared himself protector of the citizens, who had formed themselves into a municipality with syndics and other officers. The count of Geneva was reduced to a mere vassal of his cousin of Savoy, while the bishop was compelled to yield his palace to the latter, together with the vidomnat, the office empowering him to administer summary justice in the city. Finally the bishop recognized the municipality, after the citizens, posted on the towers of St. Peter's, had withstood bombardment by the count of Geneva from his castle. This castle was dismantled in 1320. In the meantime the citizens had defeated the count's army. By calling in the count of Savoy the Genevese had fallen out of the frying pan and into the fire. They had been able to free themselves from the count of Geneva and to defy the bishop, but they discovered that their protector intended to make himself "prince" of the city. The counts of Savoy endeavored to obtain the election to the bishopric of Geneva for themselves, or for a cadet of the family, or for a prelate devoted to its interests. Involved in the struggle between France and Burgundy through the policy of the House of Savoy, the town was ransomed by the Swiss after their victory over Charles the Bold in 1477. The measures taken by Louis XI had destroyed the fairs of Geneva, and the prevalent distress of the 15th century became still worse in the 16th, when Charles III, in 1525, went so far as to impose his will on the assembly of the citizens. But better times came at last, thanks to the commercial relations established between Geneva and the Swiss. Through wars Charles III lost his lands. Once the Genevese were rid of him, they were able to organize their independent republic in peace.

Year of the World 5473 | Year of Christ 274

Eutychian (Euticianus) the pope from Tuscia (Thuscus), a native of the city of Luna, sat at Rome after Felix. He was a very pious and learned man. He ordained that the new fruits, particularly grapes and beans, were to be blessed upon the altar. Item: that those who wished to bury the martyrs should not bury with them the clothing prescribed for church service, but leave them behind. It is said that with his own hands he buried three hundred martyrs. But after he had consecrated 14 priests, five deacons, and nine bishops, he too was crowned with martyrdom and was buried in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Appian Way on the 25th day of the month of July. He sat one year, one month, and one day; and at that time the chair was vacant eight days. Some say he was in the papal see eight years and ten months. Damasus, however, was the author of the first thought.

Eutychian (Eutychianus) buried 300 martyrs with his own hands. His term as pope is given as 275-283 CE.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not found in the German edition of the Chronicle.

Caius the pope, a Dalmatian and of the family clan of the emperor Diocletian, was a godly man. He divided the consecrations into stages without passing through which no one could attain to the office of bishop. He also assigned to the deacons the respective regions in which the histories of the martyrs were to be written; that no layman was to summon the consecrated ones before the court; and that no pagan or heretic should have the right to lodge complaint against any Christian. But as in the time of Diocletian, a greater persecution than ever before arose, he concealed himself in hidden places underground. Finally he was taken prisoner by the persecutors, and was crowned with martyrdom, together with Gabinius, his brother, and Susanna, his brother's daughter; and he was buried on the Appian Way in the cemetery of Calixtus on the 22nd day of the month of April. He sat 11 years, four months, and eleven days. Eusebius writes that this pope was in office fifteen years. [Caius, a Dalmatian, devised six orders preliminary to ordination as a bishop: ostarius, lector, exorcist, acolyte, subdeacon and deacon. His term is given as 283-296 CE].

Paul (Paulus) the bishop of Samosata, and a highly informed man, at this time, is said to have resurrected the heresy of Artemas (Arthemonis), a heresy that deviates from the orthodox faith. This heresy denied the virginity of Mary, and held that Mary, after the birth of Christ, had intercourse with Joseph and bore other sons. Then this Paul was crowned bishop of Antioch, carried himself about with too much pride, read letters to his followers, and sent out epistles. In consequence of his vanity many people looked down upon the Christian faith. But if these same people in our own time should see his courtly fashions, his vanity, pomp, and excessive ecclesiastical show, and so many expensively clad young courtiers riding on horseback, and the swarm of priests following, clad in dress ornamented with gold, and the horses caparisoned in the best and most colorful manner, they would curse and say that such a bishop or cleric, except for his assumed spirituality, had nothing in common with Christ. This Paul denied that the Son of God descended from heaven, and claimed that Christ came of Mary and had an earthly origin. Therefore in the Council of Antioch he was condemned by the common consent of all the bishops attending, and chiefly by Gregory the bishop of Caesaria, a pious man, who was also present and was later martyred for his Christian faith. [Eusebius, 7.27-30; Bohn, pp. 286-292. According to Eusebius, Paul "entertained low and degrading notions of Christ, contrary to the doctrine of the church, and taught that he was in nature but a common man . . . But the other heads of the churches, assembled in all haste from different parts, at Antioch, as against one who was committing depredations on the flock of Christ. . . . And this arch-heretic at Antioch, being detested, and now evidently discarded by all, was excommunicated from the whole Catholic Church under heaven." The specific charges against Paul are set forth in the epistles issued against him and sent forth to the bishops of the churches at distant places: "But in those instances where he abandoned the rule of faith, and went over to spurious and corrupt doctrines, there is no necessity of judging his conduct, when he was yet in no connexion with the church; nor that he was in poverty and beggary; and that he who had received neither wealth from his fathers, nor obtained possessions by any art, or any trade or business, has now arrived at excessive wealth, by his iniquities and sacrileges, and by those various means which he employed to exact and extort from the brethren, depressing the injured, and promising to aid them for a reward; and yet how he deceived them, and without doing them any good, took advantage of the readiness of those who were in difficulties, to make them give anything to be freed from their oppressors. We shall say nothing of his making merchandise of piety; nor how he affected lofty things, and assumed with great haughtiness worldly dignities, wishing rather to be called a magistrate than a bishop, strutting through the forum, and reading letters, and repeating them as he walked in public, and how he was escorted by multitudes going before and following after him: how he, also, brought envy and odium upon the faith, by his pomp, and the haughtiness of his heart. We shall say nothing of the vanities and pretensions with which he contrived, in our ecclesiastical assemblies, to catch at glory and empty shadows, and to confound the minds of the more simple, with such things as these; nothing of his preparing himself a tribunal and a throne, not as a disciple of Christ, but having like the rulers of this world, a secretum, and calling it by his name; nothing of his striking his thigh and his stamping on the tribunal with his feet, and his reproving and insulting those that did not applaud; . . . nothing of his harsh invectives in the congregation, against the expounders of the word, who had departed this life, and of his magnifying himself, not as a bishop, but as a sophist and juggler. Besides this he stopped the psalms that were sung in honor of Christ Jesus Christ, as the late compositions of modern men, but in honor of himself he had prepared women to sing at the great festival in the midst of the church, which one might shudder to hear. He suborned, also, those bishops and presbyters of the neighboring districts and cities of his party, to advance the same things in their addresses to the people. . . . He did not wish to confess with us that the Son of God descended from heaven . . . And as to those women, those adopted sisters, as the inhabitants of Antioch call them, which belong to him, and the presbyters and deacons about him, whose incurable sins, in this and other respects, he conceals with them, though he is conscious of the facts, and has convicted them, he dissembles, in order to have them subservient to his purposes; so that, fearing for themselves, they dare not venture to accuse him in regard to his impious conduct and doctrine . . . We have been compelled therefore to excommunicate this man . . . and to appoint another bishop in his place over the catholic church." And they named Domnus, a man they believed fully endowed with all the qualities of a bishop].

Manes, the heretic, a native of Persia, a cunning devilish man of coarse life and manners, lived at this time. This heretic dared to call himself Christ and chose twelve disciples for himself whom he brought to believe in him; and to kill the souls of the deceived he made an unspeakable poem of shameful teachings of ungodliness and gross lies, with which he deluded himself and also his followers; for he said that Christ was not a true body, but an idle image. This heretic and his followers said that there are two origins—one of good, the other of evil; one of darkness, the other of light. He disregarded the Old Testament, and looked alone to the New. And from him the heresy of the Manichees had its origin.

For Manes, cf. Eusebius (Ecclesiastical History 7.31; Bohn p. 293):

In the meantime, also, that madman Manes, as he called himself, well agreeing with his name, for his diabolical heresy, armed himself by the perversion of his reason, and at the instigation of Satan, to the destruction of many. He was a barbarian in his life, both in speech and conduct, but in his nature as one possessed and insane. Accordingly he attempted to form himself into a Christ, and then also proclaimed himself to be the very Paraclete, and the Holy Spirit, and with all this was greatly puffed up with his madness. Then, as if he were Christ, he selected twelve disciples, the partners of his new religion, and after patching together false and ungodly doctrines, collected from a thousand heresies long since extinct, he swept them off like a deadly poison, from Persia, upon this part of the world. Hence the impious name of the Manichees spreading among many, even to the present day.

Eusebius' final words were prescient, for of all the heresies (perhaps more properly we should say 'alternative belief systems') that came out of the complex web of early Christian communities (however loosely defined these communities were in relationship to what later became Orthodox/Catholic beliefs), none, perhaps, has had a more long-lasting and profound influence on the culture and ideology of the West in terms of its (admittedly sporadic) embrace of the idea of dualism, especially that between the forces of light and dark, good and evil. The most famous adherent (and later opponent) of Manicheism was Augustine himself. Possible Manichee-influenced (or Manichee-like) movements from later times include the Bogomils, Paulicians, and the Cathars, as well as certain evangelical and fundamentalist religious groups of many different religious traditions (e.g. Judaism, Christianity, and Islam).

But while this heretic Manes is descried for his ill will and vanity, Anatolius the Laodecian bishop is highly praised for his holiness and teachings.

Felix the priest and Eusebius the monk were slain at Terracina in the country of Campania during this persecution because of their Christian faith. For after Eusebius had buried the pious martyrs, Julianus and Caesarius (Cesarium), the priests, and on their account had converted many people to the faith and had baptized them, he, together with Felix the pope, was taken before the court; and as he would not sacrifice to the gods, he was beheaded on the fifth day of November. Caesarius the deacon, and Julianus the priest, were slain on the same day in the same city. After Caesarius had spent many days alone in prison, and was there enlightened, he, together with Julianus, were put in a sack and thrown into the sea on the first day of November. Adiochus the priest, Tyradius the deacon, and Felix the subdeacon, former disciples of Polycarp (Policarpus) whom he thanked for preaching from the East to Gaul, were crowned with glorious martyrdom in the city of the Gauls, Augusta; finally they died, pierced with spears.

Folio CXXIII recto

Tacitus, the Roman emperor, attained the sovereignty after Aurelian from the Roman senate and the people. At his election a Roman senator said: An army cannot exist very long without a leader; therefore necessity dictates that such a man should be elected, for, it is said, that the Germans invaded the region within the Rhine and the strong cities, and worried the noble, rich and mighty. Immediately the whole senate voted and elected this Tacitus. By reason of his virtue and excellence he was a capable and fit man to rule for the common good. The money he collected at home he employed to pay the army. He lived a moderate life and loved sour food. He seldom bathed, and was strong in his old age, and took pleasure in various kinds of glassware. He ate no bread unless it was dry. He was highly versed in architecture, and was partial to marble. He loved to hunt wild game. At length, through the instigation of the army, he was slain in the sixth month of his reign. But some say he succumbed to an illness. His reign being brief, he accomplished nothing great. He caused the month of September to be named Tacitus after himself, for in that month he was born and was also made emperor. [M. Claudius Tacitus, Roman emperor from September 25, 275 CE, until April 276, was elected by the senate after the death of Aurelian, the army having requested the senate to elect a successor to the imperial throne. At the time he was seventy years of age and was with difficulty persuaded to accept the position. The high character that he had born he amply sustained during his brief reign. He endeavored to repress the luxury and licentiousness of the age by various sumptuary laws, and he himself set the example by the abstemiousness, simplicity and frugality of his own habits. The only military achievement of his reign was the defeat and expulsion from Asia Minor of a party of Goths, who had carried their devastation across the peninsula to the confines of Cicilia. He died either at Tarsus or at Tyana, about the 9th of April, 276].

Florianus, brother of the aforesaid Tacitus, attained to the sovereignty after his brother, not through election by the Roman senate, but by his own act, as though the sovereignty was inheritable. For he knew that Tacitus in the senate had vowed that after his death, the senate should elect an emperor, not his son, but a good and virtuous man. Florianus held the sovereignty for two months, and was slain. This Florianus was a follower of his morals, but not in all things; for he was more ambitious of power than his brother, and therefore not comparable to him. [M. Annius Florianus, the brother, by a different father, of the emperor Tacitus, upon whose death he was proclaimed emperor at Rome in 276 CE. He was murdered by his own troops at Tarsus, after a reign of about two months, while on his march against Probus, who had been proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria].

Probus, the Roman emperor, was a celebrated man at home and abroad, and after Tacitus he was made emperor by the unanimous voice of all men. He ruled the world very peacefully. He was born in the city of Sirmium, in Pannonia, his mother being of more noble birth than his father. His inheritance was moderate, and his relationship was not very distinguished. During his reign as well as up to that time he was noted for his high nobility and virtue. And since he was renowned in military affairs, and now received the care of the commonwealth, he relieved the besieged Gauls of the barbarians with great good fortune; and forty thousand men were slain and seventy celebrated cities freed of the enemy. This Probus also carried on various wars against Saturninus, the emperor in the East; and he suppressed Proculus and Bonosus at Cologne, in Gaul, with masterful speed. Finally he returned to Sirmium, his home, determined to advance and enlarge his fatherland. This caused objection on the part of the army, and they killed him in an iron tower to which he fled, in the sixth year of his reign. [M. Aurelius Probus, Roman emperor (276-282 CE), was a native of Sirmium in Pannonia, and rose to distinction through his military abilities. He was appointed governor of the entire East by Tacitus. On the latter's death the position of emperor was forced on him by the armies of Syria. The downfall of Florianus speedily removed his only rival, and he was hailed by the united voice of the senate, the people, and the legions. His reign was one of brilliant achievements. He defeated the barbarians on the frontiers of Gaul and Illyricum, and in other parts of the Roman Empire. He put down the rebellions of Saturninus at Alexandria, and of Proculus and Bonosus in Gaul. After crushing all external and internal foes, he was killed at Sirmium by his own soldiers who had risen against him because he had employed them in laborious public works. Probus was as just and virtuous as he was warlike, and is deservedly regarded as one of the greatest of Roman emperors].

Carus, the Roman emperor, attained the sovereignty after Probus. He associated with him in the government his two sons Numerianus and Carinus, making them caesars, and reigning with them for two years. While conducting a war against the Sarmatians, he received news of a revolt in Persia. So he went to the East and made war upon the Persians. He was killed by lightning in camp on the river Tigris. [M. Aurelius Carus, Roman emperor (282-283 CE), was probably born at Narbo in Gaul. He was praefectus praetorio ('commander in charge of the Praetorian Guard') under the emperor Probus, and on the murder of the latter was elected his successor. After defeating the Sarmatians, he invaded the Persian dominions, took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and was preparing to push his conquests beyond the river Tigris, when he was struck dead by lightning, toward the close of the year 283. He was succeeded by his sons Carinus and Numerianus. Carus was a victorious general and an able ruler]. Numerianus was confined to his bed by an affliction of the eyes, and was secretly murdered. He surpassed all the poets of his time. [M. Aurelius Numerianus was the younger of the two sons of the Roman emperor Carus. He accompanied his father in an expedition against the Persians in the year 283. After his father's death in the same year he was chosen joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The army, alarmed by the fate of Carus, who was struck dead by lightning while preparing to push his conquests beyond the Tigris in the year 283, compelled Numerianus to make a retreat toward Europe. During the greater part of this march, which extended over a period of eight months, he was confined to his litter by an affliction of the eyes. But the suspicions of the soldiers became aroused, and they at length found their way into his tent; and there they discovered the dead body of their prince. Arrius Aper, prefect of the Praetorians, and father-in-law of the deceased, was arraigned for murder before a military council, and without being permitted to speak in his own defense was stabbed in the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor]. But Carinus, a man contaminated with every vice, and a constant adulterer, was defeated by Diocletian in Dalmatia, and thus suffered the penalty for his crimes. [M. Aurelius Carinus, elder of the two sons of Carus, was associated with his father in the government in 283 CE. He remained in the West while his father and brother proceeded to war against the Persians in the East. On the death of his father in the same year, Carinus and Numerianus succeeded to the empire. When the latter was slain in 284, Carinus marched into Moesia to oppose Diocletian who had been proclaimed emperor. Carinus gained the victory, but in the moment of triumph was slain by his own officers, some of whose wives he had seduced].

Diocletian of Dalmatia was of very obscure and low birth. He was elected emperor in the year of the founding of the city (i.e. Rome) 1041. When a revolt occurred in Gaul, he sent Maximianus, surnamed Hercules, there with an army, soon silencing this great people. But when wars broke out which Diocletian could not withstand alone, he made Maximian (Maximianus) associate emperor, and sent Constantius and Maximinus Galerius to assist him in governing the empire. After ten years Maximian brought Britain back into the empire. Constantius slaughtered many thousands of Germans who came to Gaul as mercenaries; and he freed Gaul. In the meantime Diocletian proceeded to Egypt and besieged Alexandria. This he conquered in eight months, giving the city over to the soldiers for pillage. Diocletian was cunning, well mannered, resourceful, at times subtle and ingenious, and, in addition, a very industrious and ambitious prince. Although his predecessors were saluted, he commanded that he be worshipped. Maximian, however, was a serious man, ignored customs and usages, and his fierce countenance expressed his cruel nature. Having quelled all the revolts, Diocletian in the East and Maximian in the West, they proceeded to destroy the churches. Diocletian divided the empire and retired. He lived to the age of 73 years and was put to death by poison. [Valerius Diocletian, Roman emperor (284-305 CE), was born near Salona in Dalmatia in 245. From his mother Doclea, or Dioclea, who received her name from the village in which she lived, he inherited the appellation of Docles or Diocles, which after his assumption of the purple, was expanded into Diocletianus, and attached as a cognomen to the high patrician name of Valerius. Having entered the army he served with high reputation under Probus and Aurelian, followed Carus to the Persian war, and after the fate of Numerianus became known, was proclaimed emperor by the troops. He finally became undisputed master of the empire; but as the attacks of the barbarians became daily more formidable, he associated with himself as a colleague Maximian (Maximianus), who was invested with the title of Augustus in 286. The latter took care of the Western empire, Diocletian of the Eastern. But as the dangers from Persian attack in the East, and the barbarians in the West became still more imminent, he made a further division of the empire. In 292 Constantius, Chlorus, and Galerius were proclaimed caesars. Britain was restored to the empire in 296, the Persians were defeated, and the barbarians driven back. After an anxious reign of twenty-one years Diocletian retired to his native Dalmatia, where he died in 313. Today he is perhaps most remembered for his fierce persecution of the Christians].

Folio CXXIII verso

The tenth persecution of the Christians after Nero was originated in these times by Veturius, the captain of the army, and at the command of Diocletian and Maximian (Maximianus) it was carried on in all parts of the world. Diocletian in the East, and Maximian in the West, ordered the churches ravaged and the Christians tortured and slain. This persecution was the cruelest of all and lasted longer than the others. The Holy Scriptures were burned, and those in civil offices who acknowledged themselves Christians were deposed and looked upon as without honor. Slaves who became Christians could not be set free by their owners. Christian soldiers were compelled to either sacrifice to the gods or lose their offices, and to give up their careers, under a cruel law posted by the emperor in the market place. One man dared to break this law, and he was flayed, and vinegar and salt poured upon him until he lost his life. This is attested by Dorotheus and Gorgonius, two renowned men. On the same day fire broke out in the imperial palace at Nicomedia. In a spirit of feigned anger, the emperor attributed this to the Christians, and he caused many Christians to be slain, and many to be thrown alive into the fire. Such violent cruelties were not only practiced in Mytilene (Militena), Syria, Africa, Thebes, and in Egypt, but also in Palestine and Tyre. The Christians were spared no form of torture, and as Damasus states, in 30 days 17,000 persons of both sexes were crowned with martyrdom not including those who were exiled to the islands, or to the mines, or to dig ore, or to hew stone; and of these there were an endless number. Finally God opened his eyes and forced Diocletian to abdicate. And Maximian was so frightened by disease and confusion that he committed suicide.

Adauctus, a Roman patrician, a man most Christian and holy, received martyrdom in Phrygia (Phrigiam) because he had converted the city. For this reason Diocletian caused the whole city to be burned because the citizens would not sacrifice to the gods. After having his eyes dug out, this Adauctus was made a martyr by decapitation.

Alexander, the powerful soldier of the legions of Thebes, at this time preached in the name of Christ. After practising numberless virtues he honorably attained martyrdom by decapitation. His body was buried by Grata, a pious widow, on her own soil. There a worthy temple was built, which is still to be seen there. [Alexander, according to one version of the , is said to have been a standard-bearer, according to another version, a head centurion, in the Theban legion. Known to be a Christian, he was brought before Maximian at Rome. A long and tedious discussion between them is given by the author of the , out of his own head. A soldier was ordered to cut off the head of Alexander, but became motionless. Alexander was then led back to prison. He escaped during the night and took refuge at the Bergamo, but was discovered and dragged before an idol and executed with the sword. A Christian matron named Grata took up his body and buried it on her farm].

Barbara, a very noble virgin, and a native of the city of Nicomedia, was, because of her great beauty, placed in a high tower by her father, who feared she might become a Christian. But through the instruction of the Holy Spirit, she prayed like a Christian to the God of Heaven. Her father decided to slay her, but she concealed herself. However, she was discovered, brought before him with feet upward and beaten with rods, burned with torches and had her breasts cut off. After suffering numberless tortures, she was beheaded by her father on the fourth day of the month of December. Fire, proceeding from heaven, burnt the father to dust. []

Anastasia, daughter of a very noble Roman and the wife of Publius, a very powerful man, became a Christian; and she practiced works of mercy toward the Christians. In this tumult she was imprisoned for a long time by Publius, her husband, and tortured for the sake of Christ. And she was comforted by Chrysogonus (Grisogono), who afterwards through the decapitation of his head earned the palm of martyrdom. Finally, together with men and many women she was lead to the Palmarian islands. After various prayers made by the Christians, Anastasia was tied to a stake by the prefect. And he cremated her with fire on the 8th day of the Kalends of January around the Year of the Lord 280. She was, moreover, very well versed in good literature, and concerning her persecution are extant letters she sent to Chrysogonus full of eloquence.

Concerning Anastasia, cf. The Catholic Encyclopedia (Kirsch, "St. Anastasia." Vol. 1. New York, 1907):

This martyr enjoys the distinction, unique in the Roman liturgy, of having a special commemoration in the second Mass on Christmas day. This Mass was originally celebrated not in honour of the birth of Christ, but in commemoration of this martyr, and towards the end of the fifth century her name was also inserted in the Roman canon of the Mass. Nevertheless, she is not a Roman saint, for she suffered martyrdom at Sirmium, and was not venerated at Rome until almost the end of the fifth century. It is true that a later legend, not earlier than the sixth century, makes Anastasia a Roman, though even in this legend she did not suffer martyrdom at Rome. The same legend connects her name with that of St. Chrysogonus, likewise not a Roman martyr, but put to death in Aquileia, though he had a church in Rome dedicated to his honour. According to this "Passio", Anastasia was the daughter of Praetextatus, a Roman vir illustris, and had Chrysogonus for a teacher. Early in the persecution of Diocletian the Emperor summoned Chrysogonus to Aquileia where he suffered martyrdom. Anastasia, having gone from Aquileia to Sirmium to visit the faithful of that place, was beheaded on the island of Palmaria, 25 December, and her body interred in the house of Apollonia, which had been converted into a basilica. The whole account is purely legendary, and rests on no historical foundations. All that is certain is that a martyr named Anastasia gave her life for the faith in Sirmium, and that her memory was kept sacred in that church. The so-called "Martyrologium Sieronymianum" (ed. De Rossi and Duchesne, Acta SS, 2 November) records her name on 25 December, not for Sirmium alone, but also for Constantinople, a circumstance based on a separate story. According to Theodorus Lector (Hist. Eccles, II, 65), during the patriarchate of Gennadius (458-471) the body of the martyr was transferred to Constantinople and interred in a church which had hitherto been known as "Anastasis" (Gr. Anastasis, 'Resurrection'); thenceforth the church took the name of Anastasia. Similarly the cultus of St. Anastasia was introduced into Roman from Sirmium by means of an already existing church. As this church was already quite famous, it brought the feast of the saint into especial prominence. There existed in Rome from the fourth century, at the foot of the Palatine and above the Circus Maximus, a church which had been adorned by Pope Damasus (366-384) with a large mosaic. It was known as "titulus Anastasix", and is mentioned as such in the Acts of the Roman Council of 499. There is some uncertainty as to the origin of this name; either the church owes its foundation to and was named after a Roman matron Anastasia, as in the case of several other titular churches of Rome (Duchesne), or it was originally an "Anastasis" church (dedicated to the Resurrection of Christ), such as existed already at Ravenna and Constantinople; from the word "Anastasis" came eventually the name "titulus Anastasix" (Grisar). Whatever way this happened, the church was an especially prominent one from the fourth to the sixth century, being the only titular church in the centre of ancient Rome, and surrounded by the monuments of the city's pagan past. Within its jurisdiction was the Palatine where the imperial court was located. Since the veneration of the Sirmian martyr, Anastasia, received a new impetus in Constantinople during the second half of the fifth century, we may easily infer that the intimate contemporary relations between Old and New Rome brought about an increase in devotion to St. Anastasia at the foot of the Palatine. At all events the insertion of her name into the Roman Canon of the Mass towards the end of the fifth century, show that she then occupied a unique position among the saints publicly venerated at Rome. Thenceforth the church on the Palatine is known as "titulus sanctus Anastasix", and the martyr of Sirmium became the titular saint of the old fourth-century basilica. Evidently because of its position as titular church of the district including the imperial dwellings on the Palatine this church long maintained an eminent rank among the churches of Rome; only two churches preceded it in honour: St. John Lateran, the mother-church of Rome, and St. Mary Major. This ancient sanctuary stands today quite isolated amid the ruins of Rome. The commemoration of St. Anastasia in the second Mass on Christmas day is the last remnant of the former prominence enjoyed by this saint and her church in the life of Christian Rome.

In the German edition of the Chronicle this mini-biography of Anastasia is very abbreviated:

Anastasia, daughter of a very noble Roman and the wife of a very powerful man, became a Christian; and she practiced works of mercy toward the Christians. In this tumult she was imprisoned for a long time by Publius, her husband, and was decapitated.

Claudius, Nicostratus, Symphorianus, and Simplicius, highly renowned men, suffered at this time in Rome. They were first imprisoned, then beaten with scorpions [Scorpions: Not only with smooth rods were the ancients accustomed to punish offenders, and the Christians among the rest, but likewise with knotty and prickly ones, which they appropriately named "scorpions."], and finally, upon the order of Diocletian, were thrown into the sea on the 28th day of October.

Crispinus and Crispinianus, celebrated men, were first taken prisoners in the city of Soissons (Suesionem) and cruelly tortured. Finally, beheaded on the 25th day of the month of October, they received the crown of martyrdom. [Crispinus and Crispinianus (aka, Crispin and Crispian; 285 CE) are said to have been brothers, natives of Rome, who exercised the trade of shoemakers at Soissons. In 284 Maximinus Hercules proceeded against the Bagaudae, and having punished them for their revolt, came to Soissons. Among the Bagaudae there had been, no doubt, Christians, and Maximinus was inflamed with anger against them. Crispin and Crispinian were denounced to him, and he ordered the prefect of the Gauls to punish them. The prefect ordered them executed by the sword, and their bodies thrown into the common sewers. But the add much apocryphal matter, such as that the judge ordered the brothers to have slivers of wood thrust under their finger-nails, but which promptly flew out and stabbed their tormentors, who were wounded and died shortly as the saints prayed. Then millstones were hung about their necks, and they were thrown into the river; but they swam across without the slightest inconvenience. Boiling lead was poured over them, but it only refreshed them. They were plunged into a bubbling cauldron of oil, and this failed to injure them. The prefect, disgusted at his lack of success, pitched himself headmost into the fire under the cauldron, and stifled his dissatisfaction in the flames. Seeing their persecutor thus disposed of, the martyrs calmly placed their necks under the sword, and their heads were struck off without difficulty by the executioner. Crispin and Crispinian are regarded as the patron saints of shoemakers. In art they are represented with the symbols of their trade, but sometimes with millstones hung round their necks].

Maurice (Mauricius), Exuperius, Candidus, and Victor, together with Innocentius, the most distinguished soldiers of the Theban Legion, at this time received the crown of martyrdom with six thousand six hundred sixty-six others, for the sake of Christ, at the instigation of the emperor Maximian in Gaul, near the city of Seduno. These martyrs were of the East, and out of the noble city of Egypt that lies on the river Nile; and they were baptized by the bishop of Jerusalem. Being greatly experienced in military affairs, noble in virtue, and still nobler in the faith, they were called upon by Maximian to assist him in Gaul. However, when he sent them against the Christians, and he commanded them to worship the idolatrous gods, they refused to do so; and he punished them in various places with various forms of martyrdom, beheading those who proved stubborn. He beheaded every tenth man; but Maurice, the leader of the legion, confirmed the members in their faith; and they laid down their arms and willingly sacrificed themselves. The bodies of these men were revealed after many years of suffering to the holy bishop Theodotus, who built a basilica in their honor. Their feast day is celebrated on the 10th Kalends of October.

The legends surrounding Maurice and the Theban Legion are among the most interesting in the Christian martyrology. The stories recount that among the legions of the Roman army in the time of Diocletian and Maximian, one was styled the "Theban Legion" because originally levied from area in and around Thebes, in Egypt. Much of what is said about this legion in medieval tradition is probably legendary. That said, those very legends record that the number composing this corps was 6666, and all were Christians, as remarkable for their valor and discipline as for their piety and fidelity. It was commanded by an excellent Christian officer of illustrious birth, Maurice (in Latin Mauritius). Around the year 286 Maximian summoned this legion from the East to reinforce the army with which he was about to march into Gaul. The Alps having been passed, some of the legion was dispatched to the Rhine, the rest of the army halting on the banks of the Lake of Geneva, where Maximian ordered a general sacrifice to the gods, accompanied by games and ceremonies usual on such occasions. But Maurice and his Christian soldiers withdrew from the idolatrous rites, and retiring to a distance of about three leagues, they pitched their tents at a place called Aganum (now St. Maurice). Maximian insisted on obedience to his commands, at the same time making it known that the service for which he required their aid was to extirpate the Christians, whose destruction he had sworn. The legion having with one voice refused to make the sacrifice, or to be led against their fellow-Christians, the emperor ordered the soldiers decimated. Their officers encouraged them to perish rather than yield; and when summoned for the third time, Maurice, in the name of his soldiers, again refused compliance, pleading that they were not only the soldiers of the emperor, but also of Jesus Christ, receiving pay from the former, and eternal life from the latter. Unmoved, the cruel tyrant ordered the rest of the army to surround the devoted legion for a general massacre. And they obeyed; nor did the Christian soldiers, on the other hand, resist, but throwing away their weapons, they submitted themselves to the slaughter like sheep. Some were trampled down by the cavalry; some were hung on threes and shot with arrows; some were killed with the sword. As Maurice and his officers knelt down in an attitude of prayer, they were beheaded; and so perished the Theban Legion.

The last two sentences in this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Vincent (Vincentius), the deacon, a very invincible and pious man from Spain, disciple of St. Sixtus, the pope, and very much resembling the martyr Lawrence (Laurentii) in skill and virtue, and of noble birth and highly learned, together with Valerius, the pious bishop of the city of Caesar Augusta, suffered very bitter martyrdom at the hands of Dacianus, the proconsul. After severe punishment and imprisonment, being put in chains and starved, Vincent suffered deadly tortures in every limb. He was stretched on a gallows, and while hanging there was lacerated with many wounds. Then he was taken down and laid on a gridiron over glowing coals, and while still on that was torn to pieces with iron forks, and had salt poured over him. After that he was imprisoned with his feet locked in the stocks; and there he was left alone without anyone to console him. But he was released from his bonds by an angel of God, surrounded with a great light. For that reason Dacianus said, We are defeated. And in order to further torture him, he caused him to be healed; but he soon died of starvation and gave up his Spirit to heaven. After his persecution Christians placed his body under the altar of a certain church outside the walls of Valencia (Valentie). Prudentius [Prudentius (348-after 405), a celebrated Christian poet born in northern Spain, wrote a series of lyric poems entitled ('Crowns of Martyrdom'), on Spanish and Roman martyrs, including Vincent. Prudentius describes how Vincent was brought to trial along with his bishop Valerius, and that since Valerius had a speech impediment, Vincent spoke for both, but that his outspoken fearless manner so angered the governor that Vincent was tortured and martyred, though his aged bishop was only exiled]. expressed his suffering and noble triumph in verse. Augustine also very richly displays praise for this very holy martyr.

The legends regarding Vincent state that he was born in Saragossa, in the kingdom of Aragon. During the persecution under Diocletian, the cruel proconsul Dacian, infamous in the annals of Spanish martyrdom, caused all the Christians of Saragossa, whom he collected together by a promise of immunity, to be massacred. And at this time lived Vincent, early instructed in the Christian faith, and with all the ardor of youth devoted to the service of Christ. At 20 he was already a deacon. He encouraged and sustained many of his brethren in the torments inflicted upon them, and was himself called upon to receive the crown of martyrdom. Being brought before the tribunal of Dacian, together with his bishop Galerius, they were accused of being Christians. Confessing their faith, the old bishop was ordered banished, but for the brave Vincent, who had defied him, a severer fate was reserved as an example to the rest. His body was lacerated with iron forks, and flames were administered; and they laid him bleeding, and half consumed by fire, on the ground strewn with potsherds and left him there. But when the guards looked into the dungeon, they saw it filled with light and fragrance; and they fell upon their knees and acknowledged the true God. Vincent died of his tortures, and the proconsul ordered his body thrown to the wild beasts. But God sent a raven to guard his remains. Then Dacian ordered the body sewn up in an ox-hide and thrown into the sea.

The last three sentences in this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Agnes, the highly renowned virgin of exalted memory, was at the time of this persecution (according to the testimony of Ambrose) born in Rome of Roman citizens. She was a young girl of thirteen with a beautiful face and, when she returned from school was loved by the son of the prefect. But she said, I already love the one whose mother was a virgin. For that reason she was imprisoned and given the choice of sacrificing to the goddess Vesta, or to join the company courtesans. But she disregarded both, and was therefore sent naked into a house of prostitution by the prefect. But the Lord covered her with thick tresses as though she were covered with raiment. And when they came in, she had been clad in a white dress by an angel of the Lord. And at this many wondered; and the son of the prefect was frightened to death. But Agnes prayed for him, and he came to life again. After that she was threatened, frightened, and beaten, and then thrown into the fire. Yet she remained uninjured. At length her neck was pierced by a sword; and so she was brought to martyrdom on the 21st day of January. In the night she appeared to her parents, with a host of virgins; and she said, Dearest parents, you should not mourn for me as one who is dead, but rejoice with me; for I am espoused to that one in Heaven, who, while on earth, I loved with complete understanding. [The legend of Agnes (containing many elements that remind one of the folktales collected by the Brothers Grimm) is as follows: There lived in Rome a maiden named Agnes (whether this name was her own, or given to her because of her lamb-like meekness and innocence does not seem clear). She was only 13, yet filled with all good gifts of the Holy Spirit, having loved and followed Christ from her infancy. She was of surpassing beauty. The son of the prefect of Rome desired her for wife, and he asked her in marriage of her parents; but she repelled all his advances and rejected his gifts of gold and gems, saying: "I am the betrothed of a lover who is greater and fairer than any earthly suitor." The son of the prefect was seized with jealousy and rage; and he fell ill, almost to the point of death. The prefect went to Agnes and to her parents to intercede for his son, but Agnes remained firm. Learning that she was a Christian, he ordered her to enter the service of the goddess Vesta. Being still further resisted, he threatened her with death; and he loaded her with chains, and ordered her to be dragged before the altars of the pagan gods; but to no avail. He ordered her carried to a place of prostitution, and exposed to the most degrading outrages. The soldiers stripped her, and when she saw herself exposed, she bent her head and prayed. Immediately her hair, already long, became like a veil, covering her whole person. And those who looked on were seized with awe and averted their eyes. And they shut her up in a chamber; and she saw before her a shining garment; and the whole place was filled with a glorious light. The son of the prefect entered the chamber, was struck blind and fell into convulsions, and was carried off as dead. But Agnes prayed for him, and her prayers were granted. The young man was eager to save Agnes, but the people demanded her death as a sorceress. So the prefect sent one of his deputies to judge her. And he ordered her to be burned; but the flames were suddenly extinguished. The executioners then ascended the pile and killed her with a sword. The parents and relatives took away her body and buried it in a cemetery outside the city. And when they assembled at her grave at night to offer devotions, she appeared before them, and said, "Weep not, dry your tears, and rejoice with exceeding joy; for me a throne is prepared by the side of Him whom on earth I preferred to all others, and to whom I am united forever in heaven." And the Christian mourners wiped away their tears, and returned to their homes with joy and thanksgiving].

Cyriacus (Ciriacus), the deacon, together with Largus and Smaragdus and twenty others, suffered in these times. He released from the Devil, Artemia, the daughter of Diocletian; also Jobia, daughter of Sapor the king of the Persians. Then, after forty-five days, they returned, having received from Diocletian much honor. After his (i.e. Diocletian's) death, his son, Maxiamian (Maximianus), ordered those three, together with other Christians, to be placed in prison. Then, by the judgment of Carpasius, he (i.e. Cyriacus) was brought forth and hot pitch was poured over his head. And afterwards, the son of Diocletian ordered that Cyriacus, together with Smaragdus and twenty others, be beheaded. And there were led away with him (i.e. Cyriacus) those of both sexes. And they were decapitated at Rome on the Salarian Road (Via Salaria). Pope Marcellus with Lucina buried the bodies of the martyrs on a farm on the Hostiensian Road (Via Hostiense) at the seventh mile-stone from the city (i.e. Rome) on the sixth of the Ides of August.

Cyriacus, a deacon of Rome, Smaragdus, and Largus were martyred by the sword under Maximian. Tradition (very unhistorical) asserts that Cyriacus converted and baptized Artemia, daughter of Diocletian, and that he was sent by Diocletian to King Sapor, of Persia, to heal his daughter Jobia, possessed with a devil. This he did, and also baptized Jobia, Sapor, and four hundred and thirty of the Persian court.

The last two thirds of this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Gervasius and Protasius (Prothasius), brothers, of Milan, sons of the holy martyr Vitalus, and born at the same time, suffered martyrdom at Milan at this time. Before this, upon the death of their parents, they gave their entire inheritance to the poor. For many years they devoted themselves to good works. Artesius, the governor of the city, was about to go to war. Then the priests of the pagan gods asked him why he did not compel Gervasius and Protasius to worship the idols; so he could not refuse. Therefore Gervasius was beaten to death with scourges loaded with lead; and Protasius was beaten with clubs. At length they were beheaded. Their bodies, still intact, were found many years later by St. Ambrose (Ambrosius) pursuant to a divine revelation, in the same condition as though they had died that very day. These very blessed martyrs were martyred on the 13th day of the Kalends of January.

Gervasius and Protasius, twin brothers, apparently were martyred sometime in the first (Nero is the villain in this account) or second century. Having been sent to Milan, together with Nazarus and Celsus, they were brought before Artesius, who, sharing in the enmity of his master against the Christians, commanded them to sacrifice to his idols. On refusal, he condemned Gervasius to be beaten to death with scourges loaded with lead, and ordered Protasius to be beheaded. A good man, named Philip, carried home their bodies and buried them honorably in his own garden; and they remained undiscovered until Ambrose, in response to a dream, caused them to be dug up. On the second day after their discovery they were borne in solemn procession to the Basilica. They are the patron saints of Milan and of haymakers, and are invoked for the discovery of thieves.

St. George (Georgius) of Cappodocia (Capadocus), was a tribune and a true soldier of Christ. In these times he went from Cappadocia to the city of Diospolis in Persida [Diospolis = Lydda in ancient Palestine (modern day Lod, a mixed Arab-Jewish city ten miles southeast of Tel Aviv). Persida is, perhaps, a misspelling for Persia]. to relieve his fatherland of a dragon at the risk of his own life, and to suffer martyrdom. After slaying the dragon, he was stretched out on a rack, and all his limbs were pulled and his vitals torn. After enduring many tortures he was finally beheaded, as is recorded in history and other writings. Although his very brilliant martyrdom is honored by the Church of God in various ways. And very justly so, for (as Ambrose writes) although acknowledgment and affirmation of the Christian faith remained hidden, this holy martyr alone affirmed the name of the Son of God, and endured torture and martyrdom with the support of divine grace. His sacred head was brought to Venice, and there a church and cloister were erected in his honor. His banner is exhibited with the greatest solemnity in the episcopal city of Bamberg, in Germany. All Christians commemorate his feast day on the 24th of April.

George is, perhaps, the martyr around whom more legends accrued than any other. A sampling of the more famous ones follows.

George was a native of Cappadocia, living in the time of the Emperor Diocletian. He was born of noble parents and was a tribune in the army. In traveling to join his legion he came to a certain city in Libya called Selene. The inhabitants were in great trouble in consequence of the ravages of a monstrous dragon which issued from a neighboring marsh or lake, and devoured the flocks and herds of the people who had taken refuge within the walls; and to prevent him from approaching the city, the air of which was poisoned by its pestiferous breath, they offered him daily two sheep; and when the sheep were exhausted, they were bound to sacrifice two children daily, to save the rest. One day the lot fell upon the king's daughter and she was led forth to the sacrifice, and the gates were shut against her. George was passing by on his steed and he met the maiden in tears. And he engaged to deliver her. After a terrible and prolonged battle he pinned the dragon to the earth with his lance; and he slew the dragon, cutting off its head. All the rewards bestowed upon the victor, George gave to the poor; and he went on his way, and came to Palestine. At this time Diocletian issued his edict against the Christians, and when George saw it posted in public, he was filled with indignation; and he tore it down and trampled it under foot. He was seized and carried before Dacian, the proconsul, and condemned to suffer for eight days the cruelest tortures. He was bound to a wooden cross and his body torn with sharp iron nails. He was burned with torches and salt rubbed into the wounds. He was compelled to drink poison, but it did not affect him. He was bound to a wheel full of sharp blades, but angels broke the wheel. They flung him into a cauldron of boiling lead; and when his executioners believed him subdued, they brought him to the temple to assist in the sacrifice. But he knelt and prayed, and thunder and lightning destroyed the temple and its idols. Then Dacian caused George to be beheaded.

Erasmus, the Campanian bishop, and a brilliant and pious man, left Antioch in fear of the despotism of Diocletian, who ordered that all who would not sacrifice to the idolatrous gods should be subjected to many tortures. And he lived in the wilderness for seven years in prayer and contemplation, receiving his food from the Lord through a raven. Afterwards, in obedience to an angelic voice, he went to the city and relieved many from demons, and with his teachings converted many to Christ. Therefore he was brought before Diocletian, and tortured with leaden scourges and with cudgels; later resin, sulphur, pitch, and oil were poured over him. But Erasmus remained unconsumed. By such a miracle many people were converted from idolatry to Christian faith. Later he was placed in a hard cell and covered with heavy iron weights; but at length was led forth by an angel. Afterwards he was taken by the Emperor Maximian and submerged in a caldron of seething lead, pitch and resin; but he remained unharmed. Through the guardianship of an angel he was taken out of the city at night to the seacoast, and by divine providence he was carried away in a small boat to Formia in Campania. At length he saw the apparition of a crown descending upon him, and he said: Lord, receive my spirit. And so he went to his holy end on the 3rd day of the month of June. His body is said to rest at Gaeta (Caiete) where his head is on display.

Erasmus, according to the Acts of the Martyrs, was a bishop who, on the breaking out of the persecution, retired to Mt. Lebanon, where he lived in a cave, and was fed by a raven which brought him daily a loaf of bread. He was arrested by order of Diocletian, and subjected to various ways. He was then conducted to Gaeta, where he expired peacefully. According to popular belief Erasmus died by having his bowels unwound and coiled upon a windlass, and thus he is represented in some works of art. In Naples he is regarded as the patron of sailors, with his name corrupted into Elmo.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Christopher (Cristoferus), the martyr, a man of erect stature and of unmatched size and strength, suffered death at this time, in the name of Christ, in the city of Samos, in the state of Lycia, in the province of Asia. He was first beaten with iron rods, then burned with flames; and yet remained firm through divine strength. Finally he was slain with arrows, and was beheaded on the 25th day of the month of July. As they say, he carried the Lord Jesus, in the person of an infant, on his shoulders across the water. [The legends surrounding Christopher rival those in number that surround George. Christopher was of the land of Canaan, where he was known as Offero. He was a man of colossal stature, and of terrible aspect. He was proud of his vast bulk and strength, and would serve none other than the greatest king. He traveled far and wide, and finding him, was engaged. And there came a minstrel who sang before the king, and in the course of his story made frequent mention of the Devil. Noting that the king crossed himself every time Satan was mentioned, Christopher inquired the reason. The king told him that he made the sign to preserve him from the power of Satan, fearing he might be overcome and slain by him. And so the great king confessed that there was a greater one than himself. So Christopher in disgust left the king's service to seek the more powerful potentate. Finding him, he entered Satan's service. As he journeyed along with his new master, they came upon a cross by the wayside. And the Evil One trembled and made a great circuit to avoid it. "Upon that cross died Jesus Christ, and when I behold it I must tremble and fly, for I fear him." So Christopher left the Devil, seeking Christ. From a hermit he learned that this Christ was the great king of heaven and earth, and that if he would serve him, he must fast and submit to other hard duties. Refusing to fast for fear of losing his strength, the hermit directed him to a certain river, stony and wide and deep, and often swelled by rains, and in which many people perished in attempting to pass over. "Since you will neither fast nor pray, go to that river, and use your strength to aid and save those who struggle with the stream, and those who are about to perish." This service pleased the giant; and having rooted up a palm tree from the forest, he used it for a staff to support his steps. He went to the stream, and on his shoulders he carried the weak across it, and he never wearied of his task. And the Lord was pleased. "Behold this strong man, who knows not yet the way to worship me, yet has found the way to serve me!" And Christopher built a rude hut beside the stream. One night he heard the plaintive voice of a child, which asked to be carried over the stream. And he found the child. He lifted it on his strong shoulders, and took his staff and entered the stream. The waters rose higher and higher, and the waves roared, and the wind blew; and the infant on his shoulders became heavier, until it seemed to him he must sink under the weight; and he began to fear; but at length he reached shore. And he asked the child, "Who are you? Had I carried the whole world on my shoulders, the burden could not have been heavier!" And the child replied: "Wonder not, for you have not only borne the world, but him who made the world . . . I accept your service. Plant your staff in the ground, and it shall put forth leaves and fruit." As Christopher did so, the dry staff flourished as a palm-tree in season. But the child vanished, and Christopher fell on his face, and confessed and worshipped Christ. Leaving that place he came to Samos, a city of Lycia, where he found many Christians who were tortured and persecuted; and he encouraged them and cheered them. For this he was seized and brought before the king, who ordered him to prison for confessing Christ. At length he was tortured, and finally beheaded].

Cosmo (Cosmas) and Damian (Damianus), the Christians, noted physicians, were imprisoned at this time. They were submerged in the sea, burned, stoned, shot, and at length beheaded. The blessed Cosmo, Damian, Antimus, Leontius, and Euprepus were martyred on the 27th day of September. [According to legend, Cosmo and Damian were brothers, and Arabians by birth, who dwelt in Aegae, a city in Cilicia. Their father died during their infancy, and their pious mother Theodora, brought them up with all diligence, and in the practice of every Christian virtue. They lived in the greatest abstinence, distributing their goods to the poor. They studied medicine and surgery, that they might prescribe for the sick, and relieve the sufferings of the wounded and infirm. They became noted physicians. They ministered to rich and poor alike, and even to animals. At length Diocletian and Maximian came to the throne. Those physicians, professing themselves Christians, were seized by Lycias, the proconsul of Arabia, and cast in prison. At first they were thrown into the sea, but an angel saved them; then into the fire, but the fire refused to consume them. They were then bound on two crosses and stoned, but the stones never reached them. Finally, they were beheaded. They are the patron saints of pharmacists, doctors, surgeons, dentists, barbers and hairstylists].

Methodius, bishop first of the city of Olympus and afterwards of Tyre, in these times in the state of Calchis at the Negropontus (as the divine Jerome writes) was crowned with martyrdom. He was a highly learned man, and left many writings behind, especially his text On the Creation of the World, revealed to him in prison. He died on the 14th day of the Kalends in October. He also composed a brilliant speech against Porphyry as well as books such as his Symposium of Ten Virgins.

Methodius (d. 311 CE), bishop of Olympus in Lycia, and perhaps afterwards of Tyre (though no other account besides Jerome mentions this), wrote a treatise on the Resurrection against Origen, another against Porphyry, and several other works. His only surviving work is his Symposium of Ten Virgins, written in imitation of Plato's Symposium. Unlike Plato's speakers, who each describe and praise love, Methodius' ten young ladies proclaim the glories and excellence of virginity.

The German edition of the Chronicle streamlines its entry for Methodius thus: "Methodius, bishop of the cities of Olympus and Tyre, was slain in these times at Negropontus. He was a highly learned man, and left many learned writings behind."

Gorgonius, a Roman soldier, was in these times living in Nicomedia. And he was strongly denouncing the persecution under Diocletian that was especially being brought against Christians. Captured by the emperor himself, he was ordered to be hanged, torn to pieces, and most cruelly roasted on a grill—but still he survived. On the Ides of September they killed him with a rope. Then his body was buried at Rome on the Via Latina.

Gorgonius: Diocletian having discovered that Peter, one of his officers, was a Christian, ordered him tortured. When Gorgonius and Dorotheus, two other officers, remonstrated with the emperor, he ordered them executed. Eusebius says that Peter was scourged, and as he bore this without showing anguish, Diocletian ordered him broiled on a gridiron. Gorgonius and Dorotheus were finally hung.

The German edition of the Chronicle streamlines its entry for Gorgonius thus: "Gorgonius, a Roman soldier, was in these times imprisoned by Diocletian at Nicomedia, and hanged, torn to pieces, roasted on a grill, and at length strangled with a rope."

Marcus and Marcellianus, brothers and Roman citizens, were arrested by a certain Duke Fabianus under this madness of persecution, and were immediately tied to a tree trunk, and sharp pegs were driven into their feet. And when, at length, they would not renounce the name of Jesus Christ, they were pierced with lances. Through these wounds they migrated to the heavens on the 14th of the Kalends of July.

Legend states that Marcus and Marcellinus (286 CE), twin brothers of a noble Roman family, had been converted and baptized in their youth and were married. When Diocletian ascended the throne, and before he issued his edict of persecution, the Christians in the capital and elsewhere suffered from popular tumults, or the ill will of cruel magistrates. Marcus and Marcellinus were imprisoned and condemned. Their friends obtained a respite to prevail upon them to submit to the state religion. For this purpose they were removed from prison to the house of Nicostratus, the registrar. However, through the efforts of Sebastian, who visited them and encouraged them, they remained steadfast, and their parents as well as Nicostratus and Chromatius were converted to Christianity. They were afterwards betrayed, ordered to be tied up and their feet to be nailed to a wooden post, and run through with lances.

The German edition of the Chronicle streamlines its entry for Marcus and Marcellianus thus: "Marcus and Marcellianus, brothers and Roman citizens, were imprisoned because of their Christian faith, tied to a tree trunk, and sharp pegs were driven into their feet. And when, at length, they would not renounce the name of Christ Jesus Christ, they were pierced with lances."

Maximus and Claudius, very illustrious men, were at this time, together with the noble wife and two sons of the former, in the city of Hostia, taken in hand by the people of the court of Diocletian and sent into exile; and at length were burned in the name of Christ on the 12th day of the Kalends of March. And thus by that burning they offered to God the sacrifice of their martyrdom.

Legend states that Maximus and Claudius were brothers, the former, count of the privy purse to Diocletian, while the latter held a post of distinction about the person of the emperor. They were of noble family, and when Galerius Maximianus, the Caesar, had lost his wife, Valeria, daughter of Diocletian, the emperor resolved on finding another wife for his son-in-law. Haring of the beauty and modesty of Susanna, daughter of Gabinus, he sent Claudius to the father to ask her hand. But Susanna had dedicated herself to Jesus Christ. Claudius and his brother Maximus calmly informed the emperor that the maiden preferred a heavenly crown to an earthly one. Diocletian, in fury, caused the brothers and their families to be hurried to Cumae, where they were burnt alive, and their ashes cast into the river. Gabinus and his daughter Susanna were kept in prison to suffer later.

The German edition of the Chronicle streamlines its entry for Maximus and Claudius thus: "Maximus and Claudius, the illustrious men, were at this time, together with the wife and two sons of the former, in the city of Hostia, taken in hand by the people of the court of Diocletian and sent into exile; and at length were burned in the name of Christ on the 18th day of February."

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) GEORGE

George (Georgius) is represented by a new and ornate woodcut portraying the saint in an elaborate coat of mail. However, instead of a helmet he wears a chaplet over his flowing tresses, and from the chaplet proceeds a plume. In his right hand he carries a spear with the banner of the resurrection. Before him lies the dragon, across which he has extended his left arm and hand, as though the ferocious creature were a pet dog. From under his left arm proceeds upward what would appear to be the dragon's tail, twisting into a shape reminiscent of the number 8.

(B) ERASMUS

Erasmus is portrayed as a bishop. In his left hand he holds the crozier, and in his right, a windlass symbolism of his martyrdom, brought about by having his bowels unwound and coiled upon a windlass.

(C) CHRISTOPHER

Christopher (Cristoferus) is portrayed as a sturdy character in flowing garb. The little Christ child, also in voluminous habit, confidently sits on his shoulder, with a finger of his right hand extended over the saint in blessing. St. Christopher, although portrayed only to the waist, is proceeding forward, firmly holding his rugged staff, a small tree trunk, with both hands. The garments of men and Child are fluttering in a strong wind, and the expression on the saint's face is that of one sustaining a heavy burden. The Christ-child wears a floriated nimbus; the saint none at all.

(D) COSMO AND DAMIAN

Cosmo (Cosmas) and Damian (Damianus), brothers, and both physicians, are in dual portrait, each clad in medieval cloaks and headgear. As symbols, one carries an apothecary's mortar, the other the usual bottle used by medieval physicians for examination of the patient's urine.

(E) METHIDIUS

Methodius, the bishop, holds the palm-branch of martyrdom (in the German edition he is portrayed in the raiment of a medieval doctor, and wears a fez-shaped cap).

(F) MARCUS AND MARCELLIANUS

Marcus and Marcellianus are represented by a single portrait (in the German edition they are represented by a dual portrait).

(G) MAXIMUS AND CLAUDIUS

Maximus and Claudius are represented by a dual portrait (in the German edition they are represented by a single portrait).

Folio CXXV recto

Sebastian (Sebastianus), a very illustrious man, was an officer of the highest rank under Diocletian, and the soldiers honored him as a father. He was a true lover of God, and at this time, with his learning sustained many martyrs, particularly Marcus and Marcellianus, the brothers, and their parents, and comforted them in their fears. Without fear he acknowledged himself a Christian. He brought speech to the dumb wife of Nicostratus, and converted them both to the Lord. When Diocletian heard this he caused Sebastian to be bound in the middle of the field, and the soldiers to shoot at him as at a target. And so they filled him with arrows until he looked as rough as a hedgehog; and they left him for dead. But in a short time he came back to health, and to the emperors he made declaration of their unjust persecutions. They caused him to be beaten with clubs at Rome until he died. The people of Diocletian's court threw him into a secret chamber. Through a vision he was disclosed to the blessed Lucina, and buried in an honorable place. This Sebastian, beside his Christian faith, was a man of complete foresight, truthful speech, righteousness, wise counsel, and faithful dealings, and renowned for his sound morals. The divine Sebastian suffered martyrdom at Rome on the 13th of the Kalends of February. [Sebastian was a native of Narbonne, in Gaul, and the son of noble parents, who had held high offices in the empire. At an early age he was promoted to the command of a company in the Praetorian Guard, so that he was always near the person of the emperor, and held in special favor. Secretly he was a Christian, but his faith rendered him more loyal to his masters; more faithful in his engagements; more mild, more charitable, while his favor with his princes, and his popularity with the troops, enabled him to protect those who were persecuted for Christ's sake, and to convert many to the truth. Among his friends were two young men of noble family, soldiers like himself, Marcus and Marcellinus. Being Christians, they were condemned to undergo torture, which they endured with unshaken firmness, and were afterward led forth to death. Sebastian, neglecting his own safety, strengthened and confirmed them in their faith; and although they were saved at this time, were denounced a few months later, and together with the whole Christian community were put to death. At length it was Sebastian's turn. Diocletian ordered him bound to a stake and shot to death with arrows. The archers left him for dead. In the middle of the night, Irene, the widow of one of his martyred friends, took away his body to bury it honorably; but it was found that none of the arrows had pierced him in a vital part, and that he yet breathed. They carried him to her house and dressed his wounds; and he recovered. He was counseled to flee from Rome, but instead he went to the palace and reproached the emperor for his intolerance and cruelty. In a rage Diocletian had him seized and clubbed to death, and his body thrown into the Cloaca Maxima ('Biggest Sewer'), Rome's (and one of the world's earliest) sewage systems (the earlier emperor Elagabalus also suffered a similar fate). But a Christian lady, named Lucina, found means to recover his body, and interred it secretly in the catacombs].

Lucia, a maiden of Sicily, among other virgins of the same island the most prominent, was at this time betrothed by her mother to a renowned youth. But when Lucia had seen the miracles of Saint Agatha, she asked her mother to no longer call her the spouse of the youth, and in haste she gave her inheritance to the widows and the poor. For this reason her husband denounced her before the court as a Christian and accused her of dealings contrary to the law. And the judge advised her to sacrifice to the idolatrous gods, saying, If you will not do this, I will cause you to be put into a public house with prostitutes; and he arranged to have this done. Shortly after that she said, The body cannot be defiled without the consent of the mind; and if against my will you cause me to be violated, chastity will be a double crown. But through the help of the Holy Spirit she became so heavy that she could not be removed from the spot. The judge caused a great fire to be made beside her, but the judge became so frightened that his friend drove a sword through her neck. And thus on the Ides of December she gave up her spirit. And through her suffering and holiness the city of Syracuse was especially adorned. [Legend recounts that Lucia (in English 'Lucy'), a noble and virtuous young girl, lived with her widowed mother in the city of Syracuse. She had been early instructed in Christianity, and secretly dedicated her virginity to Christ; but her mother did not know it. At fourteen she was betrothed by her relatives to a youth of the same city, noble and wealthy, but a pagan. Suffering from a grievous disorder, her mother made a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Agatha, and Lucy accompanied her. There Lucy saw St. Agatha in a vision, and the vision addressed her as "my sister-handmaid of Christ." And the mother was healed. After this Lucy secured her mother's consent to remain a virgin, and entreated that her dowry might be given to the poor. So Lucy sold all their possessions and gave them to the sick, the widows and orphans. And her betrothed became enraged when he learned this, and denounced her to the governor as being a Christian. When she refused to sacrifice to the gods, the governor ordered her to be carried to a brothel and treated with indignity and humbled to his will. And she said, "My body is in your power; but know that there can be neither sin nor shame to which the mind does not consent."]

Vitus, a child out of Sicily, together with Modestus, his tutor, and Crescentia his nurse, suffered martyrdom in the island of Sicily. As a Christian believer, at the age of twelve years, he gave his estate to the needy. He would not follow his pagan father in the worship of idols, and for this reason suffered severe punishment at the hands of Valerianus the judge. Then, by means of an angelic warning, he, together with Modestus and Crescentia, shipped to the land of Tonagritarus; and there they remained for some time, unknown and in prayer. They released the son of Diocletian from demons. By him Vitus was asked to worship the idols, and refusing to do so, he was placed in irons and imprisoned. And afterwards, because they remained steadfast in their faith, they were laid upon a mass of seething resin and pitch; but they remained uninjured. Later they were hung upon a gallows, and so stretched that, with the bones separated, their inner organs could be seen. There was a great earthquake, and an angel of God released them, and led them to the river Siler (Syler). There, while praying, they made their way to the Lord. He collected their flowering bodies and buried them with spices. They suffered their prophesied martyrdoms on the 17th day of the Kalends of July. [The legends concerning Vitus or Vito claim that he was the son of a noble Sicilian. And although his parents were pagans, his nurse Crescentia, and his foster-father Modestus, were secretly Christians. And it was the latter two who brought him up in the faith, and caused him to be baptized. At the age of 12 he openly professed himself a Christian to the great indignation of his father, and the cruel governor Valerian, who attempted to subdue his constancy by the usual terror and tortures. He was beaten and shut up in a dungeon; but his father, looking through the keyhole, beheld him dancing with seven beautiful angels; and he was so amazed and dazzled by their celestial radiance, that he became blind in the same moment, and only recovered his sight by the intercession of his son. But his heart being hardened, he again persecuted Vitus, and treated him cruelly; therefore the youth fled with his nurse and Modestus, and crossed the sea to Italy in a little boat, an angel steering at the helm. But soon after their arrival they were accused before the court of the Emperor Diocletian, plunged into a caldron of boiling oil, and thus received the crown of martyrdom. Vitus became the patron saint of dancers and actors, and was invoked against the nervous affection commonly called St. Vitus' Dance].

Afra (Affra) was a daughter of the king of Cyprus. He was defeated in a battle. For that reason, while still young, she went with her mother Hilaria from their home to Rome. And Hilaria, her mother, gave her up to the goddess Venus for the attainment of her favors. Sine this Venus was a woman of Cyprus. On account of her beauty it was said that she was a goddess and a temple was built for her on Cyprus. Afterwards they came to Augsburg (Augustum), and there Afra gave herself up to vile uses and carnal business. During the time of the Diocletian persecution the bishop Narcissus came into her house, having no knowledge of her way of life, for purposes of prayer, as was his custom. Afra wondered about this unusual guest. But when she recognized him as a Christian bishop, she confessed herself a vile woman. And she was drawn away from her vile mode of life and was baptized. Dionysius, the brother of Hilarius, there himself was made a bishop. Afterwards she was seized by Gaius, the judge, and given her choice to sacrifice to the gods or endure great punishment. And as she refused to sacrifice, she was led to an island in the river Lech (Lici), not far from Augusta, and there she was tied to a tree, and burned. And as the fire was lighted she gave praise and thanks to God. Afterwards Hilaria, Digna, Eunomia and Eutropia were also burned because of their constancy in the faith. And the blessed Afra suffered (her martyrdom) on the seventh of the Ides of August.

Afra is another interesting, though somewhat perplexing, martyr. First, there may be two of her, for the Brescians honor, as their patroness, a Saint Afra. With regard to the identity of the saint, there is some inexplicable confusion. We are here concerned, not with the patron saint of the Brescians, but with the patroness of Augsburg (Augusta). She was a woman of that city who had for a long time followed the profession of courtesan; and it happened that a certain holy man whose name was Narcissus, flying from the persecution which affected the Christians in the reign of Aurelian, took refuge in the home of Afra without knowing that she was abandoned to sin. When she found out that he was a Christian priest, she was overcome with fear and respect, and by a feeling of shame for her profession. He took the opportunity to exhort her to repentance. She listened to him, weeping, and fell at his feet, entreating to be baptized. He, knowing that Christ had never rejected a repentant sinner, administered baptism, and assured her of forgiveness.

And Afra had three handmaidens, who like herself, had led a dissolute life. She brought them to the feet of the Christian priest, and begged him to instruct them also in the way of salvation. Meanwhile those who were in pursuit of the priest came to search for him in the dwelling of Afra; but she concealed him, first in her own house, and then in that of her mother Hilaria; and by her help he afterward escaped to his own country, which was Spain.

But the idolators seized upon Afra, and accused her of having assisted in the escape of a Christian, and of being a Christian herself. The judge, whose name was Gaius, and who had known her former profession, was astonished at the modesty and dignity with which she replied to his questions, and acknowledged herself to be a follower of Christ. And continuing further in her faith, she was condemned to be burned alive. So they tied her to a stake, and heaped round her a pile of vine-branches. Then she lifted up her eyes to heaven and prayed. Her spirit departed, and she was carried to heaven by angels. A few days afterward her mother Hilaria, and her three maidens, Digna, Eunomia and Eutropia, also perished for their faith.

Pantaleon, an illustrious man and one who was quite learned in the art of medicine, was himself crucified for the sake of Christ at this time in the city of Nicomedia. He was the son of a senator, and while still a boy learning about medicine. Taken to the palace by his teacher, he was praised for his beauty. To him Hermolaus the priest was promising that if he would believe in the Christ, he would be able to heal without medicine. He (i.e., Pantaleon) was afterwards baptized by him (i.e., Hermolaus). In the presence of his father he made a blind man to see; and he converted both to the faith. Maximianus ordered him to be brought before him, and there he healed a man of the gout. Afterwards, for the sake of Christ he was put on a rack and lamentably burned. Then he was set in a cauldron of seething lead. But the Lord appeared and the lead cooled. At length he was thrown to wild beasts; yet they did not harm him. Seeing this, many were converted to the Christian faith, and these the emperor ordered beheaded. Finally Pantaleon himself, with his master Hermolaus and others completed their martyrdom by the blow of the sword on the 5th of the Kalends of August. [According to legend Pantaleon (Panthaleon) was born at Nicomedia in Bithynia, the son of a pagan father and a Christian mother, and having made himself master of all the learning and science of the Greeks, he attached himself particularly to the study of medicine. He became the favorite of the Emperor Maximian. At court he was in danger of forgetting all his Christian precepts that he had learned from his mother. But a venerable Christian priest named Hermolaus undertook to instruct him, and Pantaleon became an ardent Christian. When the persecution of the Christians broke out, knowing he could not conceal himself, Pantaleon prepared for his doom. In the midst of his work of healing the sick and the blind, and restoring the dead, he was accused before the emperor, and was beheaded with his aged master Hermolaus. But Pantaleon they first bound to an olive tree, and according to legend, no sooner had his blood bathed in the roots of the tree than it burst forth into leaves and fruit].

ILLUSTRATIONS

(A) SEBASTIAN

Sebastian (Sebianus) is represented in fur cap and medieval robes. He holds a group of arrows, symbolic of his martyrdom.

(B) LUCIA

Lucia (Lucia Martyr) is represented with a nimbus and crown of martyrdom. A sword pierces her throat from left to right, as she (somewhat disturbingly) maintains her attitude of prayer.

(C) VITUS

Vitus, patron saint of dancers and stage-players, had a palm branch in his right hand. In his left reposes a book upon which a cock struts. The origin of this bird as one of his attributes is a disputed point. It appears that from very ancient times it was the custom to offer up a cock to him; and so late as the beginning of the 18th century this was done by the common people of Prague.

(D) AFRA

Afra (Affra and Hilaria) is a single portrait of Afra alone. She appears bound to a narrow pillar. It is symbolic of her martyrdom at the stake.

(E) PANTALEON

Pantaleon, physician and martyr, is portrayed with his hands above his head. Through his hands a huge nail has been driven, which would seem to pierce his head also, although the legend is that his hands were nailed to the tree at which he suffered martyrdom.

Folio CXXV verso

Dorothea, a glorious virgin, of the city of Caesarea, in the province of Cappadocia, was seized at this time for Christ's sake, hung on a gallows, beaten severely with fists, and finally beheaded. Upon her passing out, she was laughed at by Theophilus the scholar, who said to her, Ha! You bride of the Lord, send us roses from the paradise of your bridegroom. Dorothea appeared to him as a child carrying a small basket containing three apples and three roses. These he soon received, and he was amazed at this, for it was cold in the month of February; and he was converted, and after severe tortures he was beheaded. [Legend recounts that Dorothea was a noble virgin who dwelt in the province of Cappadocia, and in the city of Caesarea. None in the city compared to her in beauty and grace of person. She was a Christian, serving God day and night with prayers and fasting. Sapritius (or Fabricius), the governor of the city, was a severe persecutor of the Christians, and hearing of the maiden and of her beauty, he ordered her brought before him. Being ordered to serve the pagan gods or die, she answered mildly, "Be it so; the sooner shall I stand in the presence of Him whom I most desire to behold." Then the presence of Him whom I most desire to behold." Then the governor asked whom she meant, and she replied "I mean the Son of God, my espoused! His dwelling is Paradise; by his side are joys eternal; and in his garden grow celestial fruits and roses that never fade." The governor ordered her back to her dungeon, sending two women to convert her to idolatry; but they were converted to Christianity instead. Then the governor, furious, ordered these two other maidens to be burned, compelling Dorothea to witness their torments. But Dorothea stood by, bravely encouraging the victims in their faith. Then she herself was condemned to cruel torture; and she was finally beheaded. When being led forth to her death, Theophilus, a young lawyer of the city, called to her "Ha! fair maiden, are you going to join your bridegroom? Send me, I pray you, of the fruits and flowers of that same garden of which you have spoken: I am eager to taste of them!" And she promised to grant his request. Coming to the place of execution, she knelt down and prayed; and suddenly there stood up beside her a beautiful boy, holding a basket containing three apples and three fresh-gathered roses, and these she asked the lad to carry to Theophilus. And so the angel (for such the boy was) carried them to Theophilus, with the result that he became a Christian, following Dorothea in martyrdom].

Eleutherius, a certain very illustrious soldier, was martyred in this persecution, with numberless persons, at Nicomedia. Of these some were burned, some beheaded, and some thrown into the sea. After this Eleutherius had been tortured in every limb, and yet became stronger and stronger; he was at length, like gold, proven by fire, and with the crown of martyrdom entered Paradise on the sixth of the Nones of October. [Legend recounts that when the palace of Domitian at Nicomedia having caught fire, Eleutherius, a soldier, and some other Christians were blamed. Of these some were decapitated, some drowned, and others burned alive].

Sergius and Bachus, very noble men, distinguished at the court of Maximian (Maximianum), were accused in this persecution; and they were taken to the temple of Jupiter to worship the idolatrous gods. When they refused to do so, they were stripped of their military uniform, and Bachus was beaten with rawhides until his blood flowed and his abdomen was torn and his vitals exposed. His corpse was protected against the wild animals by birds, until he was buried. And as Sergius would not permit himself to be drawn away (from his faith) he was shod with shoes with nails driven into them, and in these he was compelled to run before a wagon for many miles. At last, still firm in the Christian faith, he was beheaded on the Nones of October. [Sergius and Bachus were, according to the martyrologies, officers in the household of the emperor, Maximian. One day, when the emperor went into the temple of Jupiter to offer sacrifice, he noticed that these officers had remained outside. Suspecting the reason, he ordered them to join him in adoring the god. They refused, and Maximian sent them to Antiochus, governor of the province of Augusta Euphratorum, and there Bachus was scourged until he died; and Sergius, after having been made to walk in boots with nails in the soles so as to tear his feet, was executed by the sword. Rome has a church dedicated to Sergius and Bachus].

The four crowned ones, namely, Severinus, Severianus, Carpophorus (Carpoferus) and Victorinus, refused to sacrifice to the idolatrous god Aesculapius at the command of Diocletian, and therefore they were beaten to death with scourges containing leaden balls, and their bodies were thrown to the dogs in the streets. They were buried at night by St. Sebastian and Pope Melchiades. And since it was not possible to discover their names, thus on the seventh of the Ides of November they are thus honored. Afterwards their names were revealed. [The Four Crowned Martyrs, who died on November 8, 303, were famous wood- and stone-carvers, who would not take pagan commissions, and in consequence were flogged to death, along with five of their pupils or converts. They watch over the work of masons and sculptors].

Fides, a very holy virgin, in the city of Agenus, was urged by Dacianus, the judge, by flattery and threats, to sacrifice to the pagan gods. Declining to do so she was stretched upon an iron grill over a coal fire; still she remained constant in her martyrdom, and in consequence many people were converted to the Christian faith. When Saint Caprasius (who through fear had concealed himself) saw the martyrdom of this virgin, he prayed God to give her victory; and he saw a snow-white dove descend from heaven and place a brilliant crown of gold and precious gems on her head; and the fire was extinguished. And so he offered himself up as a Christian, and he, together with Primus and Felicianus, and with the virgin Fides, were all beheaded.

Euphemia, a very noble virgin, together with 70 others, was arrested in the city of Chalcedon in Asia by a proconsul whose name was Priscus, because they would not worship the pagan god Mars. And so they were threatened with every form of torture, all of which for the sake of Christ they steadfastly endured. Their tortures included: imprisonment, beatings, the wheel, fires, the weights of sharp stones, wild beasts, lashings, hot-irons. And, torn apart by a wild beast, she gave back her immaculate spirit to God. Her mother Theodora and her father buried her body on the sixth of the Kalends of October.

Euphemia, whom the stories say was famed for her beauty and fortitude, is one of those whom the Eastern Orthodox Church has distinguished with the epitaph Great. All that is known of her rests on the description of a picture, in which she is portrayed as a person of beauty, grace, modesty and gravity, and attired in a plain brown mantle, worn in Greece by philosophers and expressing a renunciation of worldly pleasures and vanities. She appears before the judge, Priscus, between two soldiers, one dragging her forward, the other pushing her from behind. In another part of the picture she is being tortured by two executioners, one seizing her long hair and pulling back her head, the other striking her on the mouth with a mallet. In the background is the interior of the dungeon. Euphemia, seated on the earth, raises her hands to heaven and prays for mercy and strength to bear her sufferings. Near the prison is a pile of burning sticks, in the midst of which she stands extending her arms to heaven.

The German edition of the Chronicle streamlines its entry for Euphemia thus: "Euphemia, a noble virgin, together with 70 others, was taken in the city of Chalcedon, and because they would not worship the heathen god Mars, they were threatened with every form of torture; but they remained firm unto death."

Felix, bishop in Apulia, together with Adauctus and Januarius the priests, and Fortunatus and Septimus the lectors, after having been long imprisoned during this period, traveled through all Africa and Sicily, risking many dangers, and finally, on the ninth day of the Kalends of November, they completed (their martyrdom) by being put to death by the sword. []

Also another Felix and Fortunatus, brothers, during this persecution at Aquileia, were set up on a gallows, and executioners held hot stones against their sides; but by divine power those were extinguished. At length seething oil was poured over them, but they remained unharmed. After their judgment had been given, on the third day of the Ides of June they were beheaded. [With Felix and Fortunatus we are on somewhat shakier ground than normal. One account is the following. In 295 CE the Emperor Diocletian issued his edict of Persecution against the Church of Christ, and not long afterwards the prefect, Euphemius, came to Aquileia to examine and punish the Christians there. And when he entered the city he went to the temple of Jupiter and there offered sacrifices, and then sent a herald to call all the citizens together there. One of the magistrates of the town informed the prefect that two brothers, Christians, had come there. The brothers were arrested and brought before Euphemius. Having confessed their faith and refused to worship idols, they were tortured and finally killed with the sword].

Folio CXXVI recto

Margaret (Margaretha), a very beautiful virgin of Antioch, born of pagan parents, and consigned to the care of a nurse, voluntarily permitted herself to be baptized. When, after the death of her mother, she was attending the sheep of her nurse, and now being fifteen years of age and had become quite beautiful, Olybrius (Olibrius) became enamored of her. But when he learned that she was a Christian, he imprisoned her. And as she was opposed to worshipping the pagan gods, she was hung up, beaten with rods, and her flesh torn with iron claws. Then she was thrown back into prison. There the Devil appeared to her in the form of a dragon, as though he wished to swallow her. But she made the sign of the cross, and he disappeared. Afterwards the judge ordered her to be beheaded [The German edition of the adds to this sentence the phrase "on the 12th day of July."]; and she prayed for mankind and for her persecutors, and for the pregnant women who call upon her in the time of childbirth. She completed her martyrdom on the 13th day of the Ides of July. [Legend says that Margaret was the daughter of a pagan priest of Antioch, named Theodosius; and in her infancy, being of poor health, she was sent to a nurse in the country. This woman, who was secretly a Christian, brought up Margaret in her faith. The maid, while employed in keeping the few sheep of her nurse, meditated on the mysteries of the gospels, and devoted herself to the service of Christ. One day the governor of Antioch, whose name was Olybrius, saw her and was captivated by her beauty. He commanded her to be taken to his palace, and decided that, if she were of free birth, to make her his wife. But Margaret scorned his offer, declaring herself the servant of Christ. Her father and all her relatives were struck with horror at this revelation. They fled, leaving her in the power of the governor, who endeavored to subdue her constancy by the most painful torments. They were so terrible that the tyrant himself, unable to endure the sight, covered his face with his robe; but Margaret did not flinch beneath them. They then dragged her to a dungeon, where Satan in the form of a terrible dragon, came upon her with his inflamed and hideous mouth wide open, and sought to terrify and confound her; but she held up a cross, and he fled before it. Or, according to the more popular version, he swallowed her up alive, but immediately burst; and she emerged unhurt. He returned in the form of a man to tempt her further, but she overcame him, and placing her foot on his head, forced him to confess his foul wickedness. She was again brought before the tyrant, and again refusing to abjure her faith, she was further tortured. Finally she was beheaded. And as they led her forth to death, she thanked and glorified God that her suffering was ended; and she prayed that those who invoked her in the pains of childbirth should find help through the merit of her sufferings, and in memory of her deliverance from the womb of the great dragon].

Maximilian (Maximilianus), of the city of Ceyla, born of noble and devout parents, a highly learned and virtuous man, was upon the death of St. Quirinus, the Laurian bishop, elected bishop by common consent. This was in the time of the two emperors, Carus and Numerianus. He was taken to the Temple of Mars, where he refused to worship the idolatrous gods, and was therefore martyred by the people of the court at Ceyla, outside the walls, in the Year of Christ 289, on the fourth day of the Ides of October. The Duke of Bavaria brought him to Passau, where he is commemorated.

Blasius, who flourished at this time in all piety and mildness, was elected bishop by the Christians in Sebaste, a city of Cappadocia. To escape the cruel persecutions, Blasius fled into a cave in the mountains, frequented by wild animals. These he healed, and the ravens brought him food. Hearing of this the judge ordered him to be brought before him. On his way Blasius performed miracles. He was placed in a dungeon, and because he scorned the gods, he was hung on a timber and his body was torn with an iron comb. Seven Christian women gathered up his blood. Blasius and two little children of these women were beheaded. [Blasius (also Blasé, Blyse, or Blaise), was bishop of Sebaste, a city of Cappadocia, in Asia Minor. He spent a great part of his time in retirement on a hill not far from the city, where he withdrew, after the duties of his office were finished, to be alone with God. During the Diocletian persecution of the Christians he lay concealed in his retreat for some time; but he was finally brought before Agricolaus, governor of the province, and confessing himself a Christian, was thrown into prison. After enduring many tortures, he was killed in the beginning of the fourth century. Some historians refer this event to the year 316, under the reign of Licinius].

Juliana, a very illustrious virgin of Como, a city of Gaul, suffered many cruel tortures and punishments there at this time. Afterwards she publicly fought with the Devil, overcoming him most gloriously. Then, overcoming fiery flames, burning oil, and the iron wheel with its sharp blades, she at last carried off the palm of martyrdom by having her head lopped off on the 14th day of the Kalends of March.

Primus and Felician (Felicanus), Roman spiritual men, having refused to sacrifice to idolatrous gods, were beheaded in this persecution after enduring many tortures. They attained the crown of martyrdom on the 5th day of the Ides of June. [Primus and Felician, were Roman citizens who lived as pagans until converted to Christianity. In the persecution of Diocletian and Maximian they were brought before the emperor, who invited them to offer incense to the gods; but they refused, and Primus was sent to prison, while the governor, Promotus, made every attempt to break the constancy of Felician by promises. Failing in this, the magistrate ordered his hands and feet transfixed with nails like those of the God whom he adored. He then told Primus that Felician had obeyed the emperors and had sacrificed. Disbelieving him, Primus remained firm and the governor ordered him to be beaten and his sides burned with torches. Wearying of torturing the brothers, he ordered their heads struck off].

Pamphilius (Pamphilus), a Greek priest, and a relative of Eusebius of Caesarea, was a distinguished teacher of the Holy Scriptures. In these times, on the first day of June, he was martyred in the city of Caesarea, in Palestine. [Pamphilius, a native of Berytus (Beirut), and of rich and honorable family, studied in the famous schools of his native town, and attained great proficiency in every branch of learning then taught. Later he moved to Alexandria, and spent large sums in forming an extensive library, which he bestowed on the Church of Caesarea in Palestine where he took up his abode and established a school of sacred literature. To his labors the church was indebted for a correct edition of the Bible, which he transcribed himself. He held Origen in high esteem, and during his imprisonment wrote an apology for him in five books. He also wrote an abridgement or exposition of Acts. He was remarkable for his charity, humility, and austere life. His eloquence made him especially obnoxious to the pagans. In 307 the governor of Palestine had him apprehended, tortured and imprisoned for nearly two years. The governor's successor ordered him racked and executed on February 16, 309. Eusebius of Caesarea, the historian, who has written the life of Pamphilius, and who had been his fellow-prisoner, out of respect for his memory took the surname Pamphili].

Quintin (Quintinus), a soldier of Gaul, suffered martyrdom at the hands of the emperor Maximian (Maximianus) on the last day of October. Through angelic revelation his body was discovered intact fifty-five years later. [Quintin (Quintinus), son of Zeno, a Roman senator, held a high command in the Roman army, but was converted to the Christian faith. According to legend he was imprisoned and cruelly tortured. An angel broke his chains, and he went into the market place and began to preach, converting many people. He was again arrested and tortured, but the torturers left him uninjured. Two iron spits were then run through him from his head to his feet, and finally his head was struck off. His body was thrown into the Somme, where it remained for fifty years under water. A lady named Eusebia recovered it, built an oratory for it, and this formed the nucleus of the church and town of Saint Quintin].

Rufus (Ruffus), highly renowned Roman soldier, was subjected to much oppression with his entire household by the emperor Diocletian, and became a martyr of Christ. Although many other Christians were slain at this time, we have fixed upon only the most renowned and distinguished.

Marcellinus [Marcellinus' name is spelled 'Arcellinus' in the Beloit College copy of the since space was left for the initial letter 'M' to be painted in later], a Roman, succeeded Pope Caius in the time of Diocletian and Maximian. He was taken prisoner in the sixth year of his pontificate, during the Diocletian persecution, and by threats was moved to worship strange gods. But before long he took account of himself, assembled a council of 180 bishops at Sinuessa in Campania, and there he appeared in dusty and hairy raiment, requesting punishment for his inconstancy. But in the entire council no one was found to condemn him; for all said that Peter had sinned in such a situation, and in tears had endured the penalty of his sin. Marcellinus returned to Rome and angrily upbraided Diocletian who had urged him to sacrifice to the pagan gods. And for that reason Marcellinus, with Claudius, Cyrinus, and Antoninus, all Christians, were led to martyrdom by order of Diocletian. On the way Marcellinus reminded Marcellus, the priest, not to obey the commands of Diocletian in matters of the faith, and not to bury his (Marcellinus's) body, because it was not worthy of burial, inasmuch as he had denied the Savior of the World. However, the bodies of all of them were buried after thirty-six days. Marcellinus sat (in office) 9 years, 2 months and 16 days; and the chair rested twenty-five days. [Marcellinus succeeded Caius as bishop of Rome in 296. It is said that during the Diocletian persecution Marcellinus under threats offered incense to pagan idols, but repented. For his own condemnation he called a council at Sinuessa, which however, refused to condemn him. After a considerable interregnum he was succeeded by Marcellus].

Year of the World 5493 | Year of Christ 294

Marcellus [Marcellus' name is spelled 'Arcellus' in the Beloit College copy of the since space was left for the initial letter 'M' to be painted in later], a Roman, was pope from the time of Constantine and Galerius, the emperors, to that of Maxentius. He ordained that no public council should be held without the authority of the papal see. He designated twenty-five places in the city of Rome as bishoprics for baptism and to meet the requirements of those who daily deserted paganism to come into the faith. He also established certain places for the burial of martyrs. When Maxentius learned that the noble woman, Lucina, had given her estate to the church, he became angry and exiled her for a time. While Marcellus was a prisoner, Maxentius urged him to resign the pontificate and the faith; and when he refused, Maxentius sent him away to herd animals. In the meantime, however, Marcellus did not neglect his prayers and fasting. Although relieved of his priestly office, Maxentius sent him to a foul-smelling region where he died of the stench, after having sat five years six months and twenty-one days. On his death the Roman See was vacant 20 days. [Marcellus I succeeded to the pontificate in 308, in the time of Maxentius, who put him to work in the imperial stables, of which labors he is said to have died].

Eusebius, a Greek, became pontiff in the reigns of Constantine and Maxentius. He decreed that no layman should cause a bishop to be summoned into court. During his ministry, on the 3rd day of May, the cross of the Lord was found. This pope allowed heretics to be reconciled by laying on of hands alone. He died at Rome and was buried in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Appian Way on the sixth Nones of October. He sat six years one month and three days, although some historians are doubtful as to his term. The papal chair was vacant one day at this time. [Eusebius was bishop of Rome for four months under the emperor Maxentius (309-10). The Christians in Rome were divided on the question of the reconciliation of apostates. The mild views of Eusebius brought forward a competitor, Heraclius; but both were expelled by the emperor].

Melchiades (Melciades [Melciades' name is spelled 'Elciades' in the Beloit College copy of the since space was left for the initial letter 'M' to be painted in later].), a pope, by birth an African, lived in the times of Maxentius, Licinius and Maximinus, and was distinguished for his piety and skill. He decreed that no man be condemned or judged through enmity or without credible evidence; also that no one fast on Sunday or Thursday, as the pagans held these days holy. He also made laws regulating the sacrifice. At this time the Manichean heresy gained the upper hand at Rome. After these events this pope was crowned with martyrdom at the instigation of Maximinus; likewise also Peter, the Alexandrian bishop, and Lucianus of Antioch, a Roman priest, and many others. Melchiades sat four years seven months and 19 days, and the chair rested 17 days. [Melchiades was pope from July 2, 310 to January 11, 314. The toleration edicts of Galerius and of Constantine and Licinius were published during his pontificate, which was also marked by the Lateran Synod in Rome (313), at which Caecilianus, bishop of Carthage, was acquitted of charges brought against him, while Donatus was condemned].

COUNCIL OF SINUESSA

The first council was depicted at folio CXVIII verso, and here the design is similar. Marcellinus, who called the council for his own condemnation, appears in the center of the group, though not in sackcloth and ashes. The Holy Spirit, symbolized by a dove, hovers over the gathering. Sinuessa was situated on the seacoast and on the Via Appia in the midst of the fertile country of Campania.

Folio CXXVII recto

Constantius and Galerius received the government upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian from the sovereignty of the empire; and they divided the country and its provinces between them. Galerius took Greece, Asia and the East, while Constantius was content with only Gaul and Spain; but Italy also fell to his lot. This Constantius was an extraordinary man of excellent morals, zealous about the wealth of the country and its people, though not favorable to the establishment of a common fund, and he said it was better to employ riches and possessions through various persons than to lock them up in the treasury. He was moderate in his desire for money, and when on occasion he was about to hold a feast with numerous persons, it became necessary to collect revenues and contributions from house to house for the purpose. This Constantius was not only loved by the Gauls, but held in veneration by them, for it was through his rule that they escaped the craftiness of Diocletian and the bloodthirstiness of Maximian. Constantius was the grandson of Claudius the Second, and to him was espoused Theodora, stepdaughter of Maximian. She bore him six children. He divorced her and took Helena, captured daughter of the King of England. Constantius died in Britain in the thirteenth year of his reign. By reason of his gentleness and mildness he was reckoned among the gods. [Constantius I, who was surnamed Chlorus, "the pale," Roman emperor from 305 to 306, was the son of Eutropius, a noble of Dardania, and of Claudia, daughter of Crispus, who was a brother of Claudius II. He was one of the two Caesars appointed by Maximian and Diocletian in the year 292, and received the government of Gaul, Spain, and Britain. At the same time he married Theodora, the daughter of Maximian, for that purpose divorcing his wife (or concubine) Helena, by whom he had already had a son, Constantius (later known as Constantine the Great). As Caesar he rendered the empire important services. He extended his rule over Britain, and defeated the Alamanni with great loss. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian in the year 305, Constantius and Galerius became the Augusti. Constantius died fifteen months later in an expedition against the Picts, in which he was accompanied by his son Constantius, who succeeded him in his share of the government].

Galerius, a proficient man in the practice of arms, created two rulers, namely, Maximian (Maximianum) and Severus. To the first he assigned the East; to the second, Italy. And he lived in Greece (Ilirico), which country he retained, having learned that the barbarian enemies of the Romans planned to go there. But Maximian, hoping to recover the empire he involuntarily lost, came out of retirement from Lucania to Rome; and by letters he informed Diocletian that he would again take unto himself the sovereignty he had abdicated. Against this revolt Galerius sent Severus to Rome with an army; but through treachery of the soldiery who were in league with Maxentius, he was circumvented, and fleeing to Ravenna, he was finally slain. And Maximian would have been slain by his own son had he not fled to Constantine, his son-in-law in Gaul. There he pretended that he had been driven out by his son, and for that reason attempted to assassinate Constantine. Now when the Franks and Alamanni [The Alamanni were an alliance of west Germanic tribes]. were defeated and their king taken prisoner, and his treachery was exposed by Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, to her husband, Maximian fled to Massilia (Marseilles), where he finally suffered the penalty for his misconduct. [Galerius, born near Sardica in Dacia, was the son of a shepherd. He rose from the ranks to the highest commands. He was appointed Caesar by Diocletian, along with Constantius Chlorus, in 292. As the same time he was adopted by Diocletian, receiving his daughter Valeria in marriage, and being entrusted with the command of Illyria and Thrace. In 297 he conducted an expedition against the Persian monarch Narses, whom he compelled to conclude a peace. On the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian, in 305, Galerius became Augustus or emperor. In 307 he made an unsuccessful attempt to recover Italy. He died in 311. He was a persecutor of the Christians. It was, perhaps, at his instigation that Diocletian issued the decree "Edict Against the Christians" (303) that ordered the destruction of Christian scriptures and places of worship across the Empire, while prohibiting Christians from assembling for worship].

Licinius, the emperor, a native of Dacia, by reason of his proficiency in the practice of arms and his acquaintanceship with Galerius, was elevated to a share in the government. But Constantine (Consantinus), a great man, being ambitious to rule all the world, made war against Licinius, first engaging him in Pannonia, secondly at Cibalis. And he conquered Dardania, Moesia, Macedonia, and countless other countries. Licinius was finally defeated on land and sea and slain in the fifteenth year of his reign at the age of sixty years. He was an avaricious and dissolute man and an enemy of the arts; and being ignorant, he called these a poison and a public affliction. [Licinius, Roman emperor (307-324), was by birth a Dacian peasant, and the early friend and companion of Galerius who raised him to the rank of Augustus. On the death of Galerius in 311, he concluded a peaceful arrangement with Maximinus II by which the Hellespont and the Bosphorus were to form the boundaries of the two empires. In 313 he married Constantia, sister of Constantine, and set out to encounter Maximinus who had invaded his dominions. He defeated him, and Maximinus died a few months later. Licinius and Constantine were now the only emperors and each was anxious to obtain the undivided rule. Licinius was defeated and compelled to purchase peace by ceding to Constantine, Greece, Macedonia and Illyria. After nine years hostilities were resumed. The great battle of Adrianople (323) followed by the reduction of Byzantium and a second great victory at Chalcedon placed Licinius at the mercy of Constantine, who put him to death in 324].

Maxentius was named emperor at Rome at the same time when Constantine on the death of his father Constantius was crowned emperor in Britain; for the senators at Rome called to office as an augments of the empire this Maxentius (son of Herculus [Herculus is Maximian (Maximianus) Herculus, who was Caesar (i.e., junior Roman Emperor) from July 285 and Augustus (i.e., senior Roman Emperor) from April 1, 286 to May 1, 305. He shared the latter title with his co-emperor and superior, Diocletian].), who lived in an open village not far from Rome. Maxentius was a very cruel man and a grim persecutor of the Christians, although he loved literature. Among other things he was addicted to the black arts. In the fifth year of the reign of Constantine, the latter made war against Maxentius, killed many of his people, and finally defeated him at Rome at the Milvian Bridge. Although Maxentius built a bridge across the Tiber at Rome as a trap to deceive the enemy, in a moment of forgetfulness he himself ventured on the bridge and was drowned with many of his followers. [Maxentius, Roman emperor (306-312), was the son of Maximian and Eutropia, and received in marriage the daughter of Galerius. He was passed over in the division of the empire, which followed the abdication of his father and Diocletian in 305. However, he did not acquiesce, and being supported by the praetorian troops, he was proclaimed emperor in 306. He summoned his father Maximian (Maximianus) from retirement, who again assumed the purple. The military abilities of Maximian were of great service to his son, who was of indolent and dissolute habits. Maximian compelled the Caesar Severus who had marched upon Rome to retreat in haste to Ravenna, and soon afterward put the latter to death when he treacherously got him into his power (307). The emperor Galerius now marched against Rome in person, but Maximian compelled him to retreat also. Maxentius, relieved of these imminent dangers, proceeded to disentangle himself from the control of his father and succeeded in driving him from the court. Maxentius now crossed to Africa, which he ravaged with fire and sword because it had submitted to the independent authority of one Alexander. Upon his return to Rome Maxentius openly aspired to dominion over all the western provinces, and soon afterward he declared war against Constantine on the pretext that the latter had put to death his father, Maximian. Maxentius was defeated near Rome in 312. He attempted to escape over the Milvian Bridge into Rome, but perished in the river. He is represented by all historians as rapacious, cruel and lustful. The only favored class was the military, upon which he depended for safety. All his other subjects were made the victims of licentiousness and ruined by the most grinding exactions].

Folio CXXVII verso

Then the aforesaid emperors realized that Emperor Constantine was held in great respect by all mankind, they relented against the Christians for some time. Yet Maxentius secretly sent forth his soldiers to slay all the Christians they might meet. He also found such zeal and pleasure in the black arts that he caused pregnant Christian women to be cut open to secure the fruits of their wombs, and the powder of these he used in the black arts. With the same folly and cruelty Maximian (Maximianus) also practised in the East, he even compensated the masters of the black arts for instruction in the evil arts. He gave credence to the cries of birds and soothsaying, and the Christians who disdained such matters he persecuted more than the rest. He ordered the old temples to be restored, and the gods to be worshipped according to ancient custom. Through divine vengeance this Maxentius was so bloated and ulcered in every limb and in his innards that there was no difference between him and a lazy ass. At length worms crawled forth from him in such a stench that no one could endure it; and so he died of a serious sickness, a gruesome and unstable being. He proceeded against the Christians as though they were to blame for his ills. Then Galerius sent Maximinus to govern the East in the place of Maximian, the latter employing the same cruelty, persecuting and slaying the Christians.

Christina (Cristina), a very famous virgin, suffered at Tyre in the aforesaid persecution of Maximian. She was born of very noble parents, and was so beautiful that many men sought her in marriage. Therefore her parents placed her in a tower, there to serve the gods as a virgin. But through the instruction of the Holy Spirit she scorned the idolatrous gods. Then her father learned of this and, since he could not divert her by threats, caused her to be stripped naked, flogged, and placed in a dungeon, where her tender limbs were torn. Then Christina took off her own flesh and threw it into her father's face, saying, Take it, you savage, and eat your own flesh. The enraged father fixed her to a wheel, placing fire and oil beneath her. Flames burst from the fire, which killed fifteen hundred people. The father attributed this to the black arts, and caused a large stone to be tied to her neck, and thus Christina was thrown into the sea by night. The angels received her, and Christ baptized her, and she returned to land. At length, after many tortures and the amputation of her breasts, Julian (Julianus) shot her with arrows, one through the heart, and one into her side. And thus with the palm of martyrdom she gloriously ascended to heaven. [Christina: The legend of this saint is one of those rejected by the Roman Catholic Church. The little town of Tyre, on Lake Bolsena, according to tradition her birthplace, has since been swallowed up by the waters of the lake. Christina is, however, celebrated all over Northern and Central Italy. Legend says she was the daughter of Urbanus, Roman patrician, and governor of the city. He was a pagan, but his daughter was early converted to the Christian faith, therefore she called herself Christina. One day she saw from her window many poor and sick, who begged alms; but having nothing to give them, she took the false gods of silver and gold, belonging to her father, and broke them up and divided them among the poor. For this her father caused her to be seized, beaten, and imprisoned. But angels healed her wounds. Torments proving unavailing, she was thrown into a lake, a millstone about her neck; but angels sustained the stone and she was carried to land. There her father caused her to be thrown into a fiery furnace, and for five days she remained in it singing the praises of the Lord. Then he ordered her shaved and dragged to the Temple of Apollo to sacrifice; but the idol fell before her. Next her tongue was ordered cut out, but she sang more sweetly. She was finally shot to death with arrows, and angels carried her to heaven].

Menas (Menna), an Egyptian soldier of noble parentage, suffered at this time in the capital city of the country of Phrygia. After having accepted the King of Heaven, and having wandered in solitude, he stepped forth into the world and confessed himself a Christian. When Pyrrhus the duke heard of this, he spoke to him, saying, If you will worship the gods, all that you have done through your ignorance will be forgiven. But as Menas refused to obey his wishes, he caused him to be beaten with rawhide, and subjected to other tortures until the ground flowed with blood. He was then placed on a rack and burned with torches, and after being taken down, was tied hand and foot and dragged over iron spikes. At length, while singing the praises of the Lord, he was beheaded and his body thrown into a fire, from which the Christians took it and gave it honorable burial. The body was later carried to Constantinople, and there held in great veneration. [Menas, an Egyptian, but a soldier in the Roman army, professed Christianity. He abandoned the service and retired into a solitary place with some other Christians to escape the edicts of persecution published by Diocletian and Maximian in 298. There he remained until the general persecution in 303, when, burning with Christian enthusiasm, he returned, and entering the theater at Cotyaeus, in Phrygia, where the people were seeing a martyrs' exhibition, he cried at the top of his voice, "I was ready to be found by those that did not seek me." (Isaiah 65:1). All eyes were turned on him, and to Pyrrhus, the president, who questioned him. After confessing himself a Christian, he was immediately scourged until the soil was red with his blood. But Menas refused to sacrifice to the pagan gods. The judge then ordered his sides to be torn with iron hooks, and the wounds to be fretted with horsehair cloth. Finally wearied with tormenting him, the judge ordered him burned alive. Timothy, patriarch of Alexandria (380-385), relates some of the miracles alleged to have been wrought by this saint, some grotesque, and some marvelous].

Julian (Iulianus), born in Antioch, a very Christian man, at this time suffered a most cruel martyrdom at Rome with the virgin Basillisa (Basilissa). He, together with a great number of priests and servants, sought refuge against cruel persecution; but they and many others suffered death on the 5th day of Ides of January. [Legend states that Julian was born at Antinoe, in Egypt, of noble parents. The love of God filled his heart from earliest childhood. At the age of eighteen his parents required him to marry; but this troubled him much in view of Paul's saying, "He that is unmarried cares for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord; but he that is married cares for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife." (I Cor. 7:32-33). However, in a vision, Christ told him to obey his parents; and he married Basillisa. After the merriment attending the marriage, bride and groom entered their nuptial chamber; and they became aware of a Presence; and they saw Jesus and Mary, who congratulated them for seeking the glory that is eternal. And in that vision they saw their names inscribed in the Book of Life. The vision passed; but Julian and Basillisa spent the night in prayer, and singing praises to the Lord. When his parents died, Julian divided his house and made it into a hospital, and he spent his substance in relieving the sick. He ruled over the portion devoted to the men, and Basillisa governed the women's department. It is from this circumstance of Julian having been the first to establish a hospital, that he was been called Julian the Hospitaller. After many years Basillisa died in peace; but Julian was seized and subjected to cruel tortures in the Diocletian persecution, in which he finally suffered death]. After those ones Antonius, a priest, and Anastasius and Celsus, a child, together with his mother and very many others also all died on the 5th of the Ides of January. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Victor, a citizen of Milan, and since youth a Christian, and now in the military service of Maximinus, was brought before him as a Christian and asked to worship the pagan idols. Scorning these, he was flogged, but by divine intervention he was rendered immune to pain. Molten lead poured over him left him unharmed, and so, at the command of Maximian, he was beheaded on the eighth day of the Ides of May. [Victor was a Christian officer in the army of the emperor Maximian, to whom he was denounced for his new faith. Unable to dissuade him, he caused Victor to be degraded from his rank, his hands and feet to be bound, and as an object of derision dragged through the streets. He was brought back bruised and bloody to the tribunal of the prefects and again entreated to abandon his infatuation, and to worship the gods of the state; but again he refused. He was hung up by his wrists, beaten and torn with iron combs, and his head was finally cut off by the executioner's sword. In art Victor is usually represented as a Roman soldier bearing a palm and a sword].

Saturninus, the priest, and Sisinus, the deacon, after having been arrested in Rome were imprisoned for a long time for confessing the Christian faith. They were placed on a rack, beaten with clubs and scorpions [A 'scorpion' is a whip or scourge that has spikes attached], and were finally beheaded. Their bodies were buried on the Salarian Way.

Susanna, a very holy virgin, born of noble parents in Dalmatia, and a friend of Pope Caius, in this persecution at Rome, on the 3rd day of the Ides of August, being beheaded for the sake of the Christian faith, completed her martyrdom. [It is related that Susanna was of illustrious birth, the daughter of Gabinius (also spelled Gabinus), who was the brother of Pope Caius, and also nearly related to the emperor Diocletian. She was very fair, and remarkable for her learning and penetrating intellect. Diocletian wished to marry her to his adopted son Maximus, but she refused. Enraged by her firmness, he sent an executioner, who put her to death in her own house].

Catherine (Catherina), a very highly renowned Egyptian virgin, flourished at this time (as her history informs us); and she suffered martyrdom after Diocletian, under Maxentius. This most pious virgin was of noble blood. Her father was named Costus. He was a king of the city of Alexandria. And although she was deprived of her father in her younger days, and from him as a king received a great paternal inheritance, we read of her that under the influence of riches, she was not idle nor inclined to feminine weakness, but was so gifted in extraordinary matters that it is to be marveled that in her tender years she undertook the contest of disputation with the highly wise of the world. This most divine virgin was instructed by a hermit of Christian faith and wisdom, and she was a spouse of Christ. While the Diocletian persecution still raged, and continued under the Emperor Maxentius at Alexandria, she saw a number of Christians crying because they were compelled to worship the idolatrous gods. And she stepped into the presence of Maxentius and upbraided him because of his idle worship of the gods and for his cruelty. Maxentius ordered her taken to the palace and guarded with all care. But when he heard her after the sacrifice, he marveled at her eloquence and wisdom; and he sent for fifty world-wise men. In his presence they were won over and confirmed the Christian faith, and therefore burned. Maxentius ordered Catherine placed in a dark dungeon and starved for twelve days. Then the angel of the Lord appeared to her, saying: You favored maiden of the Lord, be firm, for the Lord is with you. Many will be converted to Christ through you, and will enter glory with the sign of victory. After that she converted to the faith the soldier Porphyrius (Porphirium) with two hundred soldiers, and also the wife of the emperor, and many others, and sent them to heaven before her. A wheel with blades, prepared for her martyrdom, was soon broken and many people injured by it. Finally she was beheaded. At the place of her suffering she gave assurance of her assistance to all who preserved the memory of her suffering. After her decapitation milk flowed from her body. Her most holy body was carried by angels from there up to Mount Sinai, and so buried with honor in the 310th year of the Lord, on the 8th day of the Kalends of December.

Catherine: Many legends surround this saint. The one that follows is, perhaps, the most common. Constantius Chlorus, father of Constantine the Great, had a first wife before he married the Empress Helena. She died in giving birth to a son, whose name was Costis (Costus or Constus), and whom his father married to the only daughter and heiress of the King of Egypt, a virgin princess, whose name was Sabinella. With her he lived and reigned in great prosperity and happiness for several years, but in accordance with pagan law. One day Queen Sabinella had a prophetic dream in which was pre-figured the glory of the first-born. She gave birth to Catherine. From her earliest infancy she was the wonder of all who beheld her for grace of mind and person. At fifteen there was none comparable to her in the learning and philosophy. Her father ordained for her a tower in his palace furnished with all kinds of mathematical instruments, in which she might study with pleasure. When Catherine was about fifteen, her father, King Costis, died, and left her heiress to his kingdom. But when she became queen, she showed the same contempt for all worldly care and royal splendor that she had previously exhibited, for she shut herself up in her palace, and devoted herself to the study of philosophy. The people therefore asked her to take a husband who should assist her in the government and lead them forth to war. And she had a great battle to keep her virginity. And there was a certain holy hermit who dwelt in a desert about two days' journey from Alexandria. To him the Virgin Mary appeared, and she sent him to Catherine with a message of comfort, telling her that the husband whom she was to espouse was her Son, who was greater than any monarch of this world, and Lord of all power and might. And the hermit gave her a picture of the Virgin Mary and her divine Son. Catherine forgot all her books, her spheres and her philosophers, and placing the picture in her study, had a dream that night. She dreamed that by the side of an old hermit she was taken to heaven, presented to the Virgin Mary, and offered to her son; but that the Lord considered her neither fair nor beautiful. She awoke in a passion of grief, and wept until it was morning. She called the hermit to her and declared her vision, and seeing she was still in pagan darkness, he fully instructed her in the Christian faith, and baptized her with her mother. And again the Virgin appeared to her, accompanied by her Son and a host of angels. And learning that Catherine had been baptized, He put a ring on her finger in evidence of their betrothal. When she awoke, the ring was on her finger, and from that point on, regarding herself as the betrothed of Christ, she despised the world, thinking only of the day when she should be reunited with her Lord. She dwelt in the palace until her mother died.

At this time Maxentius came to Alexandria, and gathering together all the Christians, ordered them to sacrifice to the pagan gods. Catherine heard the cries of the people, confronted the tyrant, pleading for her fellow Christians, demonstrating the truth of the Christian and the falsehood of the pagan religion. Being confounded by her arguments and eloquence, Maxentius ordered fifty of the most eloquent philosophers and rhetoricians collected from all parts of the empire, and promised to reward them if they would overcome the Christian princess in argument. But they confessed themselves vanquished after hearing Catherine's arguments, and the emperor consigned them to the flames.

Then Maxentius ordered Catherine dragged to his palace. He tried to corrupt her, but failed. Being obliged to leave on a warlike expedition, he ordered his second-in-charge, Porphyry, to cast her into a dungeon and starve her to death; but the angels ministered to her. When Maxentius returned, he was seized with fury. He condemned his wife, the empress, and Porphyry, whom Catherine had converted to Christianity in the meantime, to be put to a cruel death; and again he tempted Catherine, offering to make her his empress. But she scorned him. He now ordered four wheels to be constructed, with sharp points and blades on it, two revolving in one direction, two in another, so that between them Catherine would be torn to pieces. But as soon as she was bound between them the wheels broke into pieces, and the fragments flew about so that the executioners and 3000 persons perished that day. Finally Maxentius ordered her to be beheaded, and this was done. The angels carried her body over the desert and the Red Sea, and deposited it on Mount Sinai.

Sophronia also was condemned for loss of her virginity by Maxentius, and as she could not avoid the danger, she killed herself in the manner of Lucretia.

Arnobius Africanus, a very celebrated philosopher and a well informed rhetorician (though very old) was held in great veneration at this time. He taught rhetoric in Africa, and wrote many books against the pagans. [Arnobius the elder, a native of Africa, lived about 300 CE, in the reign of Diocletian. He was at first a teacher of rhetoric in Sicca in Africa, but afterwards embraced Christianity; and to remove all doubts as to the reality of his conversion, he wrote, while yet a catechumen, his celebrated work (also known as [i.e., Pagans]) in seven books]. Lucian (Lucianus), the orator, and a priest of the Nicomedian church, in this period wrote many books and letters at Heliopolis, a city of Bithynia. He suffered martyrdom for Christ's sake. Likewise Jacob (Jacobus), nicknamed the Wise, a priest at Nisibina, a city of the Persias, at this time also wrote many letters against the heretics, and others for our faith. He at last died (according to Jerome) in the time of the ruler Constantius. [This last sentences is not in the German edition of the chronicle. Constantius II was Roman emperor from 337-361].

Lactantius Firmianus, a very distinguished orator and philosopher, disciple of the aforesaid Arnobius, was of great name and fame at this time. While teaching the art of eloquence at Nicomedia, he was, by reason of his virtue and greatness, ordered to Rome, together with Flavius, the grammarian. After he had taught there for some time, he became indigent because of the lack of students. Therefore he occupied himself in writing books, and at this he was very able; for after the time of Cicero, he was the second foremost in this art. In his last years he was instructor of the emperor Crispis, the son of Constantine, in Gaul. He wrote praiseworthy books and also various letters and epistles to many persons. [Lactantius was a celebrated Christian Father, but his exact name, date of birth, and place of nativity are not known. In modern works he is called Lucius Coelius Firmianus Lactantius. Since he is spoken of as far advanced in years about 315 CE, he must have been born not later than the middle of the third century, probably in Italy, possibly at Firmum, on the Adriatic, and certainly studied in Africa, where he became the pupil of Arnobius, who taught rhetoric at Sicca. His fame became so widely extended that about 301 he was invited by Diocletian to settle at Nicomedia, where he practised his art. At this period he appears to have become a Christian. He was summoned to Gaul about 312-318, when now an old man, to superintend the education of Crispus, son of Constantine, and he probably died at Treves some ten or twelve years afterward. A number of his works are still extant. The style of Lactantius, formed upon the model of the great orator of Rome, gained him the appellation of the Christian Cicero].

Eusebius, a bishop of the city of Caesarea, in Palestine, who, on account of his friendship with the martyr Pamphilus, took the name of Pamphilus. And with this same Pamphilus, a very diligent searcher of the books of the Scriptures. He was a man worthy of remembrance, was at this time esteemed by the distinguished and the noble, not only among the pagans, but also the Christians, and not only for his experience in many things, but also by reason of his wonderful knowledge of the arts. And although this Eusebius was attached to the Arian heresy, when he came to the Nicaean Council, he was so enlightened by the Holy Spirit that he came into accord with the fathers of the church, and from that point on piously lived in the Christian faith up to the time of his death. Being a well informed and highly learned man, he was, with Pamphilus, the martyr, a very diligent searcher of the books of the Scriptures. He wrote many books at this time, especially the books of Evangelical Preparation; the Ecclesiastical History against Porphyry, that most vehement enemy of the Christians; he composed six books known as the Defenses in defense of Origen; three books On the Life of Pamphilus (Pomphili) the Martyr, from whom, out of love, he took his surname; in addition very learned commentaries on one hundred and fifty Psalms; and twenty books of the life and suffering of the martyrs and of virgins, especially, his Evangelical Preparation; and also a history of chronicles from the time of Abraham to the Year of the Lord 300, which the pious Jerome completed. This Eusebius, after the conversion of the Emperor Constantine, was on good terms with the latter while he lived.

Eusebius of Caesarea (Eusebius Pamphili) lived about 260-340 CE. He was bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, and an ecclesiastical historian. He was born probably in Palestine and died as bishop of Caesarea. In early youth he became acquainted with Pamphilus, presbyter of the Church of Caesarea, and founder of a theological school there. After the death of his friend, Eusebius withdrew to Tyre, and later, while the Diocletian persecution was still raging, to Egypt, where he seems to have been imprisoned, but soon released. He became bishop of Caesarea between 313 and 315, and in 331 declined the patriarchate of Antioch. Eusebius was one of the most learned men of his age, and stood high in the favor of Constantine. At the Council of Nicaea (325) he held the large middle party of Moderates and submitted the first draft of the creed afterwards adopted with important changes. Later he yielded to the Alexandrian party, and voted for a creed that repudiated the Arian position, with which he had previously sympathized. He seems to have discovered during the Council that the Alexandrians were right in claiming that Arius was carrying his subordinationism so far as to deny all real divinity to Christ. With the extreme views of the Athanasian party, however, he was not in complete sympathy, for they seemed to savor of Sabellianism, which always remained his chief dread.

Eusebius's reputation rests on his vast erudition and his sound judgment. He is best known for his Ecclesiastical History, completed about 324 or 325. It is the most important ecclesiastical history of ancient times, and is written in the belief that the old order of things was passing away, and with the apologetic purpose of exhibiting the history of Christianity as a proof of its divine origin. Many prominent figures of the first three centuries are known to us only from its pages.

The paragraph devoted to Eusebius in the Latin edition of the Chronicle is, perhaps, the most in need of a strong editorial hand in the entire text for it is rife with repetitions, non sequiturs, etc. The German edition of the Chronicle corrects nearly all of these problems, but also removes most of the titles of the works composed by Eusebius.

Silvester the pope, a Roman, whose father was Rufinus (Ruffino), succeeded Melchiades (Melciadem) in the time of Constantine in the one thousand ninety-first year from the founding of the city (i.e, Rome). He was a pious man of angelic countenance, fine physique, clear address, holy works, good counsel, Christian faith, and patient hope, and was immersed in every affection. God endowed him with such grace that not only the Christians were remarkably loyal to him, but the pagans as well. Now when Constantine had been baptized and peace restored to the Church, Silvester initiated many laws pertaining to the divine service: Firstly, that the Chrism should be blessed only by a bishop; that a baptized person should be identified by a bishop; and that a priest should anoint a baptized person with the Chrism in the emergency of death. No layman should bail a consecrated person to court, and no consecrated person should discuss matters or transact business before a temporal judge. A priest holding mass should use white linen, since the body of Christ was buried in it. This most holy pope, among others of his miracles, relieved Rome of the plague of a dragon. He died and was buried in the cemetery of Priscilla on the Sallarian Way at the third mile-stone from the city (i.e, Rome) on the day before the Kalends of January after having sat 23 years, ten months and eleven days. Then the seat was vacant for 15 days. [Silvester I (January 314 to December 335) is said to have baptized Constantine, but evidence, almost contemporary, shows that the emperor received this rite near Nicomedia at the hands of Eusebius, bishop of that city. The so-called Donation of Constantine is shown to have been spurious; yet it must have been of considerable antiquity. It was certainly known to Pope Adrian in 778, and was inserted in the false decretals toward the middle of the next century. This Donation is a supposed grant by the emperor in gratitude for his conversion by Silvester, not only of spiritual supremacy, but also of temporal dominion over Rome, Italy, and "the provinces, places and cities of the western regions."]

Year of the World 5533 | Year of Christ 334

Mark (Marcus) the pope, a Roman, succeeded Silvester in the time of Constantine. He was a good man and a lover of the Christian faith. He ordained that the Hostian bishop, by whom the Roman bishop is consecrated, should employ choral vestments, and that on holy days, immediately after the gospel, the (confession of) faith should be sung with great voice by the priests and the people, as had already been ordained by the Nicene Council. He built two churches at Rome. He died and was buried in the cemetery of Balbina on the Ardeatine Way on the third of the Nones of October. He sat for two years eight months and 20 days; then the chair was vacant for 20 days. [Mark (Marcus), succeeded Silvester I as pope at Rome in the year 336. The records indicate that nothing noteworthy occurred during the time that he occupied the papal see].

Year of the World 5535 | Year of Christ 336

Julius (Iulius) the pope, a Roman, lived in the time of Emperor Constantius, and was a man of wonderful piety and learning, and, during the time the Arian heresy gained the upper hand, he was troubled with much disorder. Constantius, the son of Constantine, sent him into exile. After ten months he returned to Rome and punished the Arian bishops who had undertaken to hold a council at Antioch, which could not be held without the consent or authority of a Roman bishop. At Rome he built two churches and three cemeteries. He ordained that a priest should speak only before a spiritual judge; but if he mistrusted a judge, he could appeal to the Roman See; also, that all things belonging to the churches should be inventoried by a public scrivener or protonotary. He ordained 18 priests, three deacons, and nine bishops. He died and was buried on the Aurelian Way in the cemetery of Calopodius three miles from the city of Rome. He sat 15 years, two months and six days; and then the chair was vacant for twenty-five days. [Julius I, pope from 337 to 352, succeeded Marcus after an interval of four months. He is chiefly known for his action in the Arian controversy. After Eusebius, at a synod held in Antioch, had renewed with his party their disposition of Athanasius, they resolved to send delegates to Constans, emperor of the West, and to Julius, setting forth the grounds of their procedure. Julius, after expressing an opinion favorable to Athanasius, invited both parties to lay the case before a synod to be presided over by himself. This the eastern bishops declined. On his second banishment from Alexandria, Athanasius came to Rome. In 342 Julius declared him innocent, and his doctrine orthodox, and a little later summoned the Council of Sardica, attended by 76 bishops, who quickly withdrew to Philippopolis and deposed Julius, along with Athanasius and others. The Western bishops who remained confirmed the previous decisions of the Roman synod. Julius, after his death in April 352, was succeeded by Liberius].

Year of the World 5543 | Year of Christ 344

Liberius the pope, a Roman, lived in the time of Constantius and of Constantus. In their times, when a Council was hold at Milan, all of his people who were attached to Athanasius were sent into exile. In this assembly the eastern priests, cunning and crafty men, overcame the priests of the West boldly, brazenly and with guile. They denied that Christ is a person co-existent with God. This doctrine Liberius openly attacked, and because he would not condemn Athanasius as the emperor commanded, he was driven into exile by the Arian heretics; and for three years he lived away from Rome. However, the priests assembled and put Felix, a very distinguished man, in the place of Liberius, and they removed the two priests, Visacus and Valentus, from the church. By their petitions they influenced Constantius to recall Pope Liberius from exile, and to restore him to office. And although the pope was attached to the Arians, he graced the church of God with zeal. At length he died and was buried on the Salarian Way in the cemetery of Priscilla on the 9th day of the Kalends of May. He sat six years (although some say 16), 3 months, and 4 days. And then the chair was vacant six days. [Liberius, pope from 352 to 366, successor to Julius I, was consecrated on May 22nd. His first recorded act occurred after a synod had been held at Rome, and consisted in writing to Constantius, asking that a council be called at Aquileia with reference to the affairs of Athanasius; but his messenger was compelled by the emperor to subscribe a condemnation of the orthodox patriarch of Alexandria. Liberius later was one of the few, who along with Eusebius of Vercelli, Dionysius of Milan, and Lucifer of Cagliari, refused to sign the condemnation of Athanasius, which had anew been imposed at Milan by Imperial command upon all the Western bishops. The consequence was his relegation to Beroea, in Thrace; Felix II (antipope) being consecrated his successor. On his agreeing to abandon Athanasius, and to accept the communion of his adversaries, the emperor recalled him from exile; but as the Roman see was officially occupied by Felix, a year passed before Liberius was sent to Rome. It was the emperor's intention that Liberius and Felix govern the church jointly, but when Liberius arrived, the Roman people expelled Felix. Liberius died September 24, 366].

Folio CXXIX recto

Constantine (Constantinus) the Great, born of a humble marriage, son of Constantius (Constancii) the Augustus, was elected king in Britain. And although at this time the common people of Rome were ruled by four emperors, Constantine and Maxentius, sons of the Augusti, and Licinius, and Maximian, new men; yet this Constantine, as a great and mighty man who understood how to succeed in all things he undertook, possessed an ambition to rule the entire world, and he overcame all opponents. The beginning of his reign was comparable with the best and in the end with those ranked in the middle. He was gifted with unlimited strength of mind and body, possessed great military skill and zeal, and was victorious over the Goths. He was devoted to the liberal arts and loved justice. In the 339th Year of the Lord, the Christians, previously oppressed by tyrants, began to take on new life under this emperor. He who loved peace was secure by his grace, and by his mildness Constantine secured the good will and devotion of all mankind. He made decrees annulling superfluous laws and repealing those which were too severe. This all-powerful emperor was so concerned with the preservation of the integrity of Christian life that when he went to war he used no other banner than that which was inscribed with the sign of the cross which he had seen in the heavens and worshipped when he marched his army against Maxentius. And he heard the angels saying, Constantine, by this sign you shall conquer. And this he did, dispersing all the tyrants of the Romans and of all Christian people. This Constantine was influenced by Pope Silvester to prosper and multiply the churches of God with great speed. He offered the popes a diadem set with precious stones; but this was declined by Silvester as unsuited to a spiritual head, for which a white headdress should be sufficient. This Constantine and his son Crispus were baptized by Silvester. While making war against the Parthians he died in a village near Nicomedia in the thirty-first year of his reign at the age of sixty-six. His death was announced by a hairy star of unusual size that appeared for some time, a thing which the Greeks call a comet. And he has earned the right to be spoken of as one among the saints. [Constantine, surnamed "the Great," was Roman emperor from 306-337. He was the eldest son of Constantius Chlorus and Helena, and was born in 272 in upper Moesia. He received training in military matters at an early age, and served with great distinction under Galerius in the Persian war. Galerius, however, became jealous of him and retained him for some time in the East; but Constantine contrived at last to join his father in Gaul just in time to accompany him to Britain on his expedition against the Picts in 306. His father died at York in the same year and Constantine laid claim to his share of the Empire. Galerius, who dreaded a struggle with the legions of the West, acknowledged Constantine as master of the countries beyond the Alps, but with the title of Caesar only. The commencement of Constantine's reign is placed, however, in this year, so he did not receive the title of Augustus until 308. He took up his residence at Treves and governed with justice, beloved by his subjects and feared by the barbarian neighbors. It was not long, however, before he became involved in war with his rivals in the empire. In the same year in which he was acknowledged Caesar (306), Maxentius, son of Maximian, had seized the imperial power at Rome. Constantine entered into a close alliance with Maxentius by marrying his sister Fausta. In 310 Maximian formed a plot against Constantine and was put to death by his son-in-law at Massilia. Maxentius resented the death of his father and prepared to attack Constantine in Gaul. Constantine anticipated his movements and invaded Italy at the head of a large army. Maxentius was defeated at Saxa Rubra, near Rome, in 312. He tried to escape but perished. It was in this campaign that Constantine is said by later Christian apologists to have been converted to Christianity. He is supposed to have seen in the sky a luminous cross with the inscription: "By this sign you conquer" (In hoc signo vinces is the rendition in Latin of a Greek phrase); and on the night before the decisive battle with Maxentius, a vision is said to have appeared to Constantine in his sleep, bidding him to inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the sacred monogram of Christ, the chi-rho. The tale of the cross seems to have grown out of that vision but the latter is not entitled to credit. It was to his interest to gain the affections of his numerous Christian subjects in his struggle with his rivals; and it was self-interest that probably led him to adopt Christianity. By his victory he became sole master of the West. Meanwhile, in 311 Licinius and Maximinus had divided the East between them; but in 313 a war broke out between them; Maximinus was defeated. This left only two emperors, Licinius in the East, Constantine in the West, and between these war broke out in 314. Licinius was defeated and put to death, leaving Constantine sole ruler. He moved the seat of the empire to Byzantium, which he called Constantinople, or the city of Constantine. He reigned in peace the rest of his life. He died in 337, and was baptized by Eusebius shortly before he died. His three sons, Constantine, Constantius and Constans succeeded him in the empire].

Constantius, together with his brothers Constantine and Constans, secured the sovereignty from their father Constantine the Great. At this time, but at no other, Rome was under the rule of one Augustus and three Caesars; for Constantine left three sons; and there was Dalmaticus, his brother's son, not unlike his uncle. He was not long afterwards killed by the soldiers, rather through circumstances than at the instigation of Constantius. Constantine was killed at Aquileia by officers of Constantius in a war against his brother, which was ill advised. So the sovereignty passed to the two (i.e., Constantius and Constans). [Constantius II, Roman emperor, 337-361, third son of Constantine the Great by his second wife Fausta, received the East as his share of the empire on the death of his father. Upon his accession he became involved in war with the Persians, which was carried on with few interruptions during the greater part of his reign. This prevented him from taking any part in the struggle between his brothers, Constantine and Constans, which ended in the defeat and death of the former, and in the accession of the latter to the sole empire of the West in 340. After the death of Constans in 350, Constantine marched into the West to oppose Magnentius and Vetricio, both of whom had usurped the purple. Vetricio submitted, and Magnentius was finally crushed in 353, the empire thus becoming subject to one ruler. In 355 Constantius made Julian, the brother of Gallus, Caesar, and sent him into Gaul to oppose the barbarians. In 360 Julian was proclaimed Augustus by the soldiers at Paris. Constantius marched against him, but died on the way in Cilicia in 361. He was succeeded by Julian].

Constans acquired the empire. For some time he was strict and righteous; but through unfortunate circumstances and evil friends, he was turned to licentiousness, becoming unbearable to the provinces and unacceptable to the army. At the instigation of Magnentius he was slain not far from Spain, in a castle called Helena, in the seventeenth year of his reign and the thirtieth year of his age. [Constans, youngest son of Constantine the Great, upon his father's death, received Illyria, Italy and Africa, as his share. After successfully resisting his brother Constantius, who was slain in invading his territory, Constans became master of the entire West. His weak and profligate character made him an object of contempt. He was slain in 350 by the soldiers of the usurper Magnentius]. After his death Magnentius held Italy, Africa and Gaul. [Magnentius, Roman emperor in the West (350-353), was a German by birth, and after serving as a common soldier, Constans eventually entrusted him with the Jovian and Herculean battalions, who had replaced the old praetorian guards when the empire was remodeled by Diocletian. Availing himself of his position, he organized a conspiracy against the profligate Constans, who was put to death by his emissaries. He was then acknowledged emperor in nearly all the Western provinces. The armies of Magnentius and Constantius met in the Battle of Mursa Major in 351; Magnentius led his troops into battle, while Constantius spent the day of battle praying in a nearby church. Despite Magnentius' heroism, his troops were defeated and forced to retreat back to Gaul. As a result of Magnentius' defeat, Italy ejected his garrisons and rejoined the loyalist cause. Magnentius made a final stand in 353 in the Battle of Mons Seleucus, after which he committed suicide by falling on his sword]. He attacked Greece anew, and Vetrano, with the consent of the army, was elected to rule and to protect Greece. He was a pious man, of good morals, and beloved by all throughout his long and successful military career; but he was deposed by Constantine, who made war to avenge his brother's death. [Vetrano commanded the legions in Illyria and Pannonia when Constans was slain and his throne seized by Magnentius. The troops proclaimed Vetrano emperor, but he soon resigned in favor of Constantius and retired to Bithynia, where he passed the remainder of his life]. Nepotianus (Nepociano) caused a revolt at Rome in order to seize the government but was slain in retribution for his evil conduct. [Nepotianus, son of a half sister of Constantine the Great, was proclaimed emperor at Rome in 350, but was slain by Marcellinus, general of the usurper Magnentius, after a reign of only 28 days]. And so Gallus became emperor in the West. Magnentius ended his own life at Lyons in the third year and seventh month of his reign. Gallus was later slain in the wars. He was a cruel man and a ready tyrant, whenever he could make his will prevail. [Gallus was a son of Julius Constantius, grandson of Constantius Chlorus, nephew of Constantine the Great, and elder brother by a different mother, of Julian the Apostate. In 351 he was named Caesar by Constantius II, and was left in command of the East, where he conducted himself with great haughtiness and cruelty. In 354 he went to the West to meet Constantius at Milan, but was arrested at Petovio in Pannonia and sent to Pola in Istria where he was finally beheaded in prison]. Silvanus also, after stirring up revolution in Gaul, was killed in less than a month. Constantius was the sole Augustus in the empire. Quickly he sent Julian, his cousin, the brother of Gallus, who (i.e, Julian) was born from Constantius, the brother of his (i.e, Constantius II's) father Constantine, when his (i.e, Constantius II's) sister had been given in matrimony (to Julian), as Caesar against the Gauls. [Julian, born in 331 in Constantinople, was the son of Julius Constantius, half brother of Emperor Constantine I, and his second wife, Basilina. His paternal grandparents were Western Roman Emperor Constantius Chlorus and his second wife, Flavia Maximiana Theodora. His maternal grandfather was Caeionius Iulianus Camenius. Shortly afterwards Gallus, who had imposed a rule of terror during his brief reign, was executed (354), and Julian himself briefly imprisoned. However, Constantius still had to deal with the Sassanid (Persian) threat in the East, and so he turned to his last remaining male relative, Julian. He was summoned to the emperor in Mediolanum (Milan) and, on November 6th, 355, made Caesar of the West and married to Constantius II's sister Helena]. When the barbarians had attacked many towns he quickly, through his own excellence, held in check the movements of the Gauls and the Germans. Constantius, while occupied with civil wars, died on the road between Cilicia and Cappadocia in the thirty-eighth year of his rule and the forty-fifth of his life. He was a man of extraordinary tranquility, calm and too trusting of his friends and servants. [The section in this paragraph beginning with Silvanus and going to the end of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Folio CXXIX verso

Constantinople, the imperial and highly renowned city was called Byzantium while it was still small, and afterwards Constantinople. When Constantine the Great, for greater security of the imperial throne against the Parthians, decided to proceed from Rome to the East, he (as some historians state) went to Troy, where once upon a time Agamemnon and other Greek princes pitched their tents against Priam; and there he undertook to lay the foundations of a royal city. But as our Savior in a dream pointed out to him another place, he left the work unfinished; and of this indications remained for a long time. And from Thrace he sailed to Byzantium. That city he soon enlarged, building new fortifications and high towers and improving the city with beautiful public and other buildings, so that it was very deservedly called a second Rome. The ancient historians who saw the city in its flower treasured it as the home of the gods on earth, rather than that of emperors. This emperor called the city New Rome; but according to common opinion the city retained the name Constantinople, after its founder. This city was from time to time improved with public and other fine tall buildings to such an extent that strangers coming there were so astonished at its appearance that they regarded it not merely as the home of mortal sinners but of the celestials as well. The walls of this city were celebrated the world over for their height and thickness, and its defense was skillfully provided for. They write that the city was triangular. On two sides it was touched by the sea, and by its walls it was secured against naval attack. The land side was surrounded by a moat outside the fortifications. This city had twelve gates through which its beauty might be observed. In addition to other very magnificent buildings the church of Sophia was built there by Justinian, the emperor, and it is worthy of universal admiration. It was provided with nine hundred priests, and was built with wonderful skill and of costly materials. The city was visited by all the peoples of the East and was the home of some of the learned men of Greece. There three great councils were held. Due to its renown and prosperity this city aroused the envy of the Turks and suffered under their cruelties. In the Year of our Salvation 1093 it was besieged by a great force and was taken. Afterwards the Gauls, together with the Venetians, occupied this city for fifty-five years. Next the noble race of Genoese, called Paleologi, took the city from the Gauls and incorporated it in their dominions, retaining it until 1453, when it was ravaged by the Turkish Sultan, Mohammed (Machometes) Ottoman (Ottommanus). And so this most noble city fell into the hands of the infidels about 1130 years after it was built; and it had stood longer than Rome. Athalaricus ravaged Rome in the year from the founding of the city (i.e, Rome) 1164; yet he forbade the destruction of the churches of the saints; but the rage and beastly ignorance of the Turks left nothing holy or pure intact within this city, and they subjected the temples to foul abuses. We read of the wonderful celebrated and mighty deeds of the Thebans, Lacedaemonians, Athenians and Corinthians, and many venerable countries that have left no trace of their location on earth; but this city alone excels all others by reason of its great age, its wonderful buildings, its weapons, its literature, its glory and honors, to such an extent that its loss is equal to that of all the other cities. And although when the empire fell into the hands of the French, this city passed to the enemy, yet the churches of the holy ones were never destroyed, nor the library burned, nor the monasteries entirely plundered; for the ancient wisdom remained at Constantinople up to this year. No Latin was looked upon as sufficiently learned unless he had studied at Constantinople for some time. From this city Plato was given us, and from this city came to us the writings and teachings of Aristotle, Demosthenes, Xenophon, Thucidydes, Basilius, Dionysius, Origen, and many others up to our own times. But now it is otherwise under the empire of the Turks, that most savage people, the enemies of good morals and teachings. Now the rivers of learning are dammed up and its spring of wisdom sealed. I admit that there are universities among the Latins in many places, as at Rome, Paris, Bologna, Padua, Siena, Paris, Cologne, Vienna, Salamanca, Oxford, Pavia, Leipzig, Erfurt [The universities of Salamanca, Oxford, and Pavia are not listed in the German edition]. , and excellent universities elsewhere; but these are mere brooks flowing from the springs of Greece. How this city fell into the power of the Turkish sultan through war and siege, which occurred later under the emperor Frederick the Third, will be told later.

Constantinople: Ancient Byzantium was situated on the first of the seven hills, upon which, rising one above another, the modern city of Istanbul (a corruption of the Greek phrase 'to the city') stands. Upon this gently sloping promontory, which serves as a connecting link between the Eastern and Western world, Constantine, after determining to remove the seat of empire from the banks of the Tiber, decided to fix the city that bore his name as its founder. Like the ancient mistress of the world, its foundations were laid on seven hills, and the emperor called it the New Rome. However, it never acquired the title of the Eternal City. The foundations were laid according to an imperial edict in obedience to the commands of heaven, as it is said. On foot, a lance in his hand, the emperor headed the stately procession to mark the boundaries of Constantinople. At the later period the honor of having inspired the choice of a founder was attributed to the Virgin Mother, who became the tutelary guardian of the city. The dedication of the city exhibited that strange compound of religions of which Constantine himself was a type. After a splendid exhibition of chariot games, the emperor, in a magnificent chariot was carried through the public part of the city, surrounded by guards in the attire of some religious ceremonial, with torches in their hands. The emperor bore a golden statue of the Fortune of the city in his hands. The rites lasted 40 days, though the 11th day of May is considered the birthday of the city.

The walls of Constantinople, across the enlarged breadth of the triangle, stretched from the port to the Propontis and enclosed five of the seven hills; but these were not finished before the reign of Constantius. The wall was flanked at short intervals by towers, mostly rectangular. Until 1204 CE Constantinople remained the capital of the Eastern Roman Empire. In that year it was captured by the "blind old Dandolo" (Doge of the city-state of Venice) and the French. From 1204 to 1261 it became the seat of the Latin Empire, and on July 25, 1261, it reverted to the undisputed possession of the Greeks. On Ma 29, 1453, Constantius XIII, the last of the Palaeologi, fell upon the walls of his capital. Since then it has been looked upon by the people of the East as the seat of the supreme temporal and spiritual power, and the Sultan has become the heir of the Caesars. It was in 1453 that the city fell before the conquering sword of Mohammed II.

ILLUSTRATION

CITY OF CONSTANTINOPLE

The city is represented by a special woodcut extending over Folio CXXIX verso and CXXX recto. It is completely surrounded by high massive walls, flanked with square towers at frequent intervals, and a number of gates of which at least three are apparent. Over each gateway is a crown, and a coat of arms inscribed with a double eagle—the imperial symbol of the Byzantine Empire. The towers on either side of each gate also bear coats of arms, quartered by a cross, a crescent in each quarter.

The city fronts the water on two sides, while the landward side rises into the distant hills. The most prominent structure within the walls, and the only one designated by a name, is the church of St. Sophia, erected by Justinian the Great, and one of the most impressive buildings in the world. It was founded in 532 and dedicated on Christmas Day 538. Also within the walls, to the left, are three windmills. A small vessel, sails furled, with a few passengers on board, appears before the walls as the left. Before us is the Sea of Marmora, out of which the Bosphorus flows at the right, headed for the Black Sea.

Helena, mother of Constantine the emperor, was a woman of great faith and spiritual mind, and was distinguished for her acts of magnanimity. When, after the baptism of her son she saw miracles performed by Silvester before her son and against the Jews, nightly visions moved her to go to Jerusalem to search for the wood of the cross. But that was a difficult task; for the image of Venus was in the same place, put there by the old persecutors for the Christian people to worship in the place of the Savior. But with great secrecy she searched the city everywhere, and found three crosses. On one something was written in three tongues 'Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews.' Beside it stood Macherius, a bishop of that same city. He said that the first was the true cross; that the third one was laid on a dead woman, and the woman was soon restored to life. And so the cross of the Lord was found on the third day of May by Helena, and was adorned by her; and it was held in great veneration. Judas, the finder of the cross, was baptized, and was afterwards called Ciriacus. Later Helena built a temple on the site where the cross was found; and she departed from the place, bringing to her son the nails with which the body of Christ was fastened to the cross. One of these he put in his horse's bridle, to use in battle. But Constantine was persuaded that in the future no one should make such base use of it. Eager for the spread of Christianity, Constantine erected many churches in Rome. Helena died well loved by God and by mankind at Rome on the 18th day of August. [Helena, according to the best authorities, was born in either York or Colchester, England, and is inseparably connected with the discovery, or the "invention," as it is not improperly termed, of the Holy Cross at Jerusalem. Some say she was the daughter of a mighty British prince, King Coilus or Coel, and that in marrying Constantius Chlorus she brought him a kingdom for her dowry. In her old age she became a Christian, and her zeal for her new religion, and the influence she exercised over the mind of her son, no doubt contributed to the spread of Christianity throughout the empire. None of the old legends have been more universally diffused than the "History of the Cross." She is particularly connected with Benedictines, for it was believed that her remains had been carried off from Rome about the year 863, and were deposited in a Benedictine Abbey in Champagne].

Arius (Arrius), a priest at Alexandria, and a man more distinguished by looks and form than by virtue, began to sow discord in the Christian faith. He undertook to separate the Son from the substance of the Eternal and unspeakable God, saying there was a time when he was not. He did not understand that the Son was coeval with the Father, and of the same substance, or an independent element in the Trinity. As it was said, I and the Father are one. With such cunning he pressed forward as if to poison the whole world with his error. In the second year of Constantine a council was assembled, and to it came the Christians and the Arians. But when Arius could not accomplish certain things as he wished, he attempted to humiliate the Christians by accusing Athanasius of the black arts. But God did not permit this devilish man to go unpunished, for before long, when Arius was surrounded by many bishops and people, and sought to relieve himself in a secret chamber, his innards fell into it; and thus he suffered a death utterly worthy of his shameful life.

Arius is a name celebrated in ecclesiastical history, not so much on account of the personality of its bearer, as of the "Arian" controversy or heresy that it provoked. Nothing is known of the birth of its author. We first hear of him as a deacon in Alexandria. After some controversy he was ordained presbyter in 311, and discharged his duties with industry and faithfulness. The cause of the controversy was a fundamental difference of doctrine, which had far-reaching religious and philosophical implications. "Is the Divine which appeared on earth and made its presence actively felt, identical with the supremely Divine that rules heaven and earth? Did the Divine which appeared on earth enter into a close and permanent union with human nature, so that it has actually transfigured it and raised it to the plane of the Eternal?"

Arius had received his theological education in the school of the presbyter Lucian of Antioch. The latter was a follower of Paul of Samosata, bishop of Antioch, who had been excommunicated in 269; but his theology differed from that of his master in a fundamental point. Paul, starting with the conviction that the One God cannot appear substantially on earth, and consequently that he cannot have become man in Jesus, had taught that God had filled the man Jesus with his Logos or Power. Lucian, on the other hand, persisted in holding that the Logos became man in Christ. But since he shared the above mentioned belief of his master, nothing remained but for him to see in the Logos a second essence, created by God before the world, which came down to earth and took upon himself a human body. In this body the Logos filled the place of the intellectual or spiritual principle. Lucian's Christ, then, was not "perfect man," for that which constituted in him the personal element was a divine essence; nor was he "perfect God," for the divine essence was a created thing. It is this idea that Arius took up and interpreted. The principle that he had in view was firmly to establish the unity and simplicity of the eternal God. However far the Son may surpass other created things, he remains himself a created being, to whom the Father before all time gave an existence formed "out of nothing." Arius was perhaps quite unconscious that his own monotheism was hardly to be distinguished from that of the pagan philosophers, and that his Christ was a demi-god.

For years this controversy went on until it reached the ears of Constantine. Now sole emperor, he saw in the one Catholic Church the best means of counteracting the movement tending to the disintegration of the Roman empire; and he at once realized how dangerous dogmatic strife might prove to its unity. He summoned a general or ecumenical council, which was convened in Nicaea in 325, where the question was finally decided against Arius, that the Son was "of the same substance" with the Father, and all thought of his being created or even subordinate had to be excluded. Constantine accepted the decision of the council, and resolved to uphold it. Alexander the Bishop, returned to his see triumphant, but he died soon after, and was succeeded by Athanasius, his deacon, with whose fortitude and strange vicissitudes the further course of the controversy is bound up.

Although defeated in the council, the Arians were by no means subdued. Constantine was won over to a conciliatory policy by the influence of Eusebius of Caesarea, and Eusebius of Nicomedia, the latter of whom returned from exile in 328 and won the ear of the emperor, whom he baptized on his deathbed. Athanasius was banished in 335. During his absence Arius returned to Alexandria, but was suddenly taken ill while walking in the streets, and almost immediately died.

The Nicene Council, the first of all such councils, was called in the sixteenth year of Constantine at his command and pursuant to his efforts against the heretical teachings of the benighted Arius. It was attended by 318 bishops. For sometime the council transacted business and carried on disputations. Some, clever in questioning, and crafty, attached themselves to Arius, opposing the monism of our belief. However, one of their number, a highly educated philosopher, who previously had attacked our faith, being moved by God's spirit, entirely accepted our belief as holy. At length, after industrious investigation of the matter in council, it was concluded to record and acknowledge that the Son and the Father were a single substance. Those who held with Arius, seventeen in number, said that the Son of God was created separately, and was not born of the Godhead. But when the truth concerning their dissension became known, Constantine, with threats, ordered that the conclusions of the council be observed, those gainsaying it to be sent into exile. But only six, together with Arius, accepted the penalty and exiled themselves, while the remainder confessed the established truth. In this council the Sabellian heretics who held the Father and the Holy Spirit to be a single person, were also condemned. In the council the bishops lodged with Constantine accusations against one another, asking his judgment concerning them. These, Constantine caused to be burned, saying that they should await the judgment of God alone, and not of men. And there it was also ordained that those addicted to carnality should not be accepted into the priesthood in the future.

Nicene Council: 'Council' (the Greek term is 'synodos'; the Latin transliteration, used in the Chronicle, is synodus) is a general term for assembly. The term is here limited to ecclesiastical councils summoned to adjust matters in dispute with the civil authority, or for the settlement of doctrinal and other internal disputes. From a very early period in Church history, such councils or synods have been held on matters of doctrine or discipline, and they were evolved from smaller or more local gatherings. Before the form became absolutely fixed, there arose in the 4th century the ecumenical council, (ecumenical is Greek, signifying 'the inhabited world'). The ecumenical synods were not the logical outgrowth of the network of provincial synods, but the creations of imperial power. Constantine laid the foundations when, in response to a petition of the Donatists, he referred their case to a committee of bishops convened at Rome, summoned the council of Arles to settle the matter. For both of these councils it was the emperor that decided who should be summoned, paid the traveling expenses of the bishops, determined the meeting place, and the topics to be discussed. He regarded them as temporary advisory bodies, to whose recommendations the imperial power might give the force of law.

In the same manner he fixed time and place for the Council of Nicaea, used his influence to bring about the adoption of the creed, and punished those who refused to subscribe. The Council of Nicaea, on which subsequent ecumenical synods of the undivided church were modeled, commanded great veneration, for it was the first attempt to assemble the entire episcopate; but no more than the synods of Rome and Arles was it an organ of ecclesiastical self-government, but rather a means whereby the church is ruled by the secular power.

The numbering of ecumenical synods is not fixed, but the list below is the one most used in the Roman church today:

By including Pisa (1409) and by treating Florence as a separate synod, certain writers have brought the number of ecumenical councils up to 23.

The council of Nicaea is an event of highest importance in Christian history. Constantine, from his accession, showed himself the friend of the Christians. He recognized Christianity as the power of the future, and directed his energies toward the establishment of the positive relationship between it and the Roman state. But the church could only maintain its great value for the politician by remaining the same compact organism that it had proved itself to be under the stormy reign of Diocletian. But scarcely was the church at peace with the state when violent feuds broke out in its midst. Donatism in the West was followed by the Arian struggle in the East. The conflict kindled by the Alexandrian presbyter Arius with regard to the relation of Christ to God assumed a formidable character. Constantine therefore had recourse to an institution previously evolved by the Christian Church – the convocation of a synod to pronounce on the burning questions of the day. He convened a council, designed to represent the whole Church of the empire, at Nicaea, in Bithynia.

The deliberations on the Arian question passed through several stages before the final condemnation of Arius and his doctrines was reached. Some accepted and others rejected it. The majority of the council followed a neutral tendency, rejecting the formulae of Arius, and declining to accept those of his opponents. An Arian confession of faith was first brought forward and read; but it aroused such a storm of indignation that obviously, in the interests of a restoration of ecclesiastical peace, there could be no question of its acceptance. On this, Eusebius of Caesarea submitted the baptismal creed of his community. Since the creed dated from a period anterior to the Arian struggle, its reception would have been equivalent to a declaration on the part of the council that it declined to define its position with reference to the controversy of the hour. But the emperor saw that if the difficulties were eluded in any such way, they would arise again to an accentuated form, and that consequently no pacification could be expected from this policy.

Accordingly Constantine proposed that the Caesarean creed should be modified by the insertion of the Alexandrian pass words, "identical in nature," as if for the purpose of more accurate definition, and by the deletion of certain portions. The creed thus evolved by an artificial unity was no ratification of peace; in fact, it paved the way for a struggle that convulsed the whole empire. For it was the proclamation of the Nicene Creed that first opened the eyes of many bishops to the significance of the problem there treated; and its explanation led the church to force herself by an arduous path of theological work, into compliance with those principles, enunciated at Nicaea, to which, in the year 325, she had pledged herself without genuine assent.

Paul, the first hermit, died in the wilderness in Lower Thebes on the 10th day of January in his one hundred thirteenth year. As Jerome writes, St. Anthony (Antonius) saw his soul soon afterwards, flying among the choir of apostles and prophets. After the death of his parents, Paul became very rich by inheritance. At the age of sixteen he was well versed in the Greek and Egyptian languages. He was of a mild disposition, and a great lover of God. During the violent persecutions of Decius and Valerian, he wandered to a village, at last finding a rocky mountain, and within it a large cave, closed with a stone, and containing a wide passage open to the sky. It was covered with the spreading branches of an old palm-tree, and contained a very clear spring. He loved the place as though it had been given him by God; and there he spent his life in prayer and solitude. From the palm-tree he obtained sustenance and clothing. And St. Anthony visited him, and while they dined together a raven brought them a whole loaf of bread. Paul said that the Lord had sent him this food; that for the past sixty years the Lord had fed him with half a loaf, but he now doubled the bread. After Anthony's farewell, Paul slept softly, his neck upright and his hands raised; and his soul left his body. He was buried by Anthony at a place indicated by lions.

Paul and Anthony the hermits: In the persecution under the Emperor Decius, legend relates that Paul of Thebes, a Christian youth of noble family, terrified not so much by the tortures which were threatened, as by the allurements with which he was tempted to deny the faith, fled to the desert east of the Nile; and wandering there alone, he found a cavern, near which was a date-tree and a fountain of clear water. He chose this for his dwelling place, eating of the fruit of the tree, drinking the water of the stream, and clothing himself with palm-leaves woven together. Thus he lived for 98 years, having only occasional communication with other people. But it was the divine will that his long penance and virtue should be made known for the edification of men through another saint of even more renown, Anthony.

Anthony, born in Alexandria, Egypt, was 18 when his parents died and left him great riches. From childhood he had been of a melancholy, contemplative disposition. He was troubled by the temptations of the world and the responsibilities which riches imposed. He gave his wealth to the poor and joined a company of hermits, with whom he lived in great sanctity and self-denial. But still being subjected to many temptations by the Devil, he wandered forth alone and shut himself up in a cavern for 20 years. And when he had reached 90, his heart was uplifted by the thought that no one had lived in solitude so long as he. But in a vision, a voice said to him, "There is one holier than you, for Paul the hermit has served God in solitude and penance for 90 years." He resolved to go and seek Paul. Journeying across the desert he finally came upon him in his cave, and while they talked, a raven brought them a loaf of bread. And Paul lifted up his eyes, blessed the goodness of God, and said, "For sixty years, every day, this raven has brought me half a loaf, but because you have come, the portion is doubled, and we are fed as Elijah was in the wilderness." At length Paul died, and looking up, Anthony beheld his spirit carried to heaven by the prophets and apostles and a company of angels. Anthony laid the body of Paul in a grave, returning to his monastery and relating all to his disciples. Anthony lived another 14 years. According to tradition, he died at the age of 105.

Anthony (Antonius) the abbot, an Egyptian, a holy man, strong in words and works, flourished at this time. He was not only endowed with such wisdom in divine matters and with such knowledge of morals, as may be acquired by human industry, but was also divinely gifted. The emperor Constantine received from him various writings, executed with great skill. As Jerome writes, Anthony wrote seven epistles in the Egyptian tongue, and sent them to the Egyptian churches. And those, in these times (like the epistles of St. Paul with us) were read in the churches. Afterwards, because of the courage manifested in them, they were translated into the Greek tongue. In his time he was an exhorter of mankind in the faith. Through letters and messengers he was often consulted by Helena for herself and her son. Bread alone was his food, and water his drink. He ate only at sunset. He was entirely devoted to contemplation. He died in the Year of the Lord 360, at the age of 105 years. After having been long concealed, his body, through divine revelation, was discovered in the time of the emperor, Justinian the Great. It was first brought from Thebes to Alexandria, and then to Gaul, where it rested in veneration.

The day of his commemoration is the 17th day of January.

Hilarius, the very illustrious bishop of Poitiers (Pictaviensis) was highly learned in all the Scriptures, and always a good Christian. When the people of Poitiers saw that he successfully fought the heretics with all his might, they elected him a bishop. He not only protected this province, but all France against the heretics. For this reason he was accused before the emperor Constantius, and was exiled to the island of Gallinaria, which was infested with snakes that disappeared on his arrival. Afterwards, when called home by the emperor, he awakened a dead son who had passed away without baptism. At the instigation of Saturninus, bishop of Arles (Arelatensis), he was sent to Phrygia (Phrigiam), because of his Christian faith. From there he returned to his own city after many temptations. He journeyed to the Lord in the Year of Our Salvation 371. He published these books described as follows: 12 books on the Trinity, On the Council, Response to Constantius, Against the Arrian Example of Growing Blasphemy. First among Catholics, he published hymns and songs.

Hilary, though properly a French saint, for he was bishop of Poitiers in the fourth century, is considered one of the lights of the Italian Church. He distinguished himself in Lombardy by opposing the Arians. He left writings that have been quoted with admiration by Erasmus, Locke, and Gibbon.

The last two sentences ("He published . . . songs.") are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, celebrated for his piety and skill, during these times suffered severe persecution at the hands of the Arian heretics; for in years past, he had stood up against the same heretics in the council at Laodicea and had overcome them with clear and evident reasoning, and upon strong and highly sensible grounds and arguments that the Son was coeval with the Father. But when Arius and his associates could no longer contest this, they undertook to disgrace him. From a corpse they cut an arm, and this they showed to the emperor, stating that Athanasius had cut the arm off of Arsenius to employ it in sorcery. But having been warned, he at length exhibited the arm and exposed their fraud; he was nevertheless severely condemned by Constantius; and he fled, and for six consecutive years was hidden in the vault of a cistern, near the water, where he never saw the sun. Afterwards he was reported by a maiden, but, in accordance with divine warning he went into the region of Constans the emperor, who by threats compelled his brother Constantius to again accept Athanasius. Finally, on the second day of May, in the Year of the Lord 379, after many temptations, and having earned the crown of patience, he passed away in blessedness in the time of the emperors Valentinian and Valens. He wrote books (such as) Against the Pagans (Gentiles) and many others with (his?) symbol. Whoever wishes to be saved, etc.

Athanasius, whose famous creed remains a stumbling block in Christendom, was born at Alexandria about 298. He was the eldest of the Greek Fathers, and began his career by the study of profane literature, science and eloquence; but seized by the religious spirit of the age, he too fled to the desert, and became for a time the pupil of Anthony. He returned to Alexandria, and was ordained deacon. His first appearance as a public character was at the celebrated Council of Nicaea (325 CE), when he opposed Arius and his partisans with so much zeal and eloquence, that he was forever after regarded as the great pillar of orthodoxy. He became bishop of Alexandria, and the rest of his life was a perpetual contest with Arius, over whom he finally gained the victory. He died in 372, having been bishop of Alexandria for 46 years, of which 20 were spent in exile and tribulation.

The last two sentences are not in the German edition. The last sentence, "Whoever wishes to be saved, etc." (Latin = Quicumque vult salvus esse et cetera) is the beginning of the famous creed credited to him by later ages, but most likely not composed by him.

Juvencus (Iuvencus), a Spaniard, poet and cardinal, of noble parentage, and yet more noble in virtue and learning, was highly renowned at this time. He composed four books in which he translated nearly word for word into hexameter verse the four gospels. He also wrote in that meter certain works pertaining to the order of the mysteries.

Little is known of Iuvencus, an intriguing individual to say the least, who is among the first Christian poets. Here is a snippet of his adaptive-poetic technique from his epic poem Evangeliorum liber ('Book of the Gospels'; also called Evangeliorum libri quattuor ["Four Books of the Gospels"]), which uses the Gospel of Matthew as its primary source. First the Vulgate of Matthew 20:28:

Et qui voluerit inter vos primus esse, erit vester servus. Sicut filius hominis non venit ministrari, sed ministrare, et dare animam suam redemptionem pro multis.

And now 3.608-611 of Iuvencus' Matthew:

*Nec primus quisquam, nisi cunctis serviat, unus
Esse potest. Hominis natus sic vestra minister
Obsequio solus proprio pia munera gestat,
Pro multisque animam pretioso sanguine ponit.*

Jerome also mentions another poetic work by him, The Order of the Mysteries, which is now lost.

The people of Hibernia were instructed in the Christian faith by a woman prisoner. And so also the Armenians in the East received the faith. And thus the Christian faith spread to the surrounding regions.

The second schism of the Arians occurred between Liberius and Felix, the popes; for when the Council of Milan was held, all those who adhered to Athanasius were sent into exile; and therefore Liberius was away from the city of Rome for three years, and they elected Felix in his place. He was afterwards driven out by Constantius, and Liberius was reinstated. Out of this arose a violent persecution in which the priests and clerics in the churches were slain everywhere.

Felix the Second, a pope, and a Roman, was elected pope by the heretics after Liberius was driven out, or by the Christians in the place of Liberius; although Jerome states that this was done by the heretics. Now when he came into the pontificate he pronounced Constantius a heretic, and not properly baptized. And a great schism arose between Felix and Liberius, as just mentioned, but Felix could in no manner be diverted from the correct faith. He was taken prisoner by his adversaries, and was slain with many of his adherents. And he was buried in a church that he himself had built on the Aurelian Way at the second mile-stone from the city (i.e, Rome) on the 20th day of November. And he had sat only one year, four months and two days because of the uproar instigated by Liberius. [Felix II, antipope, was in 356 raised from the archdeaconate of Rome to the papal chair, when Liberius was banished by the emperor Constantius for refusing to condemn Athanasius. In 357 Constantius agreed to release Liberius if he would sign that semi-Arian creed. Constantius also issued an edict that the two bishops should rule conjointly, but Liberius was received with such enthusiasm that Felix was obliged to retire. He retired to Porto, where he died in 365].

Damasus the pope, a Spaniard, whose father was Antony, followed Liberius in the time of Julian, the emperor. He was a good man and the very best guide. He ordained that no one should be condemned in court before a hearing had taken place. He commanded also, under pain of excommunication, that no one through reckless greed should attempt to exercise any powers granted by the Roman see. After the promulgation of these laws and the establishment of peace in the churches, Damasus took pleasure in his literary free time to write the lives of all the popes who had preceded him. He also increased the houses of worship and the divine services, and described the pious bodies buried in them for commemoration by posterity. He likewise ordered that the psalms should be sung interchangeably in the churches, and at the end of each psalm, the Gloria Patri, etc. He was the first to give credence to the writings of Jerome, for up to that time the writings of the Seventy alone were held in esteem. Finally, when he had created many priests and 62 bishops, he died and was buried on the Ardeantine Way with his sister and mother in the church that he himself had founded, on the 11th day of December, after having sat for 19 years, 3 months and 11 days. At that time the chair was vacant for 21 days.

Damasus was pope from 366-384 CE. As a deacon he protested against the banishment of Pope Liberius (355); but when the emperor Constantius sent to Rome the anti-pope Felix II, Damasus with the other clergy rallied to his cause. When Liberius returned from exile and Felix was expelled, Damasus again supported Liberius. On the death of Liberius (366), he was nominated successor; but the irreconcilables of the party of Liberius set up against him another deacon, Ursinus. A serious conflict ensued which quickly led to rioting. The prefect of Rome recognized the claims of Damasus, and Ursinus and his supporters were expelled. The new pope also secured the sympathy of the people by his zeal in discovering the tombs of martyrs, and in adorning them with precious marbles and monumental inscriptions. The inscriptions he composed himself, in mediæval verse, full of Virgilian reminiscences. In Rome he erected or embellished the church that still bears his name (S. Lorenzo in Damaso).

The West was gradually recovering from the effects of the Arian crisis, and Damasus endeavored to eliminate from Italy and Illyria the last champion of the Council of Rimini. The bishops of the East, however, under the direction of Basil, were involved in a struggle with the emperor Valens, whose policy was favorable to the council of Rimini. Damasus, to whom they appealed for help, was unable to be of much service because that Episcopal group, viewed askance by Athanasius and his successor Peter, was incessantly combated at the papal court by the hatred of Alexandria. The Eastern bishops triumphed in the end under Theodosius, at the council of Constantinople in 381, in which the Western church took no part. They were invited to a council at Rome in 382, but only a few attended. This council had brought to Rome the learned monk Jerome, for whom Damasus showed great esteem, entrusting to him the revision of the Latin text of the Bible. Damasus died December 11, 384.

The third schism was between Damasus and Ursinus (Ursicinum), in consequence of which there was a resort to force and arms. But before long Damasus was confirmed by the common consent of the priests and the people; while Ursinus was relegated to the Neapolitan church. Damasus also, once upon a time, was accused of adultery. But upon his acquittal before a public council, he was absolved of guilt, and his false accusers condemned and cast out of the church; and it was decreed that whosoever should falsely accuse anyone should themselves suffer the pains and penalties provided for the crime.

Siricius the pope, a Roman, whose father was Tyburtius (Tyburcio), lived in the time of Valentinian. He ordained that the monk whose life was such as to be worthy of consecration from the beginning might attain the honor of bishop. He also ordained that the consecrations should be given from time to time. He forbade the Manichean heretics at Rome to hold communion with the faithful. However, those who desired to return and did penance were to be again accepted if they wished to come back to the cloister to improve their days with fasting and prayer. He ordered that a priest should be ordained only by a bishop, and that he who took on a widow or other housewife should be deprived of his office; also that heretics were to be taken back by laying on of the hand. As the affairs of the church were now brought to a state of peace, and this Siricius had consecrated twenty-six priests, sixteen deacons, and thirty-two bishops, he died and was buried in the cemetery of Priscilla on the Salarian Way on the 22nd day of March, and was buried. He sat (in office) 15 years 11 months and 25 days. At that time the chair was vacant for 20 days. [Siricius, pope from 384 to 399, succeeded Damasus. The disfavor that he showed to the monks led to the departure of Jerome from Rome to Bethlehem. Several of the decretal letters of Siricius are extant, setting forth the rules of ecclesiastical discipline. During his pontificate the last attempt to revive paganism in Rome was made by Nicomachus Flavianus. Siricius died November 26, 399].

Julian (Julianus) was a brother of Gallus the emperor. When Constantius became sole emperor, he made of this Julian, his uncle, a Caesar against the Gauls, who had revolted; and to him he espoused his sister. At that time a great number of Germans (Alamanni) at Strasbourg (Argentianum) were slain by him with but a few men. And when not long afterwards the German army was driven back with the assistance of the Gauls, Julian, with the sanction of the army, was raised to imperial honors. Hearing this, Constantius was afflicted with the dropsy, so that he died of pain and depression; for he learned that Julian was antagonistic. Now this Julian was an excellent man, and versed in the liberal arts; but he was yet more learned in Greek letters. He was a strong and alert orator, had a powerful memory, was kind to his friends, upright to his countrymen, and zealous for honor and renown. But all these qualities he obscured and reversed when he turned against the Christians. He was a more cunning persecutor than others had been; for he did not invoke new punishments, but with rewards, honors, faunings, flattery and advice, he aroused the people, more so than if he had been otherwise more cruel. He forbade that Christians be taught by pagan masters, and ordered that the schools should not be open to those who would not acknowledge the gods and goddesses. Some say that he was consecrated a Christian, and afterward abandoned the faith. Afterwards he undertook several wars; but these he conducted so unwisely that he was slain on the 6th day of the Kalends of July in the seventh year of his reign and the 31st year of his life. [Julianus, usually called Julian, and surnamed the Apostate, was Roman emperor 361-363 CE. He was born at Constantinople, 331 CE, and was the son of Julius Constantius by his second wife, Basilina, and the nephew of Constantine the Great. Julian and his brother Gallus were the only members of the imperial family whose lives were spared by the sons of Constantine the Great, on the death of the latter in 337. The two brothers were educated with care and brought up in the Christian religion; but as they advanced to manhood they were watched with jealousy and suspicion by the emperor Constantius. After the execution of Gallus in 354, the life of Julian was in great peril; but he succeeded in pacifying the suspicions of the emperor, and was allowed to go to Athens, in 355, to pursue his studies. Here he devoted himself with ardor to the study of Greek literature and philosophy, and attracted universal attention by his attainments and ability. Julian had already abandoned Christianity in his heart and returned to the pagan faiths of his ancestors; but fear of Constantius prevented him from making an open declaration of his apostasy. He did not remain long at Athens. In 355 he received from Constantius the title of Caesar, and was sent into Gaul to oppose the Germans, who had crossed the Rhine and were ravaging some of the provinces of Gaul. During the next five years he carried on war against the two German confederacies of Alamanni and Franks with great success, and gained many victories. His internal administration was distinguished by justice and wisdom; and he gained the good will and affections of the provinces entrusted to him. This aroused the jealousy of Constantius, who ordered him to send some of his best troops to the East to serve against the Persians. His soldiers refused to leave their favorite general and proclaimed him emperor in Paris in 360. After several fruitless negotiations between Julian and Constantius, both parties prepared for war. In 361 Julian marched along the valley of the Danube toward Constantinople; but Constantius, who set out for Syria to oppose his rival, died on his march in Cilicia. His death left Julian master of the empire. Julian entered Constantinople on December 11th. He lost no time in avowing himself a pagan, but proclaimed that Christianity would be tolerated equally with paganism. He did not, however, act impartially toward the Christians. He preferred pagans as his military and civil officers, forbade the Christians to teach grammar and rhetoric in the schools, and, in order to annoy them, allowed the Jews to rebuild the temple of Jerusalem (or, he allowed this rebuilding because he was interested in promoting all non-Christian religions in his Empire). In 363 Julian set out against the Persians and boldly marched into the interior of the country in search of the Persian king. His army suffered much from heat, lack of water and provisions, and he was at length compelled to retreat. The Persians fearfully harassed his rear, and although the Romans remained victorious in many a bloody engagement, Julian was mortally wounded in the last battle on June 26, 363, and died the same day. Jovian, on the field of battle, was chosen emperor in his place. Julian was an extraordinary character. As a monarch he was attentive to business, upright, and broad in his views. As a man he was virtuous in the midst of a profligate age. In consequence of his apostasy he has been slandered by Christian writers, but for the same reason extolled by pagan authors. He wrote a large number of works. His style is remarkably pure and is a close imitation of classical Greek].

Jovian (Jovinianus), born in Pannonia, was physically attractive, of a happy disposition, and devoted to learning. He was elected to the sovereignty by the common consent of the army, not so much at his own instigation, as at the request of his father who was better acquainted with the soldiers. And although he was thus elected emperor, he did not wish to be acknowledged such until the people had acknowledged themselves Christians. When this occurred he took the government, and relieved the army of the barbarians. Afterwards things changed; he was twice defeated by the Persians due to his army's dissension and lack of supplies. And so he followed the dictates of necessity, making a peace by ceding territory previously taken—something that had not happened for many years. After that he marched to Greece; and he died in the vicinity of Galatia. He was otherwise not an unruly or unwise man. Some say he died of starvation; others, that he died of the odor of fresh plaster in his bedchamber, etc. He died in the seventh month of his reign on the fourteenth day of the Kalends of March in the thirty-third year of his life. [Jovian (Jovianus), was a Roman emperor (363-364 CE). As captain of the imperial bodyguard, he accompanied Julian in his Persian expedition, and on the latter's death was unexpectedly chosen emperor by the army. He at once continued the retreat begun by Julian, and continually harassed by the Persians, succeeded in reaching the banks of the Tigris, where he concluded a humiliating peace. Five provinces that had been conquered by Galerius in 298 were surrendered, together with Nisibis and other cities. The Romans also gave up all interests in Armenia and abandoned its Christian prince Arsaces to the Persians. During his return to Constantinople Jovian was found dead in his bed half way between Ancyra and Nicaea. Under Jovian, Christianity was established as a State religion, although paganism was tolerated].

Valentinian (Valentinianus), born at Cibalia, in Pannonia, was a captain of the shield-bearers, and fully a Christian man. Julian the Apostate ordered him to sacrifice to the gods or stay out of the army. And although he willingly gave up military honors for the Christian faith, nevertheless, upon the slaying of Julian and the death of Jovian he was elected emperor as successor. He was an excellent emperor, of honest countenance, courageous disposition, prudent proposals, timely speech, and hateful of vice and avarice. He was sparing in his words, earnest and emphatic, etc.

Valentinian (Valentinianus), Roman emperor (364-375 CE), was the son of Gratianus. He was born in 321, at Cibalis, in Pannonia. He was the father of Gratianus, the emperor, and held important military commands under Julian and Jovian. On the death of Jovian he was elected emperor by the troops at Nicaea. A few weeks after his elevation he elected his brother Valens as co-emperor, assigning to him the East, while Valentinian himself governed the West. Valentinian was a Catholic, though his brother was an Arian. However, he did not persecute either Arians or pagans. He possessed ability, prudence, and vigor of character, had a capacity for military matters, and was a vigilant, impartial, and laborious administrator. However, he sometimes punished with excessive severity. The greater portion of his reign was taken up by the wars against the Alamanni, and the other barbarians along the Roman frontiers. His great qualities entitle him to a place among the most distinguished Romans.

The Latin edition of the Chronicle continues for several more sentences (not given in the translation), covering specific details concerning his brother Valens, his brother's Arianism, military campaigns, etc.

Valens held the Eastern Empire for four years after Valentinian's death, during which time Gratian (Graciano), Valentinian's son, ruled in the West. This Valens, rebaptized by Lucius of Constantinople, persecuted our people with enmity; nor did he spare those of our number who had gone to the desert, but commanded that these hermits should enter the military service; and if they refused, they were to be slain. Of these there were countless numbers in the wildernesses and hermitages of Egypt. At this time the Goths were driven out of their country and scattered all over Thrace. Valens armed against them; but later, at the instigation of the bishop and hermits, he was shot; and he was carried to a miserable hut, which was set on fire by the Goths. Valens was burned to death in the fourth year of his reign. This outbreak of the Goths resulted in disaster for the Roman Empire and all Italy.

Valens, emperor of Rome (364-378 CE), was born in 328, and was made emperor by his brother Valentinian. Much of his reign was occupied in wars with the Goths. At first he gained great advantages over the barbarians, concluding a peace in 370 that stipulated that they would not cross the Danube. But in 376 the Goths were driven out of their country by the Huns, and Valens allowed them to cross the Danube and settle in Thrace and the country on the borders of the Danube. Dissention soon arose between the Romans and these dangerous neighbors, and in 377 the Goths took up arms. Valens marched against them with a powerful army, but was defeated with great slaughter near Adrianople in 378. Valens was never seen after the battle. Some say he died on the field, others that he was burned to death in a peasant's home, to which he was carried, and which the barbarians set on fire without knowing who was in it. It was during the reign of Valens that the Goths were for the first time were admitted to the countries south of the Danube. The Battle of Adrianople is one of the great turning points in the late history of the Roman Empire. As part of a more extended series of campaigns known as the Gothic War (376–382), the Battle of Adrianople is often considered the start of the final collapse of the Western Roman Empire in the 5th century. Ironically, Adrianople actually was fought between the Goths and the Eastern Roman Empire, which ultimately withstood the Gothic invasions and developed into the Byzantine Empire.

The furious contests between Catholics and Arians also marked this reign.

Folio CXXXII verso

Nicholas (Nicolas), of illustrious parentage, was a citizen of the city of Panthera (Patere), in the country of Lycia (Licie). While still a child and nursed by his mother, he only suckled from his mother's breasts twice a week, on Wednesday and Friday. Now when he was a young man, after he had lost both his parents, among other acts of virtue he performed the following memorable acts. His neighbor, an upright man, was, because of his poverty, about to give up his three daughters of marriageable age to prostitution. When this came to the notice of this holy man, he, out of sympathy, at night secretly threw a small quantity of gold through the window of the poor man's house. And with this he married off his first daughter. He did likewise with the others. Afterwards he was elected bishop of Myra. He was humble, kind in admonition, earnest in punishment, and circumspect in his speech to women. At length he began to appear in miracles, so that those who invoked his name were helped—particularly mariners. Full of days, he died in blessedness, and many sick people were healed by the oil that flowed out of his grave. We celebrate his feast day on the eighth day of the Ides of December. [Nicholas was born at Panthera, a city of the province of Lycia, Asia Minor. On account of his popularity, more legends surround him than perhaps any other saint of this time. His parents were Christians. After they had been married many years, a son was granted them in recompense of the prayers and tears and the alms that they had offered up continually. He no sooner knew what it was to feed than he knew what it was to fast, and every Wednesday and Friday he would take the breast but once. His parents, seeing him full of holy thoughts, dedicated him to the service of God. After he was ordained a priest, he became still more remarkable for sobriety and humility, more modest in countenance, grave in speech, and rigorous in self-denial. While still a youth, his parents died of the plague, and he became sole heir to their vast riches. He gave liberally to the needy. There dwelt in the city a nobleman who had three daughters. He became so poor that there remained no means of obtaining food for his daughters except by sacrificing them to a life of prostitution. Meanwhile the maidens wept continually, not knowing what to do. Hearing of their plight, Nicholas, one night when the maidens were asleep and their father sat watching and weeping, took a handful of gold, tied it in a handkerchief, and threw it into an open window, and it fell at the feet of the father. With this he dowered his eldest daughter. And so Nicholas did on a second and a third occasion. After some years he took a voyage to the Holy Land. A terrible storm came up, and the sailors begged him to save them. He rebuked the storm, and it ceased. Returning from Palestine he journeyed to Myra, where he lived in obscurity and humility for some time. But one day the bishop of the city died, and Nicholas was chosen his successor. As such he practiced every saintly virtue, particularly charity, and later performed many miracles. Nicholas was, after Jesus and the Virgin Mary, perhaps the most popular Christian religious figure in the Middle Ages. Indeed, Saint Nicholas eventually metamorphizes via political cartoonist Thomas Nast's drawings, a nineteenth-century poem ("Twas the Night Before Christmas"), and an early 20th-century advertising campaign by the Coca-Cola company) into the modern Santa Claus, a figure who has in some ways (at least in the United States) eclipsed Mary and Jesus—at least during the month of December].

Donatus, a heretic from Africa ['Africa' in Latin usually refers to North Africa, specifically the lands of Libya and Tunisia], wrote much against the Christians at this time, and with his poisoned teachings he misled almost all Africa and Judea. He erred, saying the Son was less than the Father, and the Holy Spirit less than the Son. Finally, in great distress, he was driven out of Carthage. He wrote many things, especially a book on the Holy Spirit containing the Arian doctrine. [Donatus, bishop of Casa Nigra, Numidia, originated the Donatist movement in the fourth century CE. The predisposing causes of the Donatist schism were the belief that the validity of all sacerdotal acts depended upon the personal character of the agent and the question, arising out of that belief, as to the eligibility for sacerdotal office of the traditores, or those who had delivered up their copies of the Scriptures under the compulsion of the Diocletian persecution; the exciting cause was the election of a successor to Mensurius, bishop of Carthage, who died in 311. He had held moderate views as to the treatment of the traditores, and a strong fanatical party, supported by Secundus, primate of Numidia, had formed in Carthage in opposition to him and secured the election of Caecilian, the archdeacon before the other party was ready for action. This election was confirmed by the Synod of Arles in 314 and at Milan by the emperor two years later. The Donatist position was that the church is a society of holy persons. The Catholic standpoint was that holiness is not destroyed by the presence of unworthy members. After varying fortunes the severest punishments were pronounced against the Donatists by Emperor Honorius should they fail to return to the Catholic faith. They were denied all civil rights and the holding of assemblies was forbidden them on pain of death. But they lived on, suffering with their orthodox brethren in the Vandal invasions of the fifth century, and like them, finally disappearing before the Muslim onslaught two centuries later].

Eunomius, another heretic of this time, was a leper in body and soul and not otherwise within nor without. He was afflicted with the royal disease [The 'royal disease' here is jaundice]. He at first was an adherent of the Arian faithlessness, but then added and disseminated another false belief. He was affirming that the Son was unlike the Father in all things and that the Holy Spirit had nothing in common with either the Son or the Father. [Eunomius was born at Dacora, in Cappadocia, early in the fourth century. He studied at Alexandria and held ecclesiastical office at various places. His sect held that Christ was created by God and was a wholly subordinate being. The Eunomian heresy was condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 381].

Macedonius (whom our people, before he erred, made a bishop at Constantinople) was driven out by the Arian heretics because he acknowledged the Son equal to the Father. He blasphemed the Holy Spirit and thus stirred up many controversies by those who were called Macedonian heretics. [Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople, in succession to Eusebius of Nicomedia, was elected by the Arian bishops in 341, while the orthodox party elected one Paul. In 342 Macedonius was recognized as patriarch and Paul was banished. The distinctive tenet of the Macedonians was that the Holy Spirit is but a being similar to the angels, subordinate to and in the service of the Father and the Son, the relation between whom did not admit of a third. Macedonius was expelled from his see by the Council of Constantinople in 360].

Donatus, a master of rhetoric, oratory and philosophy, was the teacher of the holy Jerome, and was held in great esteem at Rome. And, among other things, he wrote a commentary on Terence. And, as they say, this Donatus is the author of a little book that up to the present is read in schools by boys learning the first elements of grammar. [Donatus was a celebrated grammarian. He taught at Rome in the middle of the fourth century and was the teacher of Jerome. His most famous work is a system of Latin grammar that has formed the groundwork of most elementary treatises upon the subject from his own time to the present].

Julian (Julianus), the emperor, was vainly addicted to the black arts. To the distress of the Christians, he rebuilt the Temple at Jerusalem for the Jews, saying he did not care to worship elsewhere. For that reason the Jews were so inflated with vanity that they contributed more to the work than usual. But before long the Temple was destroyed by an earthquake and many Jews were crushed. On the second day fire came down from above and consumed the building's ironwork. Through fright caused by this miracle, many Jews turned to the Christian faith. Some write that Julian was shot through with an arrow, but no one knows from where; and that with upraised hands he cried to heaven, You have conquered, Galilean, you have conquered! for he called Christ a Galilean and a carpenter's son. [Julian, see Folio CXXXII recto, and note].

John and Paul, brothers, were very Christian men and very famous Romans. When Julian (Julianus) heard that they supported the poor from their estates they were taken prisoner; and at Rome, upon the command of Julian, they were beheaded on the 26th day of June after receiving numerous scourgings. [John and Paul were officers in the service of Constantia, whom the old legends persist in representing as a most virtuous Christian (though she was probably otherwise) and were put to death by Julian the Apostate].

Gordian (Gordianus) and Epimachus, highly renowned men, were crowned with martyrdom at Rome in the disturbances of these times. The first, because he acknowledged the Christian faith, was beaten with leaden scourges, and finally beheaded on the 10th day of May; and his corpse was thrown to the dogs. His body was buried at night by the members of his household. [Gordian and Epimachus. Gordian was a magistrate (vicarius) of Julian the Apostate, and was sent by the emperor to visit a Christian priest, named Janisarius, who was imprisoned for his faith, and to endeavor to make him abjure Christ. But the result of the interview was the conversion of Gordian, who was now degraded from office and cruelly martyred. His body was buried by a servant in the same tomb as Epimachus, a martyr of Alexandria, who had been brought to Rome in the previous reign].

Juliana and Demetria, the virgins, also attained the crown of martyrdom by order of Julian (Julianus), the tyrant in this persecution.

Cyriacus (Quiriacus), also called Judas, a bishop of Jerusalem, at this time, together with his mother, Anna, suffered martyrdom with fortitude for the Christian faith. This is the man who showed St. Helena the place where the cross lay buried; and because of the miracles that took place at the discovery of the cross, he determined to proclaim everywhere the glory and honor of the same. For that he was taken prisoner by the pagans, and was nailed to a cross. And therefore (as many say), the order of the Crusaders had its origin with him. [Cyriacus (also spelled Quiriacus, Quiricus, and Kyriakos) also called Judas (and most commonly Judas Cyriacus), was, according to Eusebius, the fifteenth bishop of Jerusalem. This Judas is venerated on April 10th, but is supposed to be the same person also called Quiriacus by the martyrologists commemorated on this day. That he was the true discoverer of the wood of the true cross is hardly possible; and the claim that he was a martyr in the reign of Julian is unsupported. He is said to have been a Jew, the nephew of Stephen the first martyr, and grandson of Zacharias. He is also said to have revealed to Helena the place where the cross of Christ was hidden, to have been converted by the miracles wrought on its discovery, and to have been baptized under the name of Quiriacus or Cyriacus, and to have become bishop of Jerusalem. But there was no patriarch of the name of Cyriacus, and Judas died in 133. Helena did not visit Jerusalem until 326].

Folio CXXXIII recto

At this time real wool, mixed with the clouds, fell in rain in the land of the Atrebates (Atrabatas). [The Atrebates were a people in Gallia Belgica, in the modern Artois, which is a corruption of their name. In Caesar's time (57 CE) they numbered 15,000 warriors; their capital was Nemetocenna. Part of them crossed over to Britain, where they dwelt in the upper valley of the Thames, Oxfordshire and Berkshire]. Marvelously large hailstones fell at Constantinople, killing a number of persons; and an earthquake occurred throughout the earth. In these turbulent times Athanaricus, king of the Goths, cruelly persecuted the Christians among his people, and elevated them to martyrdom. [Athanaricus was a king of the Visigoths during their stay in Dacia. In 367-369 CE he carried on war with the emperor Valens, with whom he finally concluded a peace. In 374 Athanaric was defeated by the Huns, and, after defending himself for some time in a stronghold in the mountains of Dacia, was compelled to fly in 380, and take refuge in the Roman territory. He died in 381]. Over 80,000 armed Burgundians settled down on the banks of the Rhine, and before long they accepted the Christian faith. At this time, while Valens reigned, the Huns lay concealed in the inaccessible mountain fastnesses for a long while. They came forth against the Goths with such swift vengeance and ferocity that they drove them out of the country. Fleeing over the Danube, the Goths were taken in by the emperor Valens without entering into a treaty or alliance. Afterwards they were subjected to such unendurable poverty by Maximus that starvation drove them to take up arms. They fought against the army of Valens, and invaded all of Thrace, ravaging everywhere with fire and death. Now, when the Goths asked him to send them a bishop to instruct them in the faith, he sent a teacher of the Arian heresy; and so this entire people became Arian. After the emperor was slain the Goths appeared before Constantinople; but Dominica, the august wife of Valens, gave them a large sum of money and thus ransomed the city, and preserved the loyalty of her subjects to the empire.

It is agreed that the people who are called Progethic(?) Gothic had their origin from the Scythians, and that the Scythians first were in Europe in the north and at the border of the Tanais. ['Tanais' is the ancient name for the River Don in Russia. Strabo (11.1) regarded it as the boundary between Europe and Asia]. They were a savage people who were very ready to die. Above them were the Ostrogoths, and below them the Visigoths. The first dwelling in that region of the west, the latter in that region of the east in which they lived, having the names they are called in their country. The Huns themselves are also Scythians. But the Goths are far more savage since they, dwelling nearer to the Riphean Mountains [The 'Riphean Mountains' is the ancient name for the Ural Mountains in Russia which, like the Tanais River, were regarded as the boundary between Europe and Asia], are exposed to the harsh and cold environment of the north. [This paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle. The translation offered here is, at points, highly speculative. Suggestions/corrections for improving it are eagerly sought].

Basil (Basilius) the Great, bishop of Caesarea, in Cappadocia, was illustrious for his great virtue and wisdom in these times. He was the father of many monks. Among the stories of his virtue and piety is one relating to a youth, who, for the love of a maiden, surrendered himself to the Devil; but Basil reconciled him to God, and commanded the Devil to return the document of surrender. Being a very celebrated teacher, Basil wrote excellent books against the heretic Eunomius; also a book concerning the Holy Spirit, and other short works. In Greece he founded the order of the isolated or monastic people. This holy father died on the first day of the month of January in the sixth year of the reign of Valentinian, and was illustrious for his numerous miracles. [Basil (Basilius) the Great, was born in 329 CE at Caesarea. He studied at Antioch or Constantinople under Linianus, subsequently continuing his studies at Athens, chiefly under the sophists Himerius and Proaeresius. Among his fellow students were the emperor Julian and Gregory of Nazianzus, the latter becoming his intimate friend. After acquiring the greatest reputation as a student for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy and science, he returned to Caesarea where he pleaded causes. However, he soon abandoned his profession, devoting himself to a religious life. For many years his life was that of an ascetic. He was elected bishop of Caesarea in 370 in the place of Eusebius. He died in 379].

Gregory (Gregorius) Nazianzus (Nazianzenzus), the bishop, who conducted Basil to a monastery, was a teacher of Jerome in the Holy Scriptures, and was held in great esteem at this time for his piety, knowledge of letters, and eloquence. He wrote many things, particularly in praise of Cyprian (Cipriani), Athanasius, and Maximus the Wise. He wrote two books against Eunomius, and one against the Emperor Julian. He also wrote of the obligations of marriage, and eulogized virginity in poetry. For legitimate reasons he relieved the people of Constantinople of heresy. When very old he elected a successor, and from that point on lived a secluded life in the country. Gregory died in the time of Theodosius, Basil and Gratian. [Gregory (Gregorius), surnamed Nazianzen, was born in a village near Nazianzus, in Cappadocia, about 329 CE. His father took the greatest pains with his education, and he afterward pursued his studies at Athens, where he earned the greatest reputation for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy, and mathematics. Among his fellow students were Julian, future emperor, and Basil, with whom he formed a most intimate friendship. He returned home from Athens after a sojourn of six years. Having received ordination, he continued to reside at Nazianzus, where he discharged his duties as a presbyter, and assisted his aged father, bishop of the town. After the latter's death he refused to continue as bishop, being averse to a public life, and fond of solitary meditation. After living some years in retirement, he was summoned to Constantinople to defend the orthodox faith against the Arians and other heretics. In 380 he was made bishop of Constantinople by the emperor Theodosius, but resigned the office in the following year, and withdrew altogether from public life. He lived in solitude at his paternal estate, and died there in 389 or 390. He wrote orations, sermons, letters and poems]. Epiphanius, a bishop of Salamis, in Cyprus, attacked all heretics with exceptional courage, and in his great age wrote various books. He died like a saint on the fourth day of the Ides of May.

At this time there lived in Syria two holy men of great faith, named the Macharii. They were disciples of St. Anthony. One lived in the upper desert, the other in the lower. Hilarion, a most pious abbot, lived in the island of Cyprus, not far from the city of Salamis. After he saw Anthony, he led a severe life and died on the 12th day of the Kalends of November. Arsenius, born of a Roman senator, became a hermit in response to a voice that spoke to him, saying, Arsenius, if you would be saved, flee mankind and be silent. From that point on he persevered in a holy life and performed miracles in the service of Christ. He died at the age of ninety-five, concluding a blessed life. [Arsenius (c. 354-450), an anchorite, is said to have been born of a noble Roman family. He was appointed by Theodosius the Great, tutor of the young princes Arcadius and Honorius; but at the age of forty he retired to Egypt, where for forty years he lived in monastic seclusion at Scetis in the Thebais, under the spiritual guidance of John the Dwarf. He died at the age of ninety-five, near Memphis. His biography by Simeon Metaphrastes is largely fiction]. Paphuntius, the abbot, converted Thais, a very shameless prostitute, to Christ at Thebes. And after he had written the life of St. Onuffrius, he was taken to heaven by the angels in the presence of the hermits. Agathon, the abbot, also lived at this time. For three years he carried a stone in his mouth in order to acquire the virtue of silence.

Mary (Maria) of Egypt, first known as a prostitute, became an example of piety, penitence and perseverance. She lived in the desert for forty-seven years, concluding a severe penance. She carried with her over the Jordan only two loaves of bread that soon became as hard as rock. By these she sustained herself for several years. On the 9th day of April she ascended to the Lord. Her body was buried by Zozimas, a very holy abbot.

Mary of Egypt, according to tradition, ran away from home to the pleasure-loving city of Alexandria, where she spent seventeen years of her life in prostitution. One day she joined a party on the way to Jerusalem by sea, to keep the solemn festival of the Exaltation of the Holy Cross to (first instituted by Constantine in 325), but with no religious purpose in her heart, only with a wicked desire to introduce disorder and vice among the pilgrims; and in her evil she went with the crowd on the feast day to the Church, but a mysterious power held her back. Filled with shame and fear, she fell upon the pavement and wept. Becoming penitent at the sight of an image of the Virgin Mother, she crept to the door, the angelic barrier was withdrawn, and the penitent entered. Then a voice came to her as from a mighty distance, "Pass over Jordan, and you will find rest." She hastened to put this command into execution, bathed her face and hands in the sacred water, and on the next day crossed the river, taking with her a few loaves, and praying the Virgin to be her guide. She spent 47 years in the wilderness, seeing no man, and living on herbs and wild dates. Her clothes wore out, and she suffered from alternate heat and cold, and often from hunger. She was discovered by Zozimus, a holy anchorite in Palestine, who gave her his mantle. And when they parted, the penitent made Zozimus promise to return next Lent and bring with him the most precious Body and Blood of our Lord, and to wait for her on the banks of the Jordan nearest to the desert in which she dwelt.

Next year, in Lent, when the brethren dispersed, Zozimus was detained at his monastery by sickness, but by the end of Lent he recovered and made his way to Jordan. Night drew on, and the holy woman did not come. But as the moon rose, he saw her on the other bank. She crossed the stream and received the sacred mysteries that Zozimus had brought with him. And again they parted.

Next Lent Zozimus again traversed the solitude; but when he came to the banks he found Mary lying there, wrapped in the shreds of his old mantle, quite dead. Stooping down, he saw traced on the sands these words, "Abbot Zozimus, bury here the body of the sinner Mary." But he had no spade. A lion came out of the desert, and with his feet dug a hole; and there the old man laid the penitent to await the resurrection of the just.

Anastasius the pope, a Roman, successor to Siricius (Syricium), elected under the Emperor Gratian (Graciano), ordained that the priests should in no event sit, but stand with heads bowed while the Gospel was being read or sung in the churches of God; also that pilgrims, and most of all those who wandered overseas, should not be admitted to the clergy or to consecration, unless they could produce the signatures of the five bishops. This came about (as they say) because of the Manichean heretics, who were in great veneration at that time in Africa, to the destruction of the faith because of the letters they sent forth. He also ordained that those who were physically weak [The Latin adjective debilis usually refers to physical weakness or frailty (including those who are crippled, lame, etc.), but can also refer to a general sense of helplessness or weakness], and those who lacked an arm, or any other member, should not be accepted in the number of the clergy or the consecrated. After he had made a number of priests, deacons and bishops, he died on the 5th day of the Kalends of May; and the chair was vacant 21 days at that time. [Anastasius I, pope from 399 to 401, condemned the writings of Origen shortly after their translation into Latin].

Innocent (Innocentius), the first pope with this name, was born in Albano in the time of Theodosius the emperor. He was a holy man, who understood many good things pertaining to the Christian and spiritual being. He was esteemed during the peace of the Roman Empire, and was favored with the good will of the emperor. He ordained that one should fast on Saturday, because Christ was laid in his grave on that day, and his disciples fasted. He made certain rules concerning the Jews, the pagans, and monks. He desired that a church once consecrated should not be consecrated again. He drove the Cathaphrygian heretics out of home, and condemned Pelagius, the monk or hermit; also Celestinus, another heretic; because they denied the necessity of divine grace, and said that for the fulfillment of the divine commandments the will alone was sufficient. This pope also ordained that on all festive days observed by the churches, before partaking of the Holy Sacrament, peace was to be given to all believers in Christ. He died and was buried in the cemetery Ad Ursum Pileatum [Ad Ursum Pileatum is Latin for 'to the bear wearing a helmet.'] on the 5th Kalends of August. He sat 15 years, 2 months and five days. And the chair was vacant for 22 days.

Innocent I, son of Anastasius I, was pope from 402 to 417. During his papacy the siege of Rome by Alaric took place. He maintained and extended the authority of the Holy See as the ultimate resort for the settlement of all disputes. He took a decided view on the Pelagian controversy, confirming the decisions of the synod of the province of pro-consular Africa held in Carthage in 416 which had been sent to him. He wrote in a similar sense to the fathers of the Numidian synod of Mileve who, Augustine being one of their number, had addressed him. He died March 12, 417. His successor was Zosimus.

The text speaks of the controversies among the theologians on the question of grace and free will, but the Pelagian doctrine is rather vaguely stated. In one sense grace is described as inspiration, in another as favor, or as power, or as pity; but the fundamental feature of the experience is man's perception that he is in touch with a wider Self from which there flow into him streams of rich and full energy. Some of his greatest achievements seem to have come to him from external sources, and he feels that he could never have attained them without that external influence. In Christianity the conception of grace has developed proportionately to the richness of the experiences of the believers. The Christian believes himself in touch with a deity whose character and influence are equivalent to the historical Jesus.

The largest single contribution on this question was made by Augustine, the Bishop of Hippo in Africa. The experiences of his stormy youth and impressive conversion led him to stress the irresistible power of God, and he therefore undervalued the importance of the co-operation of the free human will. According to his own past wickedness, interpreted as evidence of the correctness of the meaning of the early chapters of Genesis describing the Fall, man is not only by nature inclined to evil, but is now in such condition that he cannot by his own natural strength and good works carry out the will of God. According to the Roman Catholic catechism, we can do no good works of our own accord, but need the help of God's grace.

But Pelagius, a native of Britain, a learned layman and monk, contemporary with Augustine, saw no safeguard for righteousness unless men recognized the complete freedom of the will and realized that they were accountable for their own actions. In 417 Augustine secured the condemnation of Pelagius by imperial decree, which was confirmed by the Council of Ephesus fourteen years later. In the sixteenth century Erasmus tended to the side of Pelagius, but Luther, and even to a greater extent Calvin, leaned to the side of Augustine. Calvin seemed to insist that God predestines some to blessedness, others to damnation, and that man himself is so helpless and corrupt that all he can do is to thankfully receive whatever grace and mercy may be dealt out to him. The teaching and experience of Luther, however, that faith alone was needed to receive grace, was a great simplification of life.

Modern psychology has led to a clearer apprehension of the reality of grace. The notion that behind consciousness lies a large realm has suggested to some that grace is the inflow into consciousness (as through a mental sluice) of spiritual power existing in the realm of the subconscious or superconscious. Extension of Protestant principles has led many to discard sacraments, services, and institutions as means of grace, and to assert that the individual can find the power he needs ready to hand at all points in ordinary daily life.

Zosimus the pope, a Greek, succeeded Innocent in the time of Arcadius and Honorius, the emperors. He was a holy and pious man, and not unmindful of the many perplexities which affected divine matters. He ordained that in celebrating (the mass), the deacons should use a covering of cloth woven from flax and wool; that on holy Easter Eve the Easter candles be blessed in the parishes; that the clergy and consecrated ones do not drink in public; although this was quite permissible in the homes of the faithful. He also ordained that serfs and servants shall not be admitted to the clergy. It is said that Zosimus sent Faustinus the bishop and two priests of the city of Rome to the Council held at Carthage, in order to indicate that nothing was to be done there without the acquiescence of the Roman Church. He died after having sat one year, three months and twelve days; and then the chair rested eleven days. [Zosimus, bishop of Rome from March 18, 417 to December 26, 418, succeeded Innocent I. He took a decided part in the protracted dispute in Gaul as to the jurisdiction of the see of Arles over that of Vienne, but without settling the controversy. Of his attitude in the Pelagian controversy we have already spoken elsewhere].

Year of the World 5613 | Year of Christ 414

Boniface the First, a pope, and a Roman, whose father was Jucundus, lived in the time of Honorius. After he was chosen pope a schism occurred among the churchmen, for Boniface had been elected at one place, and Eulalius at another; and this is said to have been the fourth schism in the Church. When the emperor Honorius, then at Milan, became aware of this, both men were driven out of Rome. Seven months later, however, Boniface was recalled, and he alone was installed as pope, at Rome. And now having peacefully entered upon his pontificate, he made a number of laws for the benefit and honor of the clergy—particularly one to the effect that no one, during his absence, should under any circumstances be accused or condemned in court; also, that no man should be ordained as a priest until he had attained the age of thirty years. Boniface died and was buried on the Salarian Way with the body of Saint Felicity on the 8th of the Kalends of November. He sat three years, eight months and seven days. Immediately afterwards some chose Eulalius from the priesthood, and called him to Rome; but either because he was unwilling to act, or because he scorned worldly affairs, he ignored the summons. He died one year after Boniface. [Boniface I occupied the pontificate from 418 to 422. When his predecessor died, the clergy were divided, one faction electing Eulalius, the other Boniface. In the interest of public order the imperial government commanded the competitors to leave the town, the decision being reserved to a council. Eulalius having broken his ban, Honorius decided to recognize Boniface, and the council was countermanded].

Gratian (Gracianus [Gratian's name is spelled 'Racianus' in the Beloit College copy of the since space was left for the initial letter 'G' to be painted in later].), eldest son of Valentinian, held the sovereignty for six years after the death of Valens, although he had reigned a long time previously with Valens, his uncle, and Valentinian, the latter's brother. From youth he was stern in military affairs, and also a good Christian. Then, when a countless horde of the enemy overran the country of the Romans, he armed himself, and although but a youth, yet having faith in Christ, he raised a small army unequal to that of the enemy; and at Strasbourg he fought a fierce battle with incredible good fortune. Although the Roman losses were few, 30,000 Alamanni were routed. Thus Gratian was rewarded for his true love of the faith. When Ambrose (Ambrosius) was elected bishop all Italy returned to the true faith. He ordered all the ruined churches restored. Now when Gratian saw Thrace and Dacia in the hands of the Goths, and the Roman welfare in danger, he recalled from Spain Theodosius, then 33 years of age, and at Sirmium, with the unanimous consent of all, appointed him ruler of the East and of Thrace. This man, placing every faith in Christ's help, attacked the cruel and mighty Scythians, Alamanni, Huns, and Goths, and defeated them in many great battles. In the meantime Maximus ravished Britain, and then marched into Gaul; and at Lyons he slew Gratian, who was then 29 years of age. Nevertheless, Gratian was a learned and eloquent man, moderate in his meals and hours of sleep, and a victor over licentiousness. [Boniface I occupied the pontificate from 418 to 422. When his predecessor died, the clergy were divided, one faction electing Eulalius, the other Boniface. In the interest of public order the imperial government commanded the competitors to leave the town, the decision being reserved to a council. Eulalius having broken his ban, Honorius decided to recognize Boniface, and the council was countermanded].

Theodosius the Elder, a Spaniard, whose father was Theodosius and mother Termancia, after the death of Gratian (Graciano), was sole ruler of the Roman Empire for eleven years. At Aquileia he slew the tyrant Maximus, the murderer of Gratian. This was prophesied to that same tyrant by St. Martin. By divine assistance Theodosius suppressed many tyrants; for he was an augmenter and protector of the general welfare. Morally and physically he resembled Trajan. In addition to his military training he was very intelligent, and was devoted to a Christian life. Once upon a time when he wanted to attend church at Milan, a thing forbidden him because he had not done penance for a certain offense, and was refused admittance, he took this in good part, thanked Ambrose the bishop, and did penance. He married Flacilla, by whom he begot Arcadius and Honorius. He died at Milan in the fiftieth year of his life, leaving the sovereignty to his sons in peace. His body was taken to Constantinople and buried there. [Theodosius I, surnamed the Great, Roman emperor of the East (378-395 CE), was the son of the general Theodosius, who restored Britain to the empire and was beheaded at Carthage in the reign of Valens in 376. The future emperor was born in Spain in 346. He received a good education, and learned the art of war under his father, whom he accompanied in his British campaigns. After Valens fell in battle against the Goths, he was proclaimed emperor of the East by Gratian, who felt himself unable to sustain the burden of the empire. The Roman Empire in the East was then in a critical position; for the Romans were disheartened by the bloody defeat which they had sustained; and the Goths were insolent in their victory. Theodosius, however, gained two signal victories over them, and concluded a peace in 382. In 383 Maximus assumed the imperial purple in Britain, and invaded Gaul with a powerful army. In the war which followed Gratian was slain, and Theodosius, who did not consider it prudent to enter into a contest with Maximus, acknowledged him emperor of Spain, Gaul, and Britain, but he secured for Valentinian, the brother of Gratian, Italy, Africa, and western Illyricum. When Maximus expelled Valentinian from Italy, Theodosius espoused the latter's cause, and marched into the West at the head of a powerful army. After defeating Maximus in Pannonia, Theodosius pursued him across the Alps into Aquileia. Here Maximus was surrendered by his soldiers to Theodosius, and was put to death. In 389, Theodosius entered Rome in triumph, accompanied by Valentinian and his own son Honorius. In 390, while the emperor was at Milan, a serious riot broke out at Thessalonica, in which the imperial officer and several of his troops were murdered. To avenge this offense, Theodosius sent an army of barbarians to Thessalonica; the people were invited to the games of the Circus; and as soon as the place was filled, the soldiers received the signal for a massacre. This lasted for three hours, and over 7,000 paid the penalty of the insurrection. Ambrose, archbishop of Milan, revealed to Theodosius his crime in a letter, and told him that penitence alone could efface his guilt. When Theodosius was about to perform his devotions in the great church of Milan, the archbishop stopped him at the door, demanding an acknowledgment of his guilt. The conscience-stricken emperor humbled himself before the church, which has recorded his penance as one of its greatest victories. He laid aside the insignia of imperial power, and in the posture of a suppliant entreated pardon for his sin before the entire congregation. After eight months he was restored to communion with the church. Theodosius spent 3 years in Italy, establishing Valentinian II on the throne in the West, and returning to Constantinople in 391, and there he died in 395. His two sons, Arcadius and Honorius, had already been elevated to the rank of Augusti, and the empire was now divided between them, Arcadius taking the East, Honorius the West. Theodosius was a firm Catholic, and a fierce persecutor of the Arians and all heretics. It was in his reign that the formal destruction of paganism took place, with pagan worship being prohibited under severe penalties].

Arcadius (Archadius), son of Theodosius the Great, ruling in the East, and Honorius, his brother, in the West, held the sovereignty in common. Arcadius lived eleven years after his father's death. [Arcadius (378-408), Roman emperor, the elder son of Theodosius the Great, was created Augustus in 383, and succeeded his father in 395. The empire was divided between him and his brother Honorius, Honorius governing the two western prefectures (Gaul and Italy), and Arcadius the two eastern (the Orient and Illyricum). There was estrangement between the two governments throughout the reign of Arcadius. Honorius's general Stilicho was always on the watch to annex Illyricum. Arcadius was guided at first by the praetorian prefect Rufinus, and after his assassination, probably instigated by Stilicho, at the end of 395, by the eunuch Eutropius (executed at the end of 399). His wife, Eudoxia (daughter of a Frank general, Bauto), had great influence over him. She died in 404. In the last years of his reign, Anthemius (praetorian prefect) was his minister. In 395-400 the Gothic general Gainas, with the aid of partisans in Constantinople, tried to set up a German domination. But he fell after having held the city for six months. The banishment in 404 of John Chrysostom, patriarch of Constantinople, who had offended the empress and quarreled with the bishop of Alexandria, was important in determining the supremacy of the emperor to the patriarch]. They were still young when their father died; so he provided three mighty men as guardians, namely, Rufinus (Ruffinum) to rule the East; Stilicho (Stiliconem), the West; and Gildo (Gildonem), Africa. But they were so ambitious to rule that they determined to ignore these youths and to reign for themselves; however, because of his cruelty, Gildo was driven out by his brother Masceleger, and died of poison or of despondency. However, as Masceleger, after his victory, spared neither God nor man, his soldiers killed him. Rufinus was subjugated by Arcadius. Stilicho worked much harm to the common good; and when he was finally defeated by the Goths, and asked for help, the emperor ungratefully sent a number of officers, who killed Stilicho. [Rufinus, chief minister of state, under Theodosius the Great, was a dangerous and treacherous man. After the death of Theodosius in 395, he exercised paramount influence over the weak Arcadius; but toward the end of the year a conspiracy was formed against him by Eutropius and Stilicho, who induced Gainas, the Gothic ally of Arcadius, to join in the plot. In consequence Rufinus was slain by the troops of Gainas. Stilicho, son of a vandal captain under Valens, became a distinguished general under Theodosius I, and on the death of the latter in 375, the real ruler of the West under Honorius. His power increased when Rufinus died, as well as by the marriage of his daughter to Honorius. His military ability saved the Western Empire. In 403 he defeated Alaric, compelling him to retire from Italy. In 405 he gained a great victory over Radagaisus, who had invaded Italy with another horde of barbarians. These victories caused him to aspire to the mastery of the Roman empire; but he was apprehended and put to death at Ravenna in 408. Gildo, a Moorish chieftain, governed Africa for some years as a subject of the Western Empire. In 397 he transferred his allegiance to the Eastern Empire, Arcadius accepting him as a subject. Stilicho, guardian of Honorius, sent an army against him. Gildo was defeated, and being taken prisoner, hanged himself. Arcadius, emperor of the East (395-408), eldest son of Theodosius I, was born in Spain in 383. On the death of Theodosius he became emperor of the East, while the West was given to his younger brother Honorius. Arcadius possessed neither physical nor mental vigor, and was entirely governed by unworthy favorites. At first he was ruled by Rufinus, the prefect of the East, and on the murder of the latter soon after the accession of Arcadius, the government fell into the hands of the eunuch, Eutropius. The latter was put to death in 399, and his power now devolved upon Gainas, the Goth; but upon his revolt and death in 401, Arcadius became entirely dependant upon his wife Eudoxia. Arcadius died in 408 leaving the empire to his son Theodosius II].

Honorius was the brother of the aforesaid Arcadius. In moral and Christian life he resembled his father Theodosius. When, after accepting the sovereignty, he saw the strength of the commonwealth declining daily, he sent Constantius, a strong and warlike man, with an army into Gaul; and afterwards he married him to his sister Galla Placidia, to the joy of all. By her Constantius begat Valentinian, his son, who afterwards carried on the government. And therefore he took him to Ravenna to rule the empire jointly with him. However, before the expiration of seven months he passed away. In the meantime Placidia was driven out by her brother, and with her sons, Honorius and Valentinian, she went to the East. There she was honorably received by Theodosius. After Honorius had reigned fifteen years with the younger Theodosius, his brother's son, he died at Rome and was buried in a mausoleum next to the atrium of the blessed apostle Peter, leaving no living issue of his body. [Honorius, Roman emperor of the West (395-423 CE) was the second son of Theodosius the Great, and succeeded to the sovereignty of the West upon his father's death. During his minority the government was in the hands of Stilicho, whose daughter Honorius married. Stilicho for a time defended Italy against Alaric and Radagaisus. However, after Honorius put Stilicho to death on a charge of treason, Alaric invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome in 410. Honorius then lived an inglorious life at Ravenna, where he died in 423].

Ambrose (Ambrosius), bishop of Milan, was a Roman and a worthy advocate. He was a very pious man and among all the teachers of his time the highest and most distinguished. Upon the death of Auxentius he was elected bishop by divine indication and by the choice of the people, although he had been a pagan judge until then. And soon he was baptized and consecrated. For a child's voice was heard to say, This Ambrosius is worthy to be a bishop. He was the ninth bishop of Milan. Now, as he delivered several books to the emperor Gratian (Graciano) for the sake of the Christian faith, and was received with due honor, all Italy soon reverted to the true faith, and Gaul, lying on this side of the mountains, accepted the true faith. This Ambrosius was of such a good disposition, pious ways, acute intelligence, and was so divine in learning, that, not alone during his lifetime, but also after his death, he was commemorated in Italy and the surrounding countries. When this Ambrosius was still an unspeaking child, sleeping in the cradle, a swarm of bees covered his face as though it were a bee-hive, flying from it to symbolize that out of his mouth honeyed learning would flow; which actually occurred afterwards in the great sweetness of his teachings and writings of which he contributed a remarkable number to strengthen the faith and the churches. Among the Latin writers he shone like a flower. This very holy bishop died on the 4th day of the month of April. [Ambrose, one of the most celebrated Christian fathers, was born in 340 CE, the son of a prefect of Gaul. It is said that when an infant in the cradle a swarm of bees alighted on his mouth without injuring him. The same story was told of the archaic Greek poet Archilochus and the Greek philosopher Plato, and considered prophetic of pure eloquence. After an education at Rome he practiced with great success as an advocate at Milan. In 370 he was appointed prefect of the provinces now known as Genoa and Piedmont. On the death of Auxentius, bishop of Milan, in 374, the appointment of a successor led to a conflict between Arians and Catholics. Exerting his influence as a prefect to restore peace, Ambrose addressed the people in a conciliatory speech, at the conclusion of which a child in the farther part of the crowd cried out "Ambrosius episcopus!" ('Ambrose (should be) bishop!'). The words were received as an oracle from heaven, and Ambrose was elected bishop by the multitude, the bishops of both parties uniting in the election. But it was in vain that they attempted to influence Ambrose to accept; however, at length, he yielded under the express command of the emperor Valentinian I; and he was consecrated on the 8th day after his baptism, for at the time of his election he was only a catechumen. Ambrose was a man of eloquence, firmness and ability, and distinguished himself by maintaining and enlarging the authority of the church. He was a zealous opponent of the Arians. It was he also, who, after the massacre of Thessalonica in 390, refused the emperor Theodosius admission into the church of Milan for a period of 8 months, and only restored him after a public penance].

Martin (Martinus), the bishop of Tours, highly illustrious for his piety and goodness, was a native of the city of Sabaudia, in Pannonia. He was reared at Ticin, that is Pavia, in Italy. With his father, a captain under the Emperor Constantius and later under Julian, he reluctantly practised the art of war. Once he met a poor man, with whom he shared his cloak. On the following night he saw Christ, clothed in it. Immediately, therefore, he left the army and went to Hilarius, bishop of Poitiers, submitting himself to his discipline; and there he later built a cloister of which Hilarius made him a bishop; and his life afterwards was noted for miracles, the like of which have not been seen since the apostles. He was known to have awakened three from the dead. Finally, at the age of 81, he journeyed to God, on the 11th day of November, in the first year of Pope Anastasius. St. Ambrose greatly marvelled at his accomplishments, and when he afterwards became aware of his piety and virtue, he commended him with many fine expressions of veneration. [Martin of Tours is, perhaps, second to Nicholas in the popularity index of medieval saints (but only because he is confined to Western Christendom). He was born in the reign of Constantine the Great, at Sabaria (Sabaudia), a city in Pannonia (now Stain in Hungary). He was the son of a Roman tribune in the army, and his parents were pagans. But while still a child, he himself was touched by the Christian religion and received a catechumen at fifteen. Before he could be baptized, he was enrolled in the cavalry and sent to join the army in Gaul. He at once excited the admiration and love of his comrades. One day while passing out of the city gate of Amiens, he met a poor naked beggar, and having nothing but his clothes and weapons, Martin severed his cloak with his sword, giving half to the beggar. The same night he saw Christ in a dream, having half the cloak with which Martin had parted on his shoulders. At forty he left the army that he had led for many years and took to a religious life. In 371 he was elected bishop of Tours. According to legend he performed a number of miracles, and was distinguished for the determined manner in which he uprooted paganism. After governing his diocese for thirty years, he died and became an object of worship by the people. In art he is distinguished from other bishops by a naked beggar at his feet].

Theodosius, the emperor, entered into an alliance with Athanaric, the Gothic king. At that time Athanaric came to Theodosius at Constantinople, and was received with great rejoicing. When Athanaric saw the buildings of the city, and the multitudes which had come to the celebration, and later saw the imperial court and its many and various servants and officials, he said, Without doubt the emperor is an earthly god. He who is sent to raise a hand against him, shall have his blood upon his head. But soon afterwards Athanaric was afflicted by a malady, of which he died. The emperor caused him to be honorably buried, and was personally present. Now when the Gothic king thus died, and these same Goths saw and noted the virtue and goodness of the Emperor Theodosius, they unanimously gave themselves up to this same emperor and the Roman Empire. [Athanaric was king of the Visigoths during their stay in Dacia. In 367-369 he carried on a war with the Emperor Valens, with whom he finally concluded a peace. In 374 Athanaric was defeated by the Huns, and, after defending himself for some time in a stronghold in the mountains of Dacia, he was compelled to fly and take refuge in Roman territory. He died in 381].

Claudian (Claudianus), a poet of Spain, was renowned at Florence in these times. He wrote two excellent books of proverbs; also a bound book of poems in praise of the aforesaid Theodosius. [Claudian (Claudianus), last of the Latin classic poets, flourished under Theodosius and his sons Arcadius and Honorius. He was a native of Alexandria, but moved to Rome where we find him in 395. He enjoyed the patronage of Stilicho, by whom he was raised to offices of honor. The last historical allusion in his writings belongs to the year 404, by which it is supposed he became involved in the misfortunes of Stilicho, who was put to death in 408].

Prudentius, also a poet, and a Christian, and highly informed in secular literature, was celebrated in these times. He wrote a number of commendable things of a divine nature, such as a book On the Martyrs, On the Origin of Sin, On the Origin of Sins, Hexameron, On the Trinity, etc. Also a book against one Symmachus (Simacum), who defended idolatry, and certain other works. [Prudentius, earliest of the Christian poets of any celebrity, was a native of Spain, and was born in 348. After practicing as an advocate, and discharging the duties of a judge, he received a high military appointment at court; but as he advanced in years he began to view worldly honors as empty of meaning, and so turned to the spiritual. His poems were composed in a great variety of meters].

Apollinaris, bishop of the city of Laodicea, in Syria, lived in this period. He was an earnest disputant, and so sharp that he dared to say that in the dispensation that the body of the Lord and not the soul was referred to. But when urged to give reasons, he said that he also had a soul—not rational, but as a thing that gives life to the body; that to supply and constitute the rational element, the word of God had been given. This same interpretation had already been nullified and wiped out by Damasus and by Peter, the Alexandrine bishop. And from this the Apollinarian heretics had their origin and received their name.

Apollinaris, "the Younger" (died 300), bishop of Laodicea in Syria, collaborated with his father, Apollinaris the Elder, in reproducing the Old Testament in the form of Homeric and Pindaric poetry, and the New Testament after the fashion of Platonic dialogues, when the Emperor Julian had forbidden Christians to teach the classics. In his eagerness to combat Arianism he went so far as to deny the existence of a rational human soul in Christ's human nature, this being replaced in him by a prevailing principle of holiness, namely the Logos. In theology the Logos has been defined as the divine creative Word, the Son of God, the second person of the Trinity, both in his pre-existent and in his incarnate condition.

It was held that the system of Apollinaris was really Docetism, a doctrine that Christ's body was either a phantom, or, if real, of celestial origin, so that he acted and suffered in appearance only and not in fact. The position of Apollinaris was accordingly condemned by several synods, and in particular by that of Constantinople (381). He had a considerable following, which after his death divided into two sects, the more conservative taking its name (Vitalians) from Vitalis, bishop of Antioch, the other (Polemeans) adding further assertion that the two natures were so blended that even the body of Christ was a fit object of adoration. The Apollinarian type of thought persisted in what was later the Monophysite school.

Although Apollinaris was a prolific writer, scarcely anything has survived under his own name. He must be distinguished from the bishop of Hierapolis who bore the same name, and who wrote one of the earliest Christian "Apologies" (c. 170).

1. Ambrose (Sanctus Ambrosius), celebrated Christian father, is here represented by a large woodcut. He is seated, an open book in his hands, and clad in Episcopal vestments. In the background is a small gabled structure, with an arched doorway, and a piece of tapestry or other embroidered material laid over the roof, as though the object might at the same time be used as a lectern. The meaning is not clear, unless this is the symbolical beehive, introduced to bear out the legend that a swarm of bees alighted on the mouth of Ambrose while an infant in the cradle, presaging the honeyed words thereafter to proceed from his lips. Ambrose is also given a nimbus, as is the bovine creature in the lower right hand corner, and whose symbolism is not clear. It resembles an ox, the symbol of St. Luke; and as it is said that the Old Testament and the New met in the person of Ambrose, this may explain the thought of the artist.

2. Martins of Tours is represented by a small woodcut. His robes are ornate and princely. He appears to be unclasping a belt, probably that of his cloak, which according to legend he divided with the poor little beggar in tattered garments, who peeps out of the portrait from beneath the open mantle.

Folio CXXXV recto

Jerome (Hieronymus), a very pious and celebrated teacher, cardinal of the Roman church, and a priest, whose father was Eusebius, was born in the city of Stridonum, which was devastated by the Goths. To some extent it was bounded by Dalmatia and Pannonia. This man, brilliant in the learning and art of all the world, lived at Bethlehem in the land of Palestine, and enlightened that same country. Too much cannot be said of the extent to which he promoted the churches of God by his life and writings, while his most holy life brilliantly shone before all mankind. His teachings and writings are highly esteemed and held in veneration; for he was a very eloquent man and knew many tongues and writings. When he came to Rome he was consecrated a cardinal and priest. Gregory (Gregorius) Nazianzen was his master and teacher in the Holy Scriptures. Subsequently he donned the garb of monks in the desert of Syria. After four years he returned to Bethlehem. There with verse and the writing of many books he erected an invulnerable tower for the Christian churches against the poisoned darts of unbelievers. It is impossible to comprehend all that concerns this pious man. Once at vespers while St. Jerome and his brethren were sitting at a lecture, a great lion came limping into the cloister. The brethren were frightened, but Jerome approached the lion as a guest. And the lion showed Jerome his wounded feet; and Jerome healed them. And the lion lived among them as a domestic animal. At last, in the time of Honorius and Theodosius the Younger, at Bethlehem of Palestine, Jerome completed the ninety-eighth year of his life and journeyed to Christ. [Jerome (whose name in Latin was Eusebius Sophronius Hieronymus) was born about 342 at Stridonum in Dalmatia. His father, Eusebius, was rich, and as his son showed a disposition for learning, he was sent to Rome to complete his studies. There, through his own passions and evil company he fell into temptation, and for a time abandoned himself to worldly pleasures. He took up the law and became a celebrated lawyer. When over 30, he traveled to Gaul, visiting the schools of learning. It was about this time he was baptized, and vowed perpetual celibacy. In 373 he went east to animate his piety by dwelling for a time in the places where Jesus lived. On his way he visited some of the famous hermits and ascetics, of whom he has given a graphic account, and who inspired him to a monastic life of solitude. Shortly after his arrival in Syria, he retired to the desert in Chalcis on the confines of Arabia; and there he spent four years in study and seclusion. He has left us a most vivid picture of his life in penance, his trials and temptations, his fastings and his sickness of soul and body in the wilderness. He overcame the difficulties of Hebrew; and then, wearied by the religious controversies of the East, he returned to Rome, where he boldly combated the luxurious self-indulgence of the clergy, and preached religious abstinence and mortification. After three years at Rome he returned to Palestine, taking up residence in a monastery he had founded at Bethlehem. He died there in 420, leaving, beside his famous translation of the Scriptures into the Latin tongue (called The Vulgate) numerous controversial writings, epistles and commentaries. Jerome, Ambrose, Augustine and Gregory are called the Four Latin Fathers or Doctors].

Paula, Roman matron of marvelous piety, disciple of St. Jerome and daughter-in-Christ, died in this year at Bethlehem (like St. Martin), on the 27th day of January at the age of 56 years. Her worthiness, retired life, abandonment of the fatherland, and her wanderings to Jerusalem, are spoken of by St. Jerome with great praise in a small book in which he described her pilgrimages to holy places, her humility and moderation, her kind deeds to the poor, her incredible patience, deeds, and faith, her firmness against heretics, her blessed demise, and the assembly of the holy at her interment. They say this Paula was descended of the race of Agamemnon, the king who destroyed Troy. She was espoused to a renowned man born of the Roman Julian family. On her tomb he (i.e., Jerome) inscribed the following verse: You are gazing upon a narrow tomb made from hewn rock. It is the resting place of Paula, who holds the celestial kingdoms, etc.

Jerome was particularly remarkable for his influence over the Roman women. We find them subdued or excited by his eloquent exhortations, devoting themselves to perpetual chastity, distributing their possessions among the poor, attending the sick, and ready to follow their teacher to the Holy Land – to the desert – even to death. His most famous female convert was Paula, the noble Roman matron, a descendant of the Scipios and the Gracchi.

All the text from the phrase "On her tomb..." until the end of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Pelagius, a certain monk, and very evil heretic, went from Rome to England, and poisoned this whole island with his despicable errors; for he proclaimed that any person may be saved without the grace of God, and that a man might be influenced to righteousness by his own conduct and his own virtue. He also said that children are born without sin, and that it is not necessary to baptize them to relieve them of their inherited sins. But the holy Augustine, together with other priests, mightily opposed this heretic, and wrote a book on the baptism of children. Jerome also wrote a book against this heretic.

Pelagius (c. 360-c. 420) was an early British theologian, of whose origin little is known. He seems to have been one of the earliest of those remarkable men who issued from the monasteries of Scotland and Ireland, and carried back to the Continent in a purified form the religion they received from it. Coming to Rome in the beginning of the fifth century (his earliest known writing is from 405), he found a scandalously low tone of morality prevalent; but his remonstrances were met by the plea of human weakness. To remove this plea by exhibiting the actual powers of human nature became his first object. It seemed to him that the Augustinian doctrine of total depravity and of the consequent bondage of the will both cut the sinew of all human effort and threw upon God the blame that really belonged to man. His practical counsels are marked by sagacity, and are expressed with the succinctness of a proverb. When Rome was sacked by the Goths, Pelagius and his friend Coelestius, who had abandoned the legal profession for an ascetic life, crossed to Africa. Soon afterwards Pelagius sailed for Palestine, where he expected his opinions to be more cordially received, while his companion remained at Carthage with a view of receiving ordination. But the bishop of Carthage, being warned, summoned a synod, at which Coelestius was charged with holding the following six errors: (1) that Adam would have died even if he had not sinned; (2) that the sin of Adam injured himself alone, not the human race; (3) that new-born children are in the same condition in which Adam was before the fall; (4) that the whole human race does not die because of Adam's death or sin, nor will the race rise again because of the resurrection of Christ; (5) that the law gives entrance to heaven as well as the gospel; (6) that even before the coming of Christ there were men who were entirely without sin. To these propositions a seventh is sometimes added, "that infants, though unbaptized, have eternal life," a corollary from the third. Although Coelestius maintained that these were open questions on which the church had never pronounced, the synod condemned and excommunicated him. After a futile appeal to Rome, he went to Ephesus and there received ordination.

In Palestine Pelagius lived unmolested and revered until 415, when he was cited by Jerome before John, the bishop of Jerusalem, and charged with holding that man may be without sin, if he only desires it. This prosecution broke down, but in December of the same year Pelagius was summoned before a synod of 14 bishops; and although he repudiated the assertion of Coelestius, that the divine grace and help consists only in free will, and in the giving of law and instruction, he at the same time affirmed that a man is able, if he likes, to live without sin and keep the commandments of God, inasmuch as God gives him this ability. The synod expressed itself satisfied with these statements, but in 418 Zosimus, bishop of Rome, invited the bishops of Christendom to subscribe to a condemnation of Pelagian opinions, and the cause of Pelagius was rendered hopeless when the Eastern Church (Ephesus 431) confirmed the decision of the West. Pelagius himself disappears after 420.

The first principle of Pelagianism is a theory that affirms the freedom of the will, in the sense that in each volition, and at each moment of life, no matter what the previous career of the individual has been, the will is in equipoise, able to choose good or evil. We are born characterless and with no bias towards good or evil. It follows that we are uninjured by the sin of Adam, save in so far as the evil example of our predecessors misleads and influences us. There is in fact no such thing as original sin, sin being a thing of will and not of nature; for if it could be of nature, our sin would be chargeable to God the creator. This will, capable of good as of evil, being the natural endowment of man, is found in the pagan as well as in the Christian, and the pagan may therefore perfectly keep such law as they know. Pelagius maintains that it is the human will which takes the initiative, and is the determining factor in the salvation of the individual; while the Church maintains that it is the divine will that takes the initiative by renewing and enabling the human will to accept and use the aid or grace offered by God.

Alexis (Alexius), a Roman, a very holy and worthy confessor, died at Rome, unbeknown, on the 16th day of the month of July, under a staircase in the house of his father, a counsellor named Eufemian, after much patient suffering; and he ascended to God. The emperors Arcadius and Honorius were present at his interment; for, by the will of God, he left a very beautiful spouse.

Alexis was born of a mother who had long been sterile. He escaped from the nuptial chamber, deserted his bride, and lived in exile from his country in great poverty; but where is not stated. He returned to his native place, where he took up his abode in the house of his parents, unknown to them, and was abused and mocked by the servants; he finally disclosed himself to his parents. Immediately the clergy, the emperor, and all the people crowded to see him, and to witness the miracles he wrought. He was buried by the patriarch in the presence of the emperor and a great train of monks. There were various accounts of this saint—a Greek life, a Syriac life, and an Arabic life. According to the Acts, Alexis was born at Rome where his father, Euthemian, was a senator. His mother's name was Aglamades. According to some of these versions Alexis spent seventeen years in his father's house, lodged in the atrium, and fed on scraps from the kitchen. The servants used to mock him and throw dishwater over him.

According to the Latin version Alexis died at Rome, and it was not long before the stone step under which he had spent so many years in his father's house was also found. This step is now in the church of Alexis, and those who venerate it on ordinary days receive indulgence of one hundred years, and forty times as many on every double festival and in Lent. The Acts say nothing about his having lived under a step, but popular imagination speedily amplified the story and gave the saint a den in which to sleep under the stairs of his father's mansion.

John (Iohannes), surnamed Chrysostom (Crisostomus), a bishop of Constantinople, came to rest in peace at this time. He led a Christian life in word, example, and teaching. At the hands of Eudoxia and Arcadius he suffered many hardships for defending truth and righteousness. Also, in addition to his great holiness, he wrote very elegant books and sermons and letters.

John Chrysostom was born at Antioch of illustrious parents. He lost his father when young, and his mother superintended his education with care and intelligence. At the age of 20 he was already a renowned pleader at the bar, but six years later he felt a strong urge to retire from the world altogether. The law became hateful to him and he wanted to become a hermit. For a time he yielded to the entreaties of his mother not to leave her. However, two years later he fled society, passing five or six years in the wilderness near Antioch, devoting himself to reading the Bible, penance, and prayer. His abstinence was so severe that his health failed, and he was obliged to return to Antioch. Soon after he emerged from the desert, the bishop of Antioch ordained him and appointed him preacher. He entered on his true vocation as a Christian orator, the greatest next to Paul. He was next appointed patriarch of Constantinople, and was a model of a Christian bishop—humble, self-denying, content with little, hospitable to the poor, and an indefatigable preacher. He denounced vice and thundered against the irregularities of the monks, the profligacy of the Empress Eudoxia, and the servility of her flatterers. Because of that he brought down upon himself the vengeance of that haughty woman. He was banished; but the voice of the people obliged the empress to recall him. Persisting in his old course, he was again banished. On his way to exile, he sank under fatigue and the cruel treatment of his guards, who exposed him bare-headed and bare-footed to the burning sun of noon; and thus he perished at the age of sixty-three.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Cassianus, also a monk, of Constantinople or Scythia, and a deacon of the aforesaid John (Iohannis) Chrysostom (Crisostomi), was sent to Marseilles (Masilliam) by the latter. There he built two monasteries, and collected many people of both sexes for monastic life. He wrote and left many and various books serviceable to the clergy. [Cassianus (aka, Joannes Eremita Cassianus, or Joannes Massiliensis) (360-435), a celebrated recluse, was one of the founders of the monasticism in the west. His early life was spent in the monastery of Bethlehem, and after dwelling for several years among the ascetics of the Nile desert, in 403 he went to Constantinople where he was ordained deacon by Chrysostom. Becoming a priest at Rome, he journeyed to Marseilles, where he founded a convent for nuns and the abbey of St. Victor. He was a Semi-Pelagian, and of these one of the first, maintaining that while the immediate gift of grace is necessary to salvation, conversion may begin by the exercise of man's will. He wrote two treatises on the monastic life, and a number of other works].

Jerome. Represented by a large woodcut, in the robes and headdress of a cardinal, seated at a writing desk, with open books before him. Looking cut from behind him, its paws on a parapet, is the (rather sad-looking) lion he healed, and which became a domestic pet in the cloister according to legend. The artist has sanctified both man and beast by a nimbus.

The Second Ecumenical Council, held at Constantinople, was attended by one hundred fifty fathers, and was held at the time of the Emperors Gratian (Graciani) and Theodosius, and of Pope Damasus, Cyril, the bishop of Jerusalem, and Nectarius, the patriarch of Alexandria. It was called to proceed against Macedonius the bishop of Constantinople, and against Eudoxius because they had denied that the Holy Spirit was God. And all these fathers, having condemned this heresy, established four rules; for this Macedonius had occupied and embarrassed the patriarchal chair by theft and tyranny. After his deposition the fathers elected Nectarius. And they declared that the Holy Spirit is God, and life-giving, and co-eval with the Father and Son. And they cursed Apollinarius and Sabellius, the blasphemers of God, who also held that the body of Christ is spiritless and without a rational soul and without human understanding, and that the divinity passed away with the death of Christ in three days. The Emperor Theodosius was opposed to the assembled fathers, and by flattery he influenced them unwittingly to elevate the episcopal chair at Constantinople to a patriarchal one without the knowledge of the pope. And this was the cause of the schism that followed. [The Second Ecumenical Council was held at Constantinople in 381. In reality it was only a synod of bishops from Thrace, Asia and Syria, convened by Theodosius to unite the church in the orthodox faith. No Western bishop was present, nor any Roman legate. A few bishops came from Egypt, but tardily. In spite of its sectional character, the council came in time to be regarded as ecumenical in both East and West. It affirmed the Nicene faith and denounced opposing doctrines].

Didymus (Dydimus) of Alexandria suffered with impairment of sight from his youth and therefore lacked a knowledge of the alphabet. Nevertheless, in his old age he acquired a knowledge of geometry and dialectics, subjects requiring much experience in letters. He also studied the Holy Scriptures and wrote much against the Arian heretics. His industry and labors were such as no other person could have carried on without the sense of sight; but Didymus relied on his sense of hearing. []

Radagaisus (Radagasus), king of the Goths and among ancient and contemporary enemies the most cruel, ravaged Italy in the time of Emperor Honorius. With his violent horde of over two hundred thousand Goths he overran the countryside with fire and sword. He not only had a countless number of undisciplined men under him, but he himself was a rough Scythian pagan, who loved to spill the blood of all mankind as a libation to his god. Great terror and fear seized Rome, the pagans assembling and attributing their suffering to their neglect of the sacrifices due to their gods. And there arose in the city a great cursing and condemnation of Christ, but by God's intervention Radagaisus was driven to flight and captured by the Romans. Before long he was deprived of his life. It is said the Gothic prisoners were so numerous that they were sold like base animals. [Radagaisus, a Scythian, invaded Italy with a formidable host of barbarians in the reign of Honorius, but was defeated by Stilicho near Florence in 408. He was put to death although he had capitulated on condition that his life be spared].

Alaric was successor to Radagaisus. He was protected by Stilicho, who might well have defeated him; and he came to Italy. Pursuant to counsel, Honorius gave him Gaul. When Alaric arrived there, Stilicho, contrary to the common good, ordered Saulus the pagan to attack the Goths. At Easter while the Goths were engaged in their festivities, Saulus attacked and slew a great number; but the Goths made a counterattack and won. Enraged, they left Gaul and marched on Rome ravaging everything on the way with fire and sword. They took Rome and plundered and burned it in the year of the founding of the same (city) one thousand sixty-four. [The year 412 CE]. But Alaric was kind and circumspect, ordering his men to avoid bloodshed as far as possible and to spare those who fled to the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul. Finally Alaric died suddenly. [Alaric was elected king of the Visigoths in 398. He twice invaded Italy: in 402-3, when he was defeated by Stilicho, and again in 408-410, when he took and plundered Rome. Soon afterwards he died at Consentia, in Bruttium, while preparing to invade Italy].

Ataulf (Athaúlphum), relative of Alaric, was, on the score of relationship and race, made king of the Goths. And they proceeded to Rome, and what still remained they destroyed like locusts. They led away Gallia (Gallam) Placidia (Placidam), daughter of the elder Theodosius and sister of Honorius; and Ataulf himself married her. This later proved a common good, for although Ataulf had decided to destroy Rome and to build a new city there, and to call it Gothia not after the Roman emperors but after himself and his people, Placidia influenced him to abandon his cruel resolve. She made peace between him and Honorius and Theodosius the Younger. Then Ataulf went to Gaul, where he was slain through the treachery of his own people. [Ataulf (Athaúlphus) succeeded his brother-in-law, Alaric, as king of the Goths. After ravaging Italy for two years he made peace with Emperor Honorius, married the latter's sister Placidia, and led the Visigoths into Gaul in 412. From there he passed into Spain, which had been overrun by the Alans, Sueves, and Vandals. Under Adolphus the Visigoths drove the Sueves into northwestern Spain, the Alans into the southwest, and the Vandals into the south; and thus Ataulf founded the kingdom of the Visigoths in Spain and southern Gaul, eventually embracing the entire Spanish peninsula and lasting three centuries].

Augustine (Augustinus) was a disciple of Saint Ambrose in the faith, and of all who lived at this time the most learned. He was a bishop at Hippo, in Africa, and a mighty protector and protagonist of our faith. He was born of honorable parents, his father a worthy counselor, and Monica, his mother, a very good Christian matron, zealously devoted to the rearing of her son. In his youth Augustine became very well versed in secular literature, as well as in the liberal arts, which he acquired through his own efforts and understanding without the aid of an instructor. Through pagan error he fell into the Manichean heresy, in which he remained for nine years. By an unmarried woman he had a son, called Adeodatus, a man of subtle intelligence, but who died in his youth. At Carthage Augustine for many years first read the liberal arts and rhetoric. Afterwards, without his mother knowing, he went to Rome to study, and then to Milan to teach rhetoric at the request of Symmachus (Symacho) the governor. Then his mother soon followed him. Not long afterwards he was converted to the correct and true faith pursuant to her prayers and the teachings of Saint Ambrose. At the age of thirty, together with his son, he was baptized on Easter Day by the same Ambrose; and they both wrote the hymn of praise, Te Deum Laudamus. Afterwards, at the suggestion of his mother he went to Rome, traveled through the country of Etruria, and visited the pious hermits at Pisa, and their hundred cells not far from Rome. At Rome he contested with the Manichean heretics, and then returned with his mother from Rome to Africa. When his mother died Augustine and his brothers journeyed to Carthage; and he distributed his inheritance among the poor. He began to live in a monastery in the woods according to rule among the apostles. He was afterwards elected bishop of Hippo against his will. He lived another forty years, and after having written so many books in all branches of learning that they could neither be counted nor read, he died blessed at the age of seventy-five, and his body was buried in St. Stephen's Church. From here it was carried to Sardinia, and finally to Pavia, where it was held in veneration. [Augustine (Augustinus), one of the Four Fathers (or Doctors) of the Church, was born at Tagaste, in Numidia, in 354. His father was a pagan; his mother, Monica, a Christian. Endowed with splendid talents, a vivid imagination and strong passions, he passed his restless youth in dissipation, in desultory study, changing from one faith to another, dissatisfied with himself, and unsettled in mind. His mother wept and prayed for him, and in her anguish sought the bishop of Carthage. After listening to her sorrows he dismissed her with these words: "Go in peace; the son of so many tears will not perish!" Augustine soon afterwards went to Rome, gaining fame and riches by his eloquence at the bar, but still unhappy and restless. From Rome he went to Milan, where he was converted by the preaching of Ambrose and was baptized in the presence of his mother, Monica.

On this occasion the hymn, Te Deum, was composed, still in use in the churches. After some time spent in study Augustine was ordained as a priest, and then bishop of Hippo, a small town and territory not far from Carthage. Once installed, he never again left his flock or accepted any higher office. He spent all he possessed in hospitality and charity. In 430, after having presided over the diocese for 35 years, Hippo was besieged by the Vandals. In the midst of the horrors that ensued, Augustine refused to leave his people, and he died during the siege at the age of 75. It is said that his remains were afterward removed from Africa to Pavia, by Luitprand, king of the Lombards. The writings of Augustine in defense of Christianity are numerous and celebrated, and he is regarded as the patron saint of theologians and learned men. Most important are his 13 books, written in 397, and containing an account of his early life, and thus famed as perhaps the earliest (and greatest?) autobiography in the western tradition, and (The City of God) in 22 books, commenced about 413, and not finished before 426. The first ten books are a refutation of the various systems of what he viewed as the false religion of paganism; the last twelve, a systematic view of what Augustine considered the true religion, Catholicism].

Monica, mother of Saint Augustine, died in blessedness on the 7th day of May at the age of 56 years. She was a virtuous, kind, discreet, and patient woman, devoted to prayer and contemplation, and zealous in watching, fasting and giving alms. For about 1020 years her saintly corpse remained in the country where Augustine was buried, until the time of Pope Martin the Fifth. During Martin's time, about the Year of the Lord 1429, her remains were brought to Rome with great solemnity, and given a rich and costly funeral, attended with many eulogies.

Monica was born in the year 332, in Africa, of a Christian family, and was educated by a relative, perhaps an aunt, with strictness. This lady forbade her to drink water except at mealtimes, admonishing the young girl that "If you get into the habit of drinking water now, when you are married and have the keys to the cellar, you will then sneak some wine." And this happened, for when she was sent by her father with the pitcher to the cellar to draw wine for the table, she got into the habit of sipping from the pitcher before she brought it up to the dining hall. As the habit grew she drank more. A slave whom she reprimanded cast her clandestine drinking into her teeth and this brought Monica to her senses. Soon after she was baptized, and from baptism lived an edifying life.

Monica married a young pagan gentleman named Patricius, by whom she had two sons, Augustine and Navigius, both of whom preferred the paganism of their father to the Christianity of their mother. But Patricius in his older years was instructed in the true faith and allowed himself to be baptized. Monica was accustomed daily to assist at mass. Patricius died in 371 when Augustine was seventeen and studying at Carthage. To the grief of his widowed mother Augustine became involved in certain non-Christian beliefs and philosophical schools of thought, and he sank into a life of dissolute morals. At twenty-nine he went to Rome to teach rhetoric. There he fell dangerously ill, and he attributed his recovery to his mother's prayers. In 384 he went to Milan, where he fell in with Ambrose who quickly dispersed his heretical errors. In the meantime his mother came to Milan, seeking him; and there she found in Ambrose a teacher to refresh her weary soul. She was growing old, but at last, what she had longed for was accomplished – she beheld the baptism of her son Augustine at Easter in the year 387.

Monica now felt the call of home, and she persuaded Augustine and his brother Navigius to return to Ostia with her; and it was there where occurred the memorable evening conversation that Augustine has described to us in his Confessions. At Ostia, Monica fell ill and died at the age of fifty-six in the year 387.

Rufinus (Ruffinus), an Aquileian priest and a highly renowned and informed man, flourished at this time. From Jerome (Hieronymus) he received many letters of friendly praise. He was very industrious in making translations from the Greek tongue into the Latin. [Rufinus (Ruffinus), celebrated ecclesiastical writer, was born in Italy about 345. At first a member of the monastery at Aquileia, he later resided for many years at a monastery in Palestine where he became intimate with Jerome. But they quarreled, Jerome attacking Rufinus on account of his support of the tenets of Origen. After a stay of twenty-six years in the East, Rufinus returned to Italy, where he published a Latin translation of the by Pamphilus, and two books of Origen. In the preface of one of these he quoted a panegyric that Jerome had at an earlier date pronounced against Origen. This led to a bitter correspondence between Rufinus and Jerome, which was crowned by the Apologia of the one, adversus Hieronymum ('Against Jerome') and the Apologia of the other, adversus Rufinum ('Against Rufinus'). When Alaric invaded Italy, Rufinus fled to Sicily, where he died in the year 410].

Lucian (Lucianus), a priest at Jerusalem, an excellent man in piety and art, through divine revelation at this time found the remains of Saint Stephen, the first martyr, and of Gamaliel, teacher of Paul; and being a man of learning, he wrote to all the churches, proclaiming this revelation and discovery in the Greek tongue. These letters Habundius, the Spaniard, later translated into Latin.

Alexander, a physician of this period, nicknamed the Wise, who by reason of his great intelligence was regarded as the prince of physicians, wrote three books, comprehending the entire field of medicine.

At this time crept forth the heresy of the predestined, who affirmed that nothing more was necessary for (eternal) life than that all men live virtuously.

Nestor, bishop of Constantinople, a heretic, held and preached that although Christ was a pure man, he was not God; and he cited 72 articles of the Holy Scriptures in support of his erroneous interpretation. [Nestor (Nestorius) was appointed patriarch of Constantinople in 428, but in consequence of his heresies was deposed by the Council of Ephesus in 431. His great opponent was Cyril. Nestor was subsequently banished to one of the oases in Egypt, and he died in exile probably before 450. He carefully distinguished between the divine and human nature attributed to Christ, and refused to give to the Virgin Mary the title of Theotokos, or "Mother of God." The opinions of Nestor are still maintained by Nestorian Christians].

Proba, a very beautiful woman, wife of Adelphus the Roman proconsul, with much industry so beautifully and neatly assembled all the history found in the poems of Virgil the poet, as well as in the Old and New Testament up to the time of descent of the Holy Spirit, that he who is not well informed upon this composition, might believe that Virgil was an evangelist.

Euphrosina (Eufrosina), who was taught the Scriptures by her father, entered a monastery in male attire, and she called herself Smaragdus. To her end she remained there in strict abstinence in the garb of a monk.

Marina, a virgin, did likewise, entering a monastery in male attire, and calling herself Marinus. When she was accused of deflowering a virgin, she scornfully and patiently remained before the gates of the monastery until the end of her life.

1. Augustine, one of the four Fathers or Doctors of the Church, is portrayed by a large woodcut. He is clad in his Episcopal vestments, for he was bishop of Hippo for many years. Before him is a reading desk, with open books, upon which his left hand rests, while his right is raised in benediction. On the wall behind him hangs a piece of tapestry or embroidery. The child kneeling at his right in the attitude of prayer is symbolic of the story told by Augustine himself: While writing his Discourse on the Trinity, and wandering along the seashore lost in meditation, he saw a child, who having dug a hole in the sand, appeared to be bringing water from the sea to fill it. Augustine asked the purpose of the task and the child replied that he intended to empty into this cavity all the water of the great deep. 'Impossible!' exclaimed Augustine. 'Not more impossible,' replied the child, 'than for you, Augustine, to explain the mystery on which you are now meditating.' Both Augustine and child are in possession of a halo.

2. Euphrosina (Eufrosina), is represented with heavy braids coiled about her head. She holds in her hands an open book, probably to symbolize her devotion to learning (an unusual depiction of a woman at this time).

Celestine (Celestinus) the pope, a native of Campania, succeeded Boniface in the time of Theodosius the Younger. In his zeal and devotion to divine service he established ordinances to be observed in the singing and reading of the Mass, differing from customs observed before his time. As Gratianus says, he ordained that all the priests should know ecclesiastical laws, ordinances and privileges. Having consecrated a number of priests, deacons and bishops, he died and was buried in the cemetery of Priscilla on the Salarian Way on April 6th. He sat 8 years, 10 months and 17 days; and the chair then rested 21 days. [Celestine I was pope from 422 to 432. He was active in the extirpation of heretical doctrines, and was the first pope known to have taken a direct interest in Britain and Ireland].

The Third Ecumenical Council was held at Ephesus under Emperor Theodosius the Younger, Pope Celestine, and Juvenal, bishop of Constantinople. At Ephesus 200 bishops assembled, also the antagonistic heretic Nestorius with his adherents, and, all the Pelagian heretics. They held that Jesus was born of Mary alone and not of God, and that his divinity was given him for his service. Cyril (Cyrillus), bishop of Alexandria, and Pope Celestine earnestly opposed this. And it was decided to call the Blessed Virgin Theotokos (Theotocos), that is, Mother of the Lord. By unanimous judgment the followers of these heresies were condemned by 13 ordinances, and those who had wandered away from the true faith were cursed. [The Council of Ephesus (Third Ecumenical Council of the Church) was held in 431. It condemned the Nestorian doctrine which, as it was said, invalidated the unity of Christ's person by affirming that the divine Logos (Word) dwelt in Jesus as in a temple, and that inasmuch as the Logos could not have been born, it is absurd to call Mary a "Godbearer." Nestor, patriarch of Constantinople, was excommunicated and deposed at Ephesus and later banished to an oasis in Egypt, where he died, probably before 450].

Sixtus the Third, a pope, and a Roman, whose father was Sixtus, came to office in the time of Emperor Valentinian. When he became pontiff he was hailed into court by one Bassus, charged with certain offenses; but Sixtus brought the matter before a council and was unanimously acquitted in the presence of 57 bishops. His accuser, with the approval of Valentinian and his mother Placidia, was exiled, while his possessions were forfeited, not to the public purse but to the Church. Sixtus built the Church of the Blessed Virgin Mary (now Mary Maggiore) and endowed it well. Having given his all to the building of churches or their adornment and to the poor, he died and was buried in a crypt on the Tiburtine Way with the body of the blessed Lawrence (Laurentii), having sat eight years and 19 days; and the chair rested twenty-two days. [Sixtus III was bishop of Rome from 432 to 440. During his pontificate the dispute between Cyril of Alexandria and John of Antioch, who had been at variance since the Council of Ephesus, was settled].

Leo the First, a pope, and a native of Tuscany (Thuscus), whose father was Quintianus, was called Leo the Great because of his worthiness and extraordinary learning. He was held to be the first in merit because no one could equal him in versatility. Accordingly at the Chalcedonian Council, in consequence of great veneration, he was unanimously acclaimed thrice-holy. He made many ordinances for the establishment and extension of the faith, and being a highly learned man, wrote many statutes, orations and sermons. He erected, beautified, renewed, repaired, and established many churches. After having sat 21 years, one month and 13 days he died and was buried with Saint Peter in the Vatican; and the chair rested 8 days. [Leo I, who alone of Roman pontiffs shares with Gregory I the surname of The Great, was pope from 440 to 461. He was a native of Rome, although according to some, a native of Tuscany. When Sixtus III died in 440, Leo succeeded him. In 443 he took stern measures against the Manicheans (who since the capture of Carthage by Genseric in 439 had become very numerous at Rome). In 444 he reported to the Italian bishops that some of the heretics had returned to Catholicism, some had been banished, and others had fled. In seeking out the latter he sought the help of the provincial clergy. In 448 Leo received with commendation a letter from Eutyches, the Constantinopolitan monk, complaining of the revival of the Nestorian heresy there; and in 449 Eutyches asked for Leo's support at the ecumenical council at that time under summons to meet at Ephesus. Leo sent by his legates an epistle to Flavian, setting forth in detail the doctrine ever since recognized as orthodox regarding the union of the two natures in the one person of Jesus Christ. Leo's letter, though submitted, was not read by the assembled fathers, and the papal legates were in danger of their lives from the violence of the theologians who, not content with deposing Flavian and Eusebius, shouted for the dividing of those who divided Christ. When the news of the result of this council reached Rome, Leo wrote to emperor Theodosius to sanction another council, to be held in Italy. Among the reasons urged was the threatening attitude of the Huns. Their invasion took place the following year (452). Aquileia succumbed to Attila, and the conqueror set out for Rome. Leo went forth to meet him, and it is said that his eloquence influenced Attila to turn back. But when Genseric, the Vandal chieftain, arrived under the walls of Rome three years later, the best Leo could secure was a promise that there would be no burning of buildings or murder, and that three of the oldest basilicas would be exempted from plunder. Leo died November 10, 461. He was succeeded by Hilarius].

Hilarius the pope, a Sardinian, ordained that the popes after him should not choose their own successors; this statute to apply to all ecclesiastical offices. He wrote three epistles on the Christian faith, thereby confirming the three Councils held at Nicaea, Ephesus and Chalcedon. He built three chapels, a cloister, and two libraries; and having sympathetically contributed to the beautification of the houses of God, and having given admonitions to encourage learning, for penance, and the giving of alms, and all other matters, as becomes a pious superior, he was buried after a holy life in the crypt of Saint Lawrence (Laurentii) with the body of the blessed Sixtus. He sat seven years, three months and ten days. Then the chair was vacant for ten days. [Hilarius, bishop of Rome from 461 to 468, is known to have acted as the legate of Leo the Great at the "robber" Synod of Ephesus in 449. There he so vigorously opposed the condemnation of Flavian of Constantinople that he was thrown into prison, from which he escaped to Rome. He was chosen to succeed Leo in 461. In 465 he held at Rome a council which put a stop to some abuses, particularly that of the bishops in appointing their own successors. His pontificate was marked by the extension of papal authority in France and Spain. He died November 17, 467].

Theodosius the Younger was a son of Arcadius the emperor. After he had ruled fifteen years with Honorius, the latter died, and this Theodosius was confirmed in the sovereignty. But while Theodosius ruled in the East, one John (Iohannes), at the behest of Castinus, Master of the Soldiers, sought the sovereignty. When the death of Honorius was reported to Theodosius, he made Valentinian, his aunt's son, an emperor, and sent him forth with his mother to take possession of the empire in the West. Meanwhile John determined upon war in Africa, which was in the possession of Bonifacius, who was too weak to protect it. The war was terminated by the forces of Valentinian. Theodosius, a most Christian emperor and gracious man, received and took possession of the empire in a great tumult and while Roman affairs were in distress; and he lost all of Africa, which was soon taken away from him by Genseric, king of the Vandals. He suffered many ravages in Britain. After that, Valentinian, by common consent of all Italy, was crowned at Ravenna to reign and rule over the Roman Empire; and he silenced the enemy in Italy. After Theodosius had governed the empire for twenty-seven years (not counting the twenty-one years during which he reigned with his uncle Honorius), he died of the plague at Constantinople. [Theodosius II, Roman emperor of the East (408-450), was born in 401, and at the age of seven succeeded to the throne upon the death of his father Arcadius. Theodosius was a weak prince, and his sister Pulcheria became his guardian in 414 and was declared Augusta, or empress. She virtually had the government in her own hands during all his lifetime, and on his death in 450 she still remained at the head of affairs. Shortly afterwards she married Marcian, with whom she continued to reign until her death in 453. She was a woman of ability, celebrated for her piety and virtue. Bonifacius was a Roman general and governor of Africa under Valentinian III. Believing that Placidia meditated his destruction, he revolted against the emperor, inviting Genseric, king of the Vandals, to settle in Africa. In 430 he was reconciled to her, and attempted to drive the Vandals out of Africa, but without success. He left Africa in 431, and in 432 died of a wound received in combat with his rival Aetius].

Valentinian (Valentinianus), governor and ruler of the empire in the West, made peace with Genseric, king of the Vandals, and gave the Vandals certain territory in which to live. But while Valentinian went to Constantinople to espouse the daughter of Theodosius, the Vandals under the leadership of Genseric began the destruction of the city of Carthage. During this revolt Attila decided to attack the empire in the West, and, accordingly, he speedily assembled a great host and marched forth. When Aetius (Etius) learned of this, he hurried messengers to king Theodoric at Toulouse (Tolosa), urging a peace between them, and suggesting that they make common cause in the war against Attila. On the side of the Romans and Theodoric as allies were the Alans, Burgundians, French, Saxons, and all the peoples of the West. When Attila came on, a battle ensued in the fields of Chalons; and it continued into the night. In this battle there perished on both sides one hundred eighty thousand men. But since victory and power always give birth to envy, Valentinian murdered the said Aetius, being envious of his good fortune; and with Aetius the empire of the West and the hopes of the Roman people fell. But the murder did not remain unavenged, for in the following year Valentinian, after having reigned for thirty years, was stabbed to death by Trusilus, a knight of the aforesaid Aetius. [Valentinian (Valentinianus) III, Roman emperor (425-455), was born in 419, the son of Constantius III, by Placidia, sister of Honorius and the daughter of Theodosius I. He was declared Augustus in 425 by Theodosius II, and was placed over the west. But as he was only six years of age, the government was entrusted to his mother Placidia. During his long reign the empire was repeatedly exposed to barbarian invasions, and it was only the military ability of Aetius which saved the empire from ruin. In 429 the Vandals under Genseric crossed into Africa, which they conquered and held until the reign of Justinian. The Goths likewise established themselves in Gaul; but Aetius finally made peace with them (439), and with their assistance gained a great victory over Attila and the vast army of the Huns at Chalons in 451. The power and influence of Aetius excited the jealousy of Valentinian, who murdered his faithful general in 454. In the following year the emperor himself was slain by Petronius Maximus, whose wife he had violated].

Marcian (Marcianus) was installed as emperor in the East, in the year from the founding of the city (i.e., Rome) one thousand two hundred and four. He was a Christian prince, favorably disposed toward the churches. He espoused the sister of Theodosius. When Attila died, Marcian on that same night had a dream in which he saw the bow of Attila broken. During his reign the empire of the West was entirely separated from the empire of the East. Within this period the Romans lost all of Germany, Dacia, Sarmatia, and other regions and countries situated on the Danube and the Rhine; also the hinterland of Spain, Aquitania, Vasconia, and certain regions in Gaul, as well as those lying about Paris. Since then none of these countries have returned to the Roman Empire. This Marcian died at Constantinople in the seventh year of his reign. [Marcian (Marcianus), emperor of the East (450-457), was a native of Thrace (Illyricum), and served for many years as a common soldier in the Imperial army; but he attained such distinction at the death of Theodosius II in 450, that the sister of the latter, the celebrated Pulcheria, offered her hand and the imperial title to Marcian, who thus became emperor of the East. He was a man of resolution and bravery; and when Attila sent to demand the tribute, which the younger Theodosius had engaged to pay annually, the emperor sternly replied, "I have iron for Attila, but no gold." Attila swore vengeance; but he first invaded the Western empire, and his death, two years later, saved the East. In 451 Marcian assembled the Council of Chalcedon, in which the doctrines of the Eutychians were condemned. He died in 457 and was succeeded by Leo].

Leo attained to imperial office at Constantinople on the death of Marcian, and immediately made his son Leo a co-ruler of the empire. Leo was the first emperor of Greek ancestry at Constantinople. In this period there was much disorder in the Roman Empire. In the first year of the emperor Leo, a man named Majorian (Maioaranum), upon the advice of Leo, was elevated to Caesar by the army at Ravenna; but he was slain in the third year, and the Romans elected Severus (Severianus) in his place. Upon the latter's death, another, called Athenius, was crowned. But in the meantime Leo, at Constantinople, was not without difficulties. At length Leo died of a sickness, and left Leo as a successor to the empire, after having ruled over the empire of the East for seventeen years. [Leo I was a Thracian, a military tribune, whom the Patrician Aspar, most powerful of the Eastern emperor's subjects, elevated to the throne. Leo I interfered in the concerns of the Western empire in 467, in order to secure the Western throne for Julius Nepos. Leo I and his son Leo II died in 474, and were succeeded by his son-in-law Zeno].

Genseric (Gensericus), king of the Vandals, in the middle of his rule dispersed the Spaniards, Gauls and Romans. But when Bonifacius, the general, governor of Africa and St. Augustine's admirer, considered giving up Africa, he, to the destruction of the common good, allowed the Alans and Vandals, together with Genseric their king, whom the Spaniards had ousted, to march in. With murder, fire and plunder, they cruelly devastated almost all of Africa, and substituted the Arian heresies for the Christian faith. They sent various Christian bishops of the true faith into exile. During the time of this disorder, St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, in order not to witness the fall of the city, ascended to Christ in the third month of the siege. Afterwards Genseric persecuted the city under deceitful pretenses of peace by frightening the citizens with various forms of martyrdom, and taking their possessions and estates. Nor did he refrain from plundering the churches. And so Carthage was captured by the Vandals, after having been obedient to the Romans for three hundred eighty-five years. [Genseric, king of the Vandals, and most terrible of the barbarian invaders of the Roman Empire, crossed over from Spain to Africa in 429, and ravaged the country with frightful severity. He took Hippo in 431, but Carthage did not fall to him until 439. Having thus become master of Northwestern Africa, he now attacked Italy. In 455 he took Rome and plundered it for 14 days. In the same year he destroyed Capua, Nola, and Neapolis. Twice the empire endeavored to revenge itself, but without success. The first was an attempt of the Western emperor Majorian (457), whose fleet was destroyed in the Bay of Carthage. The second was made by the Eastern emperor, Leo, whose fleet was burned off Bona. Genseric died in 477 at a great age. He was an Arian and persecuted his Catholic subjects on an extensive scale]. In the following year Genseric journeyed to Sicily and afflicted on it great disasters. Likewise the Picts and Scots harassed the Island of Britain. Now, there was a man named Aetius, very powerful and swift in war, of whom the Britons asked aid. He silenced the Burgundians, who had just revolted and brought on a war. He defeated the Franks, encamped on the Rhine with the intention of overrunning Gaul, in a great battle, driving them back into Germany. He also began a violent war against the Alans, and with the advice and assistance of the kings and their people living on the Danube, he first incited the Huns to invade Italy. Now as the distinguished and foremost Britons who had become accustomed to Roman laws and usages did not wish to endure the barbarism of the Picts and Scots, they sent to this Aetius for assistance; and he loaned them an army of men, who sailed overseas and drove out these barbarians with great slaughter. But when the Britons were abandoned by Aetius, they asked help of the Angles and Saxons. These, however, they found to be enemies rather than allies; for by them they were oppressed, and through them they lost their fatherland as well as their name.

Attila (Athila), of Scythia, was a king of the Huns. His father's name was Mundizicus. His brothers were Ottar and Rhoas, who are supposed to have ruled before him. After their death, he and his brother Bleda succeeded to the kingdom of the Huns. Attila was a man of stately bearing. Turning his eyes around now here, now there, so that his lofty carriage and power also appeared in his bodily movements. He was a lover of war, not very mild, yet moderate, of good counsel and approachable. He was of short stature, broad chest, large head, small eyes, thin beard besprinkled with gray hair, flat nose, and dark skin. These proclaim his ancestry. By craft he did away with his brother Bleda, a man of kind disposition. He made the kings of the Ostrogoths more subservient to himself than companionable.

He marched forth with an army of five hundred thousand soldiers, not from Scythia alone, but from far and wide along the Danube. With such an army, together with the men who survived after the battle of Chalons, he undertook to overrun Italy. He first directed his army against Greece (Illirici), and at that time ravaged and burned many celebrated cities which were in the care of Marcian the emperor. From there he came to the Italian border, besieged Aquileia, and soon captured it. He attacked the unfortified cities of the same neighborhood, and then overthrew Rome. He marched on and captured the cities of Padua, Vincenza, Verona, Milan, and Pavia. And now the Roman people and the other inhabitants of Italy, in fear and dread awaited the tyrant Attila, who called himself the Scourge of God and the dread of mankind, attesting this by his deeds. Pope Leo, at the request of the emperor, went forth to meet Attila, whom he persuaded to spare Italy, and to march home. And his army was astonished. To those who asked him the reason he is said to have answered that he did not do this at the solicitation of the pope, but because two men stood beside him with drawn swords, threatening death to himself and his army. And it is believed these two men were Peter and Paul. By this means Attila was turned from his cruel measures and returned home. [Attila, king of the Huns, together with his brother Bleda, in 434, attained to the sovereignty of all the northern tribes between the frontier of Gaul and the frontier of China, and to the command of an army of at least 500,000 men. He gradually concentrated upon himself the awe and fear of the whole ancient world, which expressed itself by affixing to his name the epithet "the Scourge of God." His career divides itself into two parts. The first (445-450) consists of his ravages of the Eastern Empire between the Euxine and the Adriatic, and the negotiations with Theodosius II, which followed. They were ended by a treaty ceding to Attila a large territory south of the Danube and an annual tribute. The second was the invasion of the Western empire (450-452). He crossed the Rhine at Strasbourg, but was defeated at Chalons by Aetius and Theodoric, king of the Visigoths, in 451. He then crossed the Alps and took Aquileia in 452, after a siege of three months; but he did not attack Rome, in consequence, it is said, of his interview with Pope Leo the Great. He recrossed the Alps at the end of the year. He died in 453 by the bursting of a blood vessel. In person, Attila was described as a short thick-set man, of stately carriage, large head, dark complexion, flat nose, thin beard, and bald (with the exception of a few white hairs); his eyes were small but of great brilliance and quickness].

Venice, the city, had a remarkable origin and rise in the time of the invasion by the tyrant Attila. For when the cries and dread due to the siege of the city of Aquileia reached the region of Venice, the people in that same region fled from the land to the water where the city of Venice now stands. And so, by the grace of God, the building of the city soon took place in this vicinity, which in times of peace human reason would not have chosen for the purpose.

It is said that at this time the Devil in the disguise of Moses defrauded many Jews; for he promised them that in accordance with a like incident recorded in the Old Testament, he would lead them out of the island of Crete across the sea on dry feet into the Promised Land. But many of those who followed this false Moses were drowned in the sea, and only those among them who believed in Christ as the true God escaped.

ILLUSTRATION

Attila, king of the Huns, is portrayed (strange to say) in a mitred crown, otherwise used in the Chronicle only for Roman emperors. In his right hand he carries a sword to attest his military prowess; in his left a scourge in symbolism of his reputation as the "Scourge of God."

The Fourth Ecumenical Council, 630 bishops attending, was held at Chalcedon by order of Pope Leo and Emperor Marcian against the Constantinopolitan abbot, Eutyches, who held that Christ, after having accepted human form, did not have two natures but that the divine nature alone remained in him. But the unanimous opinion of the fathers was that Christ had two natures and that he should be believed to be both God and man. Therefore the Nestorian heretics and Eutyches the Manichean bishop were condemned and all Manichean books publicly burned. At this time twenty-eight ecclesiastical laws were made. [The Fourth Ecumenical Council, held at Chalcedon in 451, was occasioned by the Eutychian heresy and the notorious "Robber Synod," which caused protests and a loud demand for a new general council. In response to the imperial summons of Marcian five or six hundred bishops assembled. They annulled the acts of the "Robber Synod," deposed its leader Dioscurus, rejected Nestorianism and Eutychianism, and stood on the doctrine of two natures in Christ].

Paulus Orosius, a Spaniard, disciple of Saint Augustine, a versatile man, came to Rome at this time upon the death of Augustus. He wrote many books against the pagans, setting forth all the calamities of the world, its troubles and needs, and the vainglory of war. He wrote a history of the world from the Creation to his own time, calling it Ormista, that is, the misery of the world. Augustine sent him to Jerome for further instruction. On his return he brought with him some of the remains of St. Stephen, first martyr, the first to be brought to the West. [Paulus Orosius, Spanish presbyter, flourished under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for Augustine he went to Africa about 413. After two years Augustine sent him to Syria to counteract Pelagius who had resided for some years in Palestine. Orosius not only failed to procure the condemnation of Pelagius, but was himself anathemized by the bishop of Jerusalem. Orosius later returned to Africa and probably died there. His (also called) was dedicated to Augustine who had suggested the undertaking. The pagans, having been accustomed to complain that the ruin of the Roman Empire must be ascribed to the wrath of their deities because their worship had been abandoned, Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from earliest times the world has been the scene of calamities as great as the Roman Empire was suffering. The work, extending from the Creation down to 417, is, with exception of the conclusion, largely composed of extracts from Justin, Eutropius, and other (mostly inferior) authorities. It was very popular in the Middle Ages, though no one knows why it became known by the title (also spelled)].

John of Damascus (Iohannem Damascenum), a very good and learned monk, and a distinguished teacher of the Scriptures flourished at this time, as some believe; for he has been found to be a close adviser of Emperor Theodosius. He wrote four books of higher criticism, treating of faith of the human nature of Christ, and of baptism. And so, being a very highly learned man he wrote other books in praise and appreciation of which many remarkable things were said by Prudentius the scholar. [John of Damascus (Johannes Damascenus), eminent theologian of Damascus, derived his surname from that city; and there he was born at the close of the seventh century. His Arabic name was Mausur (the victor), and he received the epithet Chrysorroas (gold-pouring) on account of his eloquence. His father Sergius, a Christian, held high office under the Muslim caliph, in which he was succeeded by his son. John wrote several treatises in defense of image-worship, which Emperor Leo the Issurian was making strenuous efforts to suppress. Surrendering his worldly goods, John entered the monastery at St. Sabas, next Jerusalem, where he spent the rest of his life. He was ordained a priest by the patriarch of Jerusalem. In his last years he traveled through Syria, contending against the iconoclasts, and visited Constantinople at the risk of his life during the reign of Constantine Soporonymus. With him the "mysteries," the entire ritual, are an integral part of the orthodox system, and all dogma culminates in image-worship. He died about 752. He is a saint of both Greek and Latin churches, his festival being December 4th and May 6th, respectively].

Ursula, a virgin worthy of glory, was born in Britain, the only daughter of a prince of that land; and she was beautiful and magnanimous. When she was of marriageable age she was sought in marriage by the son of a pagan king; and she advised her father to give his consent only upon condition that the prince should give her ten unusually beautiful and noble young virgins, and to each of these a thousand attendants; and to prepare a sea voyage for these eleven thousand persons, thereby postponing the wedding for three years. To these virgins was assigned Pontulus, bishop of Basle, who conducted them to Rome. At once Gerasina, queen of Sicily, together with four daughters and a son, left her kingdom, and followed Ursula to martyrdom. And they went from Rome with Pope Cyriacus (Ciriaco). In order that the cause of Christianity might not be augmented, Maximus and Africanus, two pagans, wrote to their uncle Julius, general of the Huns, that when this multitude arrived at Cologne (Coloniā), a city of Germany, he should kill them. And so Ursula was shot through with an arrow, and together with eleven thousand virgins was crowned with martyrdom at Cologne by the Huns and Attila, their king, and ascended to heaven. But one of their number, called Cordula, through human fear stayed in the ship at night. The next day, however, strengthened by God, she came forth, and was killed. And if doubt exists as to the time of their suffering, the Church has no doubt concerning their martyrdom.

There are several different versions of the Ursula legend (The Catholic Encyclopedia says that they would fill more than 100 pages!). It is probably a fact that at a period when Christianity and civilization were contending for mastery over paganism and barbarism in Northern Germany, a young woman and several of her companions were murdered for their faith somewhere in the neighborhood of Cologne. The time of this even is variously fixed between 237 and 451, when the Huns invaded Belgium and Gaul. The mention of 11,000 virgins was first made by Herman, bishop of Cologne, in 922, and is said to be founded upon a mistake of abbreviation XI.M.V, that is, "eleven martyred virgins", for undecimilla virgines, "eleven thousand virgins". Others reduce the 11,000 to 1, saying that a virgin named Undecimilla perished with Ursula, giving rise to the mistake.

This is the Cologne version: Once upon a time there lived in Brittany a king, Dionotus (also spelled Theonotus, and in Celtic, Donaut), married to a Sicilian princess, Daria. Both were Christians, rearing their daughter Ursula with great care. The mother died when Ursula was just 15, and the daughter took the mother's place at court. She was beautiful and accomplished, learned and pious. Her father wished to keep her always at his side. Many princes sought her in marriage, but she refused them. The king of England had a son, Conon; but he and his people were still pagans. Of marriageable age, the son sought a wife, and the king sent ambassadors to demand Ursula for him. This worried Ursula's father, and he conferred with his daughter. She would answer the demand herself, and when the ambassadors came again they found her seated on her father's throne. She consented to the match on three conditions: First, that the bridegroom give for her ladies and companions ten virgins of the noblest blood in the kingdom, and to each of these one thousand attendants, and to her another thousand, to wait on her; secondly, for a space of three years she should permit her to honor her virginity, and, with her companions to visit the holy shrines of the saints; and thirdly, that the prince and his court receive baptism. These conditions she hoped would be refused; or if granted, 11,000 virgins would be redeemed and dedicated to the service of God. But the conditions were accepted; the prince was baptized; the required number of virgins was raised, and assembled in the capital of King Theonotus in Brittany; and they were all baptized. The bridegroom came, and Ursula received him graciously, requesting him to remain with her father as a comforter while she journeyed on with her maidens to the shrines in the city of Rome. Some say he remained, others that he accompanied her. There were no sailors on board, but the virgins miraculously steered the ship and managed the sails. But they sailed to the north instead of to the south. The winds drove them into the Rhine as far as Cologne. In a vision Ursula learned that she and her companions would suffer martyrdom at this place. But they proceeded to Basle, where they disembarked, and were miraculously conducted over the Alps by six angels, at length reaching Rome. Cyriacus, the bishop, came forth to meet them and gave them his blessing. In the meantime the prince, out of concern for his bride, had left Brittany, and now, miraculously arrived on the same day. They were baptized by Cyriacus. But the prince no longer aspired to the possession of Ursula, but fixed his hope on martyrdom with her on earth, and a perpetual reunion in heaven. Cyriacus decided to also share martyrdom with them as they set forth on the journey on the Rhine. But it so happened that at Rome were two captains, cruel pagans, commanders of all the imperial troops in Germania; and they feared that this great concourse of maidens would convert the whole nation if they were allowed to return to Germania, and their empire might cease. So they wrote the king of the Huns, then besieging Cologne, instructing him what to do. Ursula and her virgins, and Cyriacus and his churchmen arrived at Cologne. When the pagans saw a number of vessels, filled with virgins and bearded old men, approach, they rushed upon the unresisting victims. The prince fell first, then the churchmen, and finally the women were massacred. But the barbarians were awed by the majestic beauty of Ursula, and they carried her before their prince who offered to make her his queen. She deified him, and he transfigured her with three arrows. And thus all suffered martyrdom.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

The bodies of the Seven Sleepers, who under the Emperor Decius were locked up in a cave, and were crowned with martyrdom, were at this time awakened by God, to the scorn and ridicule of those who denied resurrection from the dead.

Merlin, a renowned seer of England, lived at this time (as some say). His mother, a nun, was the daughter of a king. She was reared among the nuns of Saint Peter, and (as she says) never knew a man. But she thought a beautiful man once upon a time embraced her and then disappeared; she then found herself pregnant, and at length bore this Merlin. He afterward became a great man. At his instigation Vortigern (Vortigerius) the king of Britain, greatly increased the Christian faith. His surviving brother was the father of the great Arthur. This Merlin discovered and prophesied many great things, and particularly, that below the ground, where no tower could be built, was a sea, and below the sea two dragons. [Merlin, famous sorcerer of Welsh tradition, was the enchanter and counselor of Arthurian romance. The personality of Merlin, on one side of demoniac, on the other of human, parentage, is now generally recognized as a combination of diverse traditions. Nennius' story of a boy Ambrosius, "child without a father," who revealed to Vortigern the secret of the insecure foundations of his tower, is the starting point of this combination. Into this framework were introduced elements derived from the much older story of the demon Asmodeus, who acted as familiar spirit to Solomon. The feats of divination with which the boy astonishes the messengers of the king, are derived directly from the source. The second part of Robert de Borron's trilogy, the starting point of the Arthurian cyclic development, dealt with the birth of the seer and his relations with Uther Pendragon. This originally, in verse, was later put into prose and expanded, first with additions dealing with the wars incident to the opening of Arthur's reign, then with a medley of romantic incidents connected with Arthur's court. Merlin is a strange and interesting personality, and his story may quite possibly have been inspired by popular tradition connected with an actual Welsh bard and soothsayer].

Buda is a highly celebrated and renowned city in the kingdom of Hungary, and the seat of the kings is there. It is located on the banks of the Danube. Hungary comprises vast lands on either side of it. What lies to the east of the Danube was at one time Pannonia, [Pannonia was a country bounded on the north and east by the Danube, co-terminous westward with Noricum and upper Italy, and southward with Dalmatia and upper Moesia. Little is heard of Pannonia until 35 BCE, when its inhabitants, who had taken up arms in support of the Dalmationas, were attacked by Augustus, who conquered and occupied Siscia (Sissek). In the fifth century Pannonia was ceded to the Huns by Theodosius II; but after the death of Attila it passed into the hands of the Ostrogoths, Lombards, and Avars. In upper Pannonia were Vindobona (Vienna), probably founded by Vespasian; Arrabona (Raab), a military station; and Savaria (Stein-am-Anger), founded by Claudius. In lower Pannonia were Sirmium and Sopianae (Fuenfkirchen), an important place at the meeting of five roads]. with Moesia [Moesia, a district inhabited by Tracians, bounded on the south by the Haemus and Scardus mountains; on the west by the Drinus; on the north by the Danube, and on the east by the Euxine. In the seventh century Slavs and Bulgarians entered the country and founded the modern kingdom of Serbia and Bulgaria]. on the east; to the west of this is Norica; [Norica (Noricum), a district south of the Danube, corresponding to part of Styria and Carinthia, Austria, Bavaria, and Salzburg. The country was mountainous and the soil poor; but it is rich in iron, and the famous Noric steel was used for Roman weapons. The inhabitants were warlike, and paid more attention to cattle-breeding than to agriculture. Gold and salt were found in considerable quantities. In 16 CE, having joined with the Pannonians in invading Histria, they were defeated by the Romans, and from this time Norica was called a province, although not organized as such, but remained a kingdom under the control of the imperial procurator]. to the north, the Danube; while the mountains of Greece are the southern boundary. But what lies to the west of the Danube, that is Hungary, and this was formerly a part of Scythia; and it had two peoples, namely the Gepidae, [Gepidae, one of the principal Gothic tribes. After their first migration they are said to have settled between the Oder and the Vistula, from which they expelled the Burgundiones. In the fifth century they appear under their king Ardaric, joining Attila's hosts, with whom they traversed Gaul, and afterward settled in Dacia on the banks of the Danube. Being regarded as dangerous neighbors to the Eastern Empire, Justinian invoked the aid of the Lombards against them; and in consequence the Gepidae and their kingdom were destroyed]. bordering on the Germans, and the Dacians; [Dacia, a large district of central Europe, bounded on the north by the Carpatians; on the south by the Danube; on the west by the Pathissus (Tisa or Theiss), and on the east by the Pyrus (Dneister), thus corresponding in the main to the modern Romania and Transylvania. The inhabitants were of Thracian stock, and the Getae were most akin to them in language and customs. By the Greeks they were called Dacians, by the Romans Daci. The Dacians believed in the immortality of the soul, and regarded death merely as a change of country. They were divided into an aristocracy and a proletariat. The first alone had the right to cover their heads, and wore felt hats. The second comprised the rank and file of the army, the peasants and artisans, and wore their hair long. They practiced agriculture, cattle raising, and also worked the gold and silver mines of Transylvania, at the same time carrying on a considerable outside trade. Although compelled to recognize Roman supremacy, they were by no means subdued. Trajan resolved to conquer them once for all, and after two campaigns he accomplished his purpose, making Dacia a Roman province. In 129, under Hadrian, Dacia was divided into Dacia Superior and Inferior, the former comprising Transylvania, the latter Little Wallachia, with procurators both under the praetorian legate. Marcus Aurelius rearranged it into three parts. In 256 the Goths crossed the Carpathians and drove the Romans from Dacia, and later Aurelian withdrew the troops altogether, settling the Roman colonists on the south of the Danube in Moesia, where he created the province of Dacia Aureliani]. but these are not those now called the Dacians (whom we call the Danes, whose king possesses a broad but maritime kingdom toward the German Sea, between Sweden and Saxony), but those within whose boundaries lies Transylvania, [Transylvania, a former principality, occupying until 1918 the extreme eastern portion of the kingdom of Hungary, but then added to Romania, since when the Romanian name Ardeal has become the official one. Transylvania is in the form of an irregular circle, and is a high plateau, surrounded on all sides by the Transylvanian mountains, the southeastern continuation of the Carpathian system. The Latin name first appears in the twelfth century, signifying "beyond the woods," that is, from Hungary. The German name is derived from the seven principal fortified towns or bergs founded by the German colonists—Siebenburgen. Until 1848 political rights belonged only to the Hungarians and the closely related Szekler and Saxon inhabitants, the Romanian majority having no recognition. These privileged elements formed about 40% of the population, the Hungarians being Roman Catholics, or Unitarians, and the Germans Protestants. A gypsy element has long been important]. near the Wallachians, a region of circular form surrounded by mountains. In this part of Hungary, inhabited by the Gepidae, there is another province called Scepusium, after Gepudium. Hungary is fertile; there is a little river in which submerged iron is turned to copper. It also has a fertile green bearing soil, gold and silver mines, and a good climate. It may be compared with the most fertile regions in which overproduction does not destroy the fertility of the soil. As the Huns multiplied in Scythia, they assembled and appointed captains; and they marched westward, traversing the land of the Bessi [Bessi, a fierce Thracian people living along Mt. Haemus as far as the Euxine. They were finally subdued by the Romans]. and the white Cumani; and afterward over the lands of the Ruthenians [The Ruthenians are those Ukrainians or Little Russians who were formerly Austrian subjects. The name is a Latinized form of "Russian," the terms "Red Russian," etc. being false derivations. When the early Ruthene states lost their independence, the name "Russia" was monopolized by the Muscovite state which, anxious to deny the Ruthenes a national individuality, gave them the name "Little Russians." But the Ruthenes adopted the name "Ukrainians," that is, inhabitants of the Turko-Tatar frontier in southern Russia. The Ruthenians are thus neither more nor less than Ukrainians]. and into the land of the black Cumani. They came to the river Tisa (Theiss). At first they were driven off by Martin (Martrinus) Longobardus who governed Pannonia, but finally they obtained peaceable possession of Pannonia. In the Year of the Lord four hundred one, while Attila (who according to the Hungarian is called Etzel [Etzel. By his wars Attila made himself supreme in central Europe, but his own special kingdom comprised the present Hungary and Transylvania, his capital being the modern city of Budapest. For nearly twenty years he appears to have ruled practically without a rival from the Caspian to the Rhine. Under the name Etzel he played a great part in Teutonic legend, particularly in the Niebelungenlied].) and his brother Buda were still alive, they made Attila king, and he chose the city of Sicambria for his royal seat. Through natural vainglory he harassed other people. He appointed his brother Bleda, or Buda, an associate in the government and placed him over the subjugated countries. [The Huns had various chiefs, of whom Rugilas (Ruas) was the foremost. When he died in 433, his nephews Attila and Bleda took over the sovereignty. They soon subordinated all the chieftains of their people, and finally Attila, having disposed of his brother, became sole ruler]. While Attila and his brother Buda thus ruled, and with cruel madness overran and destroyed many lands and people and afterwards lived for a time at Sicambria, Attila's brother became hostile to him, apparently intending to supplant him in the sovereignty and usurp the kingdom. Now, upon his departure Attila had ordered that the city of Sicambria was to be named Attila, after himself; but his brother called it Buda, after his own name. Therefore Attila slew his brother with his own hands, ordered him thrown into the Danube, and the city called Attila. But the Huns did not do this; and they called the city Budawara; and so the Hungarians to this day call the city Budawara. However, being concerned about the royal command, the Germans, through fear, called the city Etzelburg (Etzelpurg), after Attila. For the next five years Attila rested at Etzelburg; and he placed his governors and spies in many lands. In more fortunate times Buda at length was built up as the capital of Hungary, in such a vicinity that nothing could be found in all Hungary more secure and wonderful. Among all other cities of the same region, this city is the most renowned for the beauty of its public and other buildings; for this reason it is patronized by royalty. With its high fortifications and wonderful castle, it is the most beautiful of all. This same castle, with others, particularly Miscegradun, where the royal crown is kept, was so beautified with thick walls and mighty halls, and beautiful structures by Matthias Corvinus, [Matthias I, Hunyadi (1440-1490), king of Hungary, also known as Matthias Corvinus, second son of Janos (John) Hunyadi, was born in Transylvania February 23, 1440. He shared in his father's campaign at the age of twelve. In 1453 he was created a count, and was knighted at the siege of Belgrade in 1454. On the death of his father he was inveigled to Buda by his enemies, condemned to death on pretext of a conspiracy, but spared because of his youth. On the king's death he was detained for a time by George Podebrad, governor of Bohemia, who treated him hospitably and had him become engaged to his daughter Catherine. In 1458 he was elected king of Bohemia by the vast majority of the nation. The same year he entered Buda in state and married his bride, whose father was crowned king of Bohemia soon after. In 1468 Matthias joined the league against his father-in-law, and in the following year was elected king of Bohemia by the Czech Catholics. He succeeded in making the Turks respect Hungarian territory. His reign was fraught with many difficulties, and his last days were occupied in endeavoring to secure the succession for his illegitimate son Janos Corvinus; but the matter was still unsettled when Matthias expired very suddenly in 1490. He was equally illustrious as a scholar, statesman, soldier, orator and legislator, and never guilty of cruel or vindictive action—though often provoked. Frequently he spent half the night reading, after the labor of a strenuous day. His camp was a school of chivalry, his court a place of poets and artists]. that it is now justly prized and esteemed above all the old structures. [Budapest, capital and largest city of Hungary, is situated on both banks of the Danube, and includes the former towns of Buda (German, Ofen) and O-Buda on the right bank, and Pest, together with Kobanya, on the left bank. There is evidence of settlement on the right bank of the Rhine during pre-Roman times. The Romans founded a colony which they called Aquincum, a little north of the site of a previous settlement, and where O-Buda now stands. This acted as an outpost of the Roman Empire until 376 CE, when it fell before the assaults of the barbarians. History is silent about the centuries that elapsed before the Magyar invaders approach, but it is certain that when they arrived at the close of the ninth century that they found Slavonic settlements on the present sites of Buda and Pest (Slav. Pestj = 'oven'; German "Ofen" was used for Buda). In 1241 Pest was destroyed by the Mongols, after whose departure Bela IV, king of Hungary, founded the modern Buda (1247), and repopled Pest with colonists of German (Swabian) and other nationalities. From this time both towns made rapid progress. In 1361 Buda became the capital of Hungary, while Pest attained to commercial prominence. But neither city was allowed to advance undisturbed. For centuries the Rock of Buda overlooked scenes of strife between East and West; but the attractions of its key position also brought compensations. Crusaders from the West brought with them the glories and advantages of 14th century French civilization. French masons and Italian artists combined to produce in Buda a city fit to rival those of the West, while Flemish and Venetian merchants raised Pest to high rank as a commercial center. In 1464 Matthias Corvinus elevated Buda to a fortified city, built a splendid castle, and there preserved his rich library. And such was the status of Buda and Pest in 1493, when the was published. Thirteen years later (1526) Pest was captured and sacked by the Turks under Suleiman, who turned the fortress over to John Zapolya, of Siebenburgen, whom he designated King of Hungary and obligated him to pay tribute. Ferdinand I, King of Hungary, drove out Zapolya in 1527; but Soliman retook Buda in 1541. On September 2, 1686, the imperial troops under the leadership of Duke Karl of Lorraine, recovered Buda in a siege during which the city was plundered and burned. Architectural and other treasures were stolen or destroyed, and at the close of the occupation both towns were little more than ruins. But they overcame even this catastrophe. It was not until 1873 that both cities were united into one municipality, Budapest, which became the political, commercial, and intellectual center of Hungary. The modern town covers an area of about 80 square miles on both sides of the river. The two banks are connected by six bridges, including one of the largest extension bridges in Europe].

THE CITY OF BUDA

The City of Buda, since 1873 consolidated as one municipality with Pest, on the opposite side of the Danube, as Budapest, is represented by a large woodcut extending over the verso of one folio and the recto of another. In the foreground is the Danube. To the left is the burg or fortress, surrounded by a wall. In the gable of one of the numerous buildings within this enclosure appears a crown and two shields. The buildings themselves are of a rather generic, nondescript architecture. Within and without the walls churches, by number and prominence of position, are given prime importance. The castle of Buda, though actually located on a high elevation above the city, is shown on low ground. The residences of the city are closely packed about the churches. The only topographical eminence is in the right background—a low, bald hill. The river is without shipping, bridges or wharves. There are no signs of life. The view selected is unfortunately landward, instead of up the river. The muddy waters in the foreground give us little idea of the course of the beautiful Danube and of the relative position of Buda and Pest.

Strasbourg (Argentina), the very old and mighty city called Argentuaria among the Swiss (Helvetios), located on the Rhine, was at first under the rule of Trier (Treveris), of the province of Belgium, the building of which was begun in the time of Abraham. Together with all Switzerland and the adjoining countries, it was subjugated by Julian the emperor; and for this same city he established a treasury department to collect tribute, interest and taxes. From this time on the city was given the name Argentina, which in the Latin is equivalent to silver mine. But afterwards, when the tyrant Attila with his powerful hosts came from the north, and first invaded Greece (Illiricos), and then swept over all of Germany, destroying all the cities and castles on his way, he at length came to the kingdom of Constance. King Sigmund (Sigimundus), a prince of the same land, went forth with a great army to meet him at Basle; but after the dispersion and flight of the army, he was defeated by Attila. Then Attila went forth and laid siege to Strasbourg, which no Roman emperor had been able to overcome entirely. But Attila gave battle, and in many places he destroyed the walls, giving all free entrance to the city without obstacles. And Attila sternly commanded that the walls were not to be rebuilt in his lifetime, and that the city was no longer to be called Argentina, but that it should be called Strasbourg (Straspurg) because of the many entrances and streets passing through its walls. Now, when some time later the kings of the Franks attained to sovereignty over the Swiss (Helvetios), they established their residence in this city. Later they appointed governors over it. And just as Saint Otilia's [Legend says that Otilia was a daughter of Duke Aldarich of Alsace. Because she was born blind, her father, a pagan, commanded that she should be carried out of the house and exposed to perish; but her nurse fled with her to a monastery. And the Lord appeared to Erhard, a pious bishop, who by divine revelation was directed to the monastery to baptize the blind girl, after which, he was assured, she would recover her sight. And so it happened. Later her father repented, and on his deathbed left her all his worldly goods. She built a monastery at Hohenburg, in which she lived in great austerity and devotion. She collected 130 nuns who walked with her in the paths of Christianity. She died as abbess of Hohenburg in 720. She is the patron saint of Alsace, and more particularly of the city of Strasbourg]. father held not only the governorship of the city but also of the country, and built Hohenburg and others, so after him, his son Albertus, and his descendants reigned there. Later this city, through the Roman emperor, obtained its freedom, and became part of the Roman Empire; and from Saint Materno (Martin?), who was sent to the Rhenish cities by Saint Peter, received the true Christian faith. This city, in addition to its amusements and the good manners and hospitality of its citizens, has a very large church, with a most beautiful spire, built to an extraordinary height. The nobility from castles and from cities in the vicinity gathered there. Here there is also a noble bishopric; and princes have governed the city. In addition to the river Rhine this city has two other rivers, rich in shipping, and which are its tributaries. [Strasbourg (German Strassburg) was originally a Celtic settlement, which was captured by the Romans, who replaced it by the fortified station of Argentoratum, afterwards the headquarters of the Eighth Legion. It is first mentioned by Ptolemy. In 357 the emperor Julian here gained a decisive victory over the Alamanni, who 50 years later reconquered the whole district. Towards the end of the 5th century the town passed to the Franks, who gave it its present name. The early history of Strasbourg consists mainly of struggles between the bishop and the citizens. The conflict was finally decided in favor of the latter by the battle of Oberhausbergen in 1262, and the position of a free imperial city, which had been conferred upon Strasbourg by the German king, Philip of Swabia, was never again disputed. In 1332 there was a revolution, in consequence of which the guilds were admitted to the government. In 1681, during a time of peace, it was suddenly seized by Louis XIV, and this unjustifiable action received formal recognition at the Peace of Ryswick in 1697. In the French Revolution the city was deprived of its privileges as a free town. In the War of 1870-1 Strasbourg, with its garrison of 17,000 men, surrendered to the Germans. The city and the cathedral suffered considerably from the bombardment. The bishopric of Strasbourg existed in the days of the Merovingian kings, being probably founded in the fourth century; and it embraced a large territory on both banks of the Rhine. The bishopric was in the archdiocese of Mainz and the bishop was a prince of the empire].

CITY OF STRASBOURG (ARGENTINA)

This large woodcut shows the old German (and later German-French) city of Strasbourg, dominated by its enormous cathedral, whose spire extends almost to the top of the page. The houses are clustered about it, and among these a number of churches. The city is walled, and the woodcut shows at least two of the many gates of which the chronicler speaks, and which he alleges to be the reason for the modern name of Strasbourg (a burg or city of streets). By way of variation the spire of one of the buildings is surmounted with a weathervane (a cock). A high rugged terrain is indicated in the background at the left. In speaking of this cathedral, Victor Hugo (Le Rhin, Paris 1842) says:

The enormous cathedral, which is the highest building that the hand of man has made since the Great Pyramid, was clearly defined against the background of dark mountains whose forms were magnificent and whose valleys were flooded with sunshine. The work of God for man and the work of man for God, the mountain and the Cathedral contesting for grandeur. I have never seen anything more inspiring . . . but the real triumph of the Cathedral is the spire. It is a true tiara of stone with its crown and its cross . . . The Münster of Strassburg is nearly five hundred feet high.

Of the Death of Attila, King of the Huns.

When Attila the king (as above stated) marched from his homeland and came to the country of Norica, (in part called Austria, and in part Bavaria), Honoria, the sister of the Emperor Valentinian, through one of her personal attendants, and under the threats of her brother, urged Attila to make her his spouse. This Attila undertook with great zeal in order to attain the object of his desire and secure Honoria. [Early in Attila's reign, Honoria, grand-daughter of Emperor Theodosius II, being subjected to severe restraint on account of an amorous intrigue with one of the chamberlains of the palace, sent her ring to the king of the Huns, and called on him to be her husband and deliverer. Nothing came of the proposed engagement, but the wrongs of Honoria, his affianced wife, served as a pretext for some of the constantly recurring embassies with which Attila worried the two courts of Constantinople and Ravenna]. But he was an unchaste man who would not abstain from women, but always carried many of them with him in his army. One of these was Ildico. By his intimacy with her he brought about his own death; for once upon a time he held an hilarious celebration given to excess and pleasure, after which he fell into a deep sleep of exhaustion; and his arteries of joy were so congested that the blood spurted from his nostrils, suffocating him. [When Attila, after his interview with Pope Leo, returned to his palace beyond the Danube, he remained there until the night of his marriage with a beautiful girl, variously named Hilda, Ildico, or Mycloth, the last of his innumerable wives. At the banquet given in honor of the occasion he suffered a rupture of a blood vessel, whereof he died (454). The instantaneous fall of his empire is well symbolized in the story that on the same night the emperor Marcian at Constantinople dreamed that he saw a bow of Attila broken asunder (Jornandes, Reb. Get, 49)].

Eutyches (Euthices), an abbot of Constantinople, and a heretic, sowed his errors at this time. And in order that it should not appear that he and the heretic Nestorius were of the same mind, he said that the divine and the human nature (of Christ) fused and became one, and should under no circumstances be divided. Now as Flavian (Flavianus), the Constantinopolitan bishop, had condemned this heresy with the approval of the Emperor Theodosius, the Council of Ephesus was called, by which Eutyches was condemned and sent into exile. [Eutyches (c. 380-c. 460), a presbyter and archimandrite at Constantinople, first came into notice at the Council of Ephesus (431), where, as a zealous adherent of Cyril of Alexandria, he opposed the doctrine of the Nestorians, and affirmed that after the union of the two natures, the human and the divine, Christ had only one nature, that of the Incarnate Word, and that therefore his human body was essentially different from other human bodies. In this he went beyond Cyril and the Alexandrine school generally, who took care not to circumscribe the true humanity of Christ. It would seem that Eutyches differed from this school chiefly in word, for equally with them he denied that Christ's human nature was transmitted into his divine nature. His imprudent assertion led to an accusation of heresy by Domnus of Antioch, and Eusebius, bishop of Dorylaeum, at a synod of Constantinople in 448, which excommunicated him. At a council held at Ephesus in 449, he was reinstated in his office, and Eusebius, Domnus, and Flavian, his chief opponents, were deposed, the Alexandrine doctrine of the "one nature" receiving the sanction of the church. In 451 the fourth ecumenical council met at Chalcedon, declared the Ephesian synod to have been a "robber synod," and its proceedings were annulled, and, in accordance with the rule of Leo, bishop of Rome, it was declared that the two natures were united in Christ, without any a teration or absorption. Eutyches died in exile, but of his later life nothing was known].

Simplicius the pope succeeded Hilarius in the reigns of the emperors Leo the Second and Zeno. This holy and righteous man ordained that no one should be appointed bishop against his will; also that any cleric, possessing a benefice from a layman, should not be recognized; and this was afterwards confirmed by other popes. He declared that the Roman See should be the first among all churches. He divided the jurisdiction of the priests into five divisions: First, Peter's; Second, Paul's; Third, Lawrence's; Fourth, John Lateran's; Fifth, Mary Maggiore's. And having consecrated several houses of worship, and having benefitted the Roman churches, not only with order and laws, but with gifts, he died and was buried in the basilica of Peter on the sixth Nones of March, after having sat fifteen years, one month and seventeen days. And the chair rested twenty-six days. [Simplicius, pope from 468 to 483. During his pontificate the Western Empire was overthrown, and Italy passed into the hands of the barbarian king Odoacer. In the East, the usurpation of Basiliscus (475-476), who supported the Monophysites, gave rise to many ecclesiastical troubles, which were a source of great anxiety to the pope. The emperor Zeno who had procured the banishment of Basiliscus, endeavored to compound with the Monophysite party; and the bishop of Constantinople, who had previously fought on the pope's side for the council of Chalcedon, abandoned Simplicius and subscribed to the Henoticon, the conciliatory document promulgated by the emperor in 428. Simplicius died in 483, with the question still unsettled. The Monophysites maintained that Christ had but one composite nature].

Felix, the third of that name, a pope, and a Roman, also condemned a number of heretics for their errors, through assembled councils; and in the same councils it was ordained that one accused before a judge should always be given time and opportunity to answer; also that the churches were to be consecrated by the bishops. He built the Church of Saint Agapitus, not far from Saint Lawrence the Martyr's Church. And now, having consecrated any number of priests, deacons and bishops, he died in basilica of Paul. He sat eight years, 11 months and 17 days; and then the chair rested for five days. [Felix III became pope in March 483. His first act was to repudiate the Henoticon, deed of union, originating, it is supposed, with Acacius, patriarch of Constantinople, and published by the emperor Zeno with the view of reconciling the Monophysites and their opponents in the Eastern Church. He also addressed a letter of remonstrance to Acacius; but the latter proved refractory, and sentence of deposition was passed against him. As Acacius, however, had the support of the emperor, a schism arose between the Eastern and the Western churches, which lasted for thirty-four years. Felix died in 492].

Mamertus (Mamercus), bishop of Vienne, was at this time held in great esteem for his piety and learning. And as at that time there was a great earthquake in Gaul, and the wild animals fell upon the people and caused them much distress, Mamertus wrote the litany, called the lesser one, which is to be distinguished from the greater of Saint Gregory the Great, written on the feast day of Saint Mark. [Mamertus. The chronicler probably refers to a presbyter in the diocese of Vienne, France, whose brother was bishop. The presbyter died about 470. He wrote a number of books on ecclesiastical subjects].

Remigius, bishop of Reims, a holy and highly learned man, lived (as some say) at this time. As the historians state, he baptized Clovis (Clodoveum), king of the Franks, together with innumerable Franks. As a highly renowned man, learned in the Holy Scriptures, he wrote many useful things concerning the Old and New Testament. When he had fulfilled a term of seventy years as bishop, among other miracles, he awakened a little girl from the dead. He died in the Year of the Lord 468, on the first day of October. [Remigius (c. 437-533), bishop of Reims and friend of Clovis, whom he converted to Christianity with 3000 Franks on Christmas day 496, after the defeat of the Alamanni].

Gelasius the pope, a native of Africa, was a holy man. Whenever he was able to apprehend Manichean heretics, he condemned them to exile and publicly burned their books in Saint Mary's church. Among other things he ordained that one who had had two wives should not be consecrated without the consent of the Papal See; also that no man lame in any member should be made a priest. He wrote many manuscripts and books against the heretics. He consecrated many churches at Rome, and prescribed what books should not be considered canonical. He died and was buried in the basilica of Peter the Apostle on the eleventh day of the Kalends of December. He sat four years, eight months and seventeen days. The chair then rested seven days. [Gelasius I, pope (492-496), succeeded Felix III. He confirmed the estrangement between the Eastern and Western Churches by insisting on the removal of the name of Acacius, bishop of Constantinople, from the Diptychs].

Anastasius the pope, the second of that name, was a Roman whose father was Fortunatus. He was pope in the time of Anastasius the emperor. Although at first regarded as a good Christian, he was misled by Acacius; for he secretly recalled him; and thereby he estranged the clergy, who withdrew from communion with the pope. He also had communion with Plotinus the deacon, without the consent of the Christians, who followed the errors of Acacius. Therefore some say he died through divine intervention. They say that while evacuating his intestines fell out. This Anastasius (as some state) excommunicated the emperor Anastasius because he was partial to Acacius. He was buried in the basilica of Peter on the 13th day of the Kalends of December. He sat (in office) one year 10 months and 24 days. Then the chair rested four days. [Anastasius II, pope (496-498), lived in the time of the schism of Acacius. He showed some tendency toward conciliation, and thus brought upon himself the lively reproaches of the author of].

Zeno, the emperor, allotted the sovereignty to his son Leo the Second upon the death of Leo the First. Leo the Second, who was severely ill, prior to his death left the sovereignty to his father Zeno. This Leo, (who is mentioned above), who was called upon by his father to share the sovereignty with him, was secretly made a cleric by his mother, who was concerned about giving the imperial power to Zeno. Now when Zeno earnestly entreated her to bring forth her son, she brought him another who resembled her son in appearance. This Leo afterwards lived in the priesthood up to the time of the emperor Justinian. In the same year Little Augustus (Augustulus) marched against his uncle in Italy with an army. He drove him off, and proceeded with the rule of the empire. Over a year later Orestes (Horesce), [Orestes, regent in Italy, during the short reign of his infant son Romulus Augustulus from August 29, 475 to August 28, 476. He was a Roman by origin, but born in Pannonia, and when Attila conquered that province, he and his father Tatulus both entered the service of the conqueror until the death of the latter and the downfall of the Hun's empire. Orestes was secretary to Attila, and his ambassador at Constantinople. After Attila's death Orestes returned to Italy, where on account of his great wealth he soon rose to eminence, and obtained the title and rank of patrician. In 475, while at Rome, he received orders from the emperor Julius Nepos to assemble an army and sent it to Gaul, as fears were entertained that the West Gothic king Euric intended another invasion of that country. Being once at the head of an army, Orestes availed himself of his power and riches, to make himself the master of Italy, and immediately set out for Ravenna, where Nepos was residing. On his approach Nepos fled to Salona in Dalmatia, where he met with the deposed emperor Glycerius, his former rival, who was then bishop of that place; and on the 29th of August 475 Orestes had his son Romulus Augustulus proclaimed emperor, remaining, however, at the head of affairs himself. His first minister was Parmenus. He sent Latinus and Madusus to Constantinople in order that he might be recognized by the emperor Zeno. And he made peace with Genseric, king of the Vandals. The reign of Orestes was short. In 476 Odoacer rose in arms against him, and Orestes shut himself up in Pavia. He was taken prisoner after the town had been stormed by the barbarians, and conducted to Placentia, where he was beheaded by order of Odoacer on August 26, 476]. the patrician, made an alliance with Genseric, king of the Vandals. While matters were thus proceeding in Rome, Odoacer (Adovacer) with a strong force from the furthestmost regions in Pannonia, began to overrun Italy; and for several years Italy and certain cities were in his power. In consequence Little Augustus was seized with so much fear that he willingly abdicated after having been ruler less than eleven months. And so with this Little Augustus the Roman Empire passed away in the year from the founding of the city (i.e., Rome) 1229, and in the year from the Incarnation of the Lord four hundred seventy-five. Zeno died at Constantinople in the 17th year of his reign.

Zeno, Roman emperor of the East (474-491) was an Isaurian of noble birth. Nothing is known of his early life. After his marriage to Ariadne, daughter of Leo I in 468, he became patrician and commander of the imperial guard and of the armies in the East. In 471 he procured the assassination of Ardaburius, the Goth, who had tried to occupy in the East the position held by Ricimer in the West. In 474 Leo I died, appointing as his successor Leo, the son of Zeno and Ariadne. However, Zeno succeeded in getting himself crowned also, and on the death of his son in the same year, he became sole emperor. In the following year, in consequence of a revolt in favor of his brother Basiliscus, he was compelled to take refuge in Isauria, where he was obliged to shut himself up in a fortress. The growing misgovernment of Basiliscus ultimately enabled Zeno to re-enter Constantinople unopposed (476). His rival was banished to Phrygia, where he soon died. The remainder of Zeno's reign was disturbed by numerous but minor revolts. Since 472 the aggressions of the Ostrogothic leader Theodoric had been a constant source of danger. In 487 he induced Theodoric, son of Theodemir, to invade Italy and establish his new kingdom. Zeno is described as a lax and indolent ruler, although he appears to have ably administered the finances of his empire. In ecclesiastical history the name of Zeno is associated with Henoticon, which The Catholic Encyclopedia (Fortescue, "Henoticon." Vol. 7. New York: 1910) defines as follows:

The story of the Henoticon forms a chapter in that of the Monophysite heresy in the fifth and sixth centuries. It is the name of the unhappy and unsuccessful law made by the Emperor Zeno in order to conciliate Catholics and Monophysites. Really, it satisfied no one and brought about the first great schism between Rome and Constantinople.

When Zeno (474-91) came to the throne the Monophysite trouble was at its height. The mass of the people of Egypt and Syria rejected the Council of Chalcedon (451) altogether, and found in Monophysitism an outlet for their national, anti-imperial feeling. The three Patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem were in schism. The Catholic Patriarch of Alexandria, Proterius, had been murdered in 457; a fanatical Monophysite, Timothy Aelurus (Ailuros), had been elected as his successor. He died in 477; the heretics elected one Peter Mongus—the "Stammerer"—to succeed him; the Catholics, John Talaia. Peter Gnapheus (Fullo), one of the most determined leaders of the heretical party, occupied the See of Antioch; Theodosius, also a Monophysite, that of Jerusalem. Over 500 bishops in these patriarchates were open partisans of Eutyches's heresy. Zeno found himself in a difficult position. On the one hand he was a friend of Peter Fullo of Antioch and sympathized with the Monophysites, on the other he was forced into the defence of the Catholic Faith by the fact that his rival Basiliscus (whom he succeeded in deposing) had made himself the protector of the heretics. Zeno, in spite of his personal feeling, came to the throne as the champion of the Catholic party. At first he protected the Catholic bishops (John Talaia, for instance). But he was anxious to conciliate his old friends in Egypt and Syria, and he realized how much harm this schism was doing to the empire. He therefore issued a law that was meant to satisfy every one, to present a compromise that all could accept. This law was the famous Henoticon (henotikon, "union"). It was published in 482.

As an attempt at conceding what both parties most desired, the Henoticon is a very skillful piece of work. It begins by insisting on the faith defined at Nicaea, confirmed at Constantinople, followed faithfully by the Fathers at Ephesus. Nestorius and Eutyches are both condemned, the anathemas of Cyril approved. Christ is God and man, one, not two. His miracles and Passion are works of one (whether person or nature, is not said). Those who divide or confuse, or introduce a phantasy (i.e. affirm a mere appearance) are condemned. One of the Trinity was incarnate. This is written not to introduce a novelty, but to satisfy every one. Who thinks otherwise, either now or formerly, either at Chalcedon or at any other synod, is anathematized, especially Nestorius, Eutyches, and all their followers. It will be noticed that the Henoticon carefully avoids speaking of nature or person, avoids the standard Catholic formula (one Christ in two natures), approves of Peter Fullo's expression (one of the Trinity was incarnate), names only the first three councils with honour, and alludes vaguely but disrespectfully to Chalcedon. There is no word against Dioscurus of Alexandria. Otherwise it offends rather by its omissions than by its assertions. It contains no actually heretical statement (the text is in Evagrius, "H. E.", III, 14; Liberatus, "Breviarium", XVII). Peter Mongus accepted it, explaining that it virtually condemned Chalcedon and thereby secured his place as Patriarch of Alexandria. His rival, John Talaia, was banished. Peter Fullo at Antioch accepted the new law too. But the strict Monophysites were not content, and separated themselves from Mongus, forming the sect called the Acephali (akephaloi, "without a head" – with no patriarch). Nor were Catholics satisfied with a document that avoided declaring the Faith on the point at issue and alluded in such a way to Chalcedon. The emperor succeeded in persuading Acacius (Akakios), Patriarch of Constantinople (471-80), to accept the Henoticon, a fact that is remarkable, since Acacius had stood out firmly for the Catholic Faith under Basiliscus. It is perhaps explained by his personal enmity against John Talaia, orthodox Patriarch of Alexandria. The Henoticon was addressed in the first place to the Egyptians, but was then applied to the whole empire. Catholic and consistent Monophysite bishops were deposed, their sees were given to people who agreed to the compromise. But the emperor had not counted with Rome. From all parts of the East Catholics sent complaints to Pope Felix II (or III; 483-92) entreating him to stand out for the Council of Chalcedon. He then wrote two letters, one to Zeno and one to Acacius, exhorting them to continue defending the Faith without compromise, as they had done before (Epp. i et ii Felicis III in Thiel, "Epistolae Rom. Pontificum genuinae" Braunsberg, 1868, vol. I, pp. 222-39). Then John Talaia, exiled from Alexandria, arrived at Rome and gave a further account of what was happening in the East. The pope wrote two more letters, summoning Acacius to Rome to explain his conduct (Epp. iii et iv, ibid., pp. 239-241). The legates who brought these letters to Constantinople were imprisoned as soon as they landed, then forced to receive Communion from Acacius in a Liturgy in which they heard Peter Mongus and other Monophysites named in the diptychs. The pope, having heard of this from the Acoemeti (akoimetoï, sleepless) monks at Constantinople, held a synod in 484 in which he denounced his legates, deposed and excommunicated Acacius (Epp. vi, vii, viii, ibid., 243 sq.). Acacius retorted by striking Felix's name from his diptychs. Thus began the Acacian schism that lasted thirty-five years (484-519). The Acoemeti monks alone at Constantinople stayed in communion with the Holy See; Acacius put their abbot, Cyril, in prison. Acacius himself died in schism in 489. His successor, Flavitas (or Fravitas, 489-90), tried to reconcile himself with the pope, but refused to give up communion with Monophysites and to omit Acacius's name in his diptychs. Zeno died in 491; his successor, Anastasius I (491-518), began by keeping the policy of the Henoticon, but gradually went over to complete Monophysitism. Euphemius (490-496), patriarch after Flavitus, again tried to heal the schism, restored the pope's name to his diptychs, denounced Peter Mongus, and accepted Chalcedon; but his efforts came to nothing, since he, too, refused to remove the names of Acacius and Flavitas from the diptychs (see Euphemius of Constantinople). Gelasius I (492-96) succeeded Felix II at Rome and maintained the same attitude, denouncing absolutely the Henoticon and any other compromise with the heretics. Eventually, when the Emperor Anastasius died (518), the schism was healed. His successor, Justin I (518-27), was a Catholic; he at once sought reunion with Rome. John II, the patriarch (518-20), was also willing to heal the schism. In answer to their petitions, Pope Hormisdas (514-23) sent his famous formula. This was then signed by the emperor, the patriarch, and all the bishops at the capital. On Easter day, 24 March, 519, the union was restored. Monophysite bishops were deposed or fled, and the empire was once more Catholic, till the troubles broke out again under Justinian I (527-65).

Anastasius came to the throne after the death of Zeno, in the 492nd year from the Incarnation of the Lord. He was an ornament to the Roman Empire. He sent a costly robe to Clovis, the king of the Franks, because the latter had wrested certain regions from the Visigoths (who followed the Arian heresy). But later, through the influence of Acacius, the Constantinopolitan bishop, he became a heretic. Although through papal emissaries he was many times admonished to renounce his heresies, he foolishly ignored them. And this, God did not permit him to go unpunished, for in the twenty-seventh year of his reign he was killed by a thunderbolt. [Anastasius I (c. 430-518), was a palace official at the time of the death of Zeno (491), and bore a high character. He was raised to the throne of the Roman empire of the East through the choice of Ariadne, Zeno's widow, who married him shortly thereafter. He gained popular favor by judicious revision of taxes, and displayed great vigor in the affairs of the empire. The principal wars in which he was engaged were the Isaurian and Persian. The former was stirred up by the supporters of Longinus, brother of Zeno. The victory of Cotyaeam in 493 broke the back of the revolt. In the war with Persia both sides suffered until a peace was made in 506. To protect Constantinople and its vicinity against the invasions of Slavs and Bulgarians he built the "Anastasian Wall" from the Propontis to the Euxine. The emperor was a Monophysite, but his ecclesiastical policy was moderate. He endeavored to maintain the principle of Henoticon of Zeno and the peace of the church. Out of these religious controversies arose his unpopularity in the European provinces. Anastasius died July 9, 518].

While these events were happening among the Romans, a new revolt occurred: The Heruli [Heruli (or Eruli), a powerful German race, said to have come originally from Scandania, although they appear on the shores of the Black Sea in the year 262 during the reign of Gallianus, when in conjunction with the Goths they invaded the Roman Empire. They were conquered by the Ostrogoths, and afterward formed part of the great army of Attila, with which he invaded Gaul and Italy. After the death of Attila, in 453, a portion of them at the command of Odoacer, who is said to have been an Herulian, destroyed the Western Empire in 476. Meanwhile the remainder of the nation formed a powerful kingdom on the banks of the Theiss and the Danube, which was eventually destroyed by the Lombards. Some of the Heruli were allowed by Anastasius to settle in Pannonia, and they served with great distinction in the armies of Justinian]. and the Thuringi, [In the fifth century the Thuringians lived between the Harz Mountains and the Thuringian Forest. They were tributary to Attila, the Hun, under whom they served in the battle of Chalons in 451]. survivors of the army of Attila, living on the Danube, marched into Italy from the remote regions along the Danube. Leaving Aquileia on the left, they turned toward the Tarvisians, [Tarvisium (Treviso) a town of Venetia, in the north of Italy, on the river Silis]. Vincentians, [Vincentia, (more correctly, Vicentia), a town in Venetia in the north of Italy]. and Brixians. [Brixia, a town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the road from Comum to Aquileia]. When the news reached the emperor Little Augustus, he sent his father, Orestes, whom he had made a general, to meet Odoacer. But as he was helpless, he fled to Pavia. Odoacer pursued him, besieging the city round about, and taking it by storm. He also killed the citizens and the Roman soldiers, and not only ravaged the city, but also the country, with fire and murder. Odoacer also captured Orestes, carried him to Placentia, and stabbed him in the presence of the army. Through such cruelty the rest of the Italian peoples became frightened, and one after another gave themselves up. And so Odoacer ruled Italy 14 years as he pleased. Zeno who ruled Constantinople, advised Theodoric to march into Italy to relieve the cities of those who had wrongfully obtained them. But the alliance did not last long, for each distrusted the other. And Theodoric circumvented Odoacer, inviting him to table, and then slaying him.

Odoacer, or Odovacer (c. 434-493), the first barbarian ruler of Italy, son of Aedico or Idico, was born about 434 and probably of the tribe of Scyrri who had invaded Pannonia about 430. It is said that as a tall young recruit for the Roman armies, dressed in skins, on his way to Italy, he entered the cell of Severinus to ask his blessing. The saint had an inward premonition of his future greatness, and in blessing him said, "Go forth into Italy. You who are now dressed in poor clothes will soon give precious gifts to many." Odoacer was probably thirty when he entered the imperial service. By 472 he had risen to some eminence. In 475 the Emperor Nepos was driven into exile, and the successful rebel Orestes was enabled to array in the purple his son, a boy of about 14, who was named Romulus after his grandfather, and nicknamed Augustulus ('Little Augustus'), from his inability to play the part of the great Augustus. Before this puppet emperor had been a year on the throne, the barbarian mercenaries rose in mutiny, demanding to be made proprietors of one third of the soil of Italy. To this request Orestes answered, No. Odoacer now offered his fellow-soldiers all they desired if they would put him on the throne. On August 24, 476, he was proclaimed king, and five days later Orestes was beheaded. Augustulus was compelled to leave the throne, but his life was spared. Odoacer became chief ruler of Italy at 42, and he reigned 13 years with undisputed sway. He conducted his administration as nearly as possible along the lines of the old imperial government.

In 477 or 478 the dethroned Nepos sent ambassadors to Zeno, emperor of the East, begging his aid in the reconquest of Italy. They met ambassadors from the Roman senate, sent nominally by the command of Augustulus, really no doubt by that of Odoacer, to declare that they did not need a separate emperor. The senate had chosen Odoacer, and they therefore prayed Zeno to confer upon him the dignity of patrician, and entrust the "diocese" of Italy to his care. Zeno returned a harsh answer to the senate, commanding them to return to their allegiance to Nepos. In fact, however, he did nothing for the addressed Odoacer as patrician. On the other hand, the latter sent the ornaments of empire to Constantinople as an acknowledgment of the fact that he did not claim supreme power. He does not appear to have called himself king of Italy, but only king of the barbarian tribes that followed him. By the Roman inhabitants of Italy he was addressed as "dominus noster" ('our master'), but his right to exercise power would in their eyes rest, in theory, on his recognition as patricius by the Byzantine Augustus. His internal administration was probably, on the whole, wise and moderate. The chief events in his reign were the Dalmatian and Rugian wars. In the year 480, the ex-emperor Nepos, who ruled Dalmatia, was traitorously assassinated in Diocletian's palace at Spalato by the counts Viator and Ovida. In the following year Odoacer invaded Dalmatia, slew the murderer Ovida, and re-annexed Dalmatia to the Western state. In 487 he appeared as an invader in his own native Dalmatian land. War broke out between him and Feletheus, king of the Rugians. Odoacer entered their territory and captured their king. This Rugian war was probably an indirect cause of the fall of Odoacer. His increasing power rendered him too formidable to the Byzantine court. At the same time Zeno was embarrassed by the formidable neighborhood of Theodoric, the Ostrogoth. In these circumstances arose the plan of Theodoric's invasion of Italy. He entered Italy in August 489, defeated Odoacer on two occasions, who then shut himself up in Ravenna, and there maintained himself for 4 years. Two sallies from the city met with defeat; but with the Goths despairing of ever taking the city by assault, negotiations were opened for a compromise, by which Ravenna was surrendered, Odoacer's life spared, and he and Theodoric set up as joint rulers of the Roman state. However, the relation was soon terminated by the treachery of Theodoric, who slew Odoacer at a banquet.

Theodoric (Theodoricus), son of Theudemir (Theodomiris), king of the Ostrogoths, by Erelieva (Arilena), his concubine, held sovereignty over all Italy in the sixteenth year of Emperor Zeno, and he alone with the Goths ruled the country. His rule was not very harsh. He allowed the cities and their citizens to govern themselves. He set up his throne at Ravenna, and lived there 37 years. Theodoric, while governing Italy, was most kind to the rude inhabitants; and although his throne was at Ravenna, yet he beautified the city of Rome by the erection and repair of various buildings, churches, etc. And for the good of his empire he married Audofleda (Andefledam), daughter of Clovis (Clodovei), the king of France; and he espoused his sister to Honoricus, the king of the Vandals; and his two daughters, one to Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and the other to Gundibato. But not long afterwards he warred against Clovis, his brother-in-law, because he had defeated Alaric and had taken certain parts of his kingdom. After that he warred against the Franks, and he performed many other celebrated deeds, except that in his last years he besmirched himself with savagery in slaying Symmachus (Simachum) and Boethius (Boetium). He surrounded the city of Trient with walls. Finally he suffered a stroke and died at once. [Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, and the greatest ruler of the Gothic nation, was born about 454 CE, the son of Theudemir, one of the three brothers who reigned over the East Goths, at that time settled in Pannonia. Erelieva, Theodoric's mother, was called the concubine of Theudemir. At the age of 7 he was sent as a hostage to Constantinople, and there spent ten years of his life. Soon after his return to this father he secretly attacked the king of the Sarmatians, and wrested from him the important city of Singidunum (Belgrade). He also took the chief part in an expedition into Moesia and Macedonia, the result of which was to settle the Ostrogoths in the heart of the empire. About 474 Theudemir died, and for the fourteen following years Theodoric was engaged in profitless wars, partly against the emperor Zeno, and partly against a rival Gothic chieftain. In 488 he set out with the sanction of the emperor to win Italy from Odoacer. The conquest took more than four years (488-493). He gained two victories over Odoacer, who fled to Ravenna, resulting in a long and severe blockade of that city and ending by a capitulation, the terms of which Theodoric disgracefully violated by slaying Odoacer with his own hand (493). Theodoric's reign of 33 years was a time of unexampled happiness for Italy. The venality of the Roman officials and the turbulence of the Gothic nobles were sternly repressed. Marshes were drained, harbors formed, taxes lightened, and agriculture improved. Theodoric, though an Arian, was impartial in religious matters, and during the contested papal election between Symmachus and Laurentius, Theodoric's mediation was welcomed by both parties. Unfortunately, at the very close of this reign (524), the emperor Justinian's persecution of the Arians led him into a policy of reprisals. He forced Pope John to undertake a mission to Constantinople to plead for toleration, and on his return threw him into prison, where he died. He caused Boethius and Symmachus to be executed. Theodoric died August 30, 526, and his grandson, a boy of ten years, succeeded him, under the regency of his mother Amalasuntha].

Folio CXLI verso

It is said that a very great earthquake, which lasted four consecutive months, occurred at Constantinople. It ceased upon the admonition of a child that people should three times sing, Holy, Holy, Holy God, powerful and eternal, have mercy on us. Afterwards the Chalcedonian Council ordained that these words were to be spoken in the churches.

Many signs appeared in the sky. To the north the heavens appeared fiery, shafts of lightning were seen, the moon darkened, and a comet appeared at Toulouse (Dolosam). Finally, a very large river flooded. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

In these times arose the very wicked heresy of the Acephalonians. Acephali means without a head. This heresy was attacked by the Chalcedonian Council. These heretics contradicted and denied the presence of two natures in Christ, and proclaimed but one nature in one person. [Acephali, a term applied to sects having no head or leader; and in particular to a strict Monophysite sect that separated itself in the end of the 5th century from the rule of the patriarch of Alexandria (Peter Mongus) and remained "without king or bishop" until it was reconciled by Mark I (699-819)].

In these times, as it is said, the remains of Elisha (Elisei) were brought to Alexandria; and the body of Barnabas the apostle, together with the gospel in his own handwriting, was found at this time.

On the 29th day of September, in the time of the aforesaid Pope Gelasius, occurred the revelation of the archangel Michael on Mt. Gargano in Apulia. Later a wonderful church was built there; and it is said that at the same place many people gathered annually—not only Christians, but also non-believers, to invoke the holy angel with prayer.

Michael, the illustrious archangel of the Bible, whom Jews and Christians alike have given pre-eminence over all created spirits. All the might, majesty and radiance of Thrones, Dominations, Virtues and Powers, are centered on him. He is the chief over the celestial hosts, conqueror over the "great dragon that deceived the world." The legends which have grown out of a few mystical texts of Scripture, amplified by the fanciful disquisitions of the theological writers, give Michael three characters: (1) captain of the heavenly host, and conqueror of the powers of hell; (2) lord of souls, conductor and guardian of the spirits of the dead; (3) patron saint and prince of the Church Militant.

According to the Bible, when Lucifer, possessed by pride and ingratitude, refused to fall down and worship the Son of Man, Michael was selected to cast him down from heaven. Then he chained the revolted angels in mid-air, where they are to remain until the day of judgment, being in the meantime perpetually tortured by hate, envy and despair; for they beheld man whom they had disdained, exalted as their superior; above them they see the heaven they forfeited; beneath them the redeemed souls continually rising from earth, and ascending to the presence of God, from which they are shut out forever. To Michael it was given to sound the trumpet and exalt the banner of the Cross on the day of judgment; and to him likewise was assigned the reception of the immortal spirits when released by death. It was his task to weigh them in a balance (Dan. 5:27; Ps. 62:9). Those whose good works exceeded their demerits he presented before the throne of God; those found wanting, he gave up to be tortured in purgatory, until their souls had turned from crimson to the white of the snow. For this reason he is invoked in the hour of death. Lastly, when it pleased God to select from among the nations of the earth one people to become peculiarly his own, He appointed Michael to be president and leader over those chosen people. "At that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince who stands for the children of your people." (Dan. 10:13; 12:1). Christians, taking up and modifying these earlier Jewish traditions about Michael, believe that when the power of the synagogue was supposed to cease, and to be replaced by the power of the church, so that the Christians became the people of God, then Michael, who had been the great prince of the Hebrew people, became the prince and leader of the church militant in Christendom, and the guardian of redeemed souls against his old adversary, the Prince of Hell (Rev. 12:6,7). The worship of Michael originated in supposed visions or apparitions of him. East and West had their own particular angelic apparitions. Michael owes his popularity to three famous visions in the West: (1) In the city of Siponte, in Apulia, lived a rich cattle owner, named Galgano or Garganus. One of his bulls strayed from pasture and was found at the entrance of a cave on the summit of a mountain. Angry with the bull, the master ordered him slain, but the arrow shot at him by a servant, returned to the chest of him who sent it, and he fell dead. The master consulted the bishop, and the bishop after three days of fasting and prayer, beheld Michael in a vision, and from him the bishop learned that the servant had violated hallowed ground, and commanded that a church be erected on the spot. (2) When Rome was nearly depopulated by a pestilence, Gregory ordered a procession about the streets, singing the service since called the Great Litanies. On the third day of these processions Gregory had a vision of the Archangel Michael alighting on the summit of the tomb of Hadrian, and the sheath of his sword dripping with blood. And the pestilence ceased. The tomb has since been called the Castel Sant' Angelo ('Castle of the Angel'). (3) In the reign of Childebert II, Aubert, bishop of Avranches, France, had a vision of Michael who commanded him to journey to an isolated rock in the Gulf of Avranches, then the terror of mariners, and erect a church to his honor on the highest point of the rock. This was done.

Epiphanius, the Pavian bishop, a man very learned in sacred and profane wisdom, was held in great esteem in these times by Theodoric, the king, because of his eloquence and piety. [Epiphanius, bishop of Ticinum (Pavia), flourished from 438 to 496].

German (Germanus) of Auxerre (Autissiodorensis) and Loup (Lupus) of Troyes (Trecharenus), bishops at this time (as some write) gave the churches much assistance by their learning and writing. [German (Germanus) of Auxerre, was one of the most eminent of the early saints of the Gallic church, and lived a little before the overthrow of the Western Empire. He was born at Auxerre about 376 CE, of good family, and at first followed the legal profession. Having embraced the Christian faith and entered the church, he was ordained deacon by Amator, bishop of Auxerre, and succeeded the latter on his death. He held the see from 418-449. He was eminent for his zeal against heresy, his success as a preacher, his holiness and the miracles he is said to have wrought. He made two visits to Britain. On the first visit he was sent over by a council with Loup (Lupus) of Troyes as his associate to check the spread of Pelagianism. His writings are unimportant. One of them, which is still extant, contains an account of the death of Vortigern, the British king]. Genevieve (Genoveva) the virgin, flourished at Paris. Her virginity was praised by the Lord through the testimony of Germanus. [Genevieve was a peasant girl born at Nanterre, a little village near Paris, in 421 CE, and in childhood was employed by a neighboring farmer to tend his sheep. In her early years she was already known for her piety and humility. German, passing through Paris, no sooner cast his eyes up on her, than he became aware, through divine inspiration, of her predestined glory. He hung round her neck a small copper coin marked with the sign of the cross, and consecrated her to the service of God. From that point on she regarded herself as separated from the world and dedicated to Heaven. At fifteen she renewed her vow to perpetual chastity. On the death of her parents she went to Paris where she lived with an aged kinswoman, and there her pious conduct rendered her an object of popular veneration. But there were those who did not look upon her with favor, and she had to undergo persecutions of man and of demons. After enduring maltreatment and condemnation at the hands of some of her fellow citizens, she was given an opportunity to prove the efficacy of her piety. For now Attila threatened to besiege Paris. When the people were about to flee, she entreated them to stay, giving them assurance of divine interposition. And suddenly came word that Attila had changed his order of march, and had withdrawn from the vicinity of the capital. The people fell prostrate at the feet of Genevieve, and from this time on she became the mother of the whole city. She is said to have wrought other miracles. She died at the age of 89, and was buried by the side of King Clovis and Queen Clotilde. And so this French maid became the patron saint of Paris].

Boethius (Boetius) Anicius Manilius Severinus, a very Christian man, and a consul, highly celebrated poet and philosopher, and son-in-law of Symmachus (Simachi), was held in high esteem at Rome at this time. But since he, as a true Christian, refused to agree with the Arian heretics in many matters, therefore by order of Theodoric he was sent into exile at Pavia after his father-in-law; and there he was afterward, at the instigation of the heretics, condemned to perpetual imprisonment. During this life of misery he invented several means of amusing himself; and being a highly learned man, he wrote many books and manuscripts. Finally, after having suffered imprisonment for a long time he was slain by order of the emperor Theodoric on account of his Christian faith in the reign of Justinus the Elder in the Year of Our Lord 520 at Pavia. And (as some say) he was entered in the book of saints as Saint Severinus. [Boethius, whose full name was Anicius Manilius Severinus Boethius, was a Roman statesman and author. He was born between 470 and 475 CE, and was famous for his learning, especially of Greek philosophy. He was consul in 510, and was treated with great distinction by Theodoric the Great. However, having incurred Theodoric's suspicions by advocating the cause of the Italians against the oppressions of the Goths, he was put to death by Theodoric in 524. During his imprisonment he wrote his celebrated work ('The Consolation of Philosophy'), in five books, which is composed alternately in prose and verse. The diction is pure and elegant, and the sentiments are noble and exalted. Boethius was the last Roman of any note who understood the language and studied the literature of Greece. He translated many of the Greek philosophers, especially Aristotle, and wrote commentaries upon them. In the ignorance of Greek writers that prevailed from the sixth to the fourteenth centuries, Boethius was looked upon as the great representative of philosophy, as Augustine was of all theology, and Virgil of all literature. But after the introduction of Aristotle's works into Europe in the thirteenth century, the fame of Boethius gradually died away].

Symmachus (Symachus), Roman patrician, senator, orator and philosopher, was highly esteemed at Rome in these times; he was distrusted by King Theodoric, who condemned him to exile at Pavia, where he was imprisoned for some time. He was called home from exile, and finally suffered death by martyrdom. By his wisdom and writings, this man greatly enlightened the Roman people. He wrote a book of epistles, in which, among other things, he said, Nature rejoices in the equality of things. [Boethius (see preceding paragraph and note) was brought up in the house of the aristocratic family of Quintus Aurelius Memmius Symmachus. In fact, Symmachus himself had been consul in 485 just before Boethius' father].

Fulgentius, by birth an African, bishop at Ruspe, and a highly learned doctor, flourished at this time. He and other Christians in Sardinia were sent into exile by Thrasimund, king of the Vandals, for protecting the Christian religion. He neglected nothing that pertained to the Christian faith, writing many and various books and manuscripts. [Fulgentius was bishop of Ruspe, a town in Numidia, about the year 508, and was expelled from his see by the Vandal Thrasimund].

Gennadius, the bishop, versed in the Greek and Latin tongues, edited a book of Christian teachings, in which was set forth everything necessary to one's salvation; and this, together with his teachings and morals, proved very beneficial to the Christian churches. [Gennadius, a Greek prelate, bishop or patriarch of Constantinople, was a presbyter of the church of Constantinople, and became bishop of that see in 459. He was one of those who pressed the emperor Leo I, the Thracian, to punish Timothy Aelurus ('the weasel'), who had occupied the see of Alexandria on the murder of Proterius, and his intervention was so far successful that Timothy was banished in 460.

He also opposed Peter Gnapheus ('the fuller') who, under patronage of Zeno, son-in-law of the emperor, and general of the Eastern provinces, had expelled Martyrius from the see of Antioch, and occupied his place. Gennadius honorably received Martyrius, who went to Constantinople, and succeeded in procuring the banishment of Peter in 464. Gennadius died in 471, and was succeeded by Acacius. Theodore Anagnostes ('the reader') has preserved some curious particulars of Gennadius, whose death he seems to ascribe to the effect of a vision, in which he saw the Devil, who declared that although things would remain quiet in his lifetime, his death would be followed by the devastation of the Church, or by the predominance of the Devil in the Church].

Hegesippus, the highly learned man, also brought no small measure of advantage to the churches of God by his writings. He also wrote the regulations for monasteries, and wrote beautifully the life of Severinus, the abbot. Victorius (Victorinus) of Aquitaine (Aquitanus), a famous astronomer, at that time redid when Easter was celebrated by the course of the moon, surpassing Eusebius and Theophilus in that matter.

Victorius (or Victorinus) of Aquitaine, who had been appointed by Pope Hilarius to undertake calendar revision, devised tables for calculating the time of Easter in 457. These tables introduced serious errors that weren't addressed for several centuries.

This paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Faustus, a bishop among the Gauls, also wrote many and sundry fine books against the Arian heresy. [Faustus was a native of Brittany, and a contemporary and friend of Sidonius Apollinaris. Having passed his youth in the seclusion of a cloister, Faustus succeeded Maximus, first as abbot of Lerins, afterwards, in 472, as bishop of Riez in Provence, and died about 490. He wrote of a number of works on ecclesiastical subjects].

1. Earthquake, lightning, comet, and eclipse are one and all represented in a small woodcut. To the left is the comet, represented by a large six-pointed star, and from this proceeds a shaft resembling a cudgel, earthward. At the right is the moon; and there is a man in it, but the alleged eclipse is not indicated. In the center of the cut are storm clouds, from which flashes of lightning proceed. Below is a peaceable and desolate valley.

2. Michael, the archangel; he holds a scale in his left hand, a human being in each cup; in his right is an upraised sword, poised in judgment. The picture is apparently based on the supposition that on judgment day Michael will weigh the souls of men, consigning some to heaven, others to purgatory.

Folio CXLII recto

Ravenna is an ancient city. It was developed by the Ostrogoths. At one time it was a small town of the Sabines. Emperor Tiberius surrounded this city with walls, which are still in evidence. Because of its closed port it was called the Golden Gate. Now when Theodoric and the Goths came out of Thrace bringing with them their women and children and all their possessions, they finally besieged King Odoacer in this city of Ravenna; but due to the nature of the region this siege consumed more time than the Goths had anticipated; for this city lies on the sea and cannot be besieged very easily. Nor can it be entered readily from the landward side, for the Po River gives it a moat, and it is enclosed by various lakes and marshes. So the siege of the Goths extended itself for almost three years. They took possession of the city according to a treaty; and they furthered and developed it. King Theodoric, master of all Italy, Dalmatia, Hungary, Germany, and no small part of Gaul, lived at Ravenna for forty-two years. And he erected many tall buildings and churches there. Outside the walls may be seen a memorial erected by the same king to the memory of his daughter Amalasuntha. [See Folio CXLIII recto, below]. In it was built the cloister of Saint Mary, symbolically called the Rotunda, because of the high altar and the choir of twenty cloister people, who while singing according to the custom, are covered by a monolith on top of this rotunda. The emperor Valentinian spent many days there during thirty years of his reign. He enlarged the city, and subordinated to its bishop the bishops of twelve other regions. For a time this city was the seat of the Roman exarch; [Provincial governor under the Byzantine Empire]. but now it is subject to the Venetian council, and does not have very many inhabitants. In former times this city had many pious and learned men, namely, Apollinaris; [See Folio CXV verso, above]. Vitalus and his sons Gervasius and Protasius; [See Folio CXXIV recto, above]. also Urcinus; [Probably Johannes Ursinus, the physician]. all crowned with martyrdom. Pope John, of that name the seventeenth in number; [See Folio CLXXXI verso, below]. Peter, the Foricornelian bishop, who understandingly interpreted many of the Holy Scriptures. [Peter Chrysologus of Imola was chosen bishop of Ravenna. He is said to have found a certain amount of paganism in his new diocese and to have completely extirpated it. He often preached before the Augusta ('Empress') Galla Placida and her son Valentinian III. He appears to have died about 450 in Imola]. Cassiodorus, the Roman consul and historian of the epistles of the Ostrogothic kings, and who later retired to a monastery. [Magnus Aurelius Cassiodorus, distinguished statesman, and one of the few men of learning at the downfall of the Western Empire was born of an ancient and wealthy Roman family at Scylacium, in Bruttium. He enjoyed the confidence of Theodoric the Great and his successors, and under various titles conducted for many years the government of the Ostrogothic kingdom. At 70 he retired to the monastery of Viviera, which he had founded in his native province, and there he passed the last thirty years of his life in study. His most important work (), a collection of state papers, drawn up in accordance with instructions of Theodoric and his successors, is still extant. His is a summary of Universal History]. Also John (Iohannem), [See Folio CCXXXVI, below]. the highly learned grammarian and orator, of whom Leonardus Aretinus testifies as being the first to reintroduce into Italy, after many years, the art and teaching of oratory as it now flourishes.

Ravenna, an important town in Gallia Cisalpina, on the river Bedesis, and about a mile from the sea, though it is now about five miles in the interior in consequence of the sea having receded all along the coast, was situated in the midst of marshes, and accessible in only one direction by land, probably by the road leading from Ariminum. The town laid claim to a high antiquity. Strabo mentions a tradition that Ravenna was founded by Thessalians (Pelasgians), and afterward it passed into the hands of the Umbrians. However, it long remained an insignificant place, and its greatness does not begin until the time of the Empire, when Augustus made it one of two chief stations of the Roman fleet. He not only enlarged the town, but caused a large harbor to be constructed on the coast, and this he connected with the Po by a canal called Padusa, or Augusta fossa. Ravenna suddenly became one of the most important places in northern Italy. However, in consequence of the marshy nature of the soil, the houses were built of wood; and since an arm of the canal was carried through some of the principal streets, communication was carried on to a great extent by gondolas, as in modern Venice. When the Roman Empire was threatened by the barbarians, the emperors of the West took up their residence at Ravenna, which on account of its situation and fortifications was regarded as impregnable.

Early in the fifth century, Honorius, alarmed by the progress of Alaric in the north of Italy, transferred his court to Ravenna. From this date to the fall of the Western Empire, in 476, Ravenna was the chief residence of the Roman emperors. Here Stilicho was slain; here Honorius and his sister Placidia lived and quarreled; here Valentinian III spent the greater part of his life; here Majorian was proclaimed; here the little Romulus donned the purple robe; here in the pinewood outside the city his uncle Paulus was decisively defeated by Odoacer, who made Ravenna his chief residence. Theodoric's siege of Ravenna lasted for three years (489-492); ten days after his entry into the city he killed his rival at a banquet in the palace of the Laurel Grove.

After the fall of the Western Empire, Theodoric also made this city the capital of his kingdom. His reign marked another era of magnificence. In the eastern part of the city he built a large palace. The massive mausoleum of Theodoric stands still perfect outside the walls near the northeast corner of the city. It is circular internally and decagonal externally, in two stories, built of marble blocks, and surmounted by an enormous monolith, brought from the quarries of Istria and weighing more than 300 tons. It has been converted into a church dedicated to the Virgin.

After the overthrow of the Gothic kingdom by Narses, Ravenna became the residence of the exarchs or governors of the Byzantine Empire in Italy, until the Lombards took the town in 752. The modern Ravenna stands on the site of the ancient town.

The author's statement that at one time Ravenna was a small Sabine town is undoubtedly borrowed from Pliny (III.15.20); but the statement is altogether improbable and inexplicable. Strabo gives it an Umbrian origin, and he gives his reasons. When Ravenna received a Roman colony, we do not know. Strabo does not mention the time, and we have no other means of knowing. All we can be reasonably sure of is that this Umbrian town on the verge of Cisalpine Gaul received a Roman colony not before 268 BCE, when Ariminum (now Rimini) was occupied.

The chronicler's vague statement that the town was known as the Golden Gate may refer to the gate built by Claudius, called the Porta Aurea ('Golden Gate'), which was not destroyed until 1582.

Beside the empty tombs of Galla Placida and Theodoric stands the great sarcophagus of Dante Alighieri, who spent the last four years of his life at Ravenna and died there in 1321. It is there that his dear friend Giotto painted his famous portrait. Strange that the chronicler, who informs us that "in former times this city had many pious and learned men," (a number of whom are now buried in the past, he mentions), does not even name Dante in his story of Ravenna. It is largely as his home and final resting place that one thinks of the city today. A very brief biography of Dante is given at Folio CCXXIII recto, below.

Symmachus, a native of Sardinia, was elected pope upon the death of Anastasius, but not without considerable dissension. Some of the clergy elected Symmachus; but the others elected Laurentius. In consequence there followed a great tumult and division in the Roman senate and among the people; and as a natural consequence a council was assembled at Ravenna. After considering the matter, Symmachus was confirmed in the office under a decision dictated by King Theodoric. Then, in the exercise of great kindness, Symmachus made of Laurentius a bishop of Nicotera. Symmachus drove the Manichean heretics out of Rome, and burned their books publicly. He also beautified many churches and built some entirely new from the ground up. For the poor he built houses near Saint Peter's and Saint Paul's, and he provided the people with necessities; for he was a lover of the poor; and he released those who suffered in prison. He ordained that the Gloria in Excelsis Dei should be sung on Sundays or on the days of the martyrs; and he neglected nothing that pertained to the honor of the Almighty God. He died and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the 14th day of the Kalends of August after having sat 15 years, 6 months and 22 days; and at that time the chair rested 7 days. [Symmachus, pope from 498 to 514, succeeded Anastasius II, and was himself followed by Hormisdas. He was a native of Sardinia, apparently a pagan convert, and was in deacon's orders at the time of his election. The choice was not unanimous, another candidate, Laurentius, having the support of a strong Byzantine party; both were consecrated by their friends, one at the Lateran church, the other at St. Mary's. A decision was obtained in favor of Symmachus from Theodoric, to whom the dispute had been referred. However, peace was not established until 505 or 506, when the king ordered the Laurentian party to surrender the churches of which they had taken possession. An important incident in the controversy was the decision of the "palmary synod." The remainder of his pontificate was uneventful].

The Fifth Schism arose between Symmachus and Laurentius, as above stated. But four years later, some of the clergy, by the help and assistance of Festus and Probinus, the consuls, recalled Laurentius. In consequence of that the king sent Peter, the bishop of Altinum [Modern Altino]. to Rome to drive out both of them, and to occupy the papal chair himself. However, Symmachus defended himself against these accusations before a council; and he secured the unanimous decision that the aforesaid Laurentius and Peter were guilty of all the evil and should be exiled. In consequence such uproar arose at Rome that many of the priesthood, as well as the people, and holy virgins were slain. In this dissension Gordianus, the priest, was also killed. This persecution would not have ended if Faustus, the consul, had not sympathized with the priesthood against Probinus and resorted to arms.

Pope Hormisdas (Hormisda), of Campania, at the beginning of his papacy, and according to admonition of Theodoric, also held a national council, which by unanimous decision condemned the Eutychian heretics. In the same assembly many laws were passed: Firstly, that from this point on no public penitents could attend consecrations; also that weddings of Christians were to be held publicly and not privately; that no altars be erected in consecrated churches without special permission of the bishop. This man reconciled the Greeks, reduced the number of the clergy, and received from the French king a costly gift, and the same from the emperor Justinus. King Theodoric richly endowed St. Peter's Church. And so pope, emperor, and king vied with each other in making gifts to the churches. Hormisdas died and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the 8th day of the Ides of August after sitting (in office) nine years and 18 days. The chair then rested six days. [Hormisdas, pope from 514 to 523, a native of Campania, engineered the reunion of the Eastern and Western churches which had been separated since the excommunication of Acacius in 484. After two unsuccessful attempts under the emperor Anastasius I, Hormisdas was able to come to an understanding in 518 with his successor Justin. Legates were dispatched to Constantinople; the memorial of the schismatic patriarchs was condemned; and union was resumed with the Holy See. Hormisdas secured Dionysius Exiguus to translate the Apostolic Canons and also renewed the so-called Decretum Gelasianum ('Gelasian Decree')].

John (Iohannes), first pope of this name, out of Tuscany (Thuscus), an industrious promoter of the Christian religion, drove out the Arians and gave their churches to the true Christians. This greatly distressed King Theodoric, who sent Pope John and others to Justinus, requesting that the churches of the Arians be restored, or he would destroy all Christian churches. But as these messengers could not move Emperor Justinus, they begged him in tears to have mercy and not cause the downfall and destruction of Italy. When John returned and reported this to Theodoric at Ravenna, he was thrown into prison; and there he died after having sat two years and 8 months. The chair then rested 58 days. [John I, pope from 523 to 526, Tuscan by birth, was consecrated on the death of Hormisdas. Theodoric sent him to Constantinople on an embassy to Justin to secure toleration to the Arians. On his return Theodoric had John arrested on the suspicion of having conspired with Emperor Justin. He died in prison on May 18 of neglect and starvation. His body was then transported to Rome and buried in the Basilica of St. Peter. John I is depicted in art as looking through the bars of a prison or imprisoned with a deacon and a subdeacon].

Felix, the fourth pope of that name, cursed the patriarch of Constantinople who had wandered from the faith. As a good and pious man he erected many buildings at Rome, in particular the Church of Cosimo and Damiano, which is still to be seen there. He ordained that the sick were to be anointed before death. After he had consecrated many priests, deacons and bishops, he died and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the fourth day of the Ides of October. [That is, October 11]. He sat four years, two months and thirteen days. At that time the chair rested three days. [Felix IV was raised to the papacy in 526 by the emperor Theodoric. The serious riots over his election led him on his deathbed to nominate as his successor the archdeacon Boniface, later Pope Boniface II. But his proceeding was contrary to all tradition and roused much opposition. Felix built the church of Saints Cosimo and Damiano, near the Via Sacra. He died in September 530].

Justin (Justinus) the Elder attained to the sovereignty 518 years after the incarnation of the Lord. He proved himself an earnest devotee and protector of the true Christian faith. Before long he sent his messenger to the pope to confirm the authority of the papal see and to assure peace to all the churches. To this emperor, Hormisdas the pop, sent the bishop and holy man Germaine (Germanus) concerning lapses in the faith; and he was kindly received; and through him many doubting persons were strengthened in the faith. He attained to the reputation of an industrious administrator of the faith, and through him the heretics were extinguished; and most important of all, all the Arians were driven out of Constantinople and their churches given over to the true faith. Therefore King Theodoric, as previously stated, persecuted Symmachus and Boethius, the Romans, and also Pope John. But divine vengeance quickly punished this cruel persecution, for on the 98th day after this event Theodoric died. His soul was seen between Pope John and Symmachus, the consul, by a hermit in the island of Lipara, sailing in the harbor of idolatrous god Vulcan not far from the residence of the hermit, and drowned. But after Justinus became a very old man and had carried the cares of the empire for eleven years, and had appointed Justinian (Iustiniano), his sister's son to the sovereignty, he rested in peace at Constantinople. [Justin (Justinus) I, East Roman Emperor, 518 to 527, was born in 450 in Asia. He rose to commander of the imperial guards of Anastasius. On the latter's death in 518 Justin succeeded in securing his own election. Being ignorant even of the rudiments of letters, Justin entrusted the administration of state almost entirely to his quaestor Proclus and to his nephew Justinian. In 519 he effected a reconciliation of the Eastern and Western churches after a schism of 35 years. In 522 he ceded to Theodoric the right of naming the consuls. On April 1, 527, enfeebled by an incurable wound, he made Justinian his colleague; on August 1st he died].

Clovis (Clodoneus), the first Christian king in France, attained to the sovereignty after the death of his father Childeric, and he reigned for 30 years. He was a mighty warrior, and for wife he won Clothilda (Crothildem), the daughter of Chilperic, king of Burgundy; for when he learned that this same Clothilda was beautiful, and that she excelled all other young maidens of her age in virtue, knowledge and rearing, he secretly sent messengers to find out whether she would marry him. She was informed of the king's renown and the mightiness of his empire; and she assented, but upon condition that as she was a Christian, he should also become one. And although Clovis promised her that after talking the matter over he would receive baptism, yet because of his position he did not keep his word. However, he permitted his two sons by her to be baptized. Before long he began a war against Gundobaldus, his wife's uncle, and the Burgundians; and in that war he took several cities. But the war was ended through his wife. And then he undertook a war against the Germans, who sent forth against him forces and arms not unequal to his own. But when in battle he saw his men in flight, he thought of the promise which, in spite of many reminders from his wife, he had failed to perform; and he attributed his defeat to this remissness on his own part. In consequence of that he praised the God of Heaven and Earth, whom his wife worshipped, and vowed that he would fulfill his promise should his forces defeat the enemy and attain the victory. Then his fortune turned to such an extent that the scattered and fleeing Franks drove the enemy into flight. When he returned home he, together with all his Franks, were baptized by Saint Remigius, the bishop, in the twenty-fifth year of his reign; and before long the kingdom of the Franks prospered, and the cause of the Christians was furthered. The Arians were driven out and the Christians reinstated. And the city of Paris was made the capital of the kingdom. [Clovis (Chlodovech in Frankish, Latinized as Chlodovechus, eventually transformed into Latin Ludovicus and, finally, French Louis), king of the Sabian Franks, was the son of Childeric I, whom he succeeded in 481 at the age of 15, but on his history until 486 the records are silent. In 486 he attacked Syagrius, a Roman general, who after the fall of the Western Empire in 476, had carved out for himself a principality south of the Somme. Being defeated Syagrius sought refuge with the Visigothic king Alaric II, who handed him over to the conqueror. It appears that Genevieve defended the town of Paris against Clovis for a long period. In 493 Clovis married a Burgundian princess, Clotilda, niece of Gundobald and Godegisil, joint kings of Burgundy. She was a Christian, and earnestly desired her husband's conversion. He allowed his children to be baptized, but himself remained a pagan until after the war against the Alamanni, who at the time occupied the country between the Vosges and the Rhine, and the neighborhood of Lake Constance. Clovis attacked and defeated them in the plain of the Rhine. The legend is that in the thickest of the fight Clovis swore he would be converted to the God of Clotilda if that God would grant him victory. After subduing a part of the Alamanni, he went to Reims, where he was baptized by Remigius on Christmas Day 496, together with 3000 Franks. From that time the orthodox Christians in the kingdom of the Burgundians and Visigoths looked to Clovis to deliver them from the Arian kings. Clovis seems to have failed in the case of Burgundy, which was at that time torn between the rivalry of Godegisil and Gundobald. The former appealed to Clovis, who defeated Gundobald; but he had to retire without conquests. Immediately after his departure, Gundobald slew Godegisil and seized the Burgundian kingdom. Clovis was more fortunate with the Visigoths. By 506 he had completely subjugated the Alamanni. Now he marched against the Visigothic king, Alaric II in spite of the efforts of Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, to prevent war. The entire Visigothic kingdom as far as the Pyrennes was added to the Franks' empire, with the exception of Septimania, which, together with Spain, remained in the possession of Alaric's grandson, Amalaric, and Provence, which was seized by Theodoric and annexed to Italy. The last years of his life Clovis spent in Paris, which he made the capital of his kingdom. Here he built the church of the Holy Apostles, known later as the church of St. Genevieve. By murdering the petty Frankish kings who reigned at Cambrai, Cologne and other residences, he became sole king of all the Frankish tribes. He died in 511].

Amalasuntha (Amalasiumtha), daughter (of Theodoric) and now a widow, upon the death of Theodoric, the king of the Goths, who left behind no male heirs, inherited the kingdom with her son Athalaric. Since Athalaric was very young, all the cares of government rested upon the queen. She concerned herself with giving the child an education and training in good manners. She governed with earnestness to maintain their rule over the Goths, and beyond usual feminine custom employed wisdom and prudence. She corrected her father's bad laws and restored to the children of Boethius and Symmachus their paternal inheritances which had been forfeited to the public treasury. But when the Goths proposed that their king should be taught chivalrous practices rather than letters, Athalaric, on account of the reckless abandon of his sexual life, contracted many illnesses and died at the age of seventeen. Amalasuntha, therefore, associated her friend Theodahad (Theodatum) with her in the government. He was very learned, but sluggish and slow in business and in the handling of civil affairs. Although he was taken into the sovereignty through the kind solicitation of the queen, he was ungrateful, causing her to be made a prisoner and sent away. By such faithlessness he distressed many Goths. Later he caused the queen to be slain, taking her daughter to wife and as an associate in the sovereignty. He reigned with her not over five years. [Amalasuntha, queen of the Ostrogoths (d.535), daughter of Theodoric their king, was married in 525 to Eutharic, an Ostrogoth who had previously lived in Spain. Her husband died, apparently in the early years of their marriage, leaving her with two children, Athalaric and Matasuentha. On the death of her father in 526 she succeeded him at Ravenna, acting as regent for her son; but being herself deeply imbued with the old Roman culture, she gave to that son's education a more refined turn than suited her Gothic subjects. Conscious of her unpopularity she banished and later put to death three Gothic nobles suspected of intriguing against her rule, and at the same time opened negotiations with the emperor Justinian with the view of removing herself and the Gothic treasure to Constantinople. Her son's death in 534 made but little change in the situation. Amalasuntha, now queen, invited her cousin Theodahad to share her throne. Notwithstanding a varnish of literary culture, he was a coward and a scoundrel. He fostered the disaffection of the Goths and either by his orders or with his permission Amalasuntha was imprisoned on an island in the Tuscan lake of Bolsena, where in the spring of 535 she was murdered in her bath].

Dionysius, an abbot, a highly learned man, who was praised at that time at Rome for his computus, that is, he composed with amazing skill the calculation for when Easter will occur. [The computus ('computation') is the calculation of the date of Easter in the Christian calendar, one of the most important computations of the Middle Ages. Dionysius Exiguus (his surname means 'very small' or 'meager', i.e., 'humble'), was a monk who took the existing Alexandrian computus and converted it from the Alexandrian calendar into the Julian calendar. His computus only lasted for 95 years. His greatest legacy was the creation of the Anno Domini ('in the Year of the Lord', or, better known in its abbreviation A.D.) era, which became widespread after the Venerable Bede employed it to date the events in his , written in 731].

Severinus, the bishop of Trier, a man distinguished for every kind of holiness was famous at this time. And Saint Victorinus, bishop of Marseilles, who released the son of the king of Persia from the Devil; and Euthierius, bishop of Lyons.

Folio CXLIII verso

The Third Aurelian Council was undertaken at this time at the order of King Clovis (Clodovei). This is said to have been called by St. Mellaninus; and so also, four other councils are said to have been held in this city (Aurelia), according to those versed in ecclesiastical jurisprudence. [King Clovis no doubt owed a great measure of his success to his alliance with the church. He took its property under his protection, and in 511 convoked a council at Orleans, the canons of which have come down to us. But while protecting the church, he maintained his authority over it. He intervened in the nomination of bishops, and at the council of Orleans it was decided that no one, save a son of a priest, could be ordained clerk without the king's order or the permission of the count. Orleans was an early trading post among the Gauls. The Romans called it Genadum. In the fifth century it had taken the name Aurelianum from either Marcus Aurelius or Aurelian; and thus the chronicler speaks of the city as Aureliensis in the first Latin edition. The German translator has carried the word over in this form].

Arthur, king of the Britons, at this time (as it is said) attained to the sovereignty. He was a renowned, warlike, and very strong man. He had the most beautiful armor, as well becomes such a king. On his head he wore a golden helmet, upon which a dragon was engraved. He ordered a golden shield upon which was an image of the Mother of God; so that he might at all times have her before him as a spokeswoman in all matters. He also had a broad, long lance to be carried with him wherever he went; and a sword, with which he slew four hundred and sixty men in a single battle. They say he was a good Christian and an augments of the faith, and the conqueror of many kingdoms. At last, after having overcome many enemies in battle, he too was wounded and transported to an island; and there he disappeared, and was never seen again. And it is said of the Britons that they have been waiting for his return up to the present time.

Arthur, British king, and subject of the Arthurian Legend, is represented by Nennius in his Historia Britonum as a Christian warrior leading the kings of Britain against the Saxon kings of Kent. He enumerates 12 battles, of which the eighth battle was on the castle Guinnon, "in which Arthur bore the image of St. Mary the ever-virgin upon his shoulder, and the pagans were turned to flight. . . The twelfth battle was on the Mount of Badon, in which fell 960 men in one day at a single onset of Arthur; and no one overthrew them but he alone, and in all the battles he came out victorious." There is no other record of these twelve battles, but Gildas who, writing in 550, without speaking of Arthur, mentions the battle of Mount Badon as taking place on the day of his birth, which would be c. 516. We may, therefore, conclude that a man named Arthur was born about the end of the fifth century, and that he was the general of the royal armies fighting in South Britain.

Of course, opinions differ as to whether such a character as Arthur ever lived. While the idea of a king Arthur whose dominions extended beyond the confines of the British Isles is now generally rejected, we may probably accept as a fact the existence of a chieftain of mixed Roman and British parentage, who learned the art of war from the Romans, and successfully led the forces of the British kings against the Saxon invaders. He was not a king, but a general of the royal armies. There is a hypothesis that he was betrayed by his wife and a near kinsman, and fell in battle. These meager facts constitute the historical nucleus about which his legend is woven. Yet he may simply be but a survivor of prehistoric myth, a hero of romance, and a fairy king. In his mystic character he slays monsters—the boar torch, the Giant of Mont St. Michel, the Demon Cat of Losanne. Andre de Coutances tells that Arthur was really vanquished and carried off by the Cat, but that one ought never to tell that tale before the Britons.

Cassiodorus, a monk of Ravenna and a highly learned man, was held in great esteem at this time because of his celebrated learning. At first he was a Roman consul, but later, moved by the Holy Spirit, he left the world, devoting himself to a monastic life. Before that he was the chancellor of Theodoric, king of Italy, and in the king's name wrote numerous letters to many persons concerning temporal affairs. As a mental exercise he wrote an excellent interpretation of the Psalter. Later he also compiled a chronicle of the popes and emperors, in which he wrote many things about his contemporary, King Theodatus of Ravenna; also a book on the understanding of the soul and a book on orthography. [Cassiodorus. See Note to Folio CXLII recto, above].

Priscian (Priscianum), a very learned man and philosopher of Caesarea, highly versed in the Greek and Latin tongues, flourished at Constantinople at this time. And as he was regarded as a prince among scholars in the first of the liberal arts, called grammatica, he wrote a very useful booklet upon this same art for the use and instruction of those who wished to grasp the Latin tongue. He also wrote other excellent books. [Priscian (Priscianus Caesariensis), celebrated Latin grammarian, lived around the year 500. His title Caesariensis points to Caesarea in Mauretania. Priscian was quoted by several writers in Britain in the 8th century (e.g., Bede and Alcuin). There is hardly a library in Europe that did not and does not contain a copy of his great work, , and there are about a thousand copies of it in manuscript. The first printed edition was put forth in Venice in 1470. The book is a systematic exposition of Latin grammar. It is divided into 18 books, of which the first 16 deal mainly with sounds, word-formation, and inflexions. The last two, which form about one-third of the whole work, deal with syntax. He has also preserved to us numerous fragments of the works of other writers, which otherwise would have been lost. He also wrote a number of other books].

Arator, cardinal of the holy Roman Church, and a laureate poet, was in wonderful renown at this time by reason of his art. Among the works born of his intelligence and skill are the Acts of the Apostles in rhymed verse; and he wrote other elegant things. [Arator, Christian poet of Liguria, lived during the sixth century. He practiced as an advocate and held in influential position at the court of Athalaric. About 540 he took orders. His , written about 544, was much admired in the Middle Ages].

Brandanus, holy abbot of Hibernia, was held in great esteem at this time for his piety and learning. He was a father to 3000 cloister-men, and of him many wonderful things have been written. [Brendan, Brandan or Brandon (Brandanus in the) (c. 484-578), Irish saint and hero of a legendary voyage in the Atlantic, is said to have been born at Tralee in Kerry in 484. Medieval historians usually call him Brendan of Clonfert, or Brendan son of Finnloga, to distinguish him from his contemporary Brendan of Birr (573). Little is known of the historical Brendan, who died in 578 as abbot of a Benedictine monastery which he had founded twenty years previously at Clonfort in Eastern Galway. The story of his voyage across the Atlantic to the "Promised Land of the Saints," afterward designated "St. Brendan's Island," ranks among the most celebrated of the medieval sagas of western Europe. Its traditional date is 565-573. The legend is found in prose and in verse, as well as with many variations in Latin, French, English, Saxon, Flemish, Irish, Welsh, Breton, and Scottish Gaelic. The oldest extant version of the legend is the 11th-century].

Sidonius Apollinaris flourished at this time. In the city of the Averni [Auvergne]. he was promoted from governor to bishop. As a layman he was noble, well practiced in learning, and was a well informed man. He wrote many difficult epistles. [Sidonius Apollinaris was born at Lugdunum (Lyons) c. 431. At an early age he married Papianilla, child of Flavius Avitus, and upon the elevation of his father-in-law to the imperial dignity (456) he accompanied him to Rome, and celebrated his consulship in a poem still extant. Avitus raised him to senator, and nominated him prefect of the city. But the downfall of Avitus clouded the fortunes of Sidonius, who having been shut up in Lyons, and having endured the hardships of the siege, purchased pardon by a complimentary address to the victorious Majorian. The poet was not only forgiven, but rewarded with a laurelled bust, and with the title of count. After passing some years in retirement during the reign of Severus he was dispatched to Rome (467) as an ambassador from the Arveni to Anthemius, and on this occasion delivered a third panegyric, in honor of a third prince, for which he was raised to the rank of patrician. This was followed by still another honor; for though not a priest, the vacant see of Clarendon, in Auvergne, was forced upon him in 472. During the remainder of his life he devoted himself to the duties of his sacred office, resisting the progress of Arianism. His extant works are: (1) , 24 in number, composed in various measures and on various subjects; (2) , containing 147 letters addressed to a wide circle of relatives and friends on topics political, literary and domestic, but seldom on ecclesiastical subjects].

Bridget (Brigida), a very holy virgin of Scotland, born of Christian and noble parentage, illustrious during the reign of Justinus the Elder for her piety and miraculous works. From childhood she was entirely devoted to virtuous things, and particularly to chastity, modesty, sobriety, and moderation. At one time her mother sent her forth to collect butter from cow's milk; but she gave it to the poor. When her mother demanded the butter, Bridget fell to prayer; after which she had more (butter) than her fellow-workers. When her parents wished to marry her off, she praised God for her crown of virginity. On one occasion, during the harvest, the rain overflowed all the land. However, in her field not a drop of water fell. Of the water she made beer; of the stones, she made salt. She gave sight to a person born blind; and she also worked other miracles. [Bridget (Brigida) (453-523), one of the patron saints of Ireland, was the daughter of a prince of Ulster. According to legend, she and her mother, who was a bondmaid, were sold to a wizard, who brought up the little girl, and on being converted to Christianity by her, he restored her freedom. She returned to her father's house, where she gave many of his goods to the poor, and on her refusal to marry, he tried to sell her to the king of Ulster. The king was so struck by her piety that he freed her from parental control and she founded a church and monastery at Kildare. She died February 1, which is celebrated as her feast day].

Folio CXLIII recto

Benedict (Benedictus), an Italian abbot, and father of all the people in the monasteries, at this time assembled all the scattered monks, and by inspiration from the Holy Spirit introduced order into their lives. He was born of a noble family in the country town of Nursius (Norica), highly celebrated for its privileges, but chiefly because of Saint Benedict. There he spent his life observing good morals and indisposed to worldly pleasures. He was sent to Rome to study the liberal arts and letters; but when he noted that many persons were misled into error through these arts, he drew back the foot he had set forward into the world. In his zeal to please the Lord alone, he scorned the study of letters, left his father's house, estate and possessions, and lived unknown for some time with the hermits in the wilderness. He came to a place forty miles from Rome, and there he lived in a small cave for three years, unknown to anyone except a monk named Romanus. There he led a strict and hard life, subject to many temptations; but about all this he remained silent. In addition to his virtue this most holy man was endowed with the spirit of prophecy by which he revealed many future events and hidden things. Then Totila, the king of the Ostrogoths, heard of this man's virtue and strength, he desired to learn something of his piety; so he put on the clothes of a servant, and clothed his servant in regal robes. But Benedict, in his wisdom, recognized the king clad in the apparel of a servant, invited him into the monastery, and thus prophesied his future: You will reign nine years, and die in the tenth; and the king held him in high esteem. Benedict also gave many other proofs of his holiness, particularly concerning a glass in which the brethren had mixed poison intended for him. Over this he made the sign of the cross, and the glass broke. Finally he died in the Year of Salvation 536.

The Order of the Benedictine Brothers had its origin not far from the city of Aquinas in the Abruzzi, on Mount Cassino, where formerly the city of Cassina was located, and where later the universally renowned monastery of Cassino was later built. After the erection of this monastery Saint Benedict gave the inmates a fundamental Rule by which to live wisely, whereas previously many of these people had lived in isolation. After this saint had lived as a hermit for a long time, and had distinguished himself by his virtue and miracles, many people gathered about him in the service of God; and he soon built twelve monasteries and provided them with inhabitants. And he gathered about him many disciples by whose aid he conquered almost all the world. Out of this holy man's illustrious Order emanated many pious and learned men. Although he first gave his Rule to the Black Monks alone, it was subsequently adopted by others. From his Order are said to have come 24 popes, 173 cardinals, 1464 archbishops, 15,070 distinguished abbots, and as Pope John XXII writes, 5,555 canonized and elevated monks.

Scholastica, sister of Saint Benedict, was given over to God from childhood. Her brother usually visited her once a year. On one occasion, after they had spent the day together in praising God and discussing holy matters until evening, and Benedict had received his meal and was about to return to his monastery, his sister, the pious nun, bade him to stay awhile longer and to speak to her of the joys of heavenly life. And when he told her that he did not wish to be absent from his cell, there ensued in response to Scholastica's prayers such a downpour and storm, that with his brethren, he was not able to pull his feet out of the mired earth. And so they consumed the entire night in holy conversation and spiritual intercourse. On the following day Benedict returned to his monastery, and when, after the expiration of three days, he opened his eyes in his cell, he saw his sister's soul, in the form of a dove, ascending to heaven.

Benedict (Benedictus) was born of a noble family in the little town of Norica, in the Duchy of Spoleto, about 480. He was sent to Rome to study literature and science, and gave hopes of becoming a distinguished pleader. But, while yet a boy, he became disgusted with the profligacy of his fellow-students, and the evil example about him drove him to the opposite extreme. The religious enthusiasm of such men as Jerome and Augustine led him into a hermitage at the age of 15. Leaving Rome, he fled to a wilderness about forty miles away, and there he met the hermit Romanus, who supplied him with food during the three years that Benedict spent in a cavern. During his solitary life he was subjected to many temptations. Soon the fame of the young man extended through the neighborhood, and shepherds and four villagers brought their sick to his cavern to be healed. A neighboring society of hermits asked him to become their head. Knowing something of the morals and manners of this community, Benedict at first refused. He only yielded after much persuasion, and in the hope of reforming the abuses which had crept into their monastery. But the strictness of his life filled these perverted men with envy and alarm, and while he was there, one of the men attempted to poison him in a cup of wine. Benedict, on the cup being presented to him, blessed it as usual, making the sign of the cross. The cup instantly fell from the hands of the traitor, was broken, and its contents spilled on the ground, a scene often represented in Benedictine convents. Benedict thereupon arose, and telling the monks they must provide themselves another superior, he left them and returned to his solitary cave at Subiaco, where he dwelt alone. But now Subiaco was no longer a "desert," for it was crowded with the huts and cells of those whom the fame of Benedict's sanctity, his virtues, and his miracles, had gathered about him. To introduce order and discipline into the community, he directed them to construct twelve monasteries, in each of which he placed twelve disciples, with a superior over them. Many had come from Rome and other cities, among them two Roman senators, Anitius and Tertullus, bringing their infant sons Maurus and Placidus, with the earnest request that Benedict educate them in the ways of salvation. And he took them under his special care. The community increased in number and renown, and in brotherly charity and holiness of life. Of course there were temptations and jealousies, but these were overcome by Benedict.

In a consecrated grove, near the summit of Mount Cassino, stood a temple to Apollo, who was still worshipped, for paganism had not yet been completely banished from Italy. Benedict traveled to the neighborhood of the Mount, and preached Christ to the people. And they were converted, broke the image, threw down the altar, and burned the grove. On this spot Benedict built two chapels, one in honor of St. John the Baptist, model of the contemplative life; the other in honor of St. Martin of Tours, for the active religious life. Then, higher up on the mountain he laid the foundation of that celebrated monastery which has ever since been regarded as the parent institution of their Order. Here was promulgated the famous Rule which became the general law of the monks of Western Europe, and which gave monasticism its definite form. To the rule given the cenobites of the East (poverty, chastity, and obedience), Benedict added: (1) Manual labor for seven hours per day; (2) the vows were to be made perpetual.

Toward the close of his long life Benedict was consoled for many troubles by the arrival of his sister, Scholastica, who had already devoted herself to a religious life, and now took up her residence in a retired cell about a league and a half from the convent. She emulated her brother's piety, and although it does not appear that she took vows, she was generally considered the first Benedictine nun. When she followed her brother to Mt. Cassino, she drew about her a small community of pious women; but nothing more is recorded of her, except that her brother visited her once a year. On one occasion, legend says, after they had conversed on spiritual matters until late in the evening, and Benedict was about to depart, his sister entreated him to remain awhile longer; but he refused. She prayed heaven to interfere and make it possible for her brother to stay longer; and immediately a furious storm came about, delaying Benedict's departure until late in the evening. It was a last meeting, for Scholastica died two days later; and in his cell Benedict beheld her soul ascending to heaven in the form of a dove.

The miracles attributed to Benedict are numerous. In the year 540, he was visited by Totila, king of the Goths, who prostrated himself at his feet, entreating his blessing. Benedict reproved him for his cruelties in Italy; and from that time on the ferocious Goth showed more humanity than he had previously. Shortly after this visit Benedict died of a fever that had seized him while attending the poor of the neighborhood. He died on March 21, 543.

1. Benedict, founder of the Benedictine Order of monks, is represented by a full length woodcut. He is clad in a cap and voluminous habit, a crosier in his right hand, a book in his left. Upon the book rests the poisoned cup offered him by one of the brethren. In it writhes a serpent.

2. Monastery of Cassino, founded by Benedict, is represented by a woodcut which covers almost a quarter of a page. The architecture of the buildings within the monastery walls is nondescript. This is the first woodcut of a monastery to appear in the Chronicle, and is later repeated for like institutions.

Boniface, the second pope of that name, a Roman whose father was Sigisbald (Sigisbundo), was pope after Felix, during the reign of Emperor Justinian; and (as some say) he was not elected without dissension and division; for Dioscorus was elected in Felix's place. In this uproar the clergy were troubled for twenty-eight days, but the situation was finally relieved by the death of Dioscorus. This Boniface ordained that no one should nominate his own successor to Episcopal office; which was afterwards confirmed by many popes. He ordained that on the third day after the death of a pope, a new one should be installed. He segregated the clergy from the people when the godly office was being celebrated. He also forbade the summoning of a bishop before a lay judge, whether in civil or criminal matters. And when he had sat two years and two days he died and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. And the chair then rested for two months. [Boniface II (Bonifacius), pope from 530 to 532, was by birth a Goth, and he owed his election to nomination by his predecessor Felix IV, and to the influence of the Gothic king. The Roman electors had opposed to him a priest of Alexandria, called Dioscorus, who died a month after his election, and thus left the position open for Boniface. Boniface endeavored to nominate his own successor, thus transforming into law, or at least into custom, the proceedings by which he had benefited, but the clergy and the senate of Rome forced him to cancel this arrangement].

John (Iohannes) the Second, pope, a Roman whose father was Projectus, was pope during the time of the emperor Justinian. In the beginning of his episcopacy he condemned the bishop Anthimus for his lapse into the Arian heresy. The emperor Justinian, to honor the Roman see, at this time sent two bishops to Rome with gifts with which to greet the Roman pope, these same gifts to be laid up as offerings at the Church of the Blessed Peter; namely, a golden cup set with jewels and weighing six pounds, two silver cups of twelve pounds and two silver chalices of fifteen pounds, This John (of whom historians have little to say) died after he had created fifteen priests and twenty-one bishops. He was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the sixth day of the Kalends of June. He sat two years and four months. The chair then rested six days. [John II, pope from 533-535, succeeded Boniface II. At the instance of Justinian he adopted the proposition unus de Trinitate passus est in carne ('one of the Trinity suffered in the flesh') as a test of the orthodoxy of certain monks accused of Nestorian tendencies].

Pope Agapetus (Agapitus), a Roman whose father was Gordian, was made pope, and presently was sent by King Theodahad (Theodato) to the emperor Justinian to appease his wrath against Theodahad because the latter had caused Amalasuntha, mother of King Athalaric, to be exiled and slain. But as Agapetus was honorably received by the emperor and succeeded in making peace, he was asked by the emperor to confirm the doctrine of the Eutycheans. But as this holy man opposed this, the emperor threatened him; in consequence of which Agapetus said, I wished that I might come to the most Christian emperor Justinian, but I found Diocletian, an acknowledged enemy of the Christians. In response to such free speech and divine talent, Justinian was moved to adopt the true Christian faith, and to drive out Anthimus (Anthemio), the Constantinopolitan bishop and protector of the Eutychean heresy, and to put a true Catholic in his place, who would be consecrated by Agapetus. Before long Agapetus died at Constantinople. His body was brought back to Rome and buried in the Basilica of Peter. He sat eleven months and nineteen days. [Agapetus I, pope from 535 to 536, collaborated with Cassiodorus in founding a library of ecclesiastical authors at Rome. King Theodahad sent him on an embassy to Constantinople, where he died after have deposed Anthimus, the Monophysite bishop of that town, and ordained Mennas as his successor].

Pope Silverius, of Campania, whose father was the bishop Hormisdas, was made pope at the command of King Theodatus, although this was never done before at the command of a king, but at the command of an emperor. However, the threats of this king exceeded all understanding and interpretation of the law; for at the instance of Vigilius, the Roman deacon and treasurer, he threatened the clergy with death. Under threats the empress Theodora, ordered Silverius to drive out Menas (Menna), the Constantinopolitan bishop, and to recall Anthimus (Anthemius). To this he was opposed. In response the empress wrote her general Belisarius to eject Silverius and to put Vigilius in his place. Belisarius, occupied in a war, referred the matter to his wife Antonina. Then Vigilius summoned several witnesses who accused Silverius of having planned to betray the city of Rome. In response Silverius was forced to give up the papacy and to enter upon a monastic life. He was exiled, and he died not without the blessings of piety after he had lived as pope one year, five months, and twelve days. The seat was vacant six days. [Silverius, pope from 536 to 537, successor to Agapetus I, was a legitimate son of Pope Hormisdas, born before his father entered the priesthood. He purchased his elevation from Theodotus, the Goth. He was one of those who six months later admitted Belisarius into the city. He opposed restoration of the patriarch Anthimus, whom Agapetus had deposed, and thus brought upon himself the hatred of Theodora, who desired Vigilius to be pope. He was deposed by Belisarius in 537, degraded to the rank of monk. He went to Constantinople, where Justinian entertained his complaint and sent him back to Rome; but Vigilius was ultimately able to banish his rival to Pandataria, where he spent the rest of his life].

Pope Vigilius, a Roman whose father was a consul, was elected pope in the time of Justinian. The empress Theodora requested Vigilius to proceed to Constantinople to reinstate Anthimus (Anthemius). As he objected to this, he was taken to Constantinople, and there, because of his refusal, he was so severely beaten that he almost died; and he was led about the city at the end of a rope until the closing of the gates. After this he was imprisoned, and given only bread and water for a long time; and he was rendered so patient that when he was about to be commensurately punished, he said he deserved severer treatment. Later he was recalled, but died when he arrived in the city of Syracuse in Sicily, and his body was brought back to Rome and was buried with Saint Marcellus on the Salarian Way. He lived as pope seventeen years, six months, and twenty-six days. [Vigilius, pope from 537 to 555, succeeded Silverius, and was followed by Pelagius I. He was ordained by order of Belisarius while Silverius still lived. His elevation was due to Theodora, who had prevailed upon him to disallow the Council of Chalcedon in connection with the "three chapters" controversy. But he did not fulfill his promise, and was summoned to Constantinople. There he issued a document known as the , condemning the three chapters, but expressly disavowing any intention to disparage the council of Chalcedon. After some trimming, he prepared another document, , which was laid before the so-called fifth "ecumenical" council in 553, and led to his condemnation by the majority of that body, some say even to his banishment. Ultimately, however, he was induced to confirm the decrees of the council, and, after an enforced absence of seven years, he was allowed to set out for Rome; but he died at Syracuse on June 7, 555, without having reached his destination].

Justinian (Justinianus), son of the sister of Justin, and greatest of the Roman emperors, attained to the sovereignty; and soon after he received the imperial supremacy, he set his mind upon the return of the common good. He ruled the Roman empire with good fortune. He not only conducted military affairs with success, but was also wonderfully fortunate in civic and business affairs; for through Belisarius, the great man, he defeated the Persians in war, destroyed the Vandals and their king Gelimer (Gelismero), and brought back into the empire Africa, which for 96 years had been alienated from it. Moreover, with the strength of the aforesaid Belisarius, he defeated the Goths in Italy; and captured their king; while with wonderful power and strength he also defeated the Mauri and their king Attila. Likewise, he also overcame other peoples in war. This emperor also built to the Lord, who is the wisdom of God the Father, a church in the city of Constantinople, and he called it Agia Sophia, that is, Holy Wisdom. This structure so excels all others that its equal is not to be found in all the countries of the world. This emperor was a man of true faith, proficient in his works, and upright in his judgments; for these reasons he was fortunate in all his undertakings. As a man of intelligence, with the advice and labors of a number of highly learned men, he reduced to a small number of books the great uncharted sea of law books, of which there were over two thousand scattered about in disorder; and he brought many doubtful laws into harmony. After he had reigned 38 years he died at Constantinople, a man of great and godly intelligence. [Justinian (Justinianus), surnamed The Great, emperor of Constantinople, 527-565, was born near Tauresium in Illyria in 483. He was adopted by his uncle in 527, and married the beautiful actress Theodora, who exercised great influence over him. He died in 565, leaving the crown to his nephew, Justin II. During his reign Justinian was a firm supporter of orthodoxy, and thus has received from ecclesiastical writers the title of Great; but towards the end of his life he became a heretic, being one of the adherents of Nestorianism. His foreign wars were glorious, but extremely costly. The empire of the Vandals in Africa was overthrown by Belisarius, and their king Gelimer led a prisoner to Constantinople. The kingdom of the Ostrogoths in Italy was likewise destroyed by the successive victories of Belisarius and Narses. Justinian adorned Constantinople with many public buildings of great magnificence, but at the same time taxes were constantly increased. The great work of Justinian is his legislation. He made two influential collections of laws, one of the imperial constitutions, the other of all that was valuable in the works of jurists. The last was entrusted to a commission of ten, who completed their labors in 529; and their collection was declared to be law under the title . This was the first collection. In 530 Tribonian, who had been one of the commissioners on the Code, was authorized to select fellow-workers to assist him in the other divisions of the undertaking, and this commission proceeded at once to lay under contribution the works of those jurists who had received authority from other emperors to interpret the law. They divided their material into 50 Books, and subdivided each book into Titles. Nothing that was considered valuable was omitted; nothing obsolete included. Repetition was not allowed. The work was completed in three years and became law December 30, 533. It comprehended about 9,000 extracts made from nearly 2,000 books. The Code and the Digest contained a complete body of law; but as they were not adapted to elementary instruction, a treatise was produced under the title based on elementary works of a similar character, but chiefly on the of Gaius].

The Fifth Council begun at Constantinople at the command of the pope Agapetus and the emperor Justinian, was concluded during the time of Pope Vigilius, in the year 538. It was called against Theodorus and all heretics who held that the Most Blessed Virgin Mary bore men alone, and not God and men. In this same Council it was ordained that the Blessed Virgin Mary should be called the Mother of God, because through her bearing, she bore us God. And there fourteen anathemas were written against the blasphemy of Theodorus and his associates.

Fifth Ecumenical Council (Constantinople) held in 553 grew out of the controversy of the "Three Chapters," which were condemned, and their authors, long dead, anathematized, and the orthodox faith was set forth in fourteen anathemas with special reference to Nestorians.

Justinian's ecclesiastical policy was complex and varying. For many years before the accession of his uncle Justin, the Eastern world had been vexed by the struggles of the Monophysite party, who recognized only the one nature in Christ, against the view which then and ever since has maintained itself as orthodox, that the divine and human natures coexisted in him. The latter doctrine had triumphed at the council of Chalcedon, but Egypt, a great part of Syria and Asia Minor, and a considerable minority even in Constantinople, clung to Monophysitism. When Justinian came to the throne he endeavored to persuade the Monophysites to come in by summoning some of their leaders to a conference. This having failed, he ejected suspected prelates, and occasionally persecuted them. The Monophysites sometimes alleged that they could not accept the decrees of the council of Chalcedon because that council had not condemned, but virtually approved, three writers tainted with Nestorian principles, namely, Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret, and Ibas, bishop of Edessa. It was suggested to the emperor that reconciliation might result if a condemnation of these teachers, or rather of such of their books as were objectionable, could be effected, since in that event the Chalcedonian party would be purged of any appearance of sympathy with the errors of Nestorius. Accordingly Justinian put forth an edict exposing and denouncing the errors in the writings of Theodore generally, in the treatise of Theodoret against Cyril of Alexandria, and in a letter of Bishop Ibas to the Persian bishop Maris. This edict was circulated through the Christian world to be subscribed by the bishops. Long disputes and negotiations followed, the end of which was that Justinian summoned this general council of the church, reckoned the Fifth, which condemned the impugned writings, and anathematized several other heretical authors. Its decrees were received in the East but long contested in the Western Church where a schism arose that lasted for seventy years. This is the controversy known as that of the "Three Chapters," apparently from the three propositions or condemnations contained in Justinian's original edict, one relating to Theodore's writings and person, the second to the incriminating treatise of Theodoret (whose person was not attacked), the third to the letter of Ibas.

Belisarius, an esteemed councilor, sturdy in arms, a leader sent forth by Justinian at the head of a large army, first attacked the Persians, who had seriously ravaged Roman territory, and defeated them in a great battle. With the consent of the emperor he entered Constantinople in triumph. This Belisarius was sent with an army by Justinian, the emperor, to Africa, which the Vandals had occupied for many years. With speed he engaged the Vandals in battle, defeated many of their people, took their king Gelimer (Gelimerum) prisoner, and sent him to Constantinople; and he brought Carthage back into the empire. Afterwards, this Belisarius, renowned for many battles, was sent by Justinian against King Theodahad (Theodatus) to release Italy from its servitude to the Goths. While Belisarius lingered in Sicily, the Gothic king, Theodahad, died. Vitiges succeeded Theodahad, and against him Belisarius continued the war which he had begun. He marched from Sicily into Campania and to Naples, which he took by force, slaying many people, sparing neither women nor children. From there he hastened to Rome; and the Goths, who were there, fled by night, leaving the gates open, and hurried on to Ravenna. But as Belisarius surmised that Vitiges would return to Rome with a great force, he, in the meantime speedily secured the city with fortifications, arms and moats. Now Vitiges came on with about one hundred thousand men. After defending the city for a year and a day, Belisarius decided to give Vitiges battle and to defeat his forces. But Vitiges would not accept the challenge, and fled to Ravenna. Belisarius hastened after him, and captured him in that city; and he brought him to Constantinople in the fifth year of his arrival in Italy. [Belisarius, one of the most famous generals of the later Roman Empire, was born about 505 in "Germania," a district on the borders of Thrace and Macedonia. As a youth he served in the bodyguard of Justinian, who appointed him commander of the Eastern army. He won a victory over the Persians in 530, but was defeated in the following year. Recalled to Constantinople, he married Antonina, a favorite of the empress Theodora. During the Nika sedition (532) he did Justinian good service, crushing the rebels who had proclaimed Hypatius emperor. In 533 he was put in command of the expedition against the Vandal kingdom in Africa. With 15,000 mercenaries he took Carthage, defeated Gelimer, the Vandal king, and brought him back as a captive to Constantinople. At this time Justinian decided to attack Italy, where the Ostrogothic kingdom was shaken by internal dissensions. Accordingly, Belisarius invaded Sicily (535), and after storming Naples and defending Rome for a year against almost the entire strength of the Goths in Italy, he captured Ravenna, and with it the Gothic king Vitiges. The Ostrogoths offered to acknowledge him Emperor of the West, but he rejected the proposal and returned to Constantinople in 540. The following year he was sent to check the Persians, but achieved no decisive result. In 544 the Goths, having meanwhile reconquered Italy, Belisarius was sent with inadequate forces to oppose them. During five campaigns he held the enemy at bay until he was removed from the command. He remained in retirement at Constantinople until 559, when at the head of a mixed multitude of peasants and soldiers, he repelled the Bulgarian attackers who had invaded the city. But this, like his former victories, aroused Justinian's envy. The savior of his country was coldly received and left unrewarded by his suspicious sovereign. Shortly afterward he was accused of complicity in a conspiracy against the emperor. His wealth was confiscated, and he was imprisoned in his palace. He was set free and restored to favor in 563. He died in 565].

Vitiges (Vitigis), a Goth of obscure origin, was at this time, while King Theodahad (Theodato) still lived, crowned as king of Rome; and he reigned five years. In military skill and experience he was a celebrated man. He planned to depose Theodahad. After the latter's death he hurried to Ravenna, and assembled all the Goths dispersed throughout Italy. This Vitiges proceeded to Rome against Belisarius with a large army, and with his Goths besieged the city, and overran, ravaged and burned all the country about Rome, putting all Romans to the sword. He plundered and laid open all holy things, and was attacking the city continuously. But Belisarius (of whom we have previously written) held the city. Starvation increased in Rome, and in the same year a great famine occurred throughout the world, principally in Liguria; so that (as Datus, the pious bishop of Milan, has said) any number of mothers ate the limbs of their children. And now Vitiges, the king, and his army, proceeded against Belisarius in great battle; but Vitiges and his forces suffered a great defeat, taking to flight; and during such flight he was captured at night and brought to Belisarius at Rome, and from there was taken before Justinian at Constantinople. Justinian was greatly elated. Before long he made Vitiges a governor on the Persian border. There Vitiges ended his own life and with it the Gothic kingdom.

Totila (Tottila), also called Baduila (Baduilla), was the last king of the Ostrogoths. For when Vitiges was taken prisoner the Goths beyond the Padus made Chelipidarus king. Upon his death the latter was succeeded by Erarius. Before a year had passed he was strangled; and after him this Totila was crowned. Totila speedily assembled an army and afflicted all Italy and Sicily; and he coveted Rome, which he besieged round about. And there was such a famine that the parents threatened to eat the flesh of their own children.

And when the Romans could no longer defend their city, Totila came through the Hostian Gate. To spare the people Totila caused the horns and trumpets to be sounded all night long, so that the people might protect themselves or hide from the Gothic arms. To this leniency and kindness Totila, who had been a cruel man, was influenced by the earlier admonitions of the holy father, Benedict. Some of the senators escaped over the walls and hurried to Constantinople to inform the emperor of the calamity. He at once sent Narses, his private advocate and officer, to Italy with a large army. Belisarius fought with Totila and his army, utterly defeated him, and relieved Italy of the Goths, who had ruled there for seventy-two years since the time of Theodoric. And so the Gothic name was wiped out; and those who survived the battle, wished to be called Italians and not Goths, because they were born and reared in Italy. [Totila, king of the Ostrogoths, was chosen king after the death of his uncle Ildibad in 541, his real name being Baduila. At the beginning of his reign he assembled and inspired the Goths to win a victory over Justinian near Faenza. Having gained another victory in 542, in the valley of Mugello, he left Tuscany for Naples, captured that city, and then received the submission of the provinces of Lucania, Apuleia, and Calabria. Totila's conquest of Italy was marked by mercy as well as celerity. Toward the end of 545 the Gothic king prepared to starve Rome into surrender, at the same time making elaborate preparations to check the progress of Belisarius, who was advancing to its relief. The imperial fleet just barely failed to succor the city, which was plundered by Totila. Its walls and fortifications were soon restored, and when Totila again marched against it, he was defeated by Belisarius. Several cities were taken by the Goths while Belisarius, not following up his advantage, remained inactive before finally leaving Italy. In 549 Totila advanced a third time against Rome, which he took through the treachery of some of its defenders. His next exploit was the conquest of Sicily, after which he subdued Corsica and Sardinia, and sent a fleet against Greece. Justinian then entrusted the conduct of a new campaign to Narses. Totila marched against him, but was defeated and killed in the battle of Tagina in July 552].

Narses was a eunuch of Justinian, and the personal chamberlain of the emperor. In acknowledgement of his good conduct the emperor promoted him to counselor; and from that time on he acted toward all as an image of kindness, contemplation, mercy, generosity, and graciousness. With the assistance of troops sent to him by Alboin, king of the Lombards, who was his ally, he fought against the Goths and defeated them and their king Totila; and he sent the Lombards, laden with gifts, back to their homes in Pannonia. Sophia, the wife of Justin, egged on by those envious of Narses, attempted to recall Narses, employing the disdainful words that he should return home where the wool, weaving, and spindle awaited him. But Narses answered that he would spin such thread as would leave his enemies and those envious of him no justification for their errors; and although he sought vengeance, he died shortly.

Narses, an important officer of Justinian, was a eunuch of Persarmenia, and was born about 478. If the statement that he died at the age of 95 is correct, he was probably brought to Constantinople while still very young, and obtained a footing in the office of the grand chamberlain. He rose to a position involving the custody of the archives of the household. From this office, probably in middle life, he became praepositus sacri cubiculi. In 532 the insurrection known as the Nika broke out in Constantinople, when for some hours the throne of Justinian seemed doomed to be overthrown. It was saved, partly by the courage of Theodora, and partly by the timely prodigality of Narses, who stole out into the capital and with large sums of money bribed the leaders of the "blue" faction, which was previously loyal to the emperor, to shout as of old Justiniane Auguste tu vincas ('Justinian Augustus, you are victorious'). He defeated Totila in 552, and with him fell the last hopes of the Gothic kingdom in Italy.

For thirty years Narses governed Italy with firmness and prudence. In the meantime his benefactor, Justinian I, died. At the new court the Empress Sophia, the spouse of Justin II, spoke the final word. With her the complaints against the covetousness of Narses, probably not unfounded, received a ready hearing. She influenced the emperor to recall the exarch, with whom she at any rate found no favor; and it is said that by word of mouth she conveyed a message to Narses, a man not physically strong, suggesting that he return to the distaff in the apartment of the women, and leave matters of war to men. To this Narses replied that he would spin for her a thread that would require the rest of her life to unravel. And speedily he extended to the Lombards, who lived on poor lands in Pannonia, an invitation to emigrate to the fertile fields of Italy. This invitation was heartily accepted by Alboin, the Lombard king, and with his people, including men, women and children, cattle and all their other possessions, he crossed the Julian Alps and entered Upper Italy. He made numerous conquests, and Pavia became the capital of the new Lombard Empire, which extended over entire Northern Italy. Although Alboin was finally assassinated, the empire of the Lombards endured for another two centuries, until the year 774, when Charles the Great deposed the last Lombard king.

Patrick (Patricius), a native of Britain, before he was ordained an archbishop of the Scots, converted the entire island of Hibernia to Christ by his illustrious teachings over a period of 60 years. He awakened many from the dead, released prisoners, built churches, and baptized thousands of people. But there was a savage people who refused to believe unless they saw the sufferings of the evil and the happiness of the good. So the Lord appeared to Patrick and handed him the Gospel and a staff, and led him to a desert region, and showed him a round cave, dark from without, where a true penitent could be purged of all his sins in a natural day [A natural day is 24 hours], and would see such suffering and joy. There Patrick built a church, and appointed prebendaries of the blessed Augustine, to whom he gave the key to the cave. During his time many people went to the cave, and they testified to what they learned; and this he caused to be noted in the church; for this reason this is called Patrick's Purgatory. [Patrick, patron saint of Ireland, born probably about 389, was the son of a middle-class landed proprietor. No doubt Patrick was educated as a Christian. At 16 he was carried off by a band of Irish marauders, and tradition represents him as tending the herds of a chieftain for six years, during which time he became subject to religious emotions, and saw visions which encouraged him to escape. He fled, and encountered a vessel engaged in the export of Irish wolf-dogs. After three days at sea, the traders landed, possibly on the West coast of Gaul, journeying for 28 days through a desert. At the end of two months Patrick parted from his companions and went to the monastery of Lerins, where he spent a few years. He seems to have returned home, and it was doubtless during this stay in Britain that the idea of missionary enterprise in Ireland came to him. However, he returned to Gaul in order to prepare himself. At Auxerre he was ordained deacon and there he must have spent at least 14 years. Patrick was then chosen to combat the Pelagian heresy in Ireland. He entered upon his enterprise at once, and when he landed at his destination, a convert chief granted him a site for an establishment, and a wooden barn is said to have been used for worship. In time he founded churches in various places, and there is some evidence that he made a journey to Rome, bringing back valuable relics. The story of Patrick exorcising reptiles from his adopted country has the same origin as the dragon legends of the East, and the same significance. It is merely one form of the familiar allegory figuring the conquest of good over evil, or the triumph of Christianity over Paganism. Bridget is said to have been one of Patrick's converts].

ILLUSTRATION

Patrick is usually represented either as a missionary and apostle, or as the first bishop and primate of the Church of Ireland. As the Apostle of Ireland he wears a gown with a hood, and a leather girdle, staff and wallet in one hand, the Bible in the other; at or under his feet is a serpent. The standard with the cross, proper attribute of missionary saints who overcome idolatry, also belongs to him. But here in the Chronicle he is represented as a bishop, in the usual Episcopal insignia, the mitre, the cope, the crozier, and the Bible in his hand.

Dreadful signs were seen by night in Italy in the Year of the Lord 570. Fiery rays were observed in the heavens and blood fell in drops from the clouds. This presaged that human blood would be spilled afterwards. Later it rained for many successive days, and the Tiber became so swollen that many people were drowned in the lowlands. This also occurred in other cities and countries.

Animals formed like men and women, with long hair extending to the hips, appeared in a river from morning until noontime. They say also that a mountain was torn asunder in Gaul, making a great noise; and immediately after many people and buildings were destroyed.

Leonard (Leonardus), a very holy man and a native of Cenomana, in Gaul, was baptized by Saint Remigius, who instructed him in wholesome learning, discipline, and wisdom. He did not wish to become a bishop, and deserting all, lived in the forest near the city of Lemona. A royal hunting lodge had been erected there. When the queen was in danger due to childbirth there, the king caused Leonard to be brought into the house from the woods. And the king asked him to pray for his wife. Leonard called upon God and secured a double joy for the king; for the mother recovered with the child. The king wanted to give him gold and silver; but Leonard scorned it, admonishing the king to give it to the poor, granting him instead the use of so much of the forest as he could ride about in a night. There he built a monastery in which he lived with two fellow monks in great moderation; and he became illustrious for many miracles. Prisoners who invoked his name soon went to freedom, finding their shackles broken. What other great miracles the Lord God worked through him are to be noted by the numerous and various forms of irons in his churches. [Leonard was from France, where his father held a high office in the palace of King Theodobert. Leonard had been baptized in early life, and without giving up his duties at court, fulfilled those of a devout and charitable Christian. He particularly delighted in visiting the prisons and ministering to the prisoners; and those for whom he interceded the king pardoned. He also devoted much of his substance to the liberation of captives from slavery. But life at court became distasteful to him, and he withdrew secretly to a deserted place near Limoges, turning hermit, and spending several years in penance and prayer. And it happened that while the king went on a hunt accompanied by the queen and all his court, she was suddenly seized with the pangs of childbirth and was in danger of death. The king and his attendants stood about her in perplexity. When Leonard heard of her grief, he prayed to the Lord, and she was relieved and happily delivered. The king then presented Leonard a portion of the forest; and he cleared the ground, and gathered about him a religious community. After many years spent in works of piety and charity, he died in 559. He is invoked by those who languish in captivity as prisoners or slaves. It was also a custom for those delivered from captivity to hang up their fetters in the churches or chapels dedicated to him, and he is usually represented with fetters in his hand. He is claimed by the Benedictines as a member of their order].

Maurus, a Roman monk, was the particular disciple of Benedict, the holy father. Many of the Roman nobility, moved to spiritual life by the piety of Benedict, came to Mount Cassino. The Gauls, by messengers and letters asked Benedict to send them one of his disciples for instruction in the monastic life; and he sent Maurus, who taught them to live a wholesome and blessed existence. He also built many cloisters. At length, after the practice of many virtues and the performance of many miracles, he died at a good old age and not without the great blessings of piety. [Maurus, son of a Roman senator, was given to Benedict as a boy for education in the way of salvation, and became one of his favorite disciples].

Columbanus the abbot, celebrated for his spiritual life and piety, flourished in the island of Hibernia during these times; and there he built many cloisters. Later he erected the cloister of Luxeuil, in Burgundy, gathering together innumerable people, and giving them the correct means and form of living. He took King Theuderich to task for committing adultery with certain concubines; for this action the king's mother, Brunhilde (Brunichildis), became so enraged against him that the king ordered him ejected from the monastery; and that happened, but through God's vengeance Theuderich was ignited with fire and burned up. Then Saint Columbanus, famous for his miracles, lived on the fruits of the trees. When his servant told him that while gathering fruit he discovered a bear eating the fruit which he had collected, Columban told his servant to divide the fruit and apples, and to give one portion to the bear, and to set aside the other for his use; and so the bear ate his portion, but not the other. [Columban (543-615) Irish saint and writer, was born at Leinster, and educated in the monastery of Bangor, County Down. About 585 he left Ireland with 12 other monks, establishing himself in the Bosges, in an ancient fortification, called Anagrates, in the department of Haute-Saone. Later he built the abbey of Luxeuil, for the congregation of which he drew up his Rule. His enemies accused him of keeping Easter according to Celtic uses, and a powerful conspiracy was organized against him at the court of Burgundy for boldly rebuking King Theuderich II and the queen-mother Brunhilde; being forcibly removed from the monastery, he withdrew to Switzerland, where he preached to the Suebi and Alamanni. Finally he was forced to retire to Italy, where he founded the monastery of Bobbio, in the Apennines; and there he died in 615].

Herculanus, bishop of Perugia (Perusia), the city which was taken after a siege of seven years, was crowned with martyrdom. The general of the army of Totila beheaded this Herculanus on the walls of the city. He cut off the head and threw the body over the walls. Someone carried the head to the body and buried both, together with the body of a child, beside the wall. After forty days they searched for the body in order to lay it in the church. They found the body of the child full of crawling worms; but the body of Herculanus was so entire that no signs of decapitation were to be seen. [Herculanus was bishop of Perugia when the town was besieged by Totila, king of the Goths, in 549. He probably encouraged his people to defend the city with vigor, for he incurred the vengeance of the king. When the place was taken, the commander of the army sent to Totila to learn what was to be done with the bishop. The king ordered that a strip of his skin was to be cut off from his head to his foot, and that then he was to be executed. The Gothic commander, however, decapitated the saint first, and then cut the strip of skin as required.]

Medardus, the holy bishop of Tournai, was also illustrious for his miracles. In his departure from this world, heaven was opened, and a divine light shone before him for three hours. He and Gildardus, his brother, the Rotomagian [Probably Ratomagus (or Rotomagus), now Rouen]. bishop, were born and became bishops on the same day. [Medardus was born at Salency, near Noyan, of a Frank father named Nectard, and a Roman mother named Protajia. The father was converted to the Christian faith by his wife, and allowed his son to be baptized. Medard was ordained by the bishop of Vermandois, whom he succeeded in the see on his death. As the little town which was his Episcopal seat was poorly defended, and the country exposed to the ravages of invaders, Medardus moved his seat to Noyan. On the death of Eleutherius, he became also bishop of Tournai. It was contrary to the canons that he should hold two sees, but this was a case of necessity, as no suitable person could be found to take Tournai. Medardus died at Noyan in 545, and his body was translated to the abbey called after him at Soissons. To him is attributed the institution of the festival of the Rose of Salency].

Simeon of Antioch was the chosen one of his mother's womb. Of him many miraculous things are told. At first he led a solitary life. Later he lived in a dry well. Finally he stood on a pillar for forty years, until the time of his death. [Simeon Stylites, in order to mortify his body, elevated himself on a pillar, first of six cubits, then of twelve, then of twenty-two, and finally of forty cubits in height; and there he stood for thirty-seven years with a chain about his neck, a spectacle to men and angels. The pillar top on which he stood was surrounded by a balustrade, and had a diameter not exceeding three feet, so that he could neither lie down nor even sit to rest. There was neither cell nor covering to ward off the weather. He took food only once in forty-one days, except the Eucharist, which was administered to him every eighth day. His time at prayer lasted from sunset to daybreak, during which time he made 1244 genuflections or inclinations of the body. It is said that he stood on one foot for a whole year by way of penance. Twice a day he preached from the pillar to an immense crowd. He died on the pillar at the age of seventy-two].

Year of the World 5753 | Year of Christ 554

Pelagius, the first pope of that name, a Roman whose father was John (Iohanne), was pope after Vigilius. He ordained that the heretics and schismatics might also be subjected to the temporal power in the event they do not permit themselves to be reconverted by means of a course of sensible reasoning; also that the consecrated ones should fulfill the seven canonical hours daily. He was accused of being responsible for the proceedings against Vigilius, his predecessor; so in the presence of the people and the clergy, he touched the cross and the Gospels, and cleared himself of the accusation by his oath. After this Narses came to Rome, and, together with this Pelagius, ordered that no one should be admitted to holy consecration through avarice or solicitation. Finally he died in the eleventh year, tenth month and twenty-ninth day of his episcopacy, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The chair then rested three months and twenty-six days. [Pelagius I, pope from 555 to 561, was a Roman by birth, and first appears in history at Constantinople as apocrisiarius (a cleric who served as the representative of a patriarch or pope) of Pope Silverius, whose overthrow in favor of Vigilius his intrigues promoted. In 542 the emperor Justinian sent him to Antioch on ecclesiastical business. He afterward took part in the synod of Gaza, which deposed Paul of Alexandria. When Vigilius was summoned to Byzantium in 544, Pelagius, now archdeacon, was left behind as his vicar, and by his tact in dealing with Totila, he saved the citizens from murder and outrage. He appears to have followed Vigilius to Constantinople; and for refusing, with him, to accept the decrees of the 5th general council (the 2nd of Constantinople, 553), he shared his exile].

John (Iohannes), the third pope of that name, a Roman whose father was Anastasius, was born of noble parentage and was pope during the time of Justin. He was a very wise and good man, and improved many churches. He led Narses, who was angry with the Romans, back from Naples to Rome. Not long afterwards Narses died, and his body was taken to Constantinople. In this pope's time the Armenians accepted the Christian faith. At this time also Italy suffered many defeats at the hands of the barbarian people, as was foretold by the dreadful signs in the heavens, as previously stated. This John died at a great age, full of sorrow and pain, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. He was pope for twelve years, eleven months and twenty-six days. The chair then rested ten months and three days. [John III, pope from 561 to 574, successor to Pelagius, descended from a noble Roman family. He is said to have prevented an invasion of Italy by the recall of the deposed exarch Narses; but the Lombards continued their incursions].

Benedict (Benedictus) the First, a pope and a Roman whose father was Boniface, lived in the time of Emperor Tiberius the Second. He was a pious man and well worthy of his office. Together with the emperor Tiberius, he gave assistance when Italy suffered a famine, and particularly to Rome; and caused grain to be sent from Egypt to Rome. The emperor Tiberius loved Benedict, and he was great in the eyes of the emperor. But before long (as some write) Benedict died of the sorrow and pain which he suffered during the calamity which befell Rome and Italy. He was pope for four years, one month and twenty-eight days. The chair then rested two months and ten days. They say that on his tomb the following was written:

Father Benedict, you leave behind great monuments to your (people?);
The titles of your virtues, O glory and grief.

Benedict I, pope from 575 to 579, succeeded John III. During his episcopacy occurred the Lombard invasion, and a series of plagues and famines that followed.

The tomb inscription and the preceding clause ('They say that ...') are not in the German edition of the chronicle. The inscription in the Latin edition of the Chronicle runs thus:

This makes very little sense, and the first line of the elegiac couplet does not scan properly as a hexameter. The actual inscription is much longer (12 lines), and is attributed to the tomb of Benedict II, not Benedict I. Its first two lines of which are as follows:

Pelagius the Second, a Roman whose father was Vingeldus, occupied the papal office from the time of Tiberius and that of the emperor Maurice, the son-in-law of Tiberius. He was created pope at the request of the emperor, during the time when no one could be sent out of the besieged city of Rome; for at that time the election of a pope by the clergy was not considered, as the emperor would not have confirmed such an election. So the virtuous and highly learned man Gregory, a monk and deacon, was sent to Constantinople to appease the emperor. Now having carried out all things according to the wishes of the pope, and not wishing to misuse his intelligence and leisure, he wrote books on Job known as the Moralia; and under the direction of the emperor, he so completely overcame Eutyches (Euticius), the Constantinopolitan bishop, that the latter was compelled to retract all he had said in his book concerning the Resurrection. For he said that our body, in the glory of the Resurrection was probably more subtle than wind and air; and therefore it could not be touched. But this is contrary to the words of the Lord, who says, Touch and see; for the spirit has neither flesh nor bone, as you have seen me. Now Pelagius, on the plea of the Roman people, recalled Gregory to Rome. And he made his paternal home a refuge for indigent old people, and built the basilica of Lawrence (Laurentii) the Martyr from the ground up. He died of the plague, which at that time distressed all Europe, in the tenth year, second month, and tenth day of his episcopacy, and he was buried in the Church of the Blessed Peter in the Vatican. The chair then rested six months and 28 days. [Pelagius II, a native of Rome but of Gothic descent, was pope from 579 to 590. He was consecrated successor to Benedict I without the emperor's sanction, and made apologies for this irregularity through Gregory. In 588, John, patriarch of Constantinople, by reviving the old and disputed claim to the title of ecumenic patriarch, elicited a protest from Pelagius; but the decretal which professes to convey the exact words of the doctrine is now known to be false. He died in 590 and was succeeded by Gregory I].

Folio CXLVII recto

Justin (Justinus) the Younger received the government of the empire at Constantinople on the death of the emperor Valentinian. However, he was not like him in any respect, but a greedy, rapacious man, scornful of the gods and men, who stole from the senators. He was so miserly that he caused an iron casket to be made in which he hoarded the gold that he stole. He also (as it is said) fell in with the Pelagian heresy. And as he now turned away the ear of his heart from divine matters, he came under the righteous judgment of God, losing his reason, and becoming insane. He ordered Tiberius, a just and strict man, to govern his palace or estates. Sophia, his wife, ruled the empire until the time of Tibertus the Second; by reason of which misfortune the kingdom of Italy was removed from obedience to the Constantinopolitan rule. When Justinus had reigned 11 years, his insanity ended with his life. [Justin (Justinus) II was Roman emperor of the East from 565 to 578. He was the nephew and successor of Justinian I. As master of the palace, and as husband of Sophia, the niece of the late empress Theodora, he secured a peaceful election. The first few days of his reign – when he paid his uncle's debts, administered justice in person, and proclaimed religious toleration – gave bright promise; but in the face of the lawless aristocracy and defiant governors of provinces, he effected few subsequent reforms. The most important event of his reign was the invasion of Italy by the Lombards, who, entering in 508, under Alboin, in a few years made themselves masters of nearly the entire country. Justin's attention was distracted from Italy to the northern and eastern frontiers. After refusing to pay the Avars tribute, he fought several unsuccessful campaigns against them. In 572 his overtures to the Turks and protection of the Christian Armenians led to a war with Persia. After two disastrous campaigns, Justin bought a precarious peace by payment of an annual tribute. The temporary fits of insanity into which he fell warned him to name a colleague. Passing over his own relatives, on the advice of Sophia he raised the general Tiberius to Caesar in December 574, withdrawing into retirement for this remaining years].

Tiberius Constantinus accepted the sovereignty of the Romans upon the death of Justin; and (as already stated), he governed the palace of Justin. Justin adopted him as his son and heir of the empire; and not unwisely so, for this man possessed the graces well becoming such a prince, such as mildness, righteousness, goodness, devotion to God, wisdom, firmness, and enduring strength. In particular, he showed good will and kindness toward the people, especially the poor. And when he had spent upon the poor much of the treasure hoarded by Justinian, Sophia the queen upbraided the emperor many times because he had thereby reduced the state treasury to poverty. In response he said, I trust in the Lord that our public treasury will not be broken by the giving of alms to the poor and the redemption of prisoners—that is a great treasure. Once while taking a walk in his palace, he saw the cross of the Lord engraved on a marble tablet in the floor. He ordered the same cross to be put into another and more worthy place, saying, It is not the wish of God that we should tread with our feet upon the cross with which we make the sign upon our foreheads and chests. And immediately the design of another cross was found, under which he discovered so much gold and silver as his magnanimity required. Of this he gave a large portion to the poor. And with the same generosity and kindness he also employed the treasures of Narses brought to him from Italy. And as further evidence of his good fortune, the victorious army sent against the Persians brought home so much booty that it required twenty elephants to transport it—something which had never occurred before. He met with such good fortune because of his service to mankind, his devotion to our Savior, and his kindness to the Roman people, whom he protected with his arms. After he had ruled over the kingdom for seven years, he chose Maurice as his successor. He died in blessedness, and many mourned the death of such a pious prince. [Tiberius II (Anicus Thrax, Flavius Constantinus) was emperor of the East from 578 to 582. He was captain of the guards to Justinus II, who elevated him to Caesar 574. He was a native of Thrace, whence the addition of Thrax to his name. He assumed the name Constantinus after he became emperor. He was brought up at the court of Justinian, and employed by Justinus II, who succeeded Justinian in 565. Justinus, feeling unequal to the labor of administration, associated Tiberius with him, and it is said that the influence of his wife Sophia, who admired the handsome captain, contributed to the choice. The Longobards were now in Italy, but a war with Persia prevented Tiberius from directing all his attention to that quarter. Yet he maintained his authority in the exarchate of Ravenna, and in other parts of Italy, and he saved Pelagius II, the pope of Rome, and the citizens, from the Longobards by a timely supply of provisions, forwarded by a fleet. Justinian raised a large army, and in 576 defeated the Persians in Armenia. An immense booty, carried by 24 elephants, was brought to Constantinople. Justinian is said to have advanced into the very heart of the Persian empire, when one of the Persian generals gained some advantage over him and interfered with the conclusion of a treaty. He was recalled, and Mauricius, afterward the successor of Tiberius, was appointed in his stead. Justinian died in 578, and Tiberius became sole emperor. In 579 the Persian war began anew; but Mauricius in the following year inflicted a signal defeat. In Africa, which had long been disturbed by the natives, Genadius, the exarch of Ravenna, defeated Gasmul, king of the Mauritani. Mauricius enjoyed a triumph for his victories, and in 581, Tiberius, whose health was rapidly failing, raised him to the dignity of Caesar, having no sons of his own. Tiberius died in 582 and was succeeded by Mauricius. Tiberius was universally lamented. By an economical administration he decreased the taxes of his subjects, while his treasury was always full].

The Lombards (Longobardi), so called in the language of the country because of their long beards, had their origin in Scandinavia, an island belonging to Germany. When they migrated from this island they had two dukes, namely, Aionus and Thatonus. Upon the death of these two, they elected one Agelmundus as king. He was slain by the Bulgarians living on the Danube, and Lamissius was put in his place. He undertook to avenge the death of his ancestor Agelmundus, and he defeated the Bulgarians with great slaughter. He reigned forty years. After him ruled the third king, called Lethus. He also reigned forty years, and he appointed his son Hildooch as his successor in the kingdom. After him reigned Godooth, the fifth king. After him came Claffus, the sixth one; and then Thatus, the seventh king. The name of the eighth king was Unachus, and after him his son Valtharith, the ninth. The tenth king of the Lombards was Audoin (Andoin), and by him these people were first led into Pannonia, after they had lived in the province of Rugilanda for forty-two years. Under this Audoin, and afterwards under his son Alboin, the eleventh king of Lombards, they lived for forty-two years, increasing in renown and might. The entry of this people into Italy occurred at the beginning of the episcopacy of Benedict. In the thirteenth year of the reign of Justin the Younger, these people came through Austria and the province of Foriulius, [Modern-day Friaul. The Foriulius ('Forum of Julius') was a fortified town and Roman colony in the country of the Carni, northeast of Aquileia, and which became a place of importance in the Middle Ages]. and settled on the river Plane [The 'Plane' River is probably the Plavis, now Piave, in Venetia, in the north of Italy].

The Lombards (a later corruption of Langobardi or Longobardi), were a German tribe of the Suevic race. They dwelt originally on the left bank of the Elbe, near the river Saale; but they afterward crossed the Elbe to the East bank. After this they disappear from history for four centuries. Like most of the German tribes, they migrated southward, and in the second half of the 5th century we find them again on the north bank of the Danube, in Upper Hungary. Here they defeated and almost annihilated the Heruli. In the middle of the 6th century they crossed the Danube at the invitation of Justinian, and settled in Pannonia, where after a struggle of thirty years they annihilated the Gepidae.

For 13 years Narses had managed Italy with power and foresight; but in the meantime, his sponsor Justinian I, under whom the Byzantine Empire flourished, died. At the new court the empress Sophia, spouse of Justinian II, was the final authority, and with her complaints against the avarice of Narses found a ready ear. She prevailed upon her husband to recall the exarch, who was not in sympathy with her, and it is said she orally conveyed word to Narses, who was weak in body, that he should return to the distaff in the spinning room, and leave matters of war to men versed in military affairs. But Narses replied that he would spin a thread for her, which would require her lifetime to unravel. According to one version he promptly invited the Lombards, then in Pannonia, to leave their arid lands and migrate to the blessed plains of Italy, and this invitation was gladly accepted by Alboin and his people. In 568 Alboin, king of the Lombards, led his nation—men, women and children, with all their possessions – across the Julian Alps, and conquered the plains of northern Italy, which have ever since retained the name of Lombardy), and made Pavia his capital. Here he founded the celebrated Lombard kingdom, which existed for upwards of two centuries, until its overthrow by Charlemagne.

Paul the Deacon (Paulus Diaconus), a Lombard by birth, derives the name of Longobardi from the long beards they wore, but later critics reject this, inasmuch as Börde signifies in Low German a fertile plain on the banks of a river, and there is still a district in Magdeburg called the Lange Börde. Diaconus also states that the Lombards came originally from Scandinavia, where they were called Vinili, and that they did not receive the name Langobardi until they settled in Germany.

Folio CXLVII verso

Alboin (Alboinus), the eleventh king of the Lombards, together with all his people, migrated from Pannonia into the fruitful and fertile plains of Italy, on the invitation of Narses. And with all the Lombards—men, women and children, and their cattle proceeded through Sirmium and Forum Iulius into Italy—an unbelievable host. They first took possession of entire Venetia, and thereafter passed through Insubria, took possession of the city of Milan by force, besieged Pavia (Papiam) for three years and finally took it also. Finally they proceeded against Verona, where they set up the capital for the entire kingdom. And there Alboin kept his wife, his treasure, and his court. Now as the people lived in happiness and good fortune, mixing their pleasures with feasts and drunkenness, the king at one such festal occasion drank out of a vessel made of the skull of his father-in-law, Cunimund (Gunimundi), whom he had slain in Pannonia. Indiscreetly he poured too much wine into himself, and becoming intoxicated, he passed the same vessel, filled with good wine, to his wife, the queen. She so took the matter to heart that in the same hour she determined to avenge the scorn and ridicule of her father's skull, by taking the life of her husband. And thus she proceeded: Helmigis (Helmechildis), a noble knight and handsome youth at the royal court, was wooing a maiden in the women's chamber. When queen Rosamunda (Rosimunda) learned of this, she so managed that the maiden submitted to the youth's will. This the queen encouraged in the hope that the youth, through conceit and guile and without appreciation of the consequence; would later lend himself to a yet baser act. And so it turned out. For the youth was secretly introduced into the king's bedchamber while the king was taking his noonday nap; and he killed the king, with the expectation (of which the queen had assured him) that he would become the successor. But they did not accomplish their purpose, and in fear they fled to Ravenna, where they killed one another with poison.

Alboin, king of the Lombards, and conqueror of Italy, succeeded his father Audoin about 565. The Lombards at that time occupied Noricum and Pannonia, and were engaged in constant warfare with the Gepidae. Alboin secured the alliance of the Avars, and with their help destroyed the Gepidae, slew their king Cunimund in battle, and married his daughter Rosamunda (also spelled Rosamund). On April 1, 568, Alboin had assembled his people with a great number of allies, among them 20,000 Saxons, to cross the Alps and form a new settlement in Italy. According to later authorities there appears to be no truth in the legend that Narses, the Byzantine general, invited the Lombards to attack Italy. This was, in effect, a migration rather than an invasion. The Roman defenses were overrun, Milan was occupied, and Pavia was invested. Lombard rule was established in Northern Italy.

But Alboin's rule came to an early end through assassination. When at a drinking bout he forced his wife Rosamund, daughter of Cunimund (former king of the Gepidae) to drink from her father's skull, (of which, according to Scythian custom, he had caused a drinking vessel to be made), she determined to avenge the insult. She conspired with Helmigis, sword-bearer of the king; and while the king slept they had him assassinated. However, Rosamund and Helmigis were compelled to flee to escape the wrath of the Lombards. They went to Ravenna and were received by Longinus. When Longinus sued for the hand of Rosamund, she gave poison to Helmigis. He soon felt its effects and with drawn sword he compelled her to drink the rest of the potion; and so they died.

Longinus, a Greek, first supreme ruler of Italy to be called exarch, introduced a new name for sovereignty into Italy. [Exarch was a title conferred on certain chief officers or governors such as the exarchs of Ravenna. Under the rule of Narses and his successors (who were exarches), Ravenna was the seat of Byzantine dominion in Italy]. He resided at Ravenna, exercising a protectorate Italy and those cities and provinces of Emperor Justin which adhered to Rome and Ravenna. From the first he held that no governor should be supreme but that every city, march or commune should be protected and governed by its own supreme officer called a duke. Thus he put Rome on the same footing as all other Italian cities, but honoring it alone with a governor whose successors, however, were called dukes. And so for many years afterwards Rome was in name a duchy. This form of government prevailed in Rome for one hundred and twenty-four years.

Leander, bishop of Toledo (Toletun) in Spain (Hispalensis), was a pious and highly learned man. By his preaching, teaching, example and intelligence, the entire Visigothic nation, through Recaredus its king, was converted from the Arian heresy. For he wrote much, not only to confirm our true Christian faith, but also to the destruction, scorn, and extirpation of the Arian errors which those whom the Vandals driven out by Belisarius introduced from Africa into Spain. During his lifetime and at its close this holy man performed many miracles; because of this he is reckoned with the saints. His day is commemorated on the 27th of February. [Leander, apostle of the Visigoths, at an early age entered a monastery at Seville, eventually becoming archbishop. Leovigild, his brother-in-law, then reigned over the Visigothic kingdom in Spain, openly professing Arianism. This caused embarrassment to Leander, who used every effort to confirm the Catholics in the orthodox faith. On an embassy to Constantinople he became a friend of Gregory the Great, at whose instance Gregory wrote his famous . Their mission concluded, Gregory returned to Italy, Leander to Spain where Leander succeeded in converting his nephew Hermenigild, eldest son of King Leovigild. The king, enraged, executed his son and began a furious persecution of the church, its officers and members. In a year the persecution abated, and Leovigild, finding himself about to die, recalled the bishop and commended his son Recared to the care of Leander. Leander died in 596].

John (Iohannes) the Almsgiver (Elimona) and Alexandrine bishop, at this time kept the Eastern Churches in the faith as much as possible, by his reading, disputation, writing, admonitions, and teachings, although he had many adversaries. He also worked great miracles, gave many alms, and did other good works. This man's praiseworthy and miraculous life is beautifully described by Leontius (Leontius), bishop of Naples, of the island of Cyprus. [John the Almsgiver was a very wealthy native of Amathus in Cyprus, and a widower. Having buried all his children he employed his whole fortune in the relief of the poor. He later became the patriarch of Alexandria. When the Persians devastated the Holy Land and sacked Jerusalem, he entertained all who fled into Egypt, and cared for the wounded. He also sent to Jerusalem, for the use of the poor, a large sum of money, and a thousand sacks of corn, as many of puce, one thousand barrels of wine, and one thousand Egyptian workmen to assist in the rebuilding of the churches. Anticipating death, he sailed to his native island of Cyprus; and there he died in the home of his boyhood after having ruled the patriarchal see of Alexandria for ten years].

In these rebellious and violent times, the very name of Italy would have been endangered had it not been for the holy man Paul (Paulus), patriarch of Aquileia, and if Felix, the bishop of Tervis, had not come to the rescue of Italy. For Paul, together with his clergy, fled from Aquileia to Venice. And so Felix saved the possessions of the churches, finding peace and security with King Alboin.

Fortunatus, bishop of Tudertinus [Tuder or Tudertinus, now Todi, a city in Umbria, near Perugia], possessed the great gift and the power of expelling evil spirits, and in his time drove the devil out of hordes of people. By the sign of the cross he calmed down a shy and dangerous horse; and he made a blind man see. Even today, it is said that in the city of Tudertinus his corpse expels the devil daily, and cures the sick as he did in his lifetime. [Fortunatus (d. 537), Bishop of Todi, was reputed to have performed many miracles. He tamed a wild horse by the sign of the cross. When the Goths carried off two little boys of the town, he begged their chief to restore them; but he refused. Next day the chief was riding throughout the town, and his horse slipped, throwing the rider, and breaking his left leg. Regarding this as a punishment, he promised to restore the boys. Fortunatus prepared holy water and his deacon spray it on the leg of the Goth. And the man arose; and although he found his leg a little stiff, the bones were intact].

Another Fortunatus, highly learned and eloquent, by writing and example encouraged the Gauls to emulate him in his devotion to God. For their king Sigebert (Sigibertum) he wrote a book on how to govern his kingdom. He also wrote the life of the Blessed Martin. [Fortunatus (530-609), Bishop of Poitiers, chief Latin poet of his time, studied at Milan and Ravenna in order to excel in rhetoric and poetry. He then journeyed to France, where he was received with favor by Sigebert, king of Austrasia. After a year or two he traveled through various parts of France, visiting persons of distinction, and composing verses. At Poitiers he visited Queen Radegunda, who induced him to prolong his stay indefinitely. He also enjoyed the friendship of Gregory of Tours. In 599 he was elected bishop of Poitiers. His later works include hymns, epitaphs, and verses in honor of Radegunda and her sister Agnes. He also wrote a long poem in honor of Saint Martin].

Germain (Germanus), bishop of Paris, a very holy man, according to some, lived at this time. He kept the kings of France in office in this way: They vied with one another in devotional exercises and goodness; what good works they saw this bishop perform, they performed also. Thus great things are accomplished by the examples of good shepherds. [Germain, Bishop of Paris, was educated in an abbey at Autun. His fame reached the ears of King Chilbert, and he was ordered to Paris, becoming abbot of the monastery of St. Vincent, later called St. Germain-des-Pres. Four years later he became bishop of Paris, and at his request Chilbert built a church. Germain showed great courage in opposing the violence and dissolute manners of the king and his nobles. He even excommunicated King Charibert, who had put aside his legitimate wife to marry another woman. Germain died in 576].

Samson (Sampson), bishop of Dol, was illustrious for his piety. During his ordination, a dove descended from heaven and rested on his head until he was consecrated. [Samson, Bishop of Dol, was born in Glamorganshire, in Britain, and as early as the fifteenth year of his age began the practice of fasting. He was educated in the Old and New Testament, and in geometry, rhetoric, grammar and arithmetic. On the day of his ordination as a deacon, a bird is said to have descended from the heavens and to have perched on his head until the ceremony was completed. He settled at Dol and erected a monastery there. He is said to have assisted at the council of Paris in 555 or 557].

Amandus, bishop of Maastricht (Traiectensis), in Vasconia, in the time when the inhabitants were still very savage, brought the people to a better life by his piety and learning.

Amandus (c. 684), the apostle of Flanders, was a native of Herbauges, near Nantes. Although born of wealthy parents, he retired in his youth to the Isle of Oye, near LaRochele, where he embraced a religious life in a monastery. To escape the importunities of his father, who looked to his worldly advantage, he fled the island and visited the tomb of St. Martin at Tours. There he received the clerical tonsure. He distinguished himself among the clergy of Tours, although he lived in a small cell near the cathedral in preparation for his future apostleship.

When Amandus entered on his apostolic career, he maintained his dignity and his virtues, and was loved by the rich and poor. For his mission he chose Belgic Gaul, especially the territory of Ghent, where idolatry still prevailed. Although the people had rejected former missionaries, he succeeded in converting them. He is credited with having restored to life a man whom he snatched from the gallows. After reaping an abundant harvest in Flanders, he resolved to preach to the pagan tribes in Germany. He tried to convert the Slavonic peoples, but failed. He returned to Gaul during the reign of King Dagobert. The king had a son, Sigebert, who loved Amandus as a father, and influenced him to accept the bishopric of Maastricht (the Traiectus Superior of the Romans). From this point on he exchanged his missionary work over scattered districts for the supervision of a single diocese. But the work was not to his liking. He preferred the missionary career. With the permission of the pope he shook off the burdens of his diocese and visited Gascony to preach to the Basques; but he met with no success. He therefore returned to Flanders, where he supervised the many monasteries he had founded. His death is variously placed between 661 and 684.

Gregory (Gregorius), archbishop of Tours, was consecrated in the eighth year of the emperor, Justin. He was renowned in all things, and held the office of archbishop for fifteen years. When Gregory the Great became pope, being a well educated man, he wrote a history of the kings of the Franks, and other matters.

Gregory of Tours (538-594), historian of the Franks, belonged to an illustrious senatorial family, many of whose members held high office in the church and bore honored names in the history of Christianity. He lost his father early, and was taken to Clermont-Ferrand to be brought up by his uncle Gallus and by his successor Avitus, and there he received his education. Although he studied the classics, religion occupied most of his time. However, the subtleties of the theology did not interest him. At 25 he was ordained deacon. Falling seriously ill, he went to Tours to see a cure at the tomb of St. Martin; and there he lived with Euphronius. So great was the young man's popularity that on the death of Euphronius in 573, the people unanimously designated him bishop. At that time Tours belonged to Austrasia, and King Sigebert hastened to confirm Gregory's election. After the assassination of Sigebert (575), the province was ruled by Chilperic for nine years, during which period Gregory displayed great energy in protecting his town and church from the Frankish king. Despite all the king's threats, he refused to give up Chilperic's son Meroving, who had sought refuge from his father's wrath at the sanctuary of St. Martin; and defended bishop Pretextatus against Chilperic, by whom he had been condemned for celebrating the marriage of Meramec and Brunhild. On the death of Chilperic, Tours remained for two years in the hands of Guntram, but when Guntram adopted his nephew Childobert, Sigebert's son, it again became Austrasia. This change was welcome to Gregory, who often visited the court. We also hear of Gregory at Coblenz, Metz, and at Chalon-sur-Saone, whether he was sent to obtain from Guntram the ratification of the pact of Andelot. In 593 he was at Orleans, where Childobert had just succeeded his uncle Guntram. In the intervals of these journeys he governed Tours with great firmness, repressing disorders, and reducing the monks and nuns to obedience. He died November 17, 594. His History of the Franks is in 10 volumes. The first four cover the period from the Creation to the death of Sigebert, 575. The fifth and sixth books, dealing with matters within his own experiences, bring the record down to the death of Chilperic (584). Books seven to ten are in the form of a diary, recording each important event as it occurred. The last six books are of great historical value. Gregory also wrote seven books of miracles; twenty biographies of bishops, abbots and hermits; also a liturgical manual, as well as a life of St. Andrew from the Greek, and a history of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, from the Syriac.

Gregory was at great pains to be impartial, but did not always succeed. As an orthodox Christian he had nothing good to say for the Arians. He excuses the crimes of kings who protected the church, such as Clovis, but he had no mercy on those who violated ecclesiastical privileges. But at least he concealed nothing, and he invented nothing. We can correct his judgments by his own narrative.

Radegunda (Radegundis), a queen of the Franks, and a native of Thuringia, was stolen and carried away when her fatherland was conquered, and was safely reared by King Lotharius. Although later married to a temporal prince, she was not separated from the heavenly king; for afterwards, through Medardus, she was consecrated to the Lord to a monastic life. With God's cooperation she built a monastery for the people of Poitiers pursuant to the wish of Lotharius the king. And there she lived with many nuns, in great moderation and performed many wonderful works. She concluded her praiseworthy and blessed life on the 1st day of August. [Radegunda, a queen of the Franks, was the daughter of Berthaire, king of the Thuringians. Berthaire was slain by his brother Hermannfried, who took Radegunda and educated her, but was himself slain by the Frankish kings Theuderich and Clotaire in 529, and Radegunda fell to Clotaire, who later married her. She left him when he unjustly killed her brother, and fled to Medardus, bishop of Poitiers, founded a monastery there, and lived for awhile in peace. She died August 13, 587].

Gregory (Gregorius) the Great (on account of his piety and the sublimity of his surpassing moral wisdom), excelled all other learned men. He was born of noble senatorial Roman ancestry. He had as his father Gordian and as his mother Sylvia, very noble Romans. Although, in his youth, he attained to the highest point of natural philosophy and wisdom, and was possessed of great riches, he left all for a spiritual life; and this, though hampered by various temporal affairs requiring his attention. After the death of his father he built six monasteries in Sicily, and a seventh at Rome, in honor of Saint Andrew, in which he lived in humble apparel, scorning more costly clothes. He punished his body with such self-denial that he was barely able to survive with his shrunken stomach. He was held in great veneration for his holiness and piety. He wrote many excellent works at Rome and Constantinople for the benefit of the Christian life. [See note on Gregory the Great, Folio CXLVIII verso, below].

Gregory the Great is represented in pontifical vestments, seated on his throne, and wearing the papal tiara. In his hands he holds an open book, no doubt symbolic of his homilies and other famous works attributed to him. Before him, on a table, struts what would appear to be a rather militant bird, its wings outspread. No doubt this is intended to represent a dove just descended from heaven, and which is the particular attribute of Gregory.

Year of the World 5793 | Year of Christ 594

Gregory (Gregorius) the Great, the first pope of this name, a Roman, was unanimously chosen pope by the people against his own will. And as this election was to take place with the consent of the emperor, Gregory sent a messenger to the emperor Maurice (Maurice) with letters asking him not to confirm such choice by the clergy and the people. But the letters were withheld through the governor of the city of Rome, and were torn up; and other letters were written, asking the emperor to confirm Gregory as pope. This the emperor was glad to do, for Gregory had baptized a son of Maurice at Constantinople. And Maurice sent a message to Gregory, confirming him and ordering him to enter upon the papacy. After this Gregory assumed the burden of the pontificate and the rule of the Christian welfare; and he did nothing to further his own interests, but devoted himself to the common welfare and the honor of God. After scorning and laying aside all worldly riches, pleasure, honor, and power, he so lived that, up to our own time, none of his successors have excelled him in holiness of life, industry in the management of affairs, nor in learning and writing. This highly learned man was so humble that among the popes he was the first to describe himself as the servant of the servants of God. And he made many ordinances for the improvement and maintenance of divine service and of Christian life. Finally he died in the 13th year, 6th month and 10th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter with everyone lamenting him on the 12th of the month of March. The Roman chair then rested five months and nineteen days. [Gregory (Gregorius), the fourth Doctor or Father of the Latin Church, better known as Gregory the Great, was one of the most influential of all medieval popes. He was born at Rome in the year 540, the son of Gordian, a wealthy patrician of senatorial rank. Gregory commended his career in life as a lawyer, and for twelve years exercised the office of praetor or chief magistrate of his native city. Yet, while apparently engrossed by secular affairs, he became deeply imbued with the religious enthusiasm, characteristic of his time and hereditary in his family. Immediately on the death of his father he devoted his paternal inheritance to pious and charitable uses, and converted his paternal home into a monastery and hospital for the poor, which he dedicated to St. Andrew. He also founded six monasteries in Sicily. Then retiring to a little cell at the monastery of St. Andrew, he took the habit of the Benedictine Order, giving himself up to study. During the terrific plague that almost depopulated Rome, he fearlessly undertook the care of the poor and sick. Pope Pelagius having died at this time, the people with one voice called upon Gregory to succeed him; but he shrank from the high office, and entreated emperor Maurice not to ratify the choice of the people; but the emperor confirmed the election, and Gregory fled from Rome and hid in a cave. He was discovered and brought back. No sooner had he assumed the tiara, even though against his will, that he showed himself worthy of his elevation. While he asserted the dignity of his station, he was distinguished by his personal humility, and the first pope to take the title of 'Servant of the Servants of God.' He abolished slavery throughout Christendom on religious grounds. Though enthusiastic in making converts, he set himself against persecution. He was the first to send missionaries to preach the gospel in England. He instituted the celibacy of the clergy; reformed the services of the church; defined the model of the Roman liturgy, such as it has ever since remained – the offices of the priests, the variety and change of the sacerdotal garments. He arranged the music of the chants, and he himself trained the choristers. His charity was boundless, his vigilance indefatigable. He surrounded himself with clerics and monks with whom he lived as though he were still in a monastery, and in spite of constant ill health, he ministered unceasingly to the physical and spiritual needs of the people. During his pontificate the papal estates increased in value, while the grievances of the tenants were redressed, and their general position materially improved. Gregory's fault was that as a man of business he was too lavish of his revenues. He disciplined the clergy, depriving those of office who had lapsed into scandalous offenses. He divided the revenues of the church into equal parts, to be assigned to the bishop, the clergy, the poor, and the repair of the churches. He worked for the centralization of the power of the church, with supreme authority in the Roman see. The decrees of the councils were to have no binding effect without the authority and consent of the pontiff, and appeals might be taken to Rome against the decisions even of the patriarch of Constantinople. In Italy, Gregory occupied an almost regal position, stepping into the place that the emperor had left vacant, and the Lombard kings had not the strength to seize. For the first time in history the pope appears as a temporal prince, appointing governors to cities, issuing orders to generals, providing munitions of war, sending ambassadors, and concluding a peace. He made strong efforts to uproot paganism in Gaul, Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, and Corsica; Arianism in Spain; Donatism in Africa; Manicheism in Sicily, the heresy of the Three Chapters in Istria and Northern Italy. Gregory died on March 12, 603, in the 14th year of his pontificate, the last of the Latin Fathers].

Pope Sabinianus, whose place of nativity is unknown and deservedly so, was the successor to Gregory; but he was very unlike him, and very much opposed to him; for when, during his pontificate a famine occurred, and the people expected alms at his hands, as they had from Gregory, he said only this: that Gregory in order to obtain worldly renown, had dissipated the wealth of the churches; and it so happened that his books were well nigh burned. And thus the envy and wrath of this evil man were kindled against Gregory. Yet he ordained that, aside from the offices, the lamps should be kept lighted in the churches during the day, particularly at the Church of the Blessed Peter. He died after having sat in the pontifical office one year, five months, and 9 days. The chair was vacant by his death for 11 months and twenty-six days. [Sabinianus, pope from 604 to 606; successor to Gregory the Great].

Pope Boniface (Bonifacius) the Third, a Roman, came to this worthy office through the emperor Phocas, although not without opposition, on the ground that the chair of Saint Peter the Apostle, which is the head of all churches, should be so called and held by all mankind. For the Constantinopolitan church commenced to give itself up to the formerly evil emperors there, to secure their favor. But the Roman chair is very justly reserved for others, through whom, by reason of the universality and perseverance of the papal see, all heresies are removed and extinguished. After the holding of a council, he ordained many measures. However, all this was set aside by his death in the 9th month of his pontificate. The chair then was vacant one month and six days. [Boniface III, pope from February 15th to November 12th, 606, obtained from the emperor Phocas recognition as the “headship of the Church of Rome,” which signifies, no doubt, that Phocas compelled the patriarch of Constantinople to abandon, momentarily, his claim to the title of ecumenical patriarch].

Pope Boniface (Bonifacius) the Fourth, of Marseilles, secured from the emperor Phocas the church of Saint Mary, the Rotunda, which the people of old called the Pantheon. And he consecrated it in honor of the holy Virgin Mary and all the martyrs. Before this, however, he cast out all the images of the pagan gods, and illuminated the temple. He made a monastery of his paternal home, and gave his landed possessions to the monastery for the use of the monks. He also gave the monks authority to preach and to hear confessions. Not long after this he died in the sixth year, eighth month, and 13th day of his pontificate; and upon his death a famine and flood occurred. He was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The chair then was vacant 7 months and twenty-five days. [Boniface IV was pope from 608 to 615. He received permission from the emperor Phocas to convert the Pantheon at Rome into a Christian church].

Folio CXLIX recto

Maurice (Mauricius) was a son-in-law of the emperor Tiberius, and the first of imperial lineage to be elevated to the office of emperor; and although he was a Cappadocian, he was called upon to assume the sovereignty because of his virtue and firmness in the dispatch of matters of State. The Lombards, for a period of twenty years after the death of their king Alboin, had been governed by dukes; and now they set up a king for themselves; and him they called Flavius, as all preceding Lombard kings had called themselves. Maurice undertook to drive the Lombards out of Italy, and asked Sigebert, king of the Franks, to make war. Sigebert quickly collected a great army out of Gaul and Germany. He fought a great battle with the Lombard king, but was defeated. This victory so encouraged the Lombards that they marched forward to the Sicilian Sea, bringing the Italian states under their power. They besieged Rome for a long time, but could not take it. Now while the Lombards rejoiced in the good fortune of victory, and fell into all manner of vices, Maurice made a law that no Roman not incapacitated or weakened by wounds before the expiration of his service should enter upon the knighthood of the Lord. But Gregory admonished him not to extend his hand into spiritual things, nor attack the clergy. Nevertheless Maurice promoted John, the Constantinopolitan bishop, to an ecumenical patriarch, and admonished Gregory to submit to this. But Gregory answered that the power to bind and loose had been given to Peter and his successors, and not to the Constantinopolitan bishop. Still not satisfied, Maurice moved the Lombards to attack the Romans; and they besieged Rome for a whole year; but not venturing to take the city, they returned to Milan. Maurice rued his treatment of Gregory and accorded him kindly honor. Yet Maurice was a useful man for the common good; for he often fought against the enemy and defeated them. Finally Phocas was elected emperor by the army, and Maurice was slain in the twenty-first year of his reign. [Maurice (Mauricius Flavius Tiberius), Eastern Roman emperor from 582 to 602, was of Roman descent, though a native of Arabissus in Cappadocia. He joined the army and fought with distinction in the Persian War (578-581). At the age of 43 he was declared Caesar by the dying emperor Tiberius II, who bestowed upon him his daughter Constantina. Maurice brought the Persian war to a successful close by the restoration of Chosroes II to the throne (591). On the northern frontier he bought off the Avars, but after 595 inflicted several defeats upon them through his general Crispus. But his strict discipline provoked mutiny in the army on the Danube. The revolt spread to the popular factions in Constantinople and Maurice consented to abdicate. He withdrew to Chalcedon, but was put to death by his successor, Phocas, after witnessing the slaughter of his five sons].

Phocas took over the sovereignty of the Roman Empire after the death of Maurice and his sons Theodosius, Tiberius, Constantinus, and Advocatus; and he reigned eight years. He was made emperor when he arrived at Constantinople; and although he induced the people to have great faith in him, many were deceived by the result of his dealings; for during his time the Persians under Chosroes (Cosdra) overran the Roman provinces and defeated the army of this emperor. They harassed Jerusalem, and dishonored and destroyed the churches, taking the holy cross from there. They took away as prisoner Zacharias, the holy man, and patriarch of the same city. For this reason Phocas was scorned by all, and particularly by the Roman senate, and was deprived of his sovereignty and of his life by Heraclius, the general of the army and governor of the African provinces. And Heraclius took into the sovereignty with him his son. [Phocas, Eastern Roman Emperor (602-610) was a Cappadocian of humble origin. He was only a centurion when chosen by the army of the Danube to lead it against Constantinople. A revolt within the city soon resulted in the abdication of the reigning emperor Maurice, and the elevation of Phocas to the throne. Phocas proved entirely incapable of governing the empire. He consented to pay an increased tribute to the Avars and allowed the Persians to overrun the Asiatic provinces and to penetrate to the Bosphorus. When the African governor Heraclius declared war against him, Phocas was deposed with scarcely a struggle in 610. He died in the same year on the scaffold].

At Saint Peter's, in Rome, Pope Gregory (Gregorius), that most holy man, held a council of twenty-four bishops; and in that council many points of our faith were duly considered. The proceedings of the four preceding councils, held at Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon, were publicly confirmed, while the proceedings of the fifth one were recognized. Through the same council Gregory ordained that no man of two marriages should become a priest, and that a bishop should be consecrated but once. He also ordained that he would observe the last decisions in all matters; also that the inception of the mass was to be with a verse from the Psalter; that Kyrie Eleison should be sung or spoken nine times, and Alleluia. [Kyrie Eleison is Greek, and literally translates as, 'Lord, have mercy': a phrase used as a petition in many liturgies of the Eastern and Western churches as well as in the Anglican communion, together with the additional response 'Christ, have mercy'. The first movement of the mass in the Roman Catholic Church begins with these words set to music]. He also ordained and confirmed the great litany and the order of the churchly offices. [Gregory's work in connection with the liturgy and church music is a subject of dispute. If we are to credit a 9th-century biographer, Gregory abbreviated and simplified the Sacrament of Gelasius, producing a revised edition with which his own name has become associated, and which represents the ground work of the modern Roman Missal. But though it is certain that he introduced three changes in the liturgy (namely, the addition of some words in the prayer Hanc igitur, the recitation of the Pater Noster immediately before the fraction of the Host, and the chanting of the Alleluia after the Gradual besides a paschal time) and two others in the ceremonial (forbidding deacons to perform any musical portion of the service except the chanting of the gospel, and subdeacons to wear chasubles), no evidence warrants belief that the Gregorian Sacrementary is his work. A doubtful tradition ascribes to Gregory the compilation of an Antiphonary, the revision and rearrangement of the system of church music, and the foundation of the Roman Schola Cantorum].

Afterwards Pope Boniface III also held a council of 72 priests and 33 deacons; and it was ordained that, under pain of excommunication, no successor was to be elected within three days after the death of the pope or bishop. Those also were to be excommunicated, who through gift or favor sought papal or temporal office. He also ordained that all elections of bishops should be by the clergy and the people, and that such elections were to be given as much force as if sanctioned by the princes of the state. He also ordained that a priest about to say mass should always place a clean cloth, called the corporal, upon the altar.

Folio CXLIX verso

At this time a Jew stabbed the image on a crucifix, and blood flowed freely from it. It sprayed the Jew, and his footprints became bloody. Christians who saw them followed these bloody prints until they came to the bleeding image; and when they found it they stoned the Jew.

In the sixth year of Emperor Maurice so great a flood occurred that one might have believed it to be a second flood of Noah. The regions of Venetia, Liguria and other Italian provinces were so inundated that the streets and roads disappeared, and farms, meadows, villages and other human habitations were buried as in a sea. Many people and animals were drowned. At this time the river Athesis [The Athesis River is the Latin name for the river called in Italian Adige, which is found in the southern Tyrol and Upper Italy]. overflowed, and the waters reached the upper windows of the church of Zeno the martyr, located outside the walls of the city of Verona. This flood occurred on the 17th day of October. There also came hail, thunder and lightning, a condition that was almost incredible in the summer. At Rome the Tiber was enlarged to such proportions that the water flowed over the walls, and many areas within them were inundated. And a great dragon, together with many snakes, appeared in the regular watercourse, swimming down the Tiber through the city and into the sea. These disasters were soon followed by a plague which spared only a few of countless numbers. This plague first afflicted Pope Pelagius; and after his demise it spread among the people. Gregory was elected pope during this calamity; and he ordered a litany in seven parts. While one of these was being held eighty people died. He prescribed that seven choirs should participate in this procession: In the first were the clergy, in the second all the abbots and their monks, in the third all the abbesses and their congregations, in the fourth all the children, in the fifth all the laymen, in the sixth all the widows, and in the seventh all the matrons.

At this time the divine Gregory the Great sent Augustine, Miletus (Melitum) and John (Ioannem), and a number of other proved and worthy monks to England, and by these the English people were now for the first time fully instructed in our faith. And among these Englishmen these holy ones came to a blessed end.

At this time also the seamless garment of our Lord Jesus Christ, made by the Blessed Virgin Mary, and which had been given to one of the soldiers, was found in a marble ark in the city of Zaphat, [Probably Zephath, earlier name of a Canaanite town, mentioned in Judges 1:17, and which after its capture and destruction was called Hormah by the Israelites]. not far from Jerusalem, by Gregory, bishop of Antioch, Thoma, the bishop of Jerusalem, and John (Ioanne), the bishop of Constantinople. And after it was found they brought it to Jerusalem and laid it in an ivory ark, where it has been held in great veneration. It is said that when the city of Constantinople was lost, this coat passed into the control of the Turks.

Hermenigild (Hermigildus), king of the Visigoths, son of the king of Spain and the Visigoths, was at this time thrown into prison by his father Leovigild (Lemugildus), and afterwards heinously murdered because he had been converted from the Arian heresy to the true Christian faith by the learning and preaching of the Spanish bishop Leander. After Leander had converted this Hermenigild, the latter's father persecuted Leander in many ways; and he killed Hermenigild, his own son. Angelic music was heard beside the corpse, and burning lamps were seen. After this the father became ill; and he recalled Leander in order to acknowledge his injustice and to seek forgiveness on account of his sin. And he made Richard (Ricardum), his second son, a king, urging him to become a true and righteous Christian. [Hermenigild, here called Hermigildis, was the son of Leovigild, here called Lemugildus, king of the Visigoths in Spain, and of Theodosia, or Theodota, the sister of Leander and Isidore, archbishop of Seville. Educated an Arian in 579, he married Ingunda, daughter of Sigebert, king of Austrasia; and this princess, aided by Leander, succeeded in converting the prince to the Catholic faith. Leovigild had given his son a portion of his states to govern, of which Seville was the capital; but when the son renounced Arianism his father threatened to despoil him. But the son refused to submit and found himself surrounded in Seville by his father's forces. He fled to Cordova and then shut himself up in Osseto, where the father pursued him. The father sent his other son Recared to promise life if he would submit; and he submitted, but his father sent him in chains to the castle of Seville. When Easter approached, Leovigild sent an Arian bishop to promise pardon if his son would receive Holy Communion from the prelate's hands. But again Hermenigild refused, and in a rage his father sent soldiers to kill him].

Authari (Artharis) Flavius, king of the Lombards. After the Lombards had been without a king for ten years, they elected him king; and he reigned for seven years. He was the son of King Daphonus [Actually, Authari was the son of Cleph, who ruled from 572/3-574/5 and was assassinated after an 18-month reign by a young guard. His death was followed by a ten-year interregnum known as the "Rule of the Dukes". His son, Authari, eventually took the throne in 585], whom the Lombards surnamed Flavius. And although elevated to the throne as a youth, he earned great praise through many deeds and transactions; and so much so that all the Lombard dukes entrusted to him one half of their wealth. He built Phara, a very noble city, on the river Abdue. He besieged the city of Brixellus [Brixellum or Brixillum (Brescello), a town of Cisalpine Gaul, is situated on the south bank of the Po (Padus in Latin) about 12 miles northeast of Parma], situated on the shores of the river Po (Padi), captured it, and razed it to the ground. He enhanced his victory by subjugating everything to the Sicilian Sea, and brought many Italian cities under his control. He also defeated the king of the Franks, together with a large number of his own troops and of Germans, and drove them out of Italy. Afterwards he drove Francilionus, the Roman duke, out of the Comanian Island, and carried away from there great treasures. He married Theodolinda (Theudelindam) daughter of Garibald, the king of the Bavarias, a most Christian woman. Chilperic, king of the Franks, was a bitter enemy of Authari. So he overran the kingdom of Garibald, Authari's father-in-law, and drove him out of Bavaria; and Garibald fled to his son-in-law. Authari died in the year he was married. [Authari: Alboin's reign in Italy was brief. He was assassinated in 572, but during this short reign the Lombards had established themselves in the north of Italy, from where in the next decade they frequently raided Frankish territory beyond the Alps. Chiefs were placed, or placed themselves, first in the border cities, like Friuli and Trent, and then in other places. The principal seat was the rich plain watered by the Po and its affluents, which was in the future to receive its name from them; but their power extended across the Apennines into Liguria and Tuscany and then southward to the outlying dukedoms of Spoleto and Benevento. Ticinum (Pavia), the one place that had obstinately resisted Alboin, became the seat of their kings. Alboin was succeeded by Cleph, a Lombard noble, who reigned only 18 months. For the next ten years (574-584) no one noble obtained recognition as king. In the latter year, when Frankish invasion threatened, the Lombards chose as king Authari, son of Cleph, to whom is chiefly due the consolidation of the Lombard power in Italy. Under him the independence of the dukes was reduced, and something was done toward their transformation into royal officers. The dukedoms of the northern marches, Trent and Friuli, with the dukedom of Turin, long retained the independence natural to a border government in early times. The great dukedom of Benevento in the south, with its neighbor Spoleto, threatened at one time to be a separate principality, and to the last resisted the full claims of the royal authority at Pavia. Authari secured the kingdom by celebrated battles and gave it internal order and strength. In 589, at Verona, he married Theodolinda, daughter of Garibald, duke of Bavaria, and brought her to Italy. But in 591, shortly after his marriage, he died].

Theodolinda (Theudelinda), the queen of the Lombards, was the daughter of the king of the Bavarians, and high-born and of illustrious blood. Although young at the beginning of her queenly career, and of distinguished appearance and endowed with great riches, she was noted for her chastity and devout practises. Moved by her virtue, the Blessed Gregory (as some say), wrote her a number of letters of moral import. She was a very brave woman and devoted to the Christian faith. Among other good deeds she built a cloister with her own funds in honor of Columban in the city of Bobium; and to it she gave many landed estates. She also built the Basilica of the Blessed John at Modicia (Modoecia) [Modicia (Monza in Italian), a city of Cisalpine Gaul, on the river Lambrus, about 12 miles north of Milan, the name of which is not found during the period of the Roman Empire; and it was probably in those days a mere village, or at least a dependency of Mediolanum; but the Gothic king Theodoric constructed a palace there, making it his summer residence. It continued as a favorite abode of the Lombard kings, and Queen Theolinda founded a Basilica there, which has ever since been one of the most celebrated churches in northern Italy, and still contains many interesting relics of the celebrated Lombard queen]. which lies ten thousand paces from Milan, and endowed it with many estates. From this point on the Lombards, following this woman's example, adopted John the Baptist as their patron saint.

Theodolinda, daughter of Garibald, duke of Bavaria, married Authari; but her husband died one year later. As queen of the Lombards she played an important part in their history as mediator between them and the Catholic church. Although in Italy for only one year when her husband died, Theolinda had so won over the Lombard chiefs that they begged her as queen to choose the one among them whom she would have for husband and king. She chose Agilulf, duke of Turin, a Thuringian noble by birth. Agilulf remained an Arian, and was a very uneasy neighbor, not only to the Greek exarch but to Rome itself. However, he was favorably disposed both to peace and to the Catholic Church. Arian and Catholic bishops went on for a time side by side; but the Lombard kings and clergy gradually yielded to the religious influences around them. Gregory the Great, opposed as he was to the new barbarian kingdom, recognized that the empire could not expel the Lombards from Italy, and endeavored to promote peace between the Italians and Agilulf. Under these conditions the pope and the king of the Lombards naturally became the two real powers in the north and center of Italy.

Theodolinda converted her husband and many of his subjects from the Arian to the Catholic faith, and was rewarded by Pope Gregory the Great with the famous Iron Crown of Lombardy, which was said to have been forged from one of the nails of the true cross, and which is still preserved in the cathedral of Milan.

Agilulf (Agilulphus), king of the Lombards, after king Authari (Artharim) reigned over the Lombards for 21 years. After the latter's death the Lombards could not agree on a king. They finally concluded that he whom Theodolinda (Theudelinda) should choose to marry should be accepted as king; for she was a woman of such great virtue and honor that her choice was highly regarded. She chose Agilulf. He was a duke of Turin, young, well built, and warlike. The first concerns of this new king were the redemption of prisoners whom Chilbert had taken, and to make peace with that king. Having secured peace, he determined to punish the dukes who had been antagonistic to his ancestor Authari. And he slew Minulfus, duke of Saint Julian's island. When Gandulfus, duke of Bergamum, learned of this he gave himself up, asked mercy and obtained it. So also with Ulfarus, duke of Tervis, who was taken prisoner, bound, and brought before the king. After which the king decided to kill his enemy. Having now achieved peace, he made war against the Romans, besieging Rome for a year. And although a truce was declared, Zotto, duke of Benevento, broke it by attacking the monastery of Cassino; and the abbot fled, taking with him the monks, their clothing, and the book of regulations. The monastery was plundered by the barbarians and razed to the ground. And this may have been the downfall of this most celebrated monastery which (as Gregory writes) was predicted by Benedict, the holy father, who said he should hardly wish to reach God unless some of the souls from his city had accompanied him. However, Benitus, fourth abbot after Benedict, reached Rome with his brethren. Not long after the commission of this crime Zotto (Zoto) died and Arrigus was made duke by the king. Later the Lombards moved their array before Padua, which had been without fortifications since the days of the tyrant Atilla, being protected only by a moat and embankments. The buildings within had been reconstructed of wood; so when the wind was favorable, the Lombards threw flaming torches and fiery darts into these wooden buildings; and they ravaged the city with fire. This Agilulf and his Lombards were finally converted at the request of a Christian king from idolatry to Christ. And he returned the property of the churches, and died. He left a son, Adaloald (Adoaldum), still a child, and its mother Theodolinda. [Agilulf, duke of Turin (592-615), was a Thuringian nobleman. Theolinda, queen of the Lombards, chose him for husband, and thus he became king of Lombardy. Though an Arian, he was favorably disposed to the Catholic Church].

Pope Deusdedit, a Roman whose father was Stephen the subdeacon, was a very good father who was very fond of the clergy and augmented their number. They say this man possessed such holiness that by a kiss he cured a leprous person instantly. He ordained that a godson should not marry the godchild of his godfather. In the time of this pope God permitted (as his name indicates) [Deusdedit, meaning 'surrender to God' or 'God has given']. many calamities to take place, such as earthquakes, and such rashes or sores developed as made persons susceptible to leprosy, and so deformed them that they could not be recognized. He died in the 3rd year and 23rd day of his pontificate and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the sixth day of the Ides of November. By his death the papal chair was then vacant for one month and 16 days. [Deusdedit, or Deodatus/Adeodatus (615-618), is said to have been the first pope to use leaden seals for pontifical documents. Soon after his elevation an epidemical leprosy afflicted the poor of Rome. It communicated itself without touch, and merely by the breath of the infected; but the pope continued to visit the sick. A pious legend adds that, "One day Deodatus, desirous of encouraging the clergy to imitate his example, kissed a leper on the forehead, and the sick man was immediately cured. During his pontificate the Persians conquered Jerusalem and all Palestine, immolated priests, monks and nuns by the thousands, burned all the churches, and seized upon an innumerable quantity of sacred vessels. The exact time when this pontificate began, as well as its duration, are uncertain, but it is believed that Deusdedit died in the year 617 or 618].

Sisebutus, a king of the Visigoths, reigned 36 years. At first he was a pagan, but later became a Christian. He brought back under his rule many Spanish provinces which had been subjugated by the Romans. Such Jews as he was able to seize in his kingdom, he forced by severe tortures to accept the Christian faith in accordance with the wishes of Heraclius. Heraclius had been warned to beware of the circumcised; yet he was afterward oppressed, not by the Jews, but by the Saracens, who also practiced circumcision. Now this king was such a powerful man that he took from the Romans all their Spanish possessions, and thus ended the Constantinopolitan imperial rule in Spain.

Pope Boniface (Bonifacius) the Fifth, of Campania, whose father was John (Joanne) began his pontificate at the time Eleutherius was dispatched to Rome by Heraclius, but made himself king of Italy. [See Eleutherius, Folio CLII recto (below), and note]. Boniface was a man of truly singular humanity, who showed good will and mercy to the people, neglecting nothing becoming a good shepherd. He ordained that those fleeing to the churches should not be removed from them; also that the Acolytes should not touch the blood of the martyrs; and that those who injured what was holy at any place should be burned. He died in the fifth year and 10th day of his pontificate, and was buried accompanied by all the people's tears in the Basilica of Peter. After his death the seat was vacant at that time for 13 days.

Boniface V, pope from 619 to 625, was originally from Naples, and was chosen to succeed Deusdedit, or Deodatus, also called Adeodatus, upon the latter's death. According to Bede, this pope wrote three letters to Justus, metropolitan of Canterbury, congratulating the prelate on the success of his apostolical labors and exhorting him to persevere in his missions; he grants him the power of ordaining bishops, and, as a recompense for his zeal, he sent him the pallium.

The pope wishing, as his predecessors had done, to employ religion in extending the temporal authority of the Holy See, published in all Christian states a bull, providing that malefactors, whatever might be their crimes, could not be removed from the churches where they had taken refuge or sanctuary. This decree Boniface issued in the year 620, three hundred years after the reign of Constantine. By reason of this papal bull some have proclaimed Boniface the founder of church sanctuary. But the privilege is as old as paganism, and Christian emperors conferred it on churches long before his day. Boniface's action was simply an official endorsement of what had gone before. The church did not set up a form of sanctuary all its own, nor did it have recourse to the laudable and rational system of cities of refuge established by the Hebrews; but it adopted it in the form known to the pagan Greeks and Romans—a form which made the church the haven of traitors, murderers, thieves and villains in general. By the laws of Justinian, in the beginning of the sixth century, murderers, adulterers, and rapists of virgins were excluded from the privilege. By the later canon law of Gratian and the papal decretals, protection was granted to all offenders except robbers, highwaymen, and those guilty of grave crimes in the church itself. All other offenders the church refused to surrender unless an oath was taken freeing them from death or mutilation.

During this pontificate appeared the famous book of John Moschus, called the Spiritual Meadow. This John was an Egyptian anchorite, who, after having been saved when his country was invaded by the Persians, had obtained the government of a convent at Rome. In his work he professes to have been an eyewitness to all the peculiar marvels he relates. Here we learn of a French monk who pushed the fanaticism of penance so far that he ate only barley bread, spread with ashes, twice a week, and slept only one night in four. Space does not permit us to multiply these fantastical tales.

Boniface died on the 25th of October, 625, after having occupied the see for 7 years and 6 months. He was interred in the cathedral of St. Peter at Rome.

Pope Honorius the First, also of Campania, whose father was Petronius, lived at the time when Theodolinda died. Not being troubled with extraneous affairs, he rejuvenated all the clergy with his learning and piety. He improved many churches at Rome, put a bronze roof on the Basilica of Peter, and erected many other churches at Rome. This very pious man died in the 12th year, 11th month and 17th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. After his death the chair then rested one year, seven months, and 18 days. [Honorius I, pope from 625 to 638, was of noble Roman family. He continued the work of Gregory the great, especially in England. Heraclius the emperor, aided him in his difficulties with the schism of the "three chapters" in Istria and Venetia, a schism that was ended by the deposition in 628 of the schismatic patriarch Fortunatus, and the elevation of a Roman subdeacon to the patriarchate. The support given him by Constantinople may have influenced Honorius, who joined the patriarchs of Constantinople and Alexandria in supporting the doctrine of "one will" in Christ, and expounding this view in two letters to the patriarch Sergius. For this he was anathematized by name along with the Monothelite heretics by the council of Constantinople in 681, a condemnation afterward confirmed by more than one pope. Honorius I was succeeded by Severinus].

Year of the World 5823 | Year of Christ 624

Pope Severinus the First, a Roman whose father was Labienus, was confirmed as pope in place of the deceased Honorius by Isacius (Ycatio), the supreme ruler of all Italy; for at that time the election of a pope by the clergy was considered ineffectual unless confirmed by the emperors or their highest state representative. He was a man of exceptional kindness and devout spiritual practices; a lover of the poor, encouraging and kind to the needy; honest and gracious toward all men; and illustrious in the rebuilding and improvement of the churches. He died in the first year and second month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the fourth day of the Nones of August. The chair then was vacant for four months and twenty-nine days. [Severinus, pope in 640, successor to Honorius I, occupied the papal chair only three months after his consecration, having had to wait a year and a half for its ratification by the emperor. During this long vacancy the exarch of Ravenna, supported by the military body of Rome, occupied the Lateran, and seized the treasure of the Church].

Pope John (Ioannes) the Fourth, from Dalmatia, whose father was Venancius, as soon as he became pope, showed himself man of wonderful goodness. With the funds left by Isacius (Ysacius) he redeemed, as far as possible, all prisoners. And as soon as he had assumed the cares of his office he ordained that anyone who unlawfully dared seize the property of the church should be compelled to restore it four-fold. During the time of this pope, Rhotaris, king of the Lombards, favored the Arian errors and permitted two bishops at one and the same time, and of equal authority, in all the cities of his realm—one a Catholic, the other an Arian. But John, full of good works, died in the first year, ninth month, and ninth day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the fourth day of the Ides of October. The chair then was vacant for one month and thirteen days. [John IV, pope, from 640 to 642, a Dalmatian by birth, succeeded Severinus after an interval of four months. He adhered to the repudiation of the Monothelite doctrine, but endeavored to explain away the connection of Honorius I with the heresy. He was succeeded by Theodorus II].

Heraclius was acknowledged as an augments of the empire. He was crowned by Sergius, the Constantinopolitan patriarch, and received the Eastern Empire. And immediately he sent to Italy the Constantinopolitan imperial chamberlain, Eleutherius, a well informed captain, experienced in military matters and practises; and he equipped him with men and money for the purpose of confirming these matters in Italy. And now he organized the men from the vicinity in Asia and Europe, and the men his father Heraclianus sent him from Africa (and continued to send him from day to day), and sent them against Chosroes (Cosdroem), the Persian king, for the protection of the Roman provinces. For after the said Chosroes had harassed Mesopotamia and Palestine, he marched against Jerusalem and captured it; and he destroyed the churches and holy places, although (as some historians state) he is said to have shown the holy cross some veneration; for he carried off that part of the cross which Helena, the mother of Constantine the Great, had deposited at the place where Christ was crucified. And he kept it at home in a throne which he caused to be made, ornamented with wonderful work in gold and precious stones. In the sixth year of his reign the Persians conquered all of southern Asia, then turning their arms to Egypt. They captured Alexandria, and tarried there until the cry was heard that Heraclianus, the emperor's father, had assembled a great army in Africa. But at this same time Heraclianus died. When the Persians heard this they captured Carthage. At the same time Heraclius assembled a large army, and brought back into his power many provinces that had been harassed by the Persians. In a singular battle he struck the captain of the Persians, knocking him from his horse as dead. And he crushed Chosroes, the Persian king; but his son, whom he captured, he caused to be baptized and restored to his father's kingdom. And he marched into Persia and plundered the castle of Chosroes, which was filled with treasures. Of those he gave one portion to his soldiers, setting aside the other for the rebuilding of the temple and the churches which Chosroes had destroyed. He came to Jerusalem with seven elephants loaded with the great riches he had taken from the enemy; and the cross of the Lord, which the Persians had carried away, he brought back and restored to its former place. Those who had been taken prisoner by the Persians he sent back home. Now it so happened in the twelfth year of the reign of Heraclius that he brought the cross of the Lord to Jerusalem with great pomp; and when he arrived at the gate, through which one passes to the place called Calvary, and the hosts preceding him had gone out, and he himself was about to pass through, he stood still before the gate, although no one restrained him. Then the patriarch, who tarried at his side, said to him: Jesus, the master of poverty and humility, did not carry the cross out of here as you are about to do, clad in purple and costly raiment. Then the emperor immediately humbled himself. And having donned humble apparel, walked barefooted through the gate, now open, where before it appeared to be closed. He carried the cross to the place called Calvary. This Heraclius indiscreetly prided himself upon his accomplishments and fell into various errors of heresy. He finally died of the dropsy in the 30th year of his reign.

Heraclius (c. 575-642), East Roman emperor, was born in Cappadocia. His father held high military command under the emperor Maurice, and as governor of Africa maintained his independence against the usurper Phocas. When invited to head a rebellion against the latter, he sent his son with a fleet which reached Constantinople unopposed, and precipitated the dethronement of Phocas. Proclaimed emperor in 610, Heraclius set himself to reorganize the utterly disordered administration. At first he found himself helpless before the Persian armies of Chosroes II, which conquered Syria and Egypt and since 616 had encamped opposite Constantinople. After some preparations he took the field against Persia, and finally beat the enemy in the open field. A revolution at the Persian court led to the dethronement of Chosroes in favor of his son Kavadh II; the new king promptly made peace with the emperor whose troops were already advancing upon the Persian capital. Having secured his eastern frontier, Heraclius returned to Constantinople with the true cross, which in 629 he brought back in person to Jerusalem.

The triumphs which Heraclius had won did not bring him lasting popularity. In his civil administration he followed his own ideas without deferring to the nobles or the church, and the opposition he encountered went far to paralyze his efforts at reform. Worn out by continuous fighting and weakened by dropsy, he failed to show sufficient energy against the new peril that menaced his eastern provinces toward the end of his reign. In 629 the newly Islamified Arabs made their first incursion into Syria, won a notable victory a number of years later, and then conquered all Syria, Palestine and Egypt. Heraclius made no attempt to engage the Arabs, but evacuated his possessions in sullen despair. The remaining years of his life he devoted to theological speculation and ecclesiastical reforms. His religious enthusiasm led him to oppress his Jewish subjects, while on the other hand he sought to reconcile the Christian sects. He died in 642.

They say that in these days fire fell from the heavens; and a huge rainbow appeared, and the people thought that the end of the world had come because of the frightful lightning and claps of thunder. This was followed by a great plague which, during the summer, consumed many people. A good and an evil angel were seen passing through the city. And the evil angel, at the direction of the good angel, knocked on the doors of the houses; and on the next day as many people died in each house, as knocks had been given on the door.

Various wonders and frightful things occurred in Greece at this time, presaging the misdeeds of Mohammed (Mahometi); for in a certain year a fiery comet was seen at Constantinople; and a child with four feet was born. And in the island of Delos were seen two sea-wonders in human form. And so many things of a like nature appeared in various regions and places.

Mohammed (Machometus), an Arab, or (as some would have it) a Persian, was born of a noble pagan father and an Ishmaelite woman of Hebrew parentage. And although he had his origin in two contrary sects or faiths, he was not fully attached to either, but according to his own notion and by his cunning intelligence, he drew upon the laws of both, blowing up a dangerous conflagration for all mankind. For among the Arabs (by whom he was held in great veneration), he openly said that Chosroes (Cosdroem), the king of Persia, together with all his relatives, was not wiped out without good reason, having caused himself to be worshipped above God, although he was a very evil person and himself worshipped idolatrous gods. However, in his disputations upon the Hebrew and Christian laws, he said that both laws were in unison, but that both people were misled through grave errors. These errors he summed up follows: He admonished the Hebrews because they denied that Christ was born of a virgin, although her parents had announced this beforehand. On the other hand he admonished the Christians for lightheartedness in holding that Jesus, though ignominiously born of a virgin, was God's favorite, and yet God wished him to suffer death on the cross at the hands of the Jews. But Mohammed proclaimed his own law, promising that if the Saracens would accept and keep it, and follow him as the divine messenger sent to reveal it, they would attain freedom as well as rule and sovereignty over their neighbors. With a mighty army of Arabs he harassed the provinces of the Roman Empire; but Heraclius soon silenced the revolt. Afterwards the Arabs and Saracens again took up arms; and in the six hundred and twenty-third year from the Nativity of Christ they defeated the generals of Heraclius, and of him who was at first a fortunate man, they made a most unfortunate one. Mohammed called himself the Great Prophet of God, and he deceived the people of Asia and Africa by black magic; and by the pronouncement of a new faith he so influenced them that they completely extirpated the name of the empire. This false faith now holds the upper hand more than before; for all Asia and Africa, and a large part of Europe, has been subordinated to Mohammedan princes. Now by land and sea they are attempting to drive us out of this small corner of Europe. And in order that this Mohammed (as is stated in his book of laws) might lead his followers still further away from the Christian faith, he emulated certain heretics, chiefly the Nestorians, in the interpretation and description of his own laws; and he gathered together many things against the Mosaic laws and the Gospels, and assembled these in one book. And to increase the grip of his laws, he ordained that a man might take four wives of his own race, as many concubines as he could support, and as many purchased wives as he wished. However, he ordered his followers not to drink wine; and those who obeyed his laws he promised the Garden of Eden. Those who scorned his laws he threatened with hell. He stated that Moses and John the Baptist were the great prophets of God; but that Christ was the greatest of all the prophets and born of divine power and cooperation, and not of the human seed of the Virgin Mary, etc. After he had reigned six years and had attained the age of 34 years, he died in the Year of the Lord 632, after having indulged himself in adultery, drunkenness and wantonness.

Mohammed (also Muhammad and Mahomet), great lawgiver of the Arabs, and founder of a religion that has prevailed over large portions of Asia and Africa for 14 centuries – was born at Mecca in 569. He belonged to one of the most illustrious families of Arabia (the powerful priestly tribe of Koreish, and of the particular branch of Hussein, to which belonged the guardianship of the Kaaba, a temple of Mecca, which contained the Black Stone, believed by the Arabs to have covered Abraham's tomb); and although powerful, his father was a poor merchant, and an idolater. His father died soon after Mohammed was born, and he was only six years of age when his mother passed away also. An uncle became guardian of the orphan.

For a time Mohammed gained a scanty livelihood by tending goats and sheep in the vicinity of Mecca. At 13 he accompanied his uncle on a caravan journey to Syria. At the fair of Bosrah he is said to have met the famous Nestorian monk, Felix, or Sergius, whom Christian writers accused of having afterward assisted the founder of Islam in the preparation of the Koran. At the age of 25 Mohammed entered the service of a rich widow, named Khadija, who, 15 years his senior, before long offered him her hand, for he had rendered good service. She was a faithful wife, bore him two sons (who died early) and four daughters. Their union of twenty-five years was a happy one, and as long as she lived Mohammed did not take another wife, although polygamy was sanctioned by the customs of his country. He became one of the chief citizens of Mecca. His character was marked by thoughtfulness and austerity, and he spent much time in solitary contemplation.

About the year Christianity had penetrated into the heart of Arabia; its northern parts were dotted over with Jewish colonies; and round about Medina were remnants of ancient sects, such as Sabians and Mandaeans. Men appeared who denounced the futility of the ancient pagan creed, and preached the unity of God; and in consequence, some turned to Judaism, some to Christianity. Under this influence Mohammed seems to have begun his religious reformation by endeavoring to fix his own belief and to free it from idolatry. Every year, for a month at a time, he retired to a cave near Mecca devoting himself to prayer, fasting and meditation. He recognized the existence of the divine as an eternal spirit, incapable of representation by an image. He began to have visions of angels, especially of Gabriel, commanding him to preach the true religion. These visions and revelations possessed him, and the Koran was the result. His whole knowledge of Christianity was confined to a few apocryphal books, and with all his deep reverence for Jesus, whom he calls the greatest prophet next to himself, his notions of the Christian religion were extremely vague. Yet he was sincere, and the people of his household and his close friends were his first converts. Progress was slow; by the fourth year of his mission he had made forty proselytes, chiefly slaves, and very humble people. He inveighed against the superstition of the Meccans, and exhorted them to a pious and moral life, and to the belief in an all-mighty, all-wise, all-just, but merciful God who had chosen him as he had chosen the prophets of the Bible before him, to teach mankind that they should escape the punishment of hell and inherit everlasting life. But he became an object of hatred to the Koreish, then the ruling class, and his life was in constant danger during the first twelve years of his public preaching. He did not profess to establish a new religion but simply to restore the only true and primitive faith, as it existed in the days of the patriarchs from Adam to Jesus. The fundamental doctrine he tried to restore was the Unity of God. With the Jews, who adhered to their ancient ceremonial, he maintained the authority of the Pentateuch and the inspiration of the Hebrew prophets. With the Christians he admitted the divinity of Christ's mission and the truth of the Gospel, making the revelations of the Old and New Testament the basis of his own preaching. But he also indulged the extreme prejudices of the Arabs, while lamenting the folly of their idolatrous worship. He spared their popular traditions and ceremonies, at least such as suited his views, and he made them more attractive by giving divine sanction to customs already hallowed by immemorial usage.

In 609, Mohammed, now forty, having more fully developed his plans, announced his mission, proclaiming the cardinal principle of his creed: 'There is no God but Allah, and Mohammed is His Prophet.' He encountered the prejudices of his countrymen, who were alarmed for their gods. He stood his ground, but did not encourage his followers to martyrdom. His mission was to preach the One True God. The duty of this new religion was Islam, or submission to the Divine will. Its worship consisted of prayer, fasting, and almsgiving. The Kaaba and the pilgrimage were recognized by the new creed. The Mohammedans, or followers of Mohammed, were called Moslems (and, in earlier periods, Mussulmans)—"true believers."

About this time Mohammed had a celebrated vision or dream in which he was carried by the angel Gabriel on a winged steed to Jerusalem, where he met all the prophets of God and was welcomed by them; after which he was carried to the seventh heaven into the presence of God. This vision was so vivid that Mohammed deemed it a reality. This and the Koran itself were the only oracles he ever claimed. His earliest Koranic dicta, written by amanuenses, consisted of brief, rhymed sentences, and for a time the Meccans regarded him as a common soothsayer, not in his right senses. Gradually they rose in fierce opposition. Many of the converted slaves and freedmen underwent terrible punishments, and some suffered so much that they abjured their creed. Mohammed fled from Mecca to Yatrib—more favorable ground. This flight occurred in the summer of 622, and is called the Hegira. It is the point from which the Mohammedans reckon time, as Christians do from the birth of Christ.

With the Hegira Mohammed's era truly begins. He entered Yatrib in triumph, welcomed by his followers and their families, about 100 in number, who had fled before him, as a sovereign, as well as an apostle and a prophet. He changed the name of the city to Medinet al Nubi, "The City of the Prophet," or Medina "the City," as it is still called. Here Mohammed's fortune rose and his converts increased; but his character may have changed; he was unable to bear prosperity as he had born adversity. He became a politician – the head of a party. He substituted force for truth, and claimed inspiration for every action. He built up Islam by the sword, declaring that the mission of every Moslem was to propagate the dominion of Islam by the sword, to destroy the temples of the infidels, to overthrow the idols, and to pursue the unbelievers to the remotest quarters of the globe. He shared the treasures of battle with his followers, but wealth did not corrupt the simplicity of his early life. He accepted all the essential truths of Judaism, and recognized Moses and Jesus as true teachers. He taught one Supreme Being who required prayer and alms alone. He now displayed the characteristics of a warrior and statesman, passing the last ten years of his life in raising and organizing an army of warriors, destined to conquer half the civilized world.

Mohammed, who had previously been kind and affectionate, now became capable of cruelties against those who resisted him. He hoped to form an alliance with the Jews, but he gradually departed from their customs; and since they would not follow him in this, he finally denounced them as obstinate unbelievers. He proclaimed a holy war against the Koreish, defeating them, and being in turn defeated. The Jews became the special objects of his enmity, and he slaughtered them in great numbers, selling their wives and children into slavery.

Mohammed now began multiplying wives beyond the legal limit, until the number reached ten, beside his slaves. His stormy and triumphant years were spent in warring upon the Syrians, the Koreish, and the Jewish tribes, and he rapidly became the most powerful prince in Arabia. Regarding himself as now firmly established, he wrote letters demanding the conversion of Chosroes II king of Persia; of Heraclius, Roman emperor in the east; the king of Abyssinia, the viceroy of Egypt, and the chiefs of several Arab provinces. From all parts flocked deputations to do him homage, either as God's messenger, or as the prince of Arabia. He received the keys to the city of Mecca in 629, and the opening of its gates was the final triumph of Islam. Soon after, he commenced his foreign wars. He fought personally in nine battles, and his generals led his followers in fifteen military expeditions. He subdued Arabia, although his expedition against the Roman empire came to naught. In 632 he undertook his last pilgrimage to Mecca, and there on Mount Arafat fixed for all time the ceremonies of the pilgrimage. Soon after he fell ill and died on June 8, 632, in the 11th year of the Hegira.

Isidore (Isydorus), the Spanish bishop, a disciple of Pope Gregory, was at this time in great esteem because of his great learning, virtue, and numerous miracles; and he wrote very many notable things of service to the Christian faith, and concerning other matters. [Isidore of Seville (Isidorus Hispalensis) (c. 570-636), Spanish encyclopedist and historian, was born of a noble family from Cartagena. Distinguishing himself in controversies with the Arians, in 609 he was chosen to succeed his brother Leander as archbishop of Seville. He played an important part in the councils of the church. His great work, however, was the preservation of the remnants of Greek and Roman culture against the barbarians. His chief work, ('20 Books of Origins or Etymologies'; better known as either the or), written between 622 and 633, condenses the fruit of his extensive reading in the seven liberal arts, the sciences, architecture, war, political theory, etc. It was much cited in the Middle Ages, and though not original, is interesting for the history of thought].

Goar, of Aquitania, in Gaul, was illustrious for his piety and miracles. He built a church in the suburbs of Trier, near the water, and in it deposited many relics of the saints. There, also, he served God day and night in watching, praying and preaching, converting many people to Christ, and curing the sick. He suffered many temptations at the hands of the Devil. He restored life and speech to a dumb dead child. He ignored efforts to make him bishop of Trier, and at the end of his old age, he died in blessedness. [Goar (c. 585-649) was born of aristocratic parents in Aquitania. He grew up loving God, and when he reached the canonical age, he was ordained priest. For some time he labored in his native land, but later became a hermit in a nook on the right bank of the Rhine in the bishopric of Treves. His piety attracted many pilgrims whom Goar received with hospitality, lodged and fed. The bishopric was offered to him several times but he declined it].

ILLUSTRATION

Mohammed is depicted in turban and flowing robes, seated on his throne in his palace. He is apparently engaged in the act of making a convert; for in his lap he holds a book, probably the Koran, and from which he is announcing some tenet or doctrine to an elderly, richly appareled individual, who kneels before him, his hands stretched out in an attitude of adoration or prayer. Immediately to the left of Mohammed stands another man who, with his right hand points to the kneeling figure and at the same time looks at Mohammed, as if introducing the suppliant, or accusing him of some breach of faith. In his left hand he holds a cap, apparently removed from the head of the suppliant. Behind the latter stands a turbaned military officer, apparently the Lord High Executioner, a short sword in his scabbard, a much larger one held up in his right hand, seemingly ready to execute judgment.

Gall (Gallus), a disciple of the Blessed Columban, lived in the West, and in his manner of life he earned for himself the name of saint. He flourished in Germany in the time of Emperor Heraclius. In recognition of his services the monastery of Saint Gall was built for him in the bishopric of Constance. In this monastery flourished many men of virtuous and miraculous lives. Although four hundred lived there in piety, one of their number, called Erubrinus, fled from there, having been enticed away by Brunigild, the queen of France. The Blessed Gall finally went to rest in the Lord, having attested his holiness by many miracles. [Gall (c.550-645), an Irish follower of St. Columban, in 614 fixed his cell at St. Gall in Switzerland, and around this there grew up a great Benedictine abbey]. Eustachius the abbot followed in his footsteps, and Saint Aurea followed him. In her honor the Blessed Eligius built a convent for women. [Aurea is mentioned as an abbess at Patis in the 7th century. It is said that when Dogobert I built a nunnery at Paris according to the advice of St. Eligius, Aurea was made abbess of the virgins placed in it. According to her Acts, she was a Syrian maiden who came to Paris, and there was constituted superior of three hundred virgins. She is credited with the most fantastic miracles; for instance; while at a country house belonging to the abbey, she heard that the girl who shared her cell was dead. Hastening back to Paris she found the dead girl, grasping the cellar keys so tightly in her hand that they could not be taken from her. Aurea recalled her to life, and after she surrendered the keys, Aurea dismissed her again to the realm of death. On another occasion the oven was red hot, but there was no bread to put in it. Aurea got into the oven and swept the red-hot ashes out with her sleeves. At that moment all the bells of the convent began to ring. The sisters rushed to church and sang "Te Deum." When the hymn was ended, the oven was found full of well-baked loaves]. At this time they also say that a certain Basilius, who shared equal honors with Isidore the bishop in life, virtue and skill, lived.

John (Ioannes), a monk, and later a bishop of Gerunda, [Gerunda, a small inland town of the Ausetani, in north eastern Hispania Tarraconensis, on the south side of the river Alba (Ter) on the high ground from Tarraco to Narbo Martius. It stood on a hill near Garona]. preserved the Christian faith by his preaching, teaching, and writings. He was a Goth and sought learning at Constantinople. He became so versed in the Greek and Latin tongue and script, that upon his return to Lusitania he easily put to scorn the Arian heresy which had then gained the upper hand; but on this account the heretics sent him into exile. However, after the death of King Leovigild (Lemungildis), who favored the heretics, he returned, built a cloister, and wrote many things favorable to the Christian faith.

Adaloald (Adoaldus), son of Agilulf by Theodolinda, reigned with his mother for ten years after the death of his father. At the age of four years his father had espoused him to the daughter of Theodobert, king of the Franks. They were on terms of peace with the Lombards and Italians for ten years, and in the meantime liberally endowed the churches. [Adaloald (602-626), was the son of Theodolinda and Agilulf. (See Authari, Theodolinda and Agilulf, Folio CL recto and notes). Upon becoming king at the age of fourteen, he reigned under his mother who acted as his regent. Adaloald, however, went insane in his early twenties and lost the support of the nobles. He was deposed in 626 by Arioald, a Lombard noble from Turin and husband of the king's sister Gundibergera, who was hostile to the Catholic Church. Adaloald died in Ravenna shortly afterwards under mysterious circumstances].

Eleutherius, ninth exarch of the Roman emperor in Italy, was a Greek of noble birth, well versed in military matters. The Emperor Heraclius sent him into Italy, but when he came to Ravenna he declared himself king of Italy. However, when he later went to Rome, he was slain by his own soldiers because of his haughty demeanor, and his head was sent to Constantinople.

Eleutherius, the eunuch, was exarch at Ravenna from 616 to 620. His predecessor John (Johannes) Lemigius Thrax ruled in Ravenna from 611 to 615, and in the latter year was assassinated there in the midst of a popular uprising. Eleutherius under these conditions was dispatched to Italy by the emperor Heraclius, and found the imperial state in Italy in utter confusion, and indeed on the verge of dissolution. To him it seemed obvious that the imperial cause was failing, and in 619 he actually assumed the diadem and proclaimed himself emperor in Ravenna. With an Army he set out along the Flaminian Way for Rome for the purpose of having himself crowned by Pope Boniface V. But the eunuch was before his time. At Luceoli upon the Flaminian Way, not far from Gualdo Tabino where Narses had broken Totila, his own soldiers slew him and sent his head to Heraclius.

The Exarchate of Ravenna is the official name of that part of Italy that remained in the allegiance of the Roman emperors at Constantinople from the closing years of the sixth to the middle of the eighth century. The civil and military head of these possessions was stationed at Ravenna. The term exarchate has been conferred at different periods on certain chief officers or governors, both in secular and ecclesiastical matters. The exarchate of Ravenna was probably the most powerful and most important officer of this type.

Eligius, bishop of Novia, [Novia, properly Novium, was a town of the Artabri in Hispania Tarraconensis, identified with Porto Mauro, by some, and by others with Noya]. was held in great veneration at this time for his many virtues. A countless number of miracles attest to his wonderful life. He was born in the country about the city of Lemona. His father was Eucherus; his mother, Terrigia. In his youth his father apprenticed him to a goldsmith. Having served his apprenticeship he went to France, taking service with the goldsmith of the king. Now the king wished a saddle ornamented in gold and silver. The master furnished Eligius with all the material, and out of this he made two very beautiful saddles; and in consequence his renown at court increased. He so loved the poor that what he did not require for his mere necessities he generally expended upon them. Later on he withdrew from the world, and with the assistance of the king built many monasteries. From the time of Brunigild to that of King Dagobert, the evil of simony flourished in Gaul, and Eligius industriously applied himself to uprooting it. For this he was appointed bishop there; and he exercised his authority in many other places. He discovered several holy bodies, and ornamented many saintly graves and coffins with gold and silver, and King Dagobert bore the expense. Eligius also restored sight to a blind man. He died at the age of 70, and a year after his burial he was found in a good state of preservation, his hair and beard appearing to have grown in the grave. [Eligius, bishop of Noyon, was born at Chatelat, near Limoges. At an early age he was placed in the service of a goldsmith named Abbo, master of the mint there. Eligius acquired great skill in working the precious metals, and in that enamel work which afterward made the place famous. He went to Paris and was placed with the treasurer of Clothair II. The king, impressed with his workmanship and honesty, advanced him to master of the mint. The affection born by Clothair toward Eligius passed to the king's son Dagobert, who also honored him with special confidences, sending him on various embassies. On his return Eligius occupied himself in hammering out gold and jewel-encrusted vessels for his master, and in striking coins for him. Dagobert granted Eligius the estate of Solignac in Limousin, on which he founded a monastery. The abbey when completed was filled with monks. Eligius continued his work in the precious metals, and made shrines for many relics. Finally he became bishop of Noyon. He proved as conscientious a bishop as he had been a layman, and converted many pagans, and unearthed the bones of many a saint, including those of St. Quentin. He died in 659 in the midst of his faithful servants and beloved by his flock. In art he is represented, though erroneously, as a farrier, with a horse's leg in his hand. The story goes that one day while shoeing a horse the animal became restive; so he took the leg off, shod it, and put it on again, without any harmful consequences to the animal].

Rupert (Rupertus), a bishop born from the royal line of the Franks, governed the bishopric of Worms in the time of Childebert (Hildeberti), king of France. After that sovereign's death Rupert was beaten with rods by Duke Berchgarius (Berchario), who destroyed the churches and forcibly drove Rupert from the Episcopal see. After this he was cheerfully received at Regensburg by Theodo, the duke of Bavaria, whom he baptized, together with many nobles and common people. Later on he traveled from Noricum to Pannonia, preaching and proclaiming Christ, the Light of the Faith. Finally he came to the river Ivarus, on which is located the city then called Juvavia (after the river), and now known as Salzburg. This city was a distinguished one among barbarian cities, but was then fallen into ruin, being overgrown with weeds, shrubbery and woods. And when Rupert saw that the place was well situated and adapted to a bishopric, he acquired it from the duke of Bavaria. And there he built a church in honor of Saint Peter, sending forth his disciples to convert the mountain people to the faith. Therefore he is called the Apostle of Bavaria, Austria, Steier, etc. After many works of piety he died in blessedness on Easter Day, having occupied the Episcopal chair for 44 years. [Rupert was a kinsman of the Merovingian House, and bishop of worms under Childebert III (695-711). At the invitation of the Duke of Bavaria, Theodo II, Rupert went to Regensburg (Ratisbona), where he began his apostolate. He founded the Church of St. Peter near the Wallersee, and subsequently, at Salzburg, the church of St. Peter; also a monastery and a dwelling for the clerks, as well as a convent for women. He died at Salzburg, and is regarded as the Apostle of the Bavarians].

1. Gall, the abbot (Gallus Abbas). He is in the garb of a monk, but has a crozier in his right hand, while his left fondly rests on the head of an animal, probably intended to represent a bear. Gall was born in Ireland, of noble parents, and was brought up in the monastery of Bangor. With two companions he went to a desert place near the river Stemaha, and while his companions slept, Gall spent the time in prayer. Presently a bear came from the mountain, and carefully gathered up the crumbs left at the evening meal of the three recluses. Gall said to the bear, "I beg of you, in the name of Christ, to put a few logs of wood on our fire." This the bear did, and Gall gave it a loaf of bread from his pouch. "Now go back to the mountain," said St. Gall, "and be sure to hurt neither man nor beast;" and the bear did as he was told.

2. Eligius (or Loy), bishop of Novium (Noyon); portrayed in Episcopal vestments, a chalice in his left hand; in his right a crozier, and a small hammer. Both chalice and hammer are probably symbolic of the bishop's original calling as a goldsmith.

Salzburg (Saltzburga), once upon a time called Juvavia and Petena, is a very old city of Noricum, and now a principal Episcopal city of Bavaria. It had its origin, as they say, in the time of the emperor Julius. It is not far from the mountains which at one time belonged to Noricum and which are now ascribed to Germany. The Norici, who lived in the mountains nearby (as Pliny writes), were formerly called Taurisci; and even now as then around the Carni within the first boundaries of Germany, the people are called Thauri. [Noricum, a Roman province, probably derived its name from the principal town of Noreia, and was bounded on the north by the Danube, on the west by Rhaetia and Vindelicia, on the east by Pannonia, and on the south by Pannonia and Italy. The province was separated from Rhaetia and Vindelicia by the river Aenus (Inn), from Pannonia on the west by Mount Cetius, and from Pannonia and Italy on the south by the river Savus, the Alpes Carnicae and Mount Odra. It thus corresponds to the greater part of Styria and Carinthia, and a part of Austria, Bavaria and Salzburg. Noricum was a mountainous country, not only surrounded on the south and east by mountains, but one of the main branches of the Alps, the Alpes Noricae (in the neighborhood of Salzburg) running right through the province. In these mountains a large quantity of excellent iron was found, and the Noric swords were celebrated in antiquity. Gold also is said to have been found here in ancient times. The inhabitants were Celts, divided into several tribes, of which the Taurisci, also called Norici, after their capital Noreia, were the most important. They were conquered by the Romans toward the end of the reign of Augustus, and their country was formed into a Roman province]. At one time the Saxons and the people of the Marches overran the country of the Wends; [A Slavic people dwelling in Saxony and Prussia]. and the Roman Gnaeus Papirius Carbo fought with them in the mountains not far from Noricum, and (as Strabo says) suffered defeat. [Noreia (now Neumarkt in Styria) was the ancient capital of the Taurisci or Norici. It was situated in the center of Noricum, just a little south of the river Murius. It is celebrated as the place where Papirius Carbo, Roman consul, was defeated by the Cimbri in the year 113 BCE]. But not long afterwards three mighty people, the Saxons, the Germans, and the people of the mountains bordering on Austria, all at one and the same time overran Italy and, as Plutarch says, one portion of them passed through Noricum; but the armies were defeated and destroyed—the first, not far from Salzburg near the mountains, and the second on the Athesis; [A river in southern Tyrol and Upper Italy]. and of the barbarian peoples (as Pliny states) three hundred forty thousand were slain, and one hundred fifty thousand were taken prisoner. This rebellion not only frightened all the countries which were invaded, but all Italy as well. And thus the Roman arms passed here and there through Noricum, accompanied by so much commotion that the Norici could hardly continue to live there; and at one time they were obliged to endure the presence of three armies in the vicinity. Now the Romans went to war with the people along the Danube, and also with the Pannonians, Wends and Germans; and they used Salzburg as a base for the ingress and egress of their arms. Now when Julius, the Roman emperor, was about to attack the Germans, he ordered a fortress to be built on a hill in the same region where the Roman army might take refuge, or from which they might secure help; and therefore the fortress was called Juvavium (which according to the vernacular tongue [The ‘vernacular tongue’ in this instance is German]. is called Helfenburg). The name was also derived from Ivarus, the river upon which the fortress was situated. And the city which was later built there was called Juvavia, after the fortress. This city has ponds, lakes, fields, hills, and mountains, in which the Salzburger and their neighbors may make their homes and have their pastures, and secure birds and game, as well as fish. It also has ample highways over which the Germans may transport their merchandise back and forth in their commerce with Italy and other countries. This city was well protected with walls, embankments, and high towers, and therefore was the seat of the kings. In the time of the pagans it possessed marble temples erected to their gods. Although the city continued to flourish for a long time, it was afterward attacked by Attila, king of the Huns, and suffered by fire and sword to such an extent that it was entirely devastated and ruined. In the Year of Salvation five hundred eighty, when Saint Rupert (Rudbertus) had converted Theodo, the duke of Bavaria, and the people of the vicinity to the Christian faith, he finally came to the river Juvarus, now called the Salzach (Saltzaha); and he found the ruins of the city overgrown with forest brush and shrubbery. He renewed and rebuilt the place as a city, which in time became the most celebrated city of Bavaria. And as Saint Rupert considered it well situated and adapted to a bishopric, he secured its possession and liberty from the duke of Bavaria; and he caused the timber, brush and weeds to be uprooted and cleared away, and a church to be built there in honor of Saint Peter. With funds furnished by the duke he also caused a monastery of the Order of Saint Benedict to be built there. And he ruled the bishopric 44 years, and the Blessed Vitalis was his successor. Afterwards Saint Virgilius, the bishop, built the chief Episcopal church there, and in it he placed the body of Saint Rupert. Later Gebhardus, the bishop, caused the defenses to be repaired; and the city was beautified in many respects. At present the city is surrounded with huge fortifications, and improved with beautiful structures—monasteries, churches and houses, and a fortress. In addition to all this the city is graced with many venerable relics of saints.

Salzburg, the capital of the province of the same name, in Austria, lies on both banks of the Salzach where this river leaves its narrow valley through the limestone Alps and enters the Alpine foreland. The site has been occupied since pre-Roman times, the original settlement being replaced by a Roman trading town, Juvavum. Juvavum, or Juvavia, was a town in the interior of Noricum, on the left bank of the river Ivarus. It is the modern city of Salzburg, situated in an extensive and fertile valley, on the slope of a range of a high mountain. It is chiefly known from inscriptions, one of which described the place as a colony planted by the emperor Hadrian; but its genuineness is disputed. Juvavium was the headquarters of the fifth cohort of the first legion, and the residence of the governor of the province. At an earlier period it seems to have been the residence of the native kings of Noricum. In the year 477 it was destroyed by the Heruli, but was restored as early as the seventh century and still contains many beautiful remains of antiquity. The apostle of the Salzburger country was Rupert, bishop of Worms, who settled in the ruins of the Roman Juvavum in 696, after which it was given to him as an Episcopal see by Theodo, the duke of Bavaria. The modern city grew up around the monastery and bishopric thus founded by Rupert, and its history from that time on is closely bound up with that of the see. The present name, due to the local abundance of salt, appears first in 816, by which time it had been raised to an archbishopric. Its archbishops gained in temporal power and dignity and were made imperial princes by Rudolf of Hapsburgs, in 1278.

Relations between the ecclesiastical rulers on the one hand, and the nobles and people on the other, were always difficult; for example, during the Peasants' War of 1525-26, quelled with the aid of the Swabian League, and contributing to a reaction against the church when Salzburg became a stronghold of resistance to the Reformation. Persecution was rife, and Protestant citizens were driven from the town. Nevertheless, the movement grew, and in 1731-32, aided by the intervention of Frederick William I of Prussia, 30,000 people sold their possessions and left the see, 6,000 of them leaving the capital. By the peace of Luneville (1802) the see was secularized and given to the archduke of Austria. Following the peace of Pressburg (1805) it fell to Austria, but four years later passed to Bavaria, returning to Austria in 1816, with the exception of a small portion on the left bank of the Salzach by the peace of Paris. In 1849 the province became a crown land, several of its districts being transferred to Tyrol, and remained so until 1918. Salzburg abounds in objects and buildings of interest. It has 8 convents and 25 churches, the majority of interest because of their antiquity, architecture and association. Of these, the 17th century cathedral, one of the largest and most perfect specimens of the Renaissance style in the Germanic countries, is on the model of St. Peter's at Rome.

CITY OF SALZBURG

The city of Salzburg is represented by a large woodcut extending over Folio CLII verso and CLIII recto. The city is located on either side of the river Salzach (anciently the Ivarus, or Juvarus). A boat, resembling a gondola, with several people in it, appears on the river in the foreground. The river is crossed by a long bridge, more formidable than the boardwalks shown in prior illustrations to serve such a purpose. On the elevation to the left is a fortress, to which a road leads from the city below. On the right elevation is another formidable structure, surrounded by crenellated battlements continuous with the city walls. This may be a monastery. In the city below are a number of churches. In the left foreground are several contiguous flat areas enclosed by board fences, probably the village commons or small farms. A forest is indicated in the right foreground, while in the distance we see barren hills and rugged mountains.

Year of the World 5833 | Year of Christ 634

Pope Theodore (Theodorus), a Greek whose father was Theodore, a bishop of Jerusalem, upon becoming pope carefully considered all things necessary to the advancement of spiritual Christian life; and he conducted himself toward the people, particularly the poor, with wonderful goodness. He ordained that the Easter wax tapers should be blessed on Easter eve. And he ordered that no one should be given a divorce who contracted a marriage after an invalid vow. This pope condemned to exile Pyrrhus (Pirrhum), the Constantinopolitan patriarch, and Sergius, and other heretics. He brought the bodies of Primus and Felicianus, the saintly martyrs, to Rome, and buried them in the Church of Stephen, the first martyr, and beautified their resting place. Afterwards he built a church and two chapels. He died in the sixth year, fifth month and 18th day of his pontificate and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the day before the Ides of May. The bishop's chair then was vacant fifty-two days. [Theodore I, the son of a bishop, was born in Jerusalem. He succeeded John IV as pope, holding the Roman see from 642 to 649. The monothelite question was still raging, and the Roman bishop took a lively interest in it. In a Roman synod he excommunicated Pyrrhus, the Monothelite patriarch of Constantinople, signing the document with an admixture of ink and consecrated wine. This action produced little or no effect in the East. Some additional strength was, however, imparted to the Roman see in his time by the decision of an African synod to the effect that all matters of religion be laid before the apostolic chair in order to derive from this source an agreement in true doctrine for all churches].

Pope Martin (Martinus) the First, a native of Tudertis whose father was Fabricius, was made pope after Theodore. He sent a messenger to Constantinople to admonish Paul to turn from his errors and to adhere to the truth; but as Paul ignored this papal admonition the pope deposed him from his office. This displeased the emperor Constans, who, in response, made Olympius (Olimpium), his chamberlain, an exarch of Italy, with instructions to seize Martin and send him to him. During this controversy the Saracens at Alexandria prepared for war; and they came to Rhodes with a mighty fleet, took the city, and demolished the very famous Colossus, the bronze of which they loaded on nine hundred camels. [See text and note, Rhodes, Folio XXVI verso]. However, Constans did not change his attitude even in the face of such calamity and distress, but sent another exarch, Theodore Calliopas, into Italy under orders that he bring to the emperor, the pope, Martin, in bonds. Now as he was well received by the Romans, he approached the pope with feigned friendly greetings, at the same time throwing chains about his neck and sending him to Constantinople. From there Martin was exiled to the same place to which the Blessed Clemens, the Roman bishop ['Roman bishop' (or 'bishop of Rome') is another way of saying 'pope'], had been sent once upon a time; and as this Martin was there steeped in much sorrow and need, and depressed, he finally died in exile in the 6th year, first month and 26th day of his pontificate, having given many proofs of his virtue; and he has been illustrious to the present day; and for these reasons he is numbered among the holy martyrs. The day of his commemoration is November 10th. The chair at Rome then was vacant 14 months; and no one can say anything for certain concerning this very holy man's death. [Martin I succeeded Theodore in 649. He had previously acted as papal apocrisarius at Constantinople. Among his first official acts was the summoning of a synod to deal with the Monothelite heresy. It met in the Lateran church, and was attended by 105 bishops. It held five sessions, and in twenty canons condemned the Monothelite heresy, its authors, and the writings by which it had been promulgated. In this condemnation were not only included the Ecthesis, or exposition of faith of the Patriarch Sergius, for which the emperor Heraclius had stood sponsor, but also the Typus of Paul, the successor of Sergius, which had the support of the reigning emperor, Constans II. Martin published the decrees of his Lateran synod in an encyclical, and Constans replied by enjoining his exarch Olympius to seize the pope and send him prisoner to Constantinople. And so the exarch proceeded, and had already attempted to compel compliance with the emperor's orders, but in vain; and he had even become reconciled to the bishop. The emperor, however, sent into Italy another exarch, Theodore Calliopas, who, in 653, caused Martin to be seized in the Lateran Church. He was first transported to the island of Naxos in the Aegean from where, after a year's imprisonment, he was sent to Constantinople. Here he was severely treated. He was brought to trial on a charge of conspiracy against the emperor, and of being in league with the Saracens. Although not convicted, he was condemned to death. The dying patriarch of Constantinople, Paul, begged the emperor to spare his life; and in 655 he was banished to Cherson, where he arrived March 26, 655, and died the following September. Miracles are said to have been performed at his tomb].

Year of the World 5843 | Year of Christ 644

Pope Eugenius the First, a Roman whose father was Rufianus from the Caelian Hill, became pope after Martin, and at the very time that Peter was installed at Constantinople to succeed Paul, the heretic. And although said Peter in some measure observed the Christian practises more than Paul had done, he did not entirely follow them in manner and form as they were prescribed by the holy Roman Church. This pope was a man of marvelous goodness, piety, gentleness, graciousness, and kindness. He ordained that no monk should leave his monastery on any account whatsoever without the leave of his superior. He died in the second year and ninth month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the fourth day of the Nones of June. The chair then was vacant for 1 month and 28 days. [Eugenius I was appointed pope by Constans II on the banishment of Martin, and held the see for three years. At the height of the Monothelite crisis he showed greater deference than his predecessor to the emperor's wishes, and took no public stand against the patriarchs of Constantinople, though he held no communication with them].

Pope Vitalianus, a Signinian from the town of the Volsci whose father was Anastasius, became pope. Being a very good man and diligent in divine service, he made many regulations pertaining to the divine office; and (as some would have it) permitted the use of the organ. He sent Theodore, the archbishop, and Adrianus (Hadrianum), the abbot, highly learned men, to Britain, and called England, to maintain the faith. He died in the 14th year and 6th month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the 6th day of the Kalends of February. The bishop's chair then was vacant 4 months and 15 days.

Vitalianus, Roman bishop from 657 to 672, succeeded Eugenius I. In the Monothelite controversy then raging, he refrained from express condemnation of the Typus of Constans II. The chief episode in his pontificate was the visit of Constans to Rome. On this occasion the pope showed the emperor great honors, a deference which the latter requited by stripping all the bronze ornaments of the city – even to the tiles of the Pantheon – sending them to Constantinople.

Vitalianus failed in attempting to call to account the archbishop of Ravenna, who was properly independent of Rome, and who, under the protection of the exarch, retorted his anathemas, and held him at defiance. At his death his archbishop (Maurice) earnestly charged the clergy never to submit to Rome.

In 667 Egbert and Oswy, kings of Kent and Northumberland, sent Wighard to Rome for consecration as archbishop of Canterbury, to which office he had been elected. But Wighard, with most of his suite having died at Rome, Vitalianus selected and consecrated as his successor at Canterbury, one Theodore, a Greek by birth, but who had been brought up as a monk in the Roman church. The new archbishop was a man of learning and zeal, and succeeded in promoting the good order and discipline of the English Church.

Pope Adeodatus, a Roman whose father was Jovinian, was elevated from monk to pope. He was a pious and gracious man, kind to the poor, good to guests, merciful to the indigent. He restored and dedicated the Church of the Blessed Peter on the Via Portuensis next to the bridge of Meruli (Pons Meruli) at that time. He improved with new buildings the monastery of Saint Erasmus (Herasmi) on the Caelian Hill, in which he lived a monastic life; and to destroy strange omens that often appeared in his time, he conducted many litanies. [The word 'omens' is one possible translation of the Latin prodigia, which can also mean 'signs', 'portents', and 'monsters'. Schedel's text is a very radical abridgement of his source, the 9th-century (s.v. Adeodatus), which talks about the prodigia taking place after the death of Adeodatus and specifies them as consisting of rain, thunder and lighting (the latter causing the deaths of men and cattle). The text then adds that because of the Litanies said every day God was eventually placated]. Finally in the fourth year, second month, and fifth day of his pontificate this very holy man died; and he was buried in the Basilica of Peter mourned by many on the sixth day of the Kalends of July. The chair then was vacant four months and 20 days. [Adeodatus became pope in 672 and was succeeded by Donus in 676].

Constantine (Constantinus) the Third was raised to the sovereignty upon the death of his father Heraclius. Chosroes (Cosdroas), the king of Persia, flourished as a powerful victor and could not be prevailed upon to make peace. So Heraclius sent an army against this barbarian people, primarily to protect the city of Constantinople. And he put his son Constantine into the government as his associate, and he appointed the venerable patriarch Sergius and the capable man Bonosus to act as his preceptors. He was afterwards elevated to the throne in his father's stead; but four months later he was put to death by poison by Martina, his stepmother, and Heracleonas, his brother, who were incited to this misdeed by Pyrrhus, the Constantinopolitan patriarch. [Constantine III, son of the emperor Heraclius by his first wife, succeeded as joint emperor with Heracleonas, the son of Heraclius by his second wife. Court intrigues nearly led to a civil war, which was prevented by the death of Constantine in May 641. He was supposed to have been poisoned by order of his stepmother].

Heracleonas (Heraclion) took over the sovereignty after the death of his brother and in the time when Cyrus, Sergius and Pyrrhus furthered and held to the Acephalian heresy, to the effect that in Christ there is but one activity of will, though he was both man and God.

Acephali is a term applied to religious sects having no head or leader. It was applied particularly to a strict Monophysite sect that separated itself, in the end of the 5th century, from the rule of the Patriarch of Alexandria (Peter Mongus), and remained "without king or bishop" until it was reconciled by Mark I (799-819). Monophysites was the name given to those who held the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature, and especially to those who maintained this position in the great controversies of the 5th and 6th centuries. The synod of Chalcedon, in 451, endeavored to steer a middle course between the so-called Nestorian and Eutychian positions. But the followers of Cyril of Alexandria, and with them those of Eutyches, saw in the Chalcedon decree of two natures only another form of the Nestorian duality of persons in Christ, and rose everywhere in opposition. During the period between the Council of Chalcedon and the death of Justinian, the movement on the whole gained in strength, especially in Egypt, and was the cause of civil disturbances in a number of cities. Justinian himself in his later days adopted it; but his successor Justin II took no action either way for six or seven years, and then instituted a quiet but thorough system of suppression, closing Monophysite churches and imprisoning their bishops and priests.

We find two principal varieties of Monophysitism. (a) Severus, bishop of Antioch in 513, and his followers, objected to Chalcedon only because it was an innovation; they fully acknowledged the distinctness of the two natures in Christ, insisting only that they became indissolubly united so that there was only one energy of Christ's will. Severus laid great stress on the human infirmities of Christ as proving that his body was like ours, created and corruptible; and some of his followers extended this argument to Christ's human soul, which they said was, like ours, limited in knowledge. (b) Julian, bishop of Halicarnassus, and his followers, held that Christ's body was so inseparably united with the Logos as not to be consubstantial with humanity. Its natural attributes were so heightened as to make it sinless and incorruptible. The disintegration caused by Monophysitism may have contributed to the rapid and easy victory of Islam in Syria and Egypt.

In Church history the name Monothelites was given to those who, in the 7th century, while otherwise orthodox, maintained that Christ had only one will. Their theory was an attempt to effect some kind of solution of the vital unity of Christ's person on the basis of the now firmly established doctrine of the two natures. The controversy had its origin in the efforts of the emperor Heraclius to win back to the church and the empire the excommunicated and persecuted Monophysites or Eutychians of Egypt and Syria; and so he broke with the doctrine that the divine and human natures in Christ, while quite distinct in his one person, had but one activity and operation. He upheld the doctrine of one divine-human energy. The controversy became so intense that his successor Constans II prohibited all discussion of the questions of the duality or singleness of either the energy or the will of Christ.

But after the death of Heraclius, Pyrrhus returned from Africa (to which he had been exiled for his heresy) to Rome; and he fell at the feet of Pope Theodore, pleading for mercy and pardon, because (as above stated) he had incited Martina and Heracleonas to an evil deed. Now as this Heracleonas secured the sovereignty after the death of Constantine, and administered the public affairs in an evil and unworthy manner, the Constantinopolitan senate and the people became enraged against Martina and Heracleonas; and they caused her tongue and his nose to be cut off, and sent them into exile; and in their fury the people slew Pyrrhus. [Heracleonas (whose official name was Constantine Heraclius, but who never outgrew his diminutive nickname which means 'little Heracles') was Roman emperor in the East from February to September 641. He was the son of Heraclius by his second wife Martina. At the end of Heraclius's reign he obtained through his mother's influence the title of Augustus (638), and after his father's death was proclaimed joint emperor with his half-brother Constantine III. The premature death of Constantine, in May 641, left Heracleonas sole ruler. But a suspicion that he and Martina had murdered Constantine led soon after to a revolt, and to the mutilation and banishment of the supposed offenders. Nothing is known about Heracleonas after 641].

Constans, the Constantinopolitan emperor, and son of the emperor Constantine, was elevated soon after Heracleonas; while Paul, the patriarch, was put into the place of the dead Pyrrhus by the senate and the people, of which mention was made in the description of Pope Martin. And Constans planned an invasion of Italy, not (as he let it be known) to drive the Lombards out of Italy, but to rob the city of Rome and its dependencies of their riches and treasures. Now, when Constans came to Rome he was met before the city by Pope Vitalianus and the clergy, and a great number of the people. He first escorted the emperor to Saint Peter's, and then to the other churches. The emperor inspected them for five days, one after the other; and he resolved to carry away their treasures. What he saw, made of bronze and marble, he managed to carry away, or to take by force and to load into ships; so that in seven days he deprived the city of Rome of more treasures than the barbarians before him had taken in two hundred fifty-eight years. After this he went to Naples and from there he shipped to Sicily and remained at Syracuse; and there he was slain in his bath by Misesso, an Armenian, in the twenty-eighth year of his sovereignty. In his place Mezezius (Mezentius), by whose deceit they believe Constans was killed, was made emperor by the soliders.

Constans II, emperor of the East from 641 to 668, was the son of Constantine III and Gregoria, and was born November 7, 630. He succeeded after an interval due to the usurpation of Heracleonas, in 641, with Valentine as regent. His reign is notable for disasters at the hands of the Arabs and the Lombards. He fitted out an expedition to recover Egypt then occupied by the Arabs, and tried to get assistance from China. The only result was that the Arabs attacked Greek North Africa, and while he was engaged there Mu-Awijah took Syria and Cyprus and ravaged Cicilia. In 651 the Arabs extended their hold on Sicily and captured Rhodes. In 655 the loss of the sea fight off Lycia endangered Constantinople itself, but Constans profited by the internal dissension of the Arabs and won some successes on the Danube. The Lombards invaded Northern Italy at the beginning of his reign. Constans decided to turn them out, and made the last recorded attempt to establish Rome as the center of the united empire. He left for Italy in 662, and although successful at first, he failed and went to live in Syracuse. Africa now revolted under a new tribute and was lost, and the reign closes with further losses in Italy and the Greek provinces. Constans died mysteriously in his bath at Syracuse in 668. His reign is also notable for heretical disturbances. An edict of Constans, the Typus, prohibited all religious discussion. In 653 the exarch Calliopas captured the pope.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Pope Martin (Martinus) held a council of one hundred fifty bishops at Rome, against Paul, the Constantinopolitan patriarch. The messengers which said pope had sent (as above stated) to Paul, were, at the command of the emperor Constans, exiled to various islands. When Martin heard this, he first of all, in this same council, revived the excommunication of Cyrus, Sergius and Pyrrhus; and he excommunicated Paul, then patriarch of Constantinople, and sought to deprive him of his office. In the meantime the peace of Italy which had lasted for thirty years between the Romans and the Lombards, was broken; for the Lombards sought to manage matters according to their own wishes, while the Romans opposed themselves to what was undertaken contrary to justice and fairness.

Folio CLIII verso

Jodoc (Iodocus) the holy hermit, was renowned in these times for his virtue; and although the son of a king of the Britons, he disdained royal honors and worldly pomp and went to the wilderness. And there he lived in piety for a long time. He performed many miracles, and finally died in blessedness. [Jodoc (or Josse; in Latin Iodocus), and his elder brother Judicael (commonly called Gigue), were the sons of Juthael, king of Brittany, in Gaul. The older brother became king in the year 630 but renounced the crown in favor of Jodoc, and retired to a monastery; but Jodoc did likewise. They joined a company of pilgrims who planned to go to Rome. They first went to Paris, where a duke prevailed upon them to settle on his estate, and built them a chapel and cells in which they lived as hermits. Jodoc died in 669].

Etheldreda (Egiltrudis), queen of England, was renowned at this time. Although espoused to three men, she remained a virgin. Eleven years after her burial her body was found still undecayed.

Etheldreda (in Anglo-Saxon her name is spelled 'Æthelthryth'). According to Bede, King Egfrid ('Ecgrith' in Anglo-Saxon) took to wife Etheldreda, daughter of Anna, king of the East Angles. She had before been given in marriage to Tonbert, chief of the Southern Girvii, who inhabited the counties of Rutland, Northampton, and Huntingdon, with part of Lincolnshire, and had their own princes, dependent upon the kings of Mercia. But he died soon after he had received her, and she was given to the aforesaid king. Though she lived with him 12 years, yet she preserved her virginity; and according to Bede, the miraculous circumstance that her flesh, being buried, could not suffer corruption, is a token that she had not been defiled by familiarity with man.

Etheldreda requested the king to permit her to lay aside worldly cares, and to serve Christ. And having at length prevailed, she went into the monastery of the Abbess Ebba, who was aunt to King Egfrid. A year later she was made abbess in the country called Ely, where, having built a monastery, she became the virgin mother of many virgins dedicated to God. It is said that from the time of entering the monastery she never wore linen, only woolen garments, and rarely washed in a hot bath, unless just before great festivals, and then only after having first washed the other servants of God there present. She seldom ate more than once a day, except on some urgent occasion. From matins she continued prayer until it was day; some also say that by the spirit of prophecy she foretold the pestilence by which she was to die and the number that should be then snatched away out of her monastery. She died seven years after she had been made abbess, in the midst of her flock, and, as she had requested, was buried in such a manner as she had died, in a wooden coffin.

Aurea, most holy virgin, disciple or Saint Eligius, flourished at Paris at this time, renowned for her chastity, holiness and great patience. She was of noble parentage. Because of her piety and knowledge Eligius made her the superior over three hundred virgins. [Aurea was appointed abbess of a nunnery settled by Eligius at Paris. She is usually represented as holding a nail, or seated on a chair studded with nails that pierce her flesh. She is said to have recited the Psalms daily for seven years in such a chair as self-punishment for venturing to correct a deacon for infringing a rule].

Fursey (Forseus), son of a Hibernian king, with two brothers, scorning the pomp of royalty, entered monastic life. He built a monastery, and after his brothers were consecrated, he died in blessedness. Four years later his body was disinterred by bishops Eligius and Ausbertus, and no signs of decomposition were found. [Fursey (Forseus), son of an Irish king, was abbot of a monastery in an Irish diocese where now stands the church of Kill-fursa. King Clovis II invited him to France, where he died].

Oswald (Oswaldus), king of Northumbria, was slain by Penda, the Mercian king, in the first year of Emperor Heracleonas. He ruled over people of many tongues, namely the Picts, Scots, Britons and English. His right hand with which he bestowed many alms, together with his arm, head and sinews all undecomposed, are still to be seen, although the rest of his body has gone to ashes. The hand is shown as a relic at Bamburgh (Bembaburch).

Oswald (c. 605-642), sixth Christian king of Northumbria, who was expelled on the accession of Edwin, although he himself was a son of Edwin's sister. He spent some time in exile in Ionia, where he was instructed in Christianity. In 634 he defeated the British king of Ceadwalla, thereby avenging his brother Eanfrigh, who had succeeded Edwin in Bernicia, and became king of Northumbria, raising his realm to the position it held in the time of Edwin, with whom he is classed by Bede as one of the seven great Anglo-Saxon kings. He brought under his dominion all the nations and provinces of Britain. His close alliance with the Celtic church is the characteristic feature of his reign. In 635 he sent to the elders of the Scots for a bishop, and when Bishop Aidan arrived, he assigned to him the Island of Lindisfarne as his see, near the royal city of Bamburgh (Bamborough). Bede records that when he was at dinner on the holy day of Easter with this bishop a silver dish full of dainties before him, and they were just ready to bless the bread, the servant, whom he had appointed to relieve the poor, suddenly came in and told the king that a great multitude of needy persons from all parts were sitting in the streets begging some alms of the king. The king immediately ordered the meat set before him to be carried to the poor, and the dish to be cut up in pieces and divided among them. At which sight, the bishop who sat beside him, much taken with this act of piety, laid hold of his right hand, and said, 'May this hand never perish;' which fell out according to his prayer, for his arm and hand being cut off from his body, when he was slain in battle, remain entire and uncorrupted to this day, and are kept in a silver case, as revered relics, in St. Peter's church. According to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, "This year (642), Oswald, king of the North-humbrians, was slain by Penda and the South-humbrians at Maserfeld on the Nones (5th) of August, and his body was buried at Bardney. His sanctity and his miracles were afterwards manifested in various ways beyond this island, and his hands are at Bambrough, uncorrupted."

According to another entry in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, for the year 909, the body of Oswald was at that time removed from Bardney into Mercia.

Saint Gertrude (Gerdrudis) of Nivelles, died in the 20th year of the emperor Constans. She was a daughter of Ida, widow of King Pepin, who, with the consent of the holy Amandus, built a cloister, and placed her daughter in it over the virgins. On the day of her death she appeared to an abbess at Trier, who knew of her reputation, and to her, announced her death. She was illustrious for many miracles. [Gertrude. See illustrations below].

Leodegar (Leodegarius), the bishop during the time of Constans the emperor, was tortured in many ways, imprisoned and starved by Ebroin (Ebroniun), a rogue whom Theodoric, the emperor, had received back into his good graces. After cutting out his eyes, tongue, and vitals, and lacerating his heels, he was beheaded. After his death he became illustrious for many miracles. [The life of Leodegar (Leodegarius in the , and later known as Leger in French;) is involved in that of Ebroin (Ebroniun in the), Frankish "mayor of the palace," a Neustrian, who wished to impose the authority of Neustria over Burgundy and Austrasia. In 656, at the moment of his accession to power, Sigebert III, the king of Austrasia, had just died, and the Austrasian mayor of the palace, Grimoald, was attempting to usurp the authority. The great nobles, however, appealed to the king of Neustria, Clovis II, and unity was re-established. But in spite of a very firm policy Ebroin was unable to maintain this unity, and while Clotaire III, son of Clovis II, reigned in Neustria and Burgundy, he was obliged in 660 to give the Austrasians a special king, Childeric II, brother of Clotaire III, and a special mayor of the palace, Wulfoald. His efforts to maintain the union of Neustria and Burgundy were opposed by the great Burgundian nobles, who rose under Leodegar, bishop of Autun, defeated Ebroin, and interned him in the monastery of Luxeuil (670). Soon, however, Leger was defeated by Wulfoald, and himself confined at Luxeuil. Ebroin and Leger then left the cloister. Each looked for support to a different Merovingian king. Leger was besieged in Autun, forced to surrender and had his eyes put out; on October 12, 678, he was put to death after undergoing prolonged tortures].

Vigilius, the bishop of Autesiodorum, [Now Auxerre; formerly a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdenensis. The Latin edition of the misspells Autesiodorum as Antisiodorenun]. of noble birth, illustrious for his piety, administered the said bishopric for 26 years. And there, outside of the city, he built a church to the Blessed Mary together with a cloister. By reason of his piety he despised the enemies of righteousness; for this reason he was slain in the forest by Warachus, an officer of the king of France. This same Warachus was a relative of EbroYn (Ebroniun), who persecuted Leodegar. This same EbroYn was seen as he was carried to hell by demons. But when Vigilius was being taken home through the city of Sens (Senona), the chains of the prisoners broke and they emerged from their cells; and they brought their chains to the aforesaid church. [Very little is known about Vigilius. However, the basic facts seem to be the following: Vigilius was assassinated about 684 in a forest near Compiègne, doubtless at the instigation of Gilmer, son of Waraton, mayor of the palace].

ILLUSTRATIONS

1. Jodoc (Jodocus), the hermit, is portrayed as a pilgrim. He wears a broad-brimmed hat, turned up in front and faced with an escallop-shell affixed to it. Fuller, in his Church History says that shells were employed by pilgrims because they were made use of as cups and dishes by the pilgrims in Palestine, and that Nicholas de Villers, the first of the family who attended Edward I on crusade, bore the escallops to denote a tour to Palestine. According to Fosbroke's British Monachism these escallops were denominated by ancient authors, the Shells of Gales, or Gallicia, plainly applying to a pilgrimage to Compostella, and not to Jerusalem. It was usual to return by way of Compostella, and the shells appear to have implied this. The legend which the old Spanish writers offer in explanation of this badge is given in Cutt's Scenes and Characters of the Middle Ages. As a pilgrim this saint also carries a staff around which is woven or bound a list or long narrow strip of cloth, crosswise. I have not been able to discover its significance, but note the observations of Reverend Cutts: "We may call to mind the list wound crosswise round a barber's pole, and imagine that this list was attached to the pilgrim's staff for use, or we may remember that a vexillum, or banner, is attached to a bishop's staff, and that a long, narrow riband is often affixed to the cross-headed staff of the Savior in medieval representations of the Resurrection." From the end of the staff, as here portrayed, is suspended, by a ring, another object resembling a purse or wallet, the so called "scrip," a small bag which contained the pilgrim's food and his few necessities. There is nothing in the text to bear out the representation of Jodoc as a pilgrim. He may have made a pilgrimage at some time, according to accounts not now available, and may therefore have been represented as a pilgrim. This occurred occasionally when some prominent or wealthy person returned from Palestine, and requested that his effigies after death might be sculptured in his pilgrim's habit.

2. Oswald, 6th king of Northumbria, is portrayed with crown, orb and sceptre. It is the usual representation of a king in the Chronicle, except that in this instance a black raven, in silhouette, has perched upon the orb, a ring in its bill. The raven was the standard of the Norsemen, and among the ancient Greeks and Romans was dedicated to the sun-god Apollo. Like the magpie of later days it was held to be a symbol of ill-fortune. When these birds therefore are introduced in Christian art, as Hulme (Symbolism in Christian Art) observes, they ordinarily reflect the prevalent idea. Thus in some manuscripts they are represented as perching in the tree from which Eve gathers the forbidden fruit. The raven is connected with the history of some of the saints; it is placed at the feet of St. Benedict; it bears a ring in its mouth to St. Ida; brings a letter to St. Oswald, and guards the body of the sainted martyr Vincent, whose corpse was thrown to the dogs in the street. In the present instance the raven has just perched on the orb in the hands of Oswald, and is apparently bringing him the ring it holds in its bill, no doubt to give significance to some legend woven into the life of the saint but not recorded in the Chronicle.

3. Gertrude (Gerdrudis), daughter of the Frankish major-domo Pepin, is here portrayed as a nun or abbess, for such she was--of the convent of Nivelles. She was born in 626 and died in 659, and as the patron saint of travelers, is equivalent to the ancient pagan goddess Freyja. In this portrait she has a distaff before her and is spinning from it by hand. Four black mice, in silhouette, are introduced. One is climbing up the distaff, while another has already reached the top and appears to be nibbling at the wool or flax about to be spun. A third mouse is running up the shoulder of the saint, while a fourth has reached the top of her head. This Gertrude of Nivelles, in Brabant, is a favorite saint in Belgium, where she is invoked for protection against mice, rats and moles, the water from a spring in the crypt of her church having been long used to sprinkle fields infested by vermin. She often appears in ecclesiastical decoration and illuminated manuscripts, surrounded by mice and rats, or, as here, with rats and mice running up and down her spinning wheel. She is said to have been specially attached to cats, being the natural enemy of their prey. Butler describes her as the daughter of Pepin, of Landen, mayor of the palace of the French kings of Austrasia. She was born in 626 and died on March 17, 659.

Caesara (Cesaria), queen of the Persians, because of her devotion to the Christian faith, at this time, without the knowledge of her husband, and accompanied by a small number of her faithful and confidential followers, left her homeland in disguise and came to Constantinople in the year 683. She was honorably received by the emperor, and a number of days later was baptized at her own request, the emperor acting as her godfather. When the news reached the king of Persia, he speedily sent his messenger to Constantinople to demand the return of his wife by the emperor. In response the emperor said that the queen was free to stay or to return home; and when she was asked, she said that she would never return unless the king became a Christian. Before long the king came to Constantinople with forty thousand men. He was well received by the emperor, and, together with his men, was baptized and confirmed in the true faith, the emperor acting as godfather and honoring him with many presents and gifts; after which the king, together with his spouse, joyfully returned to his kingdom. [Fredegarius (Fredegar in Frankish) is the name of the unknown chronicler who continued into the seventh century the history of Gregory of Tours. His history covers the period from around 584 to 641, while several supplements by unknown hands bring the records passing under this name down to the year 768, i.e. to the period of Charlemagne. Fredegarius is invaluable for the facts of this otherwise obscure period, and his chronicle is not a mere series of annals, but often exhibits a human interest (such as in this excerpt about Caesara) that can be quite fascinating].

Rothari (Rotharis), the king of the Lombards, reigned 16 years after his predecessor, Arioldus. Although gifted with many virtues, he was spotted with the Arian stain, bringing all the Lombards under his influence. Thus he had two bishops in each place, one a Christian, the other an Arian. In military affairs and in battle he was so efficient and ingenious that he brought under his dominion Etruria and Liguria, together with the maritime countries as far as Massilia (Marseilles). He was also so intelligent that he assembled in proper order in a book all the laws that were in use, which he called the Edict; for prior to that time the Lombards had been without laws for a period of seventy-one years. Finally, after a battle with Theodorus, the exarch of Italy, in which the latter lost seven thousand men, Rothari died, leaving no sons. [Rothari came to the Lombard throne pursuant to the following succession: Agilulf (See Folio CL recto) was followed by Adelwald, (615-625) Arthari's son. Adelwald was succeeded by his brother-in-law, Ariowald (625-636). Upon the latter's death, his widow married Rothari, making him king (636-652). Rothari was a distinguished ruler. He limited the power of the Greeks in Italy, and in 644 caused the laws of the people to be codified in a book, called the . Although the chronicler states that he died without sons, history informs us that he was succeeded by a son named Rodoald].

Rodoald (Rodoaldus), his (i.e. Rothari's) son, succeeded him and ruled for five years. To him the daughter of Queen Theodolinda was married. He sank so low in sensuality that he committed adultery with the wife of another, who stabbed him to death. [Rodoald, who succeeded Rothari on the throne of the Lombard kingdom in the year 652, was slain in 653 by a Lombard whose wife he had seduced].

Aripert (Aripertus) reigned after him (Rodoald) for 9 years. He built a beautiful church at Pavia in honor of our Savior, and died leaving two sons, Berthari (Pertheritem) and Godepert (Gundibertum), as successors to the kingdom. During this same period the Lombards were at peace with Rome and Ravenna; but they incited all manner of tumult among themselves. Now when Grimoald (Grimoaldus), Lombard duke of Beneventum, learned that these two brothers were at odds, he came to Pavia with a large army, driving Berthari, the younger brother, out of Pavia, and Godepert out of Milan. When this dissension became known to Clovis, king of the Franks, he sent a large force of men into Italy; but Grimoald routed them. Some write that the Lombards, anticipating the Gauls, feigned mass retreat, leaving behind them their camp and wagon fortifications, in which they left a large quantity of wine, in the meantime secreting themselves in ambush at no great distance. The wine gave the Gauls great joy, and they sated themselves with it until they fell asleep. Immediately, then, they were slain like cattle. [Aripert I, an Agilulfian, succeeded Rodoald as king of the Lombards, and reigned from 653 to 651. He held himself out as a patron of the arts and literature, and was succeeded by his sons Berthari and Godepert (each has multiple spellings), who promptly fell into a dispute for the sole sovereignty. Both sought the aid of Grimoald, mighty duke of Beneventum, who was married to Aribert's daughter. Grimoald slew Godebert in Pavia and drove Berthari out of Milan; after which Grimoald himself was elected king by the people (662-672). He beat back the attacks of the Greeks and Franks and stemmed the invasions of the Avars. He also made new laws for the internal government. On the death of Grimoald in the year 672, his illegitimate son, named Romuald was confined to Beneventum, while the people recalled Berthari as their king (672-690). Berthari was followed by his son Cunibert (690-703)].

The Saracens at this time consumed so much wealth that, after they had subdued and calmly taken possession of the provinces in Asia that used to belong to the Romans, they took for granted they would invade Europe. And thus, sailing with a great navy from Alexandria, they arrived at Rhodes, an island of the Roman Empire. There they took the city, and demolished the very famous Colossus (from which the principal city of the island took its name), the bronze of which they loaded on nine hundred camels. And with Rhodes devastated the Saracens sailed into the Aegean Sea and afflicted many islands of the Cyclades. [This paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle, perhaps because it repeats much of what was said on Folio CLIII verso in the paragraph devoted to Pope Martin: 'During this controversy the Saracens at Alexandria prepared for war; and they came to Rhodes with a mighty fleet, took the city, and demolished the very famous Colossus, the bronze of which they loaded on nine hundred camels.']

Grimoald (Grimmoaldus), tenth king of the Lombards, reigned for 9 years. This king possessed many illustrious gifts of mind and body, for he was not only possessed of intelligence and versatility in his dealings, but also was otherwise able and virtuous. He was of medium stature, strong body, bald head, long beard, and active physically and mentally. He caused blood to be let from an artery in his arm, and when he drew the bow to shoot a pigeon, the artery bled and did not cease until he died. [See note to Aribert, on this same Folio, above].

After the death of the emperor Constantius [Constantius is Constans II], the Saracens came with a great fleet, oppressing the city of Syracuse and the entire island. With their plunder they returned to Alexandria, also bringing with them the treasures and ornaments of the city of Rome which Constans himself had taken there. [See Constans II and note, Folio CLVIII recto, above].

Dagobert (Dagobertus), the king of the Franks, a man of cunning intelligence, clever in counsel and deed, died about this time. His soul was released from the hands of demons by the help of Dionysius and Mauritius (Mauricii), the martyrs, and Martin, the confessor, whom he afterwards honored as his patrons and advisers for the rest of his life. He reigned 34 years and was at perpetual enmity with the English. With the co-operation of the emperor Heraclius he caused all the Jews in his kingdom to be baptized. [Dagobert I, king of the Franks, was the son of Clotaire II. In 623 his father established him as king of the region east of the Ardennes, and in 626 revived for him the ancient kingdom of Austrasia, minus Aquitaine and Provence. As Dagobert was yet but a child, he was placed under the authority of the mayor, or majordomo of the palace, named Pepin, and Arnulf, bishop of Metz. Upon the death of Clothar II in 629, Dagobert wished to establish unity in the Frankish realm and in this and the following year made expeditions into Neustria and Burgundy where he succeeded on the whole in securing recognition of his authority. Under him the Merovingian monarchy attained to its culminating point. Dagobert restored to the royal domain the lands that had been usurped by the great nobles and the Church. At Paris he maintained a luxurious, though by his own example, a disorderly court. He was a patron of the arts and delighted in the exquisite craftsmanship of his treasurer, the goldsmith St. Eloi (Eligius). His authority was recognized throughout the realm, and as a sovereign he was reckoned superior to the other barbarian kings. He entered into relations with the eastern empire, and swore a "perpetual peace" with the emperor Heraclius. He protected the church and placed illustrious prelates at the head of the bishoprics – Eloi (Eligius) at Noyon, Ouen (Audoenus) at Rouen, and Didier (Desiderius) at Cahors. His reign is also marked by the creation of numerous monasteries and by renewed missionary activity in Flanders and among the Basques. He died on January 9, 639, and was buried at St. Denis].

Erfurt (Erfordia), the great and memorable city, the capital of the province of Thuringia, and by the ancients called Erphesfurt, has a high hill called Saint Peter's. When the decline of the (Roman) Empire began from the time of Theodosius, the emperor, and under Arcadius and Honorius, the emperors, the Franks threw off the Roman governors from the Rhine toward Italy, and submitted themselves to the rule of a king of their own. When the Thuringians observed this, they elected as king, from another region to the east of the Rhine, and upon the advice of the king of France, Merwigus. He built a citadel on the same hill, and a castle at Erfurt, which is now the church of Saint Dionysius, and which the common man calls Merwisburg. After the death of this king, Bassinus received the sovereignty of Thuringia; and for him Childeric (Hildericus), the king of France, afterward provided a wife. During this time the village of Schildinorde was located where the Basilica of Saint Andrew now stands. In a marsh near the river Gera (which now runs through the city for almost half its length, and by the use of which the whole city is cleansed and beautified) a noted and renowned miller had a roadway. Said miller's name was Erpff; and near his mill was a passage or ford. Now, when in the Year of Salvation four hundred thirty-eight, in the time of Clovis, king of the Franks, this city had its beginning, it was named Erffordia after the miller and the ford. The noble French king Dagobert (Tagoberto) during his reign made of the citadel on the hill a Benedictine monastery in honor of Saint Peter of the Order of Saint Benedict, after which the mountain of Saint Peter was named; and he also endowed Saint Gangolf's Church. Later Boniface, the archbishop of Mainz, under Pepin (Pipino) the king of the Franks, converted Thuringia to the faith, and built a church to the glorious and perpetual Virgin Mary; and he established a bishopric there, which, however, was later absorbed by that at Mainz. Erfurt is situated in a good plain with fertile soil. It bears an herb called sandix and saponaria [Sandix, a kind of minium or red lead, made of ceruse, but inferior to the true minium. Saponaria, a European herb of the mustard family known in English as soapwort; a vespertine flower, and a common perennial plant from the carnation family. The scientific name Saponaria is derived from the Latin sapo (stem sapon-) meaning 'soap,' which, like its common name, refers to its utility in cleaning. From this same Latin word is derived the name of the toxic substance saponin, contained in the roots. It starts producing a lather when in contact with water. Saponaria also contains a blue dye obtained from its leaves. When mixed with dyer's-broom, a shrubby plant yielding a yellow dye, it becomes a permanent green]. that is very useful in the dyeing of cloth. Through its fields flow the Gera and other rivers, whose moisture makes the region fruitful. About it is also an abundant pasturage. After the year one thousand sixty-six the city was surrounded with walls and bastions, and its size was greatly increased by the addition of residences and houses, and was improved by the beautification of its monasteries and churches. This city was the very famous seat of Thuringia, being situated in the center of the country and possessing an abundance of grain and other necessities. When the country and city were freed of tithes, they on that account suffered much ill will and had much to fear at the hands of the princes in the vicinity, particularly so in the time of Henry the Third. He built castles and great fortresses on all the mountains and elevations in Saxony and Thuringia; and for this purpose he levied a tax. But as this did not bring sufficient revenue, he contrived the attack of the nearest villages and farms, as though by an enemy, so that the people in the vicinity would at all events be compelled to fortify and preserve the buildings that he had begun. And so that he himself might not openly be suspected of ravaging the country, and in order to conceal his evil purpose by an appearance of goodness, he incited the archbishop of Mainz, by every means, to collect tithes of Thuringia (as he had previously often attempted to do), offering to stand by the archbishop and to assist him in the attempt, and by royal authority coerce those who resisted; but this he made conditional, namely, that a portion of such tithes be given to the king in order to enable him to complete the buildings he had undertaken. Accordingly, the bishop called a council at Erfurt; and on the day appointed, came the king, the archbishop, Bishop Herman (Hermanus) of Bamberg, and others, who were called upon to consider and decide the matter. The Thuringians placed their hope and faith chiefly in the abbot of Fulda and of Hernelda, who had many churches and estates in Thuringia that were receiving tithes. And when they were openly requested to give them over, they urged the archbishop, that above all things, and for God's sake, he cause to remain undiverted that which since ancient times had been given to the cloisters—a right which the papal see had often confirmed by documents, old and new, and which his predecessors in the archbishopric of Mainz had never attempted to disturb. When the archbishop would not desist from his purpose, the Thuringians appealed to the papal see; but the king refused to permit this on pain of death. Immediately after that followed the Saxon war; and after that no tithes of any kind were demanded. And the Thuringians rejoiced that they had found occasion for protecting by force of arms the laws which had been given them and their forefathers. This so severely grieved the king that he almost lost his kingdom, together with his life. In this city lie interred the remains of many saintly persons, attested by celebrated men, namely, the holy bishops Adolarius, Eobanus, Severus, and Vincent, to whom churches have been built. The venerated university had its beginning here in the Year of the Lord 1392, and from it emanated many distinguished and highly learned men, versed in the Holy Scriptures, in jurisprudence, in medicine, and in philosophy. On a number of occasions, this city suffered great loss by fire. On the feast day of Saint Gervasius, in the year 1472, this city was so damaged by fire, involving the churches of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of Saint Severus, the merchant's bridge, the vegetable market, and the place before the steps in the buildings of the laity and the clergy, that almost one-third of the city went up in flames.

Erfurt, in Prussian Saxony, in Germany, is located on the river Gera, about midway between Gotha and Weimar. The origin of Erfurt (Med. Erpesfurt; Latin Erffordia) is involved in obscurity. According to legend it was founded in the eighth century by a certain Erpes, and after him was originally called Erpesford, or Erphesford. It is also certain that in the eighth century it already existed as a city; for in 741 Boniface considered it of sufficient importance to found a bishopric here, when he came to Thuringia to convert to Christianity the indigenous peoples. However, the bishopric that he set up in 741, ceased with the martyrdom of Adolar in 755, after which it was absorbed into the archbishopric of Mainz. In 805 the place received certain market rights from the emperor Charlemagne. Here also, in 936, Henry I held his last Reichstag, and caused his son Otto to be chosen as his successor. Later the overlordship was claimed by the archbishops of Mainz on the strength of charters granted by the emperor Otto I; and although they succeeded in upholding their claim to it, they encountered many difficulties, and the city succeeded in maintaining a certain independence. In 1080 Erfurt was reduced to ashes in the course of the Thuringian-Saxon war; but it was soon rebuilt. From 1109 to 1137 it remained under the over-lordship of the Landgraf of Thuringia, but in 1118 it was taken by Duke Lothar of Saxony. In 1164 Landgraf Ludwig of Thuringia leveled the walls, which the archbishop Siegfried had built in 1070. Five years later they were rebuilt by the archbishop Christian. In 1181 the Reichstag was held at Erfurt, on which occasion Henry the Lion, of Saxony, submitted to the emperor Frederick I. In 1255 the archbishop of Mainz granted the city municipal rights, and Erfurt became practically a free town. Its power was at its height at the beginning of the fifteenth century, when it joined the Hanseatic League. It grew in territorial extent by purchase as well as conquest of additional ground. Its wealth was so great that in 1378 it established a university, the first in Europe that embraced the four faculties. In 1480 over 850 students attended. At this time Erfurt was reckoned one of the greatest cities in Germany, although its population was largely overestimated; for, in the middle of the fifteenth century it had only 32,000 inhabitants. Due to the Saxon war, the great fire of 1472, and the decrease in commerce, the city's welfare suffered considerably. Nor did the feuds with Mainz, and the religious struggles of the sixteenth century further its development. During the Thirty Years' War Erfurt was for a time occupied by the Swedes, to whom it opened its doors. In 1664 it was captured by the troops of the archbishop of Mainz, and remained in the possession of the electorate until 1802, when it came into the possession of Prussia.

The city of Erfurt lost its university in 1816, when it was suppressed and its funds devoted to other purposes, among these being the endowment of an institution founded in 1758, and called the Academy of Sciences, and the support of the library which now contains 60,000 volumes and over 1,000 manuscripts. In December 1993, however, the Thuringian state parliament voted to reestablish the university. The university was officially refounded on January 1, 1994, though its first classes did not begin until the start of winter term in 1999.

THE CITY OF ERFURT

The City of Erfurt is represented by a large woodcut extending over two Folio, and specially designed to represent this city. In the foreground is the river Gera, on which the city is located midway between Gotha and Weimar. The general aspect of the city, with its crowded buildings and tight-fitting wall, bastioned at frequent intervals, is forbidding. To strangers approaching it in the early days it could not have appeared very inviting. Although the city had seven gates in medieval times, only one appears in the illustration. It is reached by a bridge.

As we look beyond the walls we see numerous church spires, in most cases surmounted by a cross; and in this connection it must be remembered that when the Chronicle was published in 1493, Luther was but a lad of ten, and the Reformation had not yet gotten under way. He became a friar in the monastery of St. Augustine (now an orphanage) in this very city; but we have no means of identifying the monastery on this woodcut.

The City of Erfurt was very irregular in plan. The main feature was a city square (Friedrich Wilhelmsplatz), to the southwest of which is the Domberg, or what we might have called cathedral heights—an eminence on which stand side by side the Cathedral, or Dome, and the great church of St. Severus which may be identified by its three fourteenth century spires. The Cathedral (Beatae Mariae Virginis) is the most noteworthy of the city's structures. It was begun in the twelfth century, but the nave was built in the thirteenth in Gothic style. The approach to both churches is by means of 48 wide stone steps, from which the immediate vicinity derived its name, "Vor den Graden," that is, 'Before the Steps.' The Cathedral was not built according to any single plan, but is a composite of a number of styles of architecture, offering the greatest divergence. The chancel, which was added in 1349-72, with the fourteenth century crypt below, rests on massive substructures known as the Cavate. Besides fine fifteenth century glass, the cathedral has very rich portal sculptures and bronze castings, among others, the Coronation of the Virgin, by Peter Vischer. Besides the Cathedral and St. Severus Church, Erfurt possesses a number of very interesting medieval houses of worship, but it is impossible to identify them here.

Pope Donus, a Roman whose father was Maurice, was pope at the time that Grimoald, the king of the Lombards, died. In the same year occurred great and mighty rains; and many people were struck by lightning and killed; and the grain and the fruits on the farms dried up and wasted away. This Donus was a virtuous man, both in the sanctity of his life and in his teachings. In the Boethian (Boeciano) monastery he seized a number of Syrian monks who had held with the Nestorian heretics; and he punished them and dispersed them into various monasteries. He restored obedience to the papal see by the churches of Ravenna, which had seceded from the Roman Church. He also gave aid to many churches in revenues and improvements. He finally died in the 5th year, 5th month and 10th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the third day of the Ides of April. From his death the bishop's chair was vacant two months and sixteen days. [Donus succeeded Adeodatus as pope in 676, retaining the see not for the 5 years listed by the , but, according to the , only for 1 year 5 months and 10 days. During that time, if Anastasius is correct, Reparatus, new bishop of Ravenna, after having for some time maintained his independence, submitted himself to Rome].

Pope Agatho the First, a Sicilian, was elevated from monk to pope. He was so pious that with his kiss he instantly cured and cleansed a leper. He was so mild and good that he permitted no man to leave him in sorrow. With the consent and sanction of the emperor, who was not unlike him in morale, he held a council at Constantinople, touching the Monothelite heretics; but postponed it until the emperor Constantine returned from the war. As soon as he returned, and the Saracens whom he fought had been rendered taxable and tributary to the Roman Empire, this pope Agatho sent a bishop and a deacon to Constantinople. They were kindly received by Constantine, who admonished them to abandon their disputations and dissensions and bring unity to the two churches. Agatho died in the second year, sixth month and fifteenth day of his pontificate, at the time when eclipses of sun and moon were followed by a pestilence. [Agatho succeeded to the pontificate in 678. Emperor Constantine made overtures for the restoration of that unity which had long been disturbed by dissensions between the patriarchs of Rome and Constantinople on the Monothelite question. The reconciliation now took place according to imperial request. Agatho sent bishops and clergy as his representatives to attend a general council at Constantinople (Sixth General Council, 680-1), armed with a synodal epistle from himself. These representatives took an active part in the council proceedings condemning the Monothelite doctrines and their principal supporters, including Bishop Honorius who was denounced as a heretic. At this Council the head of the Roman see received that title of an ecumenical pope, or universal bishop, which two of his predecessors had condemned when applied to a patriarch of Constantinople. Agatho's compliance was repaid by the emperor's agreeing to forego, in future, his claim to a fee for imperial confirmation of Roman bishop].

Leo, the second pope of that name, a Sicilian whose father was Paul, a man highly learned in the Latin and Greek tongues, was so well informed and experienced in music that he wrote the music for the Psalms, and reduced the hymns to better harmony. He ordained that in the mass the peace [Pax Vobiscum is Latin for, 'Peace be with you,' a form of salutation frequently used in the office of the ancient Christian church. First: It was usual for the bishop to salute the people in this form at his first entrance into the church. This is mentioned by Chrysostom, who derives it from apostolic practice. Secondly: The reader began the reading of the lessons with this form. The Third Council of Carthage took this privilege away from the reader and gave it to the deacons, or other superior ministers of the church. Thirdly: In many places the sermon was introduced with this form of salutation, and often ended with it. Fourthly: It was always used at the consecration of the Eucharist; and lastly at the dismissal of the congregation. Whenever pronounced by the officiating minister, the people always answered, 'And with your spirit.' Chrysostom explains the original intent through an ancient custom in the days of the apostles, when the rulers of the Church had the gift of inspiration, for the people to say to the preacher, 'Peace be with your spirit': thereby acknowledging that they were under the guidance of the Spirit of God. In the English liturgy an equivalent salutation is used, namely, 'The Lord be with you'; to which the people answer, 'And with your (thy) spirit']. should be given to the people. He accepted the decrees of the Sixth Council, and denounced those whom the Council had condemned with the sanction of the emperor. He permitted baptism on any day, as necessity might require. He also ordained that one elevated to the office of archbishop should not pay a fee for the pallium, [Pall, or Pallium, signifies a cloak thrown over the shoulders. It afterward came to denote a sort of cape, and from this came the ecclesiastical designation in the western church. It was originally only a stole wound round the neck, with the ends hanging down behind and before. The pall was part of the imperial habit, and was originally granted by the emperors to the patriarchs. Thus Constantine gave the use of the pall to the bishop of Rome; and Anthimus, patriarch of Constantinople, being ousted from his see, is said to have returned the pall to Justinian; which implies that he had received it from him. And the reason of the royal consent in this manner seems to be because it was high treason to wear any part of the imperial habit without license. In later years, when the Roman see had carried its authority to the highest pitch, Innocent III in the Lateran Council, in 1215, decreed the pall a mark and distinction, intimating the plenitude of the apostolic power, and that neither the function nor title of archbishop should be assumed without it; and this, not only when a bishop was preferred to archbishop, but likewise in translations, or removals of archbishops from one see to another. It was likewise decreed that every archbishop be buried in his pall so that his successor might make no use of it, but be obliged to apply to the pope for another. By this means the court of Rome brought vast sums of money into its coffers. An archbishop of the Roman church, although consecrated and in possession, cannot before he has petitioned for, and received and paid for the pallium, either call himself archbishop or perform such acts of importance as summoning a council, or visiting his province]. or other office of the church. If only this were observed at the present day, for through such payments evils spring up daily. [One of the extremely rare personal comments by Schedel in the , in this case provoked by his anger over the practice of simony in the late 15th century]. Leo, the good and mild man, died in the tenth month of his pontificate, and was buried, mourned by mankind as a faithful father to all, in the Basilica of Peter on the fourth day of the Kalends of July. After his death the bishop's seat was vacant for 11 months and 21 days. [Leo II was elected to the pontificate, and confirmed in his election by Constantine, under the title of "The most holy and blessed archbishop of old Rome, and universal pope," in the year 682. In an epistle to the emperor this pontiff solemnly accepted the decrees of the Sixth General Council, and denounced, among other heretics, his predecessor Honorius, as having failed to purify his apostolic Church by apostolic doctrine, but rather, by base teachers, having polluted its previously unspotted faith. He repeated the same emphatic condemnation of Honorius in epistles to the bishop of Spain, to a nobleman of that country, and to the king Erwig. In return the emperor subjugated the archbishop of Ravenna to Rome, and decreed that every newly elected archbishop of that see should in future be consecrated according to the Roman customs. On this occasion Leo reversed the law of Gregory I, that a bishop about to be consecrated should not pay any fee to the ecclesiastical offices of Rome for the pall; but he forbade (as his predecessor Adeodatus had also done) the annual commemoration of the archbishop Maurice, who had so resolutely maintained his independence of Rome. Thus the ancient rights of the archbishop of Ravenna were entirely taken away. The bishop of Rome, in union with the emperor, and in a good understanding with the Greek Church, was more than a match for such an opponent].

Year of the World 5883 | Year of Christ 684

Pope Benedict (Benedictus) the Younger or the Second, a Roman whose father was John (Joanne), and pope, was a soldier of Christ from youth, and, so zealously devoted himself to the Holy Scriptures that he was held in exceptional esteem for his learning, ability, and practice in divine matters, as well as on account of his graciousness, goodness and mercy toward mankind, particularly the poor. By the piety of this man Constantine was so moved that he sent him a confirmation to the effect that all mankind regard him who was thus elected pope by the clergy, the people, and the nobles, as the true vicar and ruler of the Christian faith. He improved many churches, and died in the tenth month and twelfth day of his pontificate, and was buried at Saint Peter's on the Ides of May. And he, since his life was dear to everyone, was celebrated by everyone as a saint, deservedly so for his beneficent human nature. After his death the seat was vacant for two months and fifteen days. [Benedict II succeeded Leo in 683, but his consecration was delayed for a year after his election, waiting for the imperial confirmation. It was probably the frequent occurrence of such delays that led Constantine to ordain that in the future newly-elected bishops be consecrated immediately without waiting for such confirmation. This, however, did not dispense with the necessity of confirmation, for confirmation as declared necessary by succeeding emperors. Constantine regarded Benedict as his personal friend].

Pope John (Ioannes) the Fifth, a Syrian of Antioch whose father was Cyriacus, was elected pope at the time of Constantine's death. He was a man of exceptional Christian life, mild, and possessed of wisdom in the Scriptures. He was elected by the people and consecrated in the Church of Salvatore, which is called Constantiniana at the Lateran, in the same manner as Pope Leo II—by three bishops, namely, of Ostia (Hostiensi), Porto (Portuensi) and Velitrae (Veliterno), a custom which was observed by his successors. After having written a booklet on the pallium, he died in the first year of his pontificate, and was buried at Saint Peter's on the 4th day of the Nones of August. After his death seat was vacant two months and 18 days. [John V, a Syrian by birth, was papal legate to the Sixth Ecumenical Council held at Constantinople in 680. He succeeded Benedict II as pope in 685, retaining the office for a year].

Folio CLVII recto

Constantine (Constantinus), son of the emperor Constans, received the Roman sovereignty after Constans and Mezezius (Mesentio); and he reigned seventeen years. This Constantine (who previously had been taken into the sovereignty by his father Constans as an associate) was so crushed by fear after the assassination of his father (as mentioned above) that he managed all matters so timidly that he might have lost the sovereignty if any force had been raised against him. Later he was a brave and very virtuous Christian man, and after receiving the sovereignty, he shared it in common with his brothers Heraclius and Tiberius whom he took into it with him. However, some write that he deprived his brothers of their noses, although they did not aspire to the sovereignty. Afterwards he restored the churches which had been destroyed by the heretics in the time of Heraclius; and he also built other churches. Being a warlike man and experienced in the use of arms, he defeated the Saracens, enemies of the Roman Empire, in war; and in the tenth year of his reign he so overcame the Saracens by a speedy victory that they chose to pay taxes and tribute to the empire. Upon these terms he made peace with them, and returned to Constantinople. To bring about unity between the Roman church and the other churches he called the Sixth Council at Constantinople at the suggestion of Agatho, the pope. And now being full of good works, he died at Constantinople, leaving his son Justinian as his successor to the sovereignty. [Constantine IV, Pogonatus (the "bearded"), son of Constans II, was emperor from 668 to 685. After his accession he crushed an Armenian usurper in Sicily. The Arabs besieged Constantinople for six years, but were finally obliged to make peace, and agreed to pay tribute for 30 years. The attacks of the Slavs and Avars upon Thessalonica were repulsed. But Constantine was unable to keep out the Bulgars who crossed the Danube and established the Bulgarian kingdom in his territory. The tribute paid by the Arabs was used to purchase the good will of the new settlers. Constantine summoned the Sixth Ecumenical Council at Constantinople, which sat from November 7, 680 to September 16, 681].

The Sixth Ecumenical Council was called by the emperor Constantine at Constantinople. Two legates of Pope Agatho were present, namely, John, the bishop of Portuensis, and John, a deacon of the Roman Church. And so, at the command of the emperor, came two hundred eighty-nine bishops. The case of the Monothelite heretics was earnestly considered. Contrary to the true Christian faith, these heretics held that there was but a single will in Christ. Two bishops were responsible for these things—George (Georgius), of Constantinople, and Macarius (Marcharius), bishop of Antioch. And although George, after the presentation of sensible views was easily dissuaded from his error, Macarius, was tenacious in strongly resistant to changing his mind; for this reason he was not only deprived of his episcopate, but, together with the deceased heretics Sergius, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, their followers in the same error, was given over to the Satan. Finally, together with a number of relatives, they were sent to Rome. Theophanus, the abbot, was installed as bishop in the place of Macarius. Now, in thanksgiving to the Lord God for the unification of the two churches, the aforesaid bishop of Porto (Portuensis) held the office of the holy mass in Latin on the eighth day of Easter in the Basilica of Saint Sophia in the presence of the emperor, the patriarch, and the people of Constantinople; and all present acknowledged that such was the correct and holy manner of holding the mass. In this Council it was concluded that according to the correct interpretation of holy Christian teaching there were two natures and wills in Christ, and not a single one as claimed by the Monothelite heretics. [The Sixth Ecumenical council (680-1) was convened at Constantinople by the emperor Constantine IV to terminate the Monothelite controversy. All the Patriarchates were represented, Constantinople and Antioch by their bishops in person, the others by legates. The council approved the first five ecumenical councils. Monothelism was condemned; Christ was declared to have had "two natural wills and two natural operations, without division, conversion, separation or confusion." Prominent Monothelites, living or dead, were anathematized, in particular Sergius and his successors in the see of Constantinople, the former pope Honorius, and Macarius, the patriarch of Antioch. An imperial decree confirmed the council, and commanded the acceptance of its doctrines under pain of severe punishment. The Monothelites fled to Syria, where they gradually formed the sect of the Maronites].

A comet appeared in these times for three months continuously; then came a heavy rain, and thunderbolts not experienced before. The elements performed as if they had conspired to destroy the city of Rome and the land of Italy. Much cattle died in consequence, and the people sustained great damage. Many men were struck by lightning and died. Crops wilted and dried up in the fields, so that melons, beans, lentils, and the like were a great rarity to the people; and the grain was beaten out by the wind, and matured as mere shrubbery.

Afterwards eclipses of the sun and moon were followed by a severe pestilence that devastated the city of Pavia, so that the people fled to the mountain heights, and the city grew up with shrubbery and weeds.

Folio CLVII verso

Conon, a native of Thrace and reared in Sicily, was elected pope. He was a pious man and well worthy of such a high office. When the Romans wanted to elect Peter the archbishop, and the army wanted to elect Theodorus, they finally unanimously elected this Conon through divine admonition; for in morals, in his knowledge of the Scriptures, in goodness, in piety and in worthiness, he was a renowned and praiseworthy man. Some called him an angelic man by reason of his venerable old age and honesty. He was a man of full understanding, of exceptional discretion and righteousness, and of more than human firmness and intelligence. But soon after he entered upon the pontificate, he became weak. Immediately, then, Paschal, the archbishop and custodian of the papal treasury, coveting the pontificate, tempted John (Ioannem), the exarch of Italy, with money, to assist him in securing the pontificate upon the death of Conon. The exarch took the money, but did not perform what he promised. Conon died in the 11th month and third day of his pontificate, and was buried in Saint Peter's on the 11th day of the Kalends of October. The seat then was vacant for two months and 23 days. [After the death of John V, the election of a new pope was contested; the clergy, magistrates and other influential citizens supporting one candidate, and the general of the army favoring another. At length all parties agreed to reject both and to elect one Conon, an aged presbyter. He died in 687, leaving (as many of his predecessors had done) a rich legacy to the clergy and the monasteries. His archdeacon Paschal, who was charged with the distribution of this treasure did not scruple to offer it as a bribe to the exarch John, with a view to securing his election to the vacant see. John used his influence at Rome for this purpose. However, the election favored a rival candidate, Sergius, whom Paschal himself was obliged to acknowledge as bishop. At the invitation of Paschal, however, the exarch came to Rome with the view of setting aside the election of Sergius; but, finding this impossible, he secured his own interest by compelling the newly elected bishop to give him the hundred pounds of gold which had been promised him by Paschal. In order to raise this money, and to excite dissatisfaction at the proceeding, Sergius pledged the costly lamps that had previously been suspended before the tomb of St. Peter].

Pope Sergius, a Syrian whose father was Tiberius (Tyberio), came from Antioch to Rome in the time of Pope Adeodatus. He was called to the Roman priesthood, and because of his knowledge of the Scriptures and of the mysteries of divine matters, he became so well known that he was elected pope after Conon; but not without dissension, for the Roman people favored Theodore the archbishop, while others named Paschal at the instigation of the exarch. But when both factions met at the Lateran, the clergy and the people united upon Sergius in the election. Later, he would not subscribe to the action of the Emperor Justinian's council; for this reason the emperor ordered Sergius to be brought to him in chains. But the soldiers of Italy would not permit this. Having attained peace of mind, he turned his attention to the improvement of the churches, including noteworthy additions to the Basilica of Peter. He found a portion of the holy cross in a small metal trunk or chest. This pope ordained that at the breaking of the body of Christ [The body of Christ (corpus Christi), as represented by the consecrated bread used in the communion. After the communion a linen cloth, called the corporal was spread over the unconsumed portion of the bread. This was in common use in the Church in the 5th century, the purpose being to represent the body of Christ as wrapped up in fine linen by Joseph of Arimathea. According to the English Order of the Holy Communion, "When all have communicated, the minister shall turn to the Lord's table, and reverently place upon it what remaineth of the consecrated elements, covering the same with a fair linen cloth."], the Agnus Dei should be sung three times. He died in the 13th year, eighth month, and 23rd day of his pontificate, and was buried, lamented by all, in the Basilica of Peter on the 6th day of the Ides of September. The seat then was vacant one month and twenty days. [Sergius, pope from 687 to 701, came of an Antiochene family that had settled at Palermo, Sicily. He was elected after a fierce struggle between two other candidates, Paschal and Theodore, as explained in the note to Conon (this Folio, above). Considering the weakness of the Greek emperors on the one hand, and the ambition of the Roman pontiffs on the other, it was not likely that a good understanding would long subsist between the Eastern and Western churches; and under the pontificate of Sergius a rupture took place. Justinian II caused a general council to assemble at Constantinople in 691 to complete the acts of the fifth and sixth councils previously held; and from this circumstance the new council is sometimes called the Quinisextine. Some of the canons of this council were highly offensive to the Church of Rome. By the 13th canon permission was given the inferior clergy to continue in a state of matrimony. The 2nd ordained that 85 apostolic canons should be received as genuine. The 36th repealed the celebrated canon of Chalcedon, and a canon of the 1st Council of Constantinople, enacting that the patriarchs of old and new Rome should possess equal privileges, but assigning superiority of rank to the former. The 56th repeated one of the apostolic canons, which provided that no ecclesiastic should fast on a Sunday or a Sabbath (except one in the holy week) under penalty of deposition, and no layman under penalty of excommunication; and this law, said the council, shall be observed in the church of Rome, in which there had previously been fasting on the Sabbath, contrary to ecclesiastical regulations. The 57th canon prohibited the use of animal blood in the preparation of food. The 82nd forbade the ancient custom of representing "Christ our God in the figure of a lamb," declaring it more seemly to represent him as a perfect man, for the purpose of exciting feelings of devotion. The emperor sent a copy of the decrees of the council to Sergius for his subscription, but Sergius would not even permit the decrees to be read in public, declaring he would rather die than consent to these innovations. Enraged by this refusal, the emperor sent Zacharias, the commander of his bodyguard, to Rome, with orders to bring Sergius to Constantinople. The pontiff was, however, protected by the soldiers stationed at Ravenna and in the district of Pentapolis and its neighborhood, who refused to suffer him to be carried away. They even repaired to Rome, where Zacharias, in fear of his life, fell at the feet of Sergius, imploring his protection. His life was spared, but the soldiers were not appeased until they had driven him from the city with demonstrations of contempt and destation. About this time (695) the emperor was deposed, and no notice was taken of the indignity to his officer. The Quinisextine decrees were never received by the Church of Rome. Servius was succeeded by John VI as pope].

John (Ioannes), the sixth pope of this name, a native of Greece, became pope when Theophylactus (Theophilatius) came to Italy; and he made no small amount of improvement in the houses of worship. Being a good man, he ransomed many prisoners with funds from the common treasury of the Church. He died in the third year and third month of his pontificate as, some will have it, a martyr, but by whom he was martyred is not known. Certain people state that he was buried in the Sebastian catacombs on the Appian Way. After his death the seat was then vacant one month and nineteen days. [John VI, pope from 701 to 705, was a native of Greece, and succeeded to the pontificate two months after the death of Sergius I. He assisted the exarch Theophylactus, who had been sent into Italy by the Eastern emperor Justinian II; but when the exarch arrived at Rome, the soldiers again assembled, as they had done in the defense of Sergius, and would have attacked the exarch but for the interference of John, who shut the gates, and sent some of his clergy to quell the disorder. Bower says the exarch was about to depose the pope, but the probability is that the soldiers were merely irritated by recollection of the past, and were excited by their own ungrounded fears regarding the exarch's visit. So great was the weakness of the imperial government in Italy at this period, that it could not prevent the irruptions of the Lombards in the Greek territory. Gisulf (or Gusulf), the Lombard duke of Benevento, now plundered and laid waist Campania, and even approached Rome. John induced him to retire, and ransomed the captives whom he had taken].

Pope John (Ioannes) the Seventh, a Greek whose father was Plato, became pope when Justinian returned to Constantinople and ordered Tiberius (Tyberium) and Leontius, by whom he had been ousted from the sovereignty, put to death in the presence of the people. This John was a well-spoken and pious man, and built a chapel in the Basilica of Peter in honor of the Mother of God; and in it the walls, on the right and left, were ornamented with the portraits of certain holy fathers in relief. He also made various improvements and beautifications in the churches. He died in the second year, seventh month and 17th day of his pontificate, and was buried on the 15th day of the Kalends of November in the Basilica of Peter before the altar of the Mother of God that he himself had built. After his death the seat was vacant three months. [John VII, pope from 705 to 707, successor to John VI, was also of Greek nationality. Justinian being now restored, sent to him two metropolitans, requesting him to convene a council, to confirm such of the Quinisextine decrees as pleased him, and to reject the others. But John was too politic to do either one or the other. He was succeeded by Sisinnus].

Pope Sisinnius (Sysimus) or, as others will have it, Sosimus, a native of Syria whose father was John, was in his pontificate only 20 days. Although he had the gout in hands and feet, so that he could neither walk nor take any food, he was so attentive to the affairs of the Roman state and Christian matters of public concern, that he neglected nothing during his pontificate, which became a pious man; for he provided all the material with which the walls of the city and the old dilapidated churches were improved. But he was taken by a sudden death, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the 8th day of the Ides of November. The seat was then vacant one month and 18 days. [Sisinnus was pontiff for only twenty days. During this brief period he set about repairing the walls of Rome—a patriotic and useful undertaking by which he sought to obtain the good will and respect of the citizens, but which did not imply temporal sovereignty. The Romans had come to regard the bishop as their protector rather than the imperial general, and they had more regard for the resident bishop than the weak emperor residing at a distance. At this time the throne at Constantinople was occupied by the weak and despised Justinian II].

Folio CLVIII recto

Justinian (Justinianus) the Second or Younger, son of the aforesaid Constantine, remained in the sovereignty for the first time for ten years after his father. At first he was good, intelligent, careful, and generous distributor of alms. In consequence he greatly enhanced the Constantinopolitan sovereignty, and made many laws respected by the godly Christian clergy. After he had reigned ten years he brought Africa from under the power of the Saracens, and made peace with them on land and sea. Likewise, he recovered from the Saracens Africa and Lybia, which his father had lost. When Gizites, the Saracen, died, he was succeeded by Baldalan, and when he heard that Justinian had acquired the sovereignty with the consent of all the provinces, he voluntarily offered him peace; under the terms of which Africa and Lybia were returned to the empire. And some write that in the same treaty there was a condition that the Saracens should pay the Roman tribute for ten years at the rate of one thousand golden coins per day and one servant from among their people, and one horse. In the meantime Justinian began to employ surprising fickleness toward the people, and contrary to the treaty of peace, he attacked the Saracens and Bulgarians; but of them he received more vexations than he had given them credit for. Immediately, then, he returned to Constantinople, where he was despised by all the citizens because he did not silence the cruelty of the exarches. And he held a council, in which a number of things were done contrary to Christian usage, and which Pope Sergius would not confirm. For this reason the emperor became enraged against the pope, and ordered him brought before him in chains. This, however, the soldiers of Italy would not permit to be done. Among the people there rose up against the emperor one Leontius (Leoncius), the Constantinopolitan senator, together with Gallinicus, the patriarch. Leontius incited the people to arms, and broke open the prisons and released the prisoners. He took Justinian prisoner, cut off his nose, and sent him into exile. [Justinian II, surnamed Rhinotmetus ('the slit-nosed'), Eastern Roman emperor, from 685 to 695, and from 704 to 711, succeeded his father Constantine IV at the age of sixteen. His reign was unhappy both at home and abroad. He made a truce with the Arabs, which admitted them to the joint possession of Armenia, Iberia and Cyprus, while by removing 12,000 Christian Mardaites from their native Lebanon, he gave the Arabs a command over Asia Minor of which they took advantage in 692 by conquering all Armenia. In 689 Justinian was defeated by the Bulgarians, but settled many Slavs in Asia Minor. Meanwhile the bitter dissensions caused in the church by the emperor, his bloody persecution of the Manicheans, and the rapacity with which, through his creatures Stephanus and Theodatus, he extorted the means of gratifying his sumptuous tastes and his mania for erecting costly buildings, drove his subjects into rebellion. In 695 they rose under Leontius, who cut off the emperor's nose (thus his surname) with the intent of forever preventing his return to power (an unblemished appearance being a requirement of Imperial rule), and banished him to Cherson in the Crimea].

Leontius (Leoncius), or, as others would have it, Emperor Leo the Second, after deposing Justinian assumed the sovereignty; and he reigned 3 years. When news of the revolt in the empire reached Habdimelech, the Saracen king, he undertook to attack Africa. Leontius sent John (Ioannem), a general of the army, to oppose him. He drove the Saracens completely out of Africa. However, before long, when another revolt occurred, they made Tiberius, a citizen of Constantinople, emperor. Tiberius speedily sailed to Constantinople, taking Leontius prisoner, as Leontius had done with Justinian. [Leontius (Leo II); see further note to Justinian, below].

Tiberius, the third emperor of this name, reigned seven years after the taking and imprisonment of Leontius (Leoncio). He was a very noble citizen of Constantinople, and was elected emperor during a revolt, as mentioned above; and he sent Philippus, a citizen of Constantinople, into exile because he had said that he had a dream that an eagle had overshadowed the head of Tiberius. This Tiberius was later deposed, as will be related below. [Tiberius III; see further note to Justinian, below].

Justinian (Justinianus), former emperor, with the aid of the Bavarians [Here and elsewhere in this paragraph, Schedel (or his source) has confused Bavarians with Khazars. Justinian received no help from the Bavarians]. and Bulgarians, again returned to Constantinople, and reigned six years. In the beginning of the pontificate of John (Ioannis) the Sixth, and while at Cherson (to which city he had been banished), Justinian determined to recover the sovereignty. Immediately the citizens who had supported Tiberius, prepared to fight Justinian; but Justinian came secretly and fled to the Bavarians, whose king espoused his daughter to him. However, at the expiration of a year the aforesaid Tiberius, by the use of money, so changed the attitude of the king that he was about to give up his guest and son-in-law. When Justinian became aware of this he fled to the king of Bulgaria, placing himself under his protection. With this king's help, and by the aid of arms, Justinian returned to Constantinople; and there he ordered Leontius and Tiberius put to death, while he caused Gallinicus, the patriarch, to be deprived of his eyesight and sent to Rome; and as often as he blew his cut-off nose, he caused one of his opponents to be hacked to pieces. Afterwards he and his son Tiberius were struck down. [Leontius, after a reign of three years, was in turn dethroned and imprisoned by Tiberius III, who next assumed the purple. Justinian meanwhile had escaped from Cherson, and married Theodora, sister of Bursus, khan of the Khazars. Compelled, however, by the intrigues of Tiberius, to leave his new home, he fled to Terbelis, king of the Bulgarians. Being provided with an army of 15,000 horsemen, Justinian suddenly pounced upon Constantinople, slew his rivals, Leontius and Tiberius, with thousands of their partisans, and once more ascended the throne (704). His second reign was marked by an unsuccessful war against Terbelis; by Arab victories in Asia Minor; by devastating expeditions against his own cities of Ravenna and Cherson, where he inflicted horrible punishment upon the disaffected nobles and refugees; and by the same cruel rapacity toward his subjects. Conspiracies again broke out, and Bardanes, surnamed Philippicus, assumed the purple; and Justinian, last of the house of Heraclius, was assassinated in Asia Minor in December 711].

Folio CLVIII verso

A Council was held at this time at Aquilaeia to consider whether the action of the Fifth Council, previously held at Constantinople, should be accepted. The said Fifth Council was held in the time of Pope Julius [Schedel or his source is wrong here, since the Fifth Ecumenical Council took place during the time of Justinian I (reigned 527-565) and Pope Vigilius (whose papacy was 537-555), not Pope Julius (337-352)]. and the emperor Justinian, against Theodore and all heretics who held that Mary bore but a human being, and not a man and God. So in the same Council it was ordained that the holy Mary should be called the Mother of God, because she bore not a mere man, but the true God and man.

Theodore (Theodorus), an archbishop of the English, highly learned and pious, flourished in England at this time; and he wrote many excellent things, notably a book on the subject of penances applicable to every case.

Theodore, seventh archbishop of Canterbury, was born, like Paul, at Tarsus, in Cilicia in 602; but he lived at Rome as a monk. He was a man of good life and profound learning, in consideration of which he was called 'the Philosopher.' The kings of Kent and Northumbria had sent one Wighard, who had been elected archbishop of Canterbury, to Pope Vitalian for consecration. Wighard had hardly reached Rome when he and his attendants died. Theodore was consecrated in his stead in 668 at the age of 66 years, and reached England in 689. According to Bede he turned the whole of Anglo-Saxon England, reforming abuses and giving instruction as to the monastic rule and the canonical Easter. According to the same authority he was the first bishop to whom all the 'church of the Angles' submitted. In 673 he presided at the first synod of the clergy in England, which was held at Hertford. After this council he revived the East Saxon bishopric. He also attended other councils. Theodore took great pains to introduce church music throughout England, for until then church song had been used only at Canterbury. One of the authentic monuments of his zeal is a penitential composed under his direction – a collection of moral and penal institutes known as the Liber Poenentialis. It reveals the moral disorders of the times, and the efforts of the church to correct them. It embodies the entire penal system of the Germanic laws, founded on the principle that required a punishment for every offense. It is not intended as a code of ecclesiastical law, but, according to the preface, it is a collection of answers to questions asked on the subject of penance; and to this are added, in a second book, answers on the whole range of ecclesiastical laws and discipline.

Theodore died in 690, at the age of 88, after an episcopate of 22 years. No bishop before him had labored so much for the intellectual development of the native clergy, or for the union of the different Anglo-Saxon dynasties. He may well be reckoned among the founders of the English Church.

Saint Theodore, bishop of Augustudiensis, [This probably refers to Augustodunum, now Autun, which succeeded Bibracte as the capital of the Aedui when Gaul was reorganized by Augustus. Autun is on the Arroux, a tributary of the Loire, but it occupies only a part of the site of Augustodunum. The most curious of the many relics of antiquity found at Autun was an ancient chart or map, cut on marble, and since buried, it is said, under the foundations of a house. Eumenius speaks of such maps. "Let the youth see in these porticoes, and let them daily contemplate all lands and all seas – the sites of all places with their names, spaces, intervals, marked down;" which clearly shows that there were such maps or delineations for the use of the youth at Autun]. was also illustrious at this time.

Lambert (Lambertus), the holy man, suffered martyrdom at this time at Liege (Leodium) because he had denounced Pepin (Pipinum), the duke, for having had intercourse with Alpheid (Alpiadis) as a concubine, beside his lawful wife; although some say that the brother or this Alpheid himself practiced this evil, and was later eaten up by head-lice. This Lambert, born of rich and noble parents, and instructed in the Scriptures from youth, was so loved by the people for his piety that they elevated him to bishop of Utrecht (Traiectensi) after Theodard, his master. When Childeric, who elevated him to princely office, was assassinated, evil persons robbed him of his dignity and placed Faramund (Pharamundus) in his place. For that reason Lambert, taking with him two boys, went into a monastery, where he lived a commendable life for seven years. But Faramund was afterward expelled and Lambert reinstated; and many a person was converted to God by his example and learning. Once upon a time, while lying crosswise on his bed, he was slain at Liege by evil persons, and secretly carried on a ship to the Episcopal church; and because of his enemies he was quickly buried. But Saint Chumbertus, his successor, pursuant to divine admonition, transferred the body of Saint Lambert from Utrecht to Liege in a great glory of miracles.

Lambert was born at Maastricht, in the Netherlands, of noble parents, belonging to a powerful family. He was born between 636 and 638, and was given to Landoald to educate during his youth. When he grew older he was entrusted to Theodard, bishop of Maastricht. On the latter's death Lambert succeeded him as bishop (670). His integrity and intelligence made him a favorite of Childeric II; but when that prince was assassinated, Lambert was driven from the see by Ebroin, mayor of the palace, who placed an intrusive prelate, Faramund, a canon of Cologne, in his room. Lambert retired to Stavelot in 674, with two servants. He spent seven years there in strict observance of the rules of the monastery. But the murder of Ebroin led to a new revolution of the wheel of fortune. Pepin of Herstal became mayor of the palace, Faramund was expelled from Maastricht, and Lambert reinstated (681). Lambert at once set to work preaching the gospel among the people of Campine. With his great zeal and gentleness he won their hearts, and brought them in crowds to baptism. He did not rest until he had planted churches throughout the region and placed a clergy in them.

Lambert's relatives resented every invasion of the lands belonging to the see; and when some wrong was done to the possessions of Lambert by two members of a powerful family, the members of his family fell upon them and killed them. One Dodo, a relative of the slain men, was an attendant on Pepin of Herstal. He and the rest of his clan resolved on revenge. Hearing that Lambert was at Liege, they went there and murdered him. This is the story as given by the two earliest biographers of Lambert; but later it was thought his fame might be enhanced if a different motive was alleged. It was pretended that Lambert had denounced the intercourse of Pepin of Herstal with Alpheid, the sister of his wife Plectrudis; and that in revenge for this, Alpheid set the murderers to kill the bishop. But there is no evidence that this was the case.

Bede (Beda), an English priest and monk, whose surname is the Venerable, and who was very well versed in the Latin and Greek tongue to no mean extent, performed no small measure of labor for the Christian life in the Year of the Lord 692. At the age of thirty he was consecrated as a priest; and although he was born in the most remote corner of the earth, yet he was illustrious throughout the world; for he did not cease preaching, teaching and writing even in his old age. For 59 years he studied and wrote books, and was never found idle. Because of his courage and honorable life he was surnamed the Venerable. Being a highly educated man, he wrote many things of good Christian service. He died at the age of 72, full of good works. The learned men, Strabo and Haymus, were his brothers.

Bede (also Beda or Baeda) (672/673-735), English historian and theologian. Of Bede, commonly called 'the Venerable Bede,' almost all that we know is contained in the short autobiographical notice which he has appended to his Ecclesiastical History:

This much concerning the ecclesiastical history of Britain, and especially of the race of the English, I, Baeda, a servant of Christ and priest of the monastery of the blessed apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, which is at Wearmouth and Jarrow, have with the Lord's help composed, so far as I could gather it, either from ancient documents, or from the tradition of the elders, or from my own knowledge. I was born in the territory of the said monastery, and at the age of seven I was, by the care of my relations, given to the reverend Abbot Benedict (Biscop), and afterwards to Ceolfried, to be educated. From that time, I have spent the whole of my life within that monastery, devoting all my pains to the study of the Scriptures; and amid the observance of monastic discipline, and the daily charge of singing to the church, it has ever been my delight to learn or teach or write. In my 19th year I was admitted to the diaconate, in my 30th to the priesthood, etc. From the time of my admission to the priesthood to my (present) 59th year, I have endeavored for my own use and for that of my brethren, to make brief notes upon the Holy Scriptures, either out of the works of the venerable fathers, or in conformity with their meaning and interpretation.

Then follows a list of his works that had been composed up to that time. As the Ecclesiastical History was written in 731, we obtain the following dates for the principal events in Bede's uneventful life: birth 672-673; priest 702-703.

It is in his works that we must look to know Bede. They fall into three classes: (1) scientific; (2) historical; (3) theological. The first comprises works on grammar, one on natural phenomena, and two on chronology and the calendar. These last were inspired largely by the Paschal question, which was the subject of bitter controversy between the Roman and Celtic churches in the 7th century. They form a natural transition to the second class. In this the chief place is held by the Ecclesiastical History of the English Nation. By this Bede has justly earned the title of the Father of English History, and by it, almost exclusively he is known to others than professed students. His style is simple and unaffected and he has shown unusual conscientiousness in collecting and setting forth his material, distinguishing between what he believed to be the fact, and what he regarded only as rumor or tradition.

Several quaint legends have been handed down as to the origin of the epithet "venerable", generally attached to his name; but probably it is a mere survival of a title commonly given to priests in his day. It has given rise to a false idea that he lived to a great age—some say 90. He was probably 63 when he died.

The body of Saint Benedict is said to have been stolen at this time from Monte Cassino and carried to Gaul. Or, as others write, it was carried from Monte Cassino to the Florentine (Floriacenum) Monastery together with his sister, Scholastica by a monk named Aigulfus. [The last sentence of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Pepin (Pipinus), a duke and governor of Austrasia, or, as others will have it, of Austeria, nicknamed the Ancient or the Short, laid the foundation for occupying the kingdom of France; and with him the celebrated name of Carolingian had its beginning. For when he learned that Bertari (Bertarium), an ignoble man (of whom Theodoric, the king of France, made use) was hated by the people, he assembled a mighty army and marched into Gaul and routed Theodoric and Bertari who had come forth to meet him. When Bertari fled, Theodoric pronounced Pepin the victor, took him home with him and made a ruler of him. Now when peace was restored in the kingdom, Pepin put a friend of his clan in charge, and returned to his home. And he reigned there another seven years.

Pepin: The Merovingian successors of Dagobert I were weak and insignificant—mere phantoms of royalty. They were called Rois-faineants ('Do-nothing-kings') – a designation fully expressing their character for the next century. The real power was exercised by the bishops and nobles, and particularly by the king's minister, the Mayor of the Palace. He was a noble chosen by his order to be the king's advisor in peace and the commander of the royal army in war, for the purpose of aiding the nobles in their efforts for the restriction of the royal power. Under the feeble Merovingian kings who succeeded Dagobert I, the Mayors of the Palace were the real sovereigns of France. One of the greatest of these rulers was Pepin d'Heristal, grandson of Pepin of Landen. After becoming the real ruler of the kingdom as the Duke of Austrasia, he vanquished the Neustrian nobility at Testry in 687; and thus having inflicted the death-blow upon Merovingian royalty, he made the office of Mayor of the Palace hereditary in his family, and made himself master of France which he governed for 27 years with vigor, prudence and success. His victory established the supremacy of the Teutonic or Germanic element in Gaul. Pepin assumed the title of Duke of the Franks, while the Merovingian king was shown to the people once a year at the Camp de Mars, but was kept in a kind of mild captivity at other times. Pepin d'Heristal died 714. The lineage of the Carolingian Mayors of the Palace is as follows:

- Arnulf, bishop of Metz, and his brother Pepin of Landen, Mayors of Dagobert I.
- Ansegisil, espoused to Pepin's daughter Begga.
- Pepin of Heristal, who died CE 714.
- Charles Martel, that is, Charles the Hammer.
- Pepin the Short, king of France after 754. With him the Carolingian kings begin.

Ferrara (Ferraria), the renowned noble city, located on the ancient river Po (Padus), as the histories say, was first surrounded by walls and beautified around the Year of the Lord 700 by Smaragdus, the exarch of Italy. The origin of its name lies in the fact that from ancient times it was the custom of the archbishops of the churches to name the three regions belonging to their churches after the three metals; as Aureolum, the city of gold; Argenta, the city of silver, and Ferrara, the city of iron. From the time of its building, this city remained on the side of Ravenna and also on that of Rome, against the Lombards; and when the Lombards were defeated by Carolus and the Christian churches were surrendered, Ferrara remained steadfast in its allegiance. Afterwards, at the time when the German emperor began to strive against the churches, this city pursued a wavering course, taking the part of each side in turn. In the 11th century of the Lord, Matilda the countess, with the aid of Venice and Ravenna, took this city from the emperor Henry III, the enemy of the churches. And one hundred twenty-one years later (when the marquises of Este were mighty in friendship and riches at Ferrara), a man of Ferrara, named Salinguerra, at the instigation of the emperor Frederick Barbarosa, took this city, and he reigned there for nineteen years; but in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred forty he was driven out by the Roman Pope Innocent the Fourth with the help and support of the Venetians. Before long the marquises of Este endeavored to subject this city to their rule. But sixty-eight years later, under Pope Clement the Fifth, Azzo, the marquis of Este, espoused Beatrice, the wife of the king of Naples, he was imprisoned by Fresco, his son, at the instance of his stepmother; and with the help of the Venetians the son took Ferrara. When he observed that the Ferrarans were about to submit themselves to the Church, he burnt half the city in revenge. For this wrong the citizens drove him out, giving themselves over to the Venetians in the hope of being faithfully protected by them. And so the marquises were driven out and the Venetians took over the city upon its surrender by the citizens; and the Venetians refused to give it up, although Pope Clement the Fifth placed a ban against the city of Venice, by which all her possessions in Gaul and Britain were severed from her. Nor did they obey the papal command until they were forced to do so by the papal legate with the assistance of the Florentines and King Charles by force of arms. Afterwards Ferrara, under the rule of the family d'Este, was always obedient to the Church, with the condition that it should annually pay to the Roman Church ten thousand golden pieces. Likewise there were various understandings with the Venetians. Under the Roman pontiff Eugenius the Fourth a council was held here. Here also is a university, from which many highly learned men came forth. [Ferrara is a city and archiepiscopal see of Emilia in Italy, and capital of the province of the same name. It is located 30 miles north by northeast of Bologna. Its origin is uncertain, but it was probably a settlement formed by the inhabitants of the lagoons at the mouth of the Po. It first appears in a document of Aistulf of 753 or 754 as a city in the exarchate of Ravenna. After 984 we find it a fief of Tedaldo, count of Modena and Canossa, nephew of the emperor Otto I. Later it made itself independent, and in 1101 the Countess Matilda took it by siege. At this time it was dominated mainly by several great families, among them the Adelardi. In 1146 the property of Guglielmo Adelardi passed as the dowry of his niece Marchessella to Azzolino d'Este. After many struggles Azzo Novello was nominated perpetual podesta in 1242. In 1259 he took Ezzelino of Verona prisoner in battle. His grandson, Obizzo II (1264-1293) succeeded him, and the pope nominated him captain-general and defender of the states of the Church; and the house of Este was from this point on settled in Ferrara. Borso received the fiefs of Modena and Reggio from Frederick III as first duke in 1452, and in 1470 was made duke of Ferrara by Pope Paul II. Ercole I (1471-1505) and his son Alfonso I carried on war with Venice when the was written].

ILLUSTRATION

THE CITY OF WÜRTZBURG (HERBIPOLIS)

This large woodcut, covering all of Folio CLIX verso and half of Folio CLX recto was specially cut for this city, through which, from left to right, passes the river Main. Over this crosses an ancient stone bridge, 650 feet long, adorned with the statutes of saints; also two modern bridges. In the woodcut no means of passage are indicated. On the high elevation at the left, called the Leistenberg, stands the fortress of Marienberg, which from 1261 to 1720 was the residence of the bishops. The architecture throughout is Gothic, and the fortress is exceptionally well done. Numerous churches with tall spires are indicated, showing that the city was long, the capital of an ecclesiastical principality. The imposing Romanesque cathedral with its four towers may be noted in the center of the city. The town is surrounded by walls and is well fortified, and is entered through a toll gate. Beside this appear two men, one of whom is practicing archery. The background consists of barren hills, and there is no indication of the vineyards in the vicinity.

Würzburg (Herbipolis), a distinguished and renowned city of the eastern Franks, or Franconia, is on the river Main, which has its source in the Bohemian Mountains; and there Diana, the pagan goddess, was worshipped until the time of Kilian, the martyr, who instructed the grand duke Gozbert (Gotzbertum) and his subjects in the Christian faith. His son, Duke Hetan, built the first church on an eminence at Würzburg in veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Franconia is level in part, and in part mountainous. The peaks are not high, and the soil is not rich but largely sandy. In many places the hills are covered with vineyards, which bear a good vintage, chiefly at Würzburg. Although this country is divided into many principalities, the Bishop of Würzburg is called Duke of Franconia; and accordingly this noble city is an Episcopal see. When the bishop performs his holy office a bared sword lies before him on the altar. Here also is a hill called Mount of Our Lady [Called Unser Frauenberg in German], upon which is a castle well worth seeing; and there the bishop generally resides. This castle, built on a high elevation, overlooks three plains, and is naturally protected. The fourth region has a bridge and a very deep moat; and here also is a tower, protected round about by bow-windows and breastworks. In the upper reaches of this tower lives a caretaker, who gives warnings by sounding his horn. In it is also a chapel, adorned in honor of God, and containing consecrated altars. Here also are many large and beautiful residences. Underneath the castle are large cellars and stalls. This distinguished city also has three prebendary churches in addition to the cathedral, and four mendicant orders; also the Benedictine Order at Saint Stephan's; the Carthusian Order, the Order of the German Master, the Order of Saint John with the Scots. It also has five convents, an equal number of parsonages, and two hospitals; the Virgin Mary Chapel, with a tower, and wonderfully adorned; as well as beautiful houses and courts of the canons and the citizens. At this time the bishopric of Würzburg is administered by the noble and distinguished bishop, Rudolf von Schernberg (Rudolphus de Schernberg), who now exceeds his ninetieth year, and has endowed the bishopric with countless wealth and a number of estates.

Würzburg, university town and Episcopal see of Bavaria, capital of the province of Lower Franconia, is situated sixty miles southeast of Frankfurt on the Main. The site of the Leistenberg was occupied by a Roman fort, and was probably fortified in the 13th century. Wircebiegum is the old Latin form. The name Herbipolis ('herb town') first appears in the 12th century. The bishopric was probably founded in 741, although the town existed in the previous century. About the 12th century the bishops had ducal authority in Eastern Franconia, and quarrels broke out between them and the citizens. In 1400, after a long struggle, the citizens submitted. Several imperial diets were held here, chief among these being in 1180, when Henry the Lion was placed under the ban. By the peace of Luneville the bishopric was secularized, and in 1803 the city passed to Bavaria. By the peace of Pressburg, in 1805, it passed to Ferdinand, formerly grand duke of Tuscany, who joined the confederation of the Rhine and took the title of grand duke of Würzburg. In 1815 the congress of Vienna restored the city to Bavaria.

A university was founded here in 1403, but existed only a few years. The present one was founded in 1582. Here W.K. Röntgen discovered the "Röntgen rays" in 1896. This city was for a long time the stronghold of the Jesuits in Germany, and the Roman Catholic theological faculty still attracts large numbers. The city is surrounded by vineyards that yield some of the best wine in Germany.

In Merian's anmuthige Städte-Chronik, published in 1642, are to be found some interesting observations concerning the origin of the name of this city. As we place the name Würzburg, the German version, beside the Latin Herbipolis, we are tempted to the conviction that this must have been an herb-town. The English word 'herb' and the Latin herba mean the same thing – springing vegetation, grass, green crops; or colloquially, the word has been applied to herbaceous plants used medicinally—a simple—as herb tea. The term is also applied to aromatic plants.

Speaking of the origin of this city, Merian informs us that the ancients call it Würzburg, Beda Wirceburg, Sigebertus Wirtiburgum and Wirtzburgum. Those who write the name with the letter "U" (as in Würzburg) say that the name is derived from herbs (or the German Gewurtz), or from the mosses which grow extensively about the citadel and on neighboring elevations, and which some also call Wurtz; but this derivation is excluded by the fact that in early times no herbs or vines grew on this site, which was occupied by a dense forest. Others say the name was derived from the citadel, whose lord was named Wiricus, or Wircus, according to existing custom. The ancients more frequently called the place Wirtzburg than Würzburg.

Pope Constantine (Constantinus), by birth a Syrian whose father was John (Ioanne), was a highly learned man and well versed in the Latin and Greek tongues. At the time he became pope there was a three-year-famine at Rome in which Constantine was such a comfort, help and support to the people, chiefly the poor, that they believed him heaven-sent. And because of his good reputation the emperor Justinian wished to see this pope. He sent ships with the request that the pope come to him. Now when Constantine approached the city, Tiberius (Tyberius), son of the emperor, with a large retinue, and Cyrus, the patriarch, with all the clergy, respectfully met him. And the emperor Justinian not only embraced the pope, but in a worshipful attitude kissed his foot. But later on, after said Justinian died, this pope declared Philippicus, the son of said emperor, a heretic. In a council the pope not only overthrew the contentions of the said Philippicus and of John (Ioannis), a monk, but also made known and ordained that the pictures of the holy fathers who were present at the six councils should be designed and painted in the vestibule of Saint Peter's; for he had learned that these portraits had been disrespectfully scraped off the walls in the Church of Saint Sophia at Constantinople. This pope also ordained that the names of heretical emperors were not to be publicly or privately displayed, cast in bronze, silver, or lead. Constantine died in the seventh year and 20th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the third day of the Ides of February. The seat was vacant 1 month and 40 days. [Constantine I, pope from 705 to 715, was a Syrian by birth. He asserted the supremacy of the papal see, and at the command of the emperor Justinian II, visited Jerusalem. However, he rejected the overtures of the emperor, who favored the Monothelite doctrine, and endeavored to gain admission for it into Rome. All Rome was excited with zeal for the orthodox faith, and a picture of the six general councils was hung up at St. Peter's. The name of the emperor was omitted in the public prayers. Civil commotion took place. In 713, however, Philippicus was murdered, and Anastasius, the new emperor, being orthodox, restored peace].

Pope Gregory (Gregorius) the Second, a Roman whose father was Marcellus, was a pious and holy man, and so eloquent and well informed in the Scriptures that he easily overcame those who spoke evil of the Christian faith. In the beginning and before he was elected to the pontifical dignity, he was of such great integrity and faith, that he with others was taken to Constantinople by Constantine, his predecessor. When heated and important disputes took place concerning certain points in the faith, this Gregory answered them so smartly that everyone was amazed at his intelligence and wisdom in the Scriptures. And so he was elected pope to succeed Constantine, although some write that Stephen the Second succeeded the deceased pope. During his pontificate Gregory not only repaired the city walls, but made various improvements in the houses of God. He is also praised for having sent into Germany Boniface and others, through whom the Germans were led from darkness into the light of the faith. In accordance with a council which he held, he placed the ban of a heretic against the emperor Leo for destroying the holy images. After he had encouraged others to virtue and piety by his exemplary life, he died in the sixteenth year, ninth month, and 11th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the third day of the Ides of February. After his death the bishop's seat was vacant 35 days. It is said that during his pontificate he created 148 bishops. [Gregory II, pope from 715 to 731, succeeded Constantine I, whom he accompanied to Constantinople in 710. To spread Christianity in Germany, Gregory gave special encouragement to the mission of a celebrated Anglo-Saxon monk, Winfred (afterward called Boniface), the apostle of the Germans, whom he consecrated in 722. He was a staunch adherent of the Eastern Roman Empire, which still exercised sovereignty over Rome, Ravenna, and other parts of Italy, and he impeded as far as possible the progress of the Lombards. About 726, however, he came into conflict with the emperor Leo, the Isaurian, on account of the excessive taxation of the Italians, and later because of his iconoclastic edicts. It was in the year 726 that the emperor issued the celebrated decree that no image, that is, statue or picture, of Christ, the angels, apostles, saints or martyrs should be worshipped or tolerated in his dominions. Gregory refused to enforce the decree, declaring the whole proceeding heretical, and admonishing every man against compliance with it. Leo endeavored to rid himself of the pope by violence, but Gregory, supported by the people of Rome, and by the Lombards, succeeded in eluding the emperor].

Pope Gregory (Gregorius) the Third, a native of Syria whose father was Joanne, was an exceptional man of Scriptural wisdom and graciousness, and above all, highly versed in the Greek and Latin tongues. He was so well grounded in the meaning of the Scriptures that no one has been found to excel him in the interpretation of hidden and miraculous things. He was such a zealous protector of the true Christian faith that he aroused the ill will and powerful animosity of the great princes and lords; but he did not permit himself to be moved by threats or force of arms. Finally, he was so good that he comforted the poor and aided them in their physical necessities; and he was deservedly called a father and shepherd of the poor. From the moment his pontificate began, he held a council in which he excommunicated the emperor Leo the Third for the aforesaid reasons. He also erected a number of buildings and made improvements in the churches and fortifications at Rome; also erected monasteries and added rules for the monks. At last, well loved by God and men, he died in the tenth year eighth month and 24th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the 4th day of the Kalends of December mourned by all. The seat ceased (to be occupied) only eight days. [Gregory III, pope from 731 to 741, condemned the iconoclasts at a council convened at Rome in 731. He pronounced an anathema against all who should oppose the worship of the images of God, of Christ, his mother, the apostles, and the saints. In defiance of imperial authority Gregory set up in the churches at Rome the most costly images. In 732 or 733 the emperor Leo III equipped a powerful fleet to reduce the refractory Gregory and the rebellious Italian cities, but his fleet was wrecked in the Adriatic].

Philippicus, who was also (called) Bardanes (Bardanus), reigned after Justinian for one year and 6 months. He was a man of great intelligence and great eloquence and ingenuity. When Pope Constantine was leaving Constantinople, he warned the emperor Justinian not to undertake severer measures against this Philippicus whom he had already banished to Cherson; but Justinian would not follow his advice, and sent ships against Philippicus with the intention of slaying him. Justinian moved forward with all the men he could raise in Constantinople and Thrace; and there followed a serious battle in which he and his son Tiberius (Tyberius) were left dead after the dispersion and flight of his men. By this victory Philippicus obtained the sovereignty; and he soon turned away from the Christian papal ordinances, and on the erroneous advice of a heretic, he sent letters to the Roman pope and clergy to bless him in his undertakings. But the pope, together with his clergy, refused to gratify his wishes, and, on the contrary, excommunicated him at the request of the Roman people; and he ordained that neither in matters sacred or profane, nor in any other dealings should his name or his sovereignty be mentioned. And so his rule did not endure for long; for as soon as Pope Constantine died, Philippicus was deposed by a Constantinopolitan citizen named Anthemius, also called Anastasius. Philippicus was taken prisoner, deprived of his sight, and cast into prison. [Philippicus, Roman emperor in the East (711-713), became distinguished as a soldier under Justinian II. His proper name, which indicates his Armenian origin, was Bardanes. He made some pretensions to the throne on the outbreak of the first rebellion against Justinian. These led to his banishment to Cherson by order of Justinian. Here Bardanes successfully incited the inhabitants to revolt, and on their assassination of Justinian assumed the purple. Among his acts were the summoning of a conciliabulum ('unlawful council') of Eastern bishops, which momentarily restored Monothelitism. His domains were attacked at once by Terbelis, king of the Bulgarians in Europe, and the Saracens in Asia. His reign was ended by a military conspiracy].

Anastasius, surnamed Anthemius, reigned as emperor for three years after Philippicus; and, as aforesaid, he deprived the said Philippicus of his sight. He sent letters to the Roman pope offering to act as a strong and mighty protector of the Christian faith. Now after this emperor had offered his respects to the pope, and had received confirmation according to the custom, he began to attack the Saracens as enemies of the Christian faith, and ordered a mighty fleet to proceed against Alexandria; but on the way the generals and captains mutinied and ignored the emperor and deposed him; and his successor, Theodosius, compelled him to accept holy consecration, so that as a consecrated person he could not again aspire to the sovereignty. [Anastasius II, Roman emperor in the East, whose original name was Artemius (not, as the has it, Anthemius), was raised to the throne of Constantinople in 713, on the deposition of Philippicus, whom he had served in the capacity of secretary. Anastasius sent an army under Leo the Isaurian, afterwards emperor, to defend Syria against the Saracens; adopted wise and resolute measures for the defense of his capital; attempted to reorganize the discipline of the army; and equipped and dispatched to Rhodes a formidable naval force. The troops of the Opsician province, resenting the emperor's strict measures, mutinied, killed the admiral, and proclaimed Theodosius emperor. After a six months' siege, Constantinople was taken by Theodosius; and Anastasius, who had fled to Nicaea, was compelled to submit to the new emperor, and retiring to Thessalonica, became a monk (716). In 721 he headed a revolt against Leo, who had succeeded Theodosius; but though he besieged Constantinople, the enterprise failed, and Anastasius, falling into Leo's hands, was put to death by his orders].

Theodosius, the third of that name, ruled the empire for one year after Anastasius. He was not of noble birth, but a scribe in the public revenues. But having attained the sovereignty, he labored as a Christian emperor, and caused the pictures of the holy fathers, which Philippicus had destroyed, to be restored; but before the end of the first year of his reign he was deposed by Leo the Third, and retired to a monastery. [Theodosius III, emperor of the East (716-717) was a financial officer, whom a Byzantine army rebelling against Anastasius II unexpectedly proclaimed monarch in his place. He captured Constantinople after a six month's siege and deposed Anastasius, but in the following year was himself forced to resign by a new usurper, Leo III. Theodosius ended his life in a monastery].

Emperor Leo the Third, together with his son Constantius, reigned for twenty-four years after Theodosius; and everything about Constantinople was in a bad state because of the tedium of his reign. He was opposed to the Christian life and unfavorable to the Roman popes, while under him the provinces subject to the empire suffered much damage; for in the first year of his reign, when Athinus and Amortrus attacked the nearer Spanish territory, a great horde of Saracens, who lived in Asia, marched into Thrace; and the leader of their hosts had a thousand ships and besieged Constantinople by land and sea. And although the city of Constantinople was not taken by the enemy at that time, it suffered a frightful calamity, and was depopulated by a plague in which three hundred thousand persons died. Although these things should have drawn the emperor Leo to a course of goodness, yet, as soon as he was relieved of the fear of the Saracens, he thought of nothing but of robbing Rome and Italy of their money, and the churches of their ornaments; and commanded the pope to do away with the pictures and to burn them. However, Pope Gregory would not give his consent to that, but admonished all Christians not to be frightened by the cruelty of this tyrant. And while he (Leo III) persisted in such obstinacy, he finally died, excommunicated and cursed.

Leo III, called The Isaurian, was emperor of the East from 717 to 741. Born about 685 in the Syrian province of Commagene, he rose to distinction in the military service, and under Anastasius II was invested with the command of the Eastern army. In 717 he revolted against the usurper Theodosius III, and marching upon Constantinople, was elected emperor in his place. The first year of Leo's reign saw a memorable siege of his capital by the Saracens, who had taken advantage of the civil discord in the Roman Empire to bring up a force of 80,000 men to the Bosphorus. By his stubborn defense the new ruler wore out the invaders who, after a twelve months' investment, withdrew their forces. An important factor in the victory of the Romans was their use of Greek fire. Having thus preserved the empire from extinction, Leo proceeded to consolidate its administration, which in the previous years of anarchy had become completely disorganized. He secured its frontiers by inviting Slavic settlers into the depopulated districts and by restoring the army to efficiency; when the Arabs renewed their invasions in 726 and 739 they were decisively beaten on both occasions by the imperial forces.

His civil reforms include the abolition of the system of prepaying taxes, which had weighed heavily on the wealthier proprietors, the elevation of the serfs into a class of free tenants, the remodeling of family and maritime law. These measures, which were embodied in a new code, published in 740, met with some opposition on the part of the nobles and higher clergy. After an apparently successful attempt to enforce the baptism of all Jews and Montanists in the realm (722), he issued a series of edicts against the worship of images (726-729). This prohibition of a custom which had undoubtedly given rise to grave abuses, seems to have been inspired by a genuine desire to improve public morality, and received the support of the official aristocracy and a section of the clergy. But a majority of the theologians and all monks opposed these measures with uncompromising hostility; and in the western parts of the empire the people refused to obey the edict. A revolt that broke out in Greece, mainly on religious grounds, was crushed by the imperial fleet (727); and two years later, by deposing the patriarch of Constantinople, Leo suppressed the overt opposition of the capital.

In Italy the defiant attitudes of Popes Gregory II and III on behalf of image-worship led to a fierce quarrel with the emperor. The former summoned councils in Rome to anathematize and excommunicate the image-breakers (730, 732); Leo retaliated by transferring southern Italy and Greece from the papal diocese to that of the patriarch. The struggle was accompanied by an armed outbreak in the exarchate of Ravenna (727), which Leo finally endeavored to subdue by means of a large fleet. But the destruction of the this naval armada by a storm decided the issue against him.

Egidius, a Greek, born of an honorable family at Athens, and renowned at this time as a model of skill and for his miracles, was instructed in the Scriptures from youth. After the death of his parents he made Christ heir to his paternal inheritance. To avoid the dangers of worldly praise and renown, he maintained himself on the sea coast. Having entered a boat, he silenced the turbulent sea by his prayers. He came to the city of Arles (Arelate) [Arles (Arelate, Arelatum, Arelas), a city in southeastern France, 54 miles northwest of Marseilles]. and lived there for two years with Saint Caesarius (Cesareo), the bishop. He cured a man who for three years had suffered with fever or chills. Later he retired into seclusion in a hermitage, living for a long time with Verdunius (Veredamo), the holy man, and making the land fruitful by his labors. After he had enlightened all mankind by his miracles, he went further into the wilderness to avoid worldly praise. For a home he selected a cave with a spring. Through divine foresight he was provided a doe, which at certain hours nourished him with its milk. When one day the servants of a savage king were hunting this doe, it fled to his foot, and Egidius prayed God to preserve it unharmed. One of the hunters shot at the doe, but struck this holy man. When this became known to King Charles (Carolus), he received Egidius with all honor; and Egidius went into a monastery in the city of Nemausus (Nemarcusem) [Nemausus, a city in Gallia Narbonensis, on the road from Arles into Spain; now Nîmes], and he awakened the son of the prince. Finally, through the Lord's revelation, he prophesied his own death to his brethren, and asked them to pray to God for him. They gave testimony that they heard the angels who received his soul. He was famous around the Year of the Lord 700.

Egidius (English: Giles; French: Gilles, Italian: Egidio; c. 650 - c. 710), according to legend, was a Greek of Athens who sailed to Marseilles and became acquainted with Caesares of Arles. According to tradition either Wamba, a Visigothic Frankish king, or Childebert, king of Franks, was following the chase in the forests along the Rhone, when a doe was startled and pursued by the hunters. It fled for refuge to a cave and penetrated into it, and an arrow as shot after it. The hunters entered the grotto and found a white-haired hermit sheltering the doe, with the arrow in his shoulder; for the old man had lived long in this solitary place, nourished by the milk of the doe.

The king, touched by the sight of this grand old man, caused the wound to be dressed, returned often to see him, and at last made him consent to the erection of a monastery upon the site of his grotto, of which he became abbot. The fame of the venerable hermit reached the ears of Charles Martel, who called him to Orleans. The abbot made the journey. Such was the origin of the celebrated abbey of St. Giles, which became one of the great pilgrim shrines of the Middle Ages, and gave birth to a town, the capital of a district whose name was born with pride by one of the most powerful feudal races.

Boniface (Bonifacius) the First, an archbishop, flourished in the time of the aforesaid popes. He was a highly learned and eloquent monk. Because of his graciousness he went from Britain to Pope Gregory the Second. When his virtue and piety become known, Gregory, at the request of Pepin (Pipino), appointed him to the see of Mainz as a bishop, and sent him to Germany to enlighten the people in the truth of the Gospel, and to instruct them in the true faith. This he did, carrying out his instructions by preaching in Thuringia, Hesse, Saxony, Austrasia and France. Having become an archbishop in the Year of Christ 715, he set up in France with the knowledge and authority of the pope and the princes of France, two Episcopal sees, one at Würzburg, and the other at Eichstädt. He appointed Burkhard bishop of the former, and Willibald of the latter. Afterwards he went to Frisia to preach; and there he was martyred after having been at the head of the church for 36 years. [Boniface was born of noble parents, about 680, in Devonshire, and while still young became a monk. He soon distinguished himself as scholar and preacher. In 716, following the example of other Saxon monks, he set out on a mission to Frisia; but he was soon obliged to return, probable because of the hostility of the Frisian king, who was often at war with Charles Martel, he recrossed the Alps and recommenced operations in Hesse, where he found but few adhering to the Christian faith. They worshipped sacred groves and fountains, and Boniface determined to strike a blow at the heart of this obstinate paganism. There was an old and venerable oak at Fritzlar, near Geismar, hallowed for ages to Thor. With his clergy Boniface went forth to fell the tree, while the pagans assembled in a great multitude to behold this trial of strength between their ancient god and the God of the stranger. Boniface felled the tree, yet he remained unharmed by the pagan spirits; and the shuddering pagans bowed before the superior might of Christianity. Out of the wood of this tree Boniface built a chapel. (The incident is the basis for a charming story, , by Henry van Dyke.) And thus Boniface began a systematic crusade baptizing, founding churches and monasteries, and calling nuns and monks from England to join in the work. In 732 Boniface was made archbishop, and nine years later he was made a legate charged with the reformation of the whole Frankish church. This he organized into four bishoprics, Erfurt, Würzburg, Buraburg and Eichstädt. In 742 he presided over what is generally called the first German council. He founded the abbey of Fulda as a center for German monastic culture. About 746 Boniface was made archbishop of Mainz, and became metropolitan over the Rhine bishoprics and Utrecht, as well as over those he had established in Germany – thus founding the pre-eminence of the see of Mainz. In 754 he resigned his archbishopric and took up again his earliest plan for a mission to Frisia; but on June 5, 754, he and his companions were killed by the natives near Dookum. His remains were afterwards taken to Fulda. Although primarily a man of action, he left some literary remains consisting of letters, sermons, and a grammar].

Around these times the Venetian dukedom had its origin; and one Paulus Lucius Heraclianus was elected duke in the city of Heraclea by the patricians, all the people and the army. He reigned as duke for eight years. He entered into an alliance with the Lombards, and devoted himself to the enhancement of the city of Venice in power and might.

Caesarius (Cesarius), bishop of Arles, a man famous for his holiness and knowledge, at this time wrote, among his other writings, ten homilies for monks. [Caesarius of Arles (c. 470-543), bishop of Arles and ecclesiastical legislator, was born at Chalons, Burgundy. In 502 he became bishop of Arles, a town then of great commercial and political importance. He convoked the council of Agde (506), of Arles (524), of Carpentras (527), of Orange and of Vaison (529), and of Marseille (533), in which such problems as semi-Pelagianism, ecclesiastical jurisdiction and property, and the education and support of the clergy were raised. His works, including his popular sermons, invaluable for history, and his monastic rule were published in Migne, Pat. Lat. Vol. LXVII]. Also Saint Wulfram (Wolframus), bishop of Sens (Zenonensis), was famous for his miracles. [] And just as famous for his holiness and his miracles was Albinus of Angers (Andegavensis) [Albinus, or Aubin, as he is called in France (c. 470-550), was a popular saint in the Middle Ages. His near contemporary, Venantius Fortunatus (c. 530-c. 600) wrote a short biography about him and the many miracles he was believed to have performed], and Remigius, bishop of Rouen (Rothomagensis) [Remigius was the illegitimate son of Charles Martel (c. 688-741). He was also the third archbishop of Rouen from 755 to 762. Because of his status as a bastard he was denied any claim to the legacy of his father. He became archbishop during the reign of his half brother, Pippin the Younger (father of Charlemagne)]. Also Saint Amatus, the archbishop of the English, was illustrious for his holiness. [Amatus (also called Ame), was a Benedictine abbot and hermit. He was born to a noble family in Grenoble, France, and was active his whole life in eastern France. He died in 627. Why the calls him an archbishop of the English is a mystery].

Saint Kilian (Kilianus), the bishop, flourished in Eastern France at this time. He was a Scot, born of noble parents. He was learned in the Scriptures, scorned the world, lived in a monastery, and led a life of obedience and moderation. Later he was consecrated as a priest and elected to the care of the monastery. However, that he might be more free to see things, he went to Britain, Gaul and Germany; and through zeal for the crown of martyrdom he came to Würzburg, among the pagans. Before he began to preach he went to Rome, received a commission as preacher from Pope Conon, and was consecrated as a bishop. And so, with the priest Colman (Colonato), and the deacon Totnan, he returned to Würzburg. There he found Duke Gozbert (Gosbertum); and having learned to speak the vernacular language of that place [German], he began to preach; and the duke abandoned the idolatrous goddess Diana, and with all his lands submitted to the Christian faith. On holy Easter Day he caused himself to be baptized. He had a wife, called Geilana, who at one time was the wife of his brother. Kilian advised him to give up his wife; but afterwards she so arranged matters that this holy man was slain. One of the murderers tore himself with his teeth, while the other became irrational and committed suicide with his sword. Geilana became possessed of demons and screamed, I am justly tortured since I sent the executioners to this holy man. And in still greater torments she came to an inglorious end. These glorious martyrs illuminate all of eastern France with their miracles and holiness.

Kilian, bishop and martyr, apostle of Franconia, was a native of Ireland. He was of an illustrious family, and having embraced a monastic life, is said to have governed some unknown monastery. Although much beloved by his clergy and people, a wish for travel came upon him, and taking with some companions, among whom are named Colman, a priest, and Totnan, a deacon, he crossed the sea and journeyed into Germany, finally arriving at Würzburg in Franconia; and there he made his abode. He was fortunate enough to convert and baptize Gozbert, duke of that part of Franconia, and this was followed by that of a great number of his subjects. When Kilian thought Gozbert sufficiently instructed to bear the denunciation of his marriage to his brother's wife Geilana, Kilian spoke up and urged a separation, as the marriage was unlawful in the sight of God. But as Gozbert was about to proceed on a military expedition, he requested delay. After Gozbert had departed, Geilana, furious at the thought of a separation, hired assassins, who struck off the heads of Kilian, Colman and Totnan, and buried the three missionaries with their vestments, books and crosses. The relics of the martyrs were found in 752 by Burkhard, bishop of Würzburg, and were placed by him in the crypt of the great church which he erected in that city.

1. Egidius, abbot, is represented in his church vestments and crozier. He is holding a hunted doe that has been shot with an arrow, although the text states that the abbot was shot by accident. He is pulling the arrow from the throat of the doe.

2. Saint Kilian (Kilianus), Saint Colman (Colonatus) and Saint Totnan (Totnanus), who were slain together at Würzburg, are represented by a triple portrait. Kilian, in the center, is portrayed in Episcopal vestments, a sword, the instrument of his martyrdom, in his right hand, the crozier in his left. Colman to the left, and Totnan to the right, each carry a palm branch symbolizing their martyrdom. Below these portraits is a shield, probably intended as the coat of arms of the city of Würzburg, and on either side of this is a border of grapevines emblematic of the famous vineyards of the city.

Saint Willibald (Wilibaldus), the holy man, was born of Saint Richard, duke of Swabia and king of the English, and his wife the most chaste Bunna. And after he had visited the Holy Land as a pilgrim, and came to Rome, Pope Gregory the Third, who loved him for his sincerity and constancy in the faith, commended him to Saint Boniface, the archbishop of Mainz. On the 11th day of the Kalends of August he was consecrated as a priest by his friendly kinsman, St. Boniface. In the Year of Salvation 740, being then 41 years of age, he was appointed to the bishopric of Eichstädt (Eystetensi), which Saint Boniface had created from the estates which Swigerus the count, had given him for the sake of God. He was also chancellor of the see at Mainz, and he and his heirs were given the chancellorship of the same see in perpetuity, with the privilege of sitting at the right hand of the archbishops of Mainz in all general councils. He also received the robe of honor, called the rationale [The word rationale was used to describe the medieval episcopal insignia], which the old priests used; and his successors were also to have the privilege of wearing it. This holy man Willibald began the erection of the city of Eichstädt in a wild hermitage by the river Altmühl (Alimonium), after chopping down the woods. Here is a praiseworthy nunnery of the Order of Saint Benedict, and in it is the grave of the holy and wonderful virgin Walpurgis, who was St. Willibald's sister. Out of this flows a holy oil which restores the sick to health. The very reverend Bishop Wilhelm, of the noble family of Reichenau, is in the possession of the bishopric of Eichstädt, which he administers at this time. It is also called the Aurealtan (Aureantensis) bishopric.

Willibald, said to have been a kinsman of St. Boniface, was a native of Wessex. He was born in 700, and having with difficulty struggled throughout the ailments of infancy, at the age of three was dedicated to the service of Christ by his despairing parents. He was placed in a monastery at five, made great progress in learning, and was loved for his virtues. As he grew up he developed a passion for travel. His father sold his possessions, and with his family, including his sons Wunibald and Willibald, and his daughter Walpurgis, journeyed toward Rome. The father died at Lucca, but the sons journeyed on to Rome. From there Willibald left for the Holy Land with a band of pilgrims; and there he visited many places. He returned by way of Constantinople, traveled through Syracuse, Naples and Capua, and finally settled at Monte Cassino. He had now been absent from England for ten years. He went to Rome in 733 and visited Gregory III, who sent him to join Boniface. Suitgar, Count of Kirsberg, anxious that the Gospel be read throughout his land, gave Willibald the place now called Eichstädt. Boniface accompanied Willibald to the scene of his future labors, and ordained him priest in the little church of St. Mary, which stood where now cluster the spires of the cathedral city.

Willibald probably planted his residence on the spur of the rock named after him, round which the river winds, now crowned by the vast castle-palace of the bishops of Eichstädt, converted into a barrack in modern times. He was ordained in 739 and sent into Thuringia, where he met his brother Wunibald. Shortly after this visit he was consecrated bishop of Eichstädt, at the age of 41. He at once founded a monastery and sent his disciples throughout the land. He was joined by his sister Walpurgis, for whom he built a convent on the slope of the limestone hill above the river, and there she died and reposes. Willibald is supposed to have died in the year 786 at the age of 86. His body reposes in the cathedral of Eichstädt.

ILLUSTRATION

EICHSTÄDT (EISTETT)

Eichstädt is represented by a special woodcut. The old Bavarian town nestles in the valley of the Altmühl (the river shown at the left), 35 miles south of Nuremberg. It is girded about by a wall and is well fortified. The cathedral of St. Willibald (first bishop of Eichstädt), the church of his sister St. Walpurgis, and the Capuchian church, are the chief ecclesiastical structures. Of the secular buildings the most noted are the town hall and the Leuchtenberg Palace, once the residence of the Prince Bishops, and later of the dukes of Leuchtenberg. The Willibaldsburg, built on a neighboring hill in the 14th century, was long the residence of the prince-bishops of Eichstädt, and now contains an historical museum. Eichstädt was originally a Roman colony, which, after the foundation of the bishopric by Boniface in 745, developed considerably and was walled in 908.

Sebald (Sebaldus), most worthy and holy confessor, flourished, as some say, in Germany at this time for his learning and piety. He was born of noble parents, the son of a king of Denmark and his chaste queen, who through vows and prayers brought forth this fruit through God. From youth he was held to discipline and study of the scriptures. He journeyed to Paris to study the liberal arts, and having become highly knowledgable in them, he espoused a beautiful maiden of royal French ancestry. But he scorned his kingdom and all worldly pomp, and leaving his most beautiful spouse by night, secluded himself as a hermit in a distant region; and there he lived in piety for fifteen years. Prompted by his devotion he went to Rome, from where Pope Gregory the Second sent him forth to preach to the Germans. The brothers Willibald and Wunibald were his companions. He was illustrious for his learning and virtue, and for his miracles among the Lombards, and later at Regensburg; and finally at Nuremberg, where in a hermitage in the forest he lived a contemplative, serviceable and full life unto his end. He not only instructed the people but became renowned for his miracles. Having reached a great age he went to Saint Martin's Chapel at Nuremberg, where now stands the Benedictine monastery of Saint Egidius; and there he died in blessedness. His holy remains were carried to the city for burial by unbridled oxen; and there a famous basilica was built in his name. In view of his many miracles the Roman popes caused his name to be inscribed among the number of holy confessors. Pope Martin the Fifth ordained that the festival of Saint Sebald should be celebrated on the 13th day of the Kalends of September. Saint Sebald, patron and house-father of Nuremberg, is honored by the Nurembergers with worthy celebrations; for through the services of its most worthy patron the city has been enhanced in honor and dignity. [Sebald (Sebaldus) is represented in the popular legends and traditions of Nuremberg as the son of a Danish king. It is most probable that he was of Anglo-Saxon lineage, and that he left England with Boniface and his companions to carry on missionary work on the continent of Europe. His name anglicized is Saint Siward, Seward, or Sigward, and we find him in association with Saint Williband and Saint Willibrod, and other Anglo-Saxon missionaries. It appears he traveled through the north of Germany to Nuremberg and took up his residence near the city, preaching, converting, baptizing, and performing miracles until the time of his death, fixed at about 770. As an object of veneration Sebald belongs exclusively to Nuremberg, but the rarity and value of some of the old prints and woodcuts in which he is represented have spread his name at least among collectors and amateurs].

Luitprand (Luitprandus), son of Aisprand (Aisprandus), king of the Lombards, received the kingdom while his father was yet alive; and he reigned thirty-one years and seven months, and was well worthy of the sovereignty. He was tall, possessed an erect strong body, and was so active and alert that no one was regarded as more skilled than he. He was so esteemed for righteousness and goodness that it was difficult to say in which of the virtues he excelled. He was also a very Christian man, and such a lover of devotion to God that he never permitted a church to be built without his help and revenues. At Pavia he also erected and adorned many churches. Charles (Carolus) Martel (Marcellus) was his godfather and very friendly toward him, sending him many men from Italy to help him against the Saracens. He also sent him his son Pepin (Pipinum), in order that he might cut his hair (as is the custom). Luitprand received him very kindly, and sent him back to his parents with presents. However, in the twelfth year of his reign he was moved by the ambition to rule; and he captured the cities round about and undertook the siege of the city of Rome. For that reason Pope Gregory (Gregorius) sent messengers to Charles (Carolus) the king of France, pleading with him to come to the assistance of the city of Rome and the churches. At the request of King Charles, Luitprand abandoned his undertaking, giving up to the Romans many of the cities he had wrested from them. [After the death of Grimoald, king of the Lombards, there followed a series of revolutions (671-711), during which six kings were on the Lombard throne. However, the prosperity of the Lombards was once more restored on the accession of Luitprand in 711. He framed wise laws, corrected evils, and won the favor of the nobility by his courage and prudence. But ambition led him to undertake the conquest of all Italy. Taking advantage of the internal strife caused by the iconoclastic edicts of Leo III, the Eastern emperor, he invaded the territory of the exarchate and took Ravenna. His success aroused the jealousy of Pope Gregory II, who, though delighted with the defeat of the iconoclasts, was disturbed by the growth of the Lombard power. When the Lombards entered Roman territory, the pope made an alliance with the Venetians whom he instigated to aid the exarch in recovering Ravenna. The people supported the pope. Leo sent emissaries to arrest him, but he was saved from imprisonment by the intervention of the Lombard king. The Italians revolted against Leo; but the pope dreaded Luitprand, and sought the protection of Charles Martel, the Duke of France. Gregory II died in the midst of the negotiations, which were pursued by Gregory III. Ravenna was taken from the exarch, who fled, and Italy was forever lost to the Eastern Roman Empire, only the pope and Lombard king remaining to dispute the sovereignty. Gregory III appealed to Martel as his predecessor had done; but the Frankish ruler died (741) before he was able to give assistance. Two years later Luitprand died also. He was succeeded in turn by Hildebrand and Rachis. In 749 Rachis was succeeded by Aistulf, and during his reign the Lombard kingdom reached the zenith of its greatness].

Richoldus, Duke of Frisia, was in this year converted by the preaching of Wulfram (Wolframmi), the bishop; but when he went to be baptized, he was seized with doubt; and he withdrew one foot, inquiring whether most of his forefathers were in hell or in Paradise. And when he was told that most of them were in hell, he hurriedly withdrew the other foot also, saying that it is better to follow the many than the few. And so he was cheated by his own folly, and he was taken away by a death upon which he had not reckoned.

Two comets were seen in January of this year for 15 days in the sky. One of them appeared before sunrise, the other followed at vespers.

Othmar (Othmarus), a German, educated in the Scriptures and in virtue, was consecrated as a priest. Because of his pious conduct and renown, Count Victor elevated him to the prelacy, and he was elected abbot. He greatly enlarged the monastery with estates and buildings, and led a strict and well regulated life. He often visited the poor, and also built a hospital. Yet he was persecuted by those who envied him. A woman accused him, and he was sent into exile; and there he died. After ten years his body was translated over the Lake of Constance to the monastery of Saint Gall, in the presence of great miracles and the stilling of the turbulent waters. And as often as the little barrel full of wine that he used for refreshing the monks was drunk, it experienced no loss of wine. He is so represented in a statue by Peter Vischer, and in a fine woodcut by Albrecht Dürer. The type of hat is the usual one for pilgrims.

The Roman Pope Gregory (Gregorius) the Third held a council of almost one thousand bishops at Rome, and during it, as already stated, he excommunicated emperor Leo from his kingdom and his people because he had destroyed the holy pictures or images. The council held that these pictures should be highly esteemed as previously, and decreed that those who violated this statute should be excommunicated. Not wishing to publicly offend the pope, emperor Leo decreed that all subjects of the Roman Empire do away with the pictures and statues of martyrs and angels in order, as he said, to avoid idolatry; and that those who would not do so be regarded as public enemies. But after this council was held Gregory admonished all Christians not to allow themselves to be misled through fear of the imperial decree. [This synod, held at Rome in 731, condemned the Iconoclasts. It was not an ecumenical council].

Charles Martel (Carolus Marcellus), son of Pepin (Pipini) the Elder, at this time was made mayor of the palace in the land of the Franks after the death of Pepin the Short. He was surnamed Martel, and was the only son of Pepin by Chalpaida (Calpiade), his first wife. Pepin also left a second wife, Plectrude, but Charles honored his stepmother as though she had born him. Nevertheless this envious woman strove to destroy this youth; for when Dagobert, the young king, at the instance of Ragenfrid (Raginfredus) enrolled an army against the government of Pepin, Charles would have lost his life and crown in prison, had he not made a cunning escape. Shortly after his release from imprisonment Dagobert died; and in a spirit of revenge Charles assembled a large army against King Chilperic and Ragenfrid, his mayor of the palace. In the first engagement both turned in flight, leaving the field to Charles. Afterwards, wishing to relieve himself of the secret envy of his stepmother, he led an army against Cologne, where she maintained herself by the fortune that Pepin had left. And by force of arms Charles captured her as well as the fortune. But she secretly escaped across the Danube to the Bulgarians. Thus Charles retained the kingdom alone, although he still had many enemies. These he defeated. Later he marched over the Rhine and subjugated the Saxons, Alamanni (Alemannos), Swabians, and Bavarians. And when he learned that the Saracens, instigated by his enemy Eudo, duke of Aquitaine, were marching into Gaul, he opposed them with a large army, slaying three hundred seventy-five thousand Saracens, while according to the historians, only fifteen hundred Franks were slain. He next turned his arms against the Frisians, then still pagans. After defeating them he returned home. He took Lyons, Arles, and Marseilles (Massiliam) from the Visigoths. He also mastered the Burgundians, but as a matter of policy, called them his allies. The Visigoths called for help from Athimus, the Saracen king. Therefore Charles marched over the Rhone with a large army and took Avignon by force. There he killed the Saracens, and moved against Narbonne and into the nearby valley of Corbaria. There he found a plain well suited for battle. Amoreus, the other Saracen king of Spain, believing Charles in flight, entered the valley. Both armies met, Amoreus was defeated, and Anthimus escaped to farther Spain by boat; and so the Saracens were subdued. From then on the Visigoths were under the power of Charles. When Charles was stricken with a severe illness he divided the conquered kingdoms and countries, according to the advice of his friends, between his sons, Carloman, the eldest, receiving Austrasia and Swabia, while Pepin (Pipino) the Younger obtained Burgundy and a part of France. Charles died in the thirty-fifth year of his reign. [Charles Martel, "The Hammer," (c. 688-741), Frankish ruler, son of Pepin II, mayor of the palace, and Chalpaida, was thrown into prison by his stepmother Plectrude after the death of his father (also called Pepin d'Herstal) in 714. The widow claimed the government in Austrasia and Neustria in the name of her grandchildren. The grandson, under her regency, assumed the title Dagobert III. But the Neustrians threw off the Austrasian yoke, and entered into an offensive alliance with the Frisians and Saxons. In the general anarchy Charles escaped, defeated the Neustrians, and forced them to terms. In Austrasia he wrested the power from Plectrude, and took the title of mayor of the palace, thus jeopardizing the interests of his nephews. Once in possession of Austrasia, Charles sought to extend his dominion over Neustria. He defeated Ragenfrid, the Neustrian mayor, and forced him to retreat to Angers. Ragenfrid died in 731, and from that time Charles had no competitor in the western kingdom. However, the Saracens of Spain had crossed the Pyrennes and were overrunning the Frankish dominions as far as the Loire. On them Charles inflicted an overwhelming defeat at Tours in 732, freeing Europe from the dangers of a Muslim conquest. His son Pepin the Younger finally drove the last remnants back into Spain. Like his father, Martel did not assume the royal title, but ruled as Duke of the Franks. He died in 741 leaving his dominions to his sons Carloman and Pepin the Younger. Carloman received Austrasia and the Frankish territories in Germany; Pepin received Neustria, Burgundy and Provence. They sought out the last of the Merovingian dynasty, and proclaimed him king of the Franks as Chilperic III. In 747 Carloman became a monk, while Pepin dethroned the feeble Chilperic and became king of the Franks, thus founding the Carolingian dynasty].

When the Vandals, three hundred fifty years ago, turned over the Christian churches in Africa to the Arian heretics, the remains of Saint Augustine were removed from the city of Hippo to Sardinia; but in the present year they were translated to Pavia through the zeal of Luitprand, the Lombard king, and were interred in a magnificent place. The terrified Saracens then feared that the army of Charles (would come) within the Pyrenees. [The last sentence of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Pope Zachary (Zacharias), a Greek whose father was Polycramus (Policramo), was elected pope after Gregory. He is reckoned among the best of princes; for he was a mild-mannered man, of wonderful sweetness and grace, and endowed with every virtue. He was a lover of the clergy and of the people. At the inception of his pontificate he found much internal strife in Italy. For the sake of peace he sent his legate and messengers to Luitprand, the Lombard king, who was at war with Thrasmundus (Trasmundum), the duke of Spoleto. But as he could accomplish nothing through his messengers, he, together with his clergy, went to the city in Sabinia, in order to admonish the king in person. It is said that eight miles from Narnia the king met the pope, and dismounting, followed him to the city of Rome. On the following day, under the office of the holy mass, the pope preached an excellent sermon, publicly indicating what it behooves a Christian king to do, whether in peace or in war. By these instructions the king was so moved that he referred all matters of war to the pope, awaiting his good judgment on those matters. Now when Zachary heard that peace prevailed everywhere, he undertook the erection and improvement of many various church buildings. He forbade the Venetians, under the pain of a curse, to sell servants marked with the sign of Christ, to the Saracens and pagans, as the merchants were accustomed to do. Since he was considered very knowledgable in Greek and Latin, he translated the four books of Dialogues of the Blessed Gregory into Greek. [This sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. He died in the 10th year and third month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the Ides of March. After his death the bishop's seat was then vacant twelve days. [Zachary succeeded Gregory III in 741, and concluded the treaty with Charles Martel. Three years later, Luitprand, the Lombard king, died, and his successor, Ratchis, laid siege to Perugia. Zachary journeyed to Ratchis' camp and not only induced him to raise the siege, but prevailed upon him to embrace the monastic life with his family. Then Aistulf succeeded to the Lombard throne, and he soon became more formidable than Luitprand. Zachary also died in the meantime (March 14 or March 22, 752), and was succeeded by Stephen II, who retained the pontificate for but three days. Then followed Stephen III, who is however, reckoned by some as Stephen II, the former not being included in the list because he was not consecrated].

Pope Stephen (Stephanus) the Second, a Roman whose father was Constantine, was elected pope. He was so acceptable to everyone that they carried him about on their shoulders in the Basilica of the Savior at Constantinople. He was a man of exceptional Christian devotion and intelligence, a lover of the priesthood, a giver of alms, and an industrious preacher and writer of Christian teachings. He was a father to the poor, and a protector of widows and orphans. He industriously tried (though in vain), by words and gifts, to dissuade Aistulf, the Lombard king, who had attacked the Romans, from pursuing his evil design. Because of this situation he turned to Pepin the king of the Franks. To honor him, Pepin sent his son Charles the younger (who by reason of his accomplishments was called the Great) to the hundredth stone to visit him. But Pepin dismounted from his horse at the third stone from the city of Rome, kissed the feet of this holy man, and led his horse by the bridle up to the Roman palace. And before long this pope anointed Pepin as a king and diverted the empire from the warring factions in France. After many good works he died in the fifth year and first month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter to the tears of all on the sixth day of the Kalends of May. Then the seat was vacant for thirty-two days. [Stephen II (pope from March 752 to April 757), implored the protection of Pepin, the French king, when Aistulf threatened to put all the Romans to the sword should they refuse to acknowledge him as their master. Pepin promised assistance, and in return Pepin was anointed by the pope; also his sons Charles and Carloman. In 755 Aistulf, by force of arms, was compelled to promise restoration of all the possessions of the church which he had seized; but as soon as Pepin left France, Aistulf laid siege to Rome, plundered and set fire to the churches, burnt the images, and devastated the surrounding country. Pepin again entered Italy and compelled Aistulf to restore the property of the Church. In 757 Stephen died, and was succeeded by his brother Paul I].

Pope Paul the First, a Roman whose father was Constantine, brother of the aforesaid Stephen, succeeded him as pope. He was a very kind and good man, and well, versed in the ecclesiastical doctrine of the patriarchate under popes Gregory the Second and Zachary. The latter, in fact, made him, together with his brother, a deacon. But, at the death of his brother, when he was being sought as his successor as pope, there were those who preferred the archdeacon Theophylactus. After a long struggle he alone, on account of the integrity of his life and his learning, was made pope by the votes of all good men in the time of (the emperors) Constantine and Leo. [In the first part of this paragraph, the following is not in the German edition of the chronicle:

After a long struggle he alone, on account of the integrity of his life and his learning, was made pope by the votes of all good men in the time of (the emperors) Constantine and Leo.

] He was, moreover, an imitator of our Savior; for he never gave evil for evil, but overcame evil by kindness. He was such a good and benevolent man that at night, accompanied by two or three servants he visited the sickbeds of the poor; and he comforted everyone with words for their recovery and with alms. He ransomed prisoners from foreign lands, and protected widows and orphans and sustained them with alms. With his assembled clergy and all the Roman people, he transferred the body of the Blessed Petronella, Peter's daughter, together with its marble sepulcher inscribed with these letters: (This is the sepulcher) of Petronella, sweetest daughter. He transferred the body from the Appian Way to the Vatican with all the priests singing (as is commonly the case) and with the people leading the celebration. And he placed that very holy body itself in the temple of Apollo at the head of the basilica dedicated to her father. And Paul died in the Basilica of Paul on the Via Ostiense, after having restored certain churches that were falling into ruin on account of their antiquity, in the tenth year and first month of his pontificate. And his body was carried to the Vatican with great and solemn ceremony. Then the seat was vacant for one year and 1 month.

Paul I (pope from 757 to 767) succeeded his brother Stephen III. His pontificate was distinguished partly by earnest efforts for the complete and secure possession of the territories which had been granted by the Frankish king, and partly by the growth of the papal power in Rome itself. Paul died in 767, and was succeeded by Stephen IV (or as some reckon, Stephen III).

In this paragraph, nearly all of the passage cited below except for the italicized words is not in the German edition of the chronicle:

Constantine (Constantinus) the Fifth, son of Emperor Leo III, reigned alone for 33 years after the death of his father; and he followed his father's evil ways. He disparaged the laws and ordinances of the holy fathers with all his might and spent his whole life in iniquity. He practiced the black arts and was addicted to excesses. After he had destroyed the holy images everywhere and had slain Constantine the bishop of the imperial city, who opposed his evil conduct, and had supplanted him with Nicetas, his fellow in crime, the pope sent his emissaries to Constantinople to admonish him under threat of excommunication, and demanding that he restore the images. But the obdurate Constantine scorned these papal admonitions and took into his good graces the Bulgarian king, Sabinus, against whom he had previously made war, and who had also destroyed the images. On the advice of Anastasius, the heretic and Constantinopolitan bishop, he also killed many monks and worthy lay Christians because of their faith. So great a plague occurred at this time that many houses died out altogether. Anastasius, the heretic, died a miserable death, excrement bursting from his mouth. And Constantine was seized with a wild ecstasy, and he died screaming, Although I am still alive, I have been consigned to an unquenchable fire. His son Leo, the fourth of that name, had previously been appointed heir to the empire.

Constantine V, son of Leo III, the Iconoclast, was emperor from 740 to 775. On his succession, and while fighting the Arabs, his brother-in-law, an Armenian named Artavasdus, a supporter of the image worshippers, was proclaimed emperor; and it was not until the end of 743 that Constantine reentered Constantinople. When he felt secure, he decided to settle the religious controversy. He assembled 338 bishops, by whom image worship was forbidden as contrary to Christian doctrine. But resistance to iconoclasm continued through the influence of many monks, resulting in a campaign against the monasteries which were closed and monks and nuns compelled to marry. As a result the pope defected and obtained protection from Pepin, king of the Franks. From this point on nominal dependence of Rome and the papacy on emperors at Constantinople ceased. Although reviled by medieval chroniclers as a monster of iniquity, Constantine is now generally regarded by historians as a very able ruler. He restored the aqueduct built by Valens, repopled Constantinople after the plague, revived prosperity, and fought with success against the Arabs, Slavs and Burgundians.

Leo the Fourth, son of Constantine the Fifth, reigned as emperor and successor to his father for five years from the Year of the Lord 777. His father espoused him to Irene (Hirenem), most noble and beautiful among women; and she bore him a son named Constantine. During the reign of Leo, the empire merely existed in name; for the barbarians harassed the Eastern Empire constantly. The Romans, exhausted by wars, looked to the Gauls or Franks. And although the emperor marched to Syria with his forces, he returned home on the approach of the enemy, giving himself over to indolence and sinking into countless vices and evils. He so loved precious stones that he could not be appeased with the largest gems. He placed on his head the most costly crown in the treasury of Saint Sophia, and wore it through the city; by divine vengeance the jewels in the crown took fire and burned him; and so he suffered a death not unlike that of his father. After his life ended his wife Irene and his son Constantine received the empire.

Leo IV, called Chazar, succeeded his father Constantine V as emperor of the East in 775. He associated with him in the empire his young son Constantine, and suppressed an uprising led by his five stepbrothers, which broke out in consequence. Leo was largely under the influence of his wife Irene, and when he died in 780, he left her as the guardian of his successor Constantine VI.

Constantine (Constantinus) the Sixth, son of the aforesaid Leo, and born of Irene (Hyrene), reigned as emperor with his mother for 10 years. This most intelligent and god-fearing empress, very beautiful in person, ruled the empire with righteousness and gave peace to the people. She reared her son with much care, intending that he should not follow the evil habits of his father and ancestors, to which she believed him inclined by nature. She called a council of three hundred fifty bishops and thereby silenced the heresy of the iconoclasts. But her son, with whom ancestral evils gained the upper hand, would no longer endure the piety, devotion and goodness of his mother and deposed her from guardianship. Alone in the sovereignty and free to follow inherited inclinations, he indulged in cruel practices. One of these cruelties consisted in securing pleasure for himself by digging out people's eyes and blinding them. The people of Constantinople therefore concerned themselves with discovering another ruler. To him was espoused a woman called Mary; but he forced her into a monastery, placing the imperial crown upon the head of a maid. For such misdeeds the citizens of Constantinople were moved to restore his mother Irene to the throne. When this was accomplished, Irene seized Constantine and blinded and imprisoned him. She reigned alone for five years, and during that time entered into an alliance with Charles (Carolo). [Constantine VI, grandson of Constantine V, succeeded his father Leo IV in 780 under the guardianship of his mother Irene. In 782, the Arabs penetrated as far as the Bosphorus, exacting annual tribute as the price of an inglorious peace. After Constantine came of age, his mother still retained supreme power; but at length he caused her arrest, before he pardoned her in 792. In 796, she plotted against him and in the following year he was seized and blinded. According to some he died on the same day, while according to others he survived for several years].

Aistulf (Aystulphus), Lombard king, reigned eight years. He attacked the country about Rome; but by means of gifts and supplications the pope moved him to peace hoping that he would observe it for a number of years. But soon afterwards Aistulf besieged Rome and ravaged the country all around it with great damage. Those of the city of Rome who should refuse to surrender, he threatened to hang or strangle. And when the pope admonished Aistulf with still greater earnestness, Aistulf remained unmoved. However, Pepin forced him to desist from his purpose and to keep the peace. After many wars Aistulf finally died of a stroke during a hunt. [Aistulf, king of the Lombards, conquered the Exarchate of Ravenna and converted it into a dukedom; after which he led his forces against Rome, then practically ruled by the pope though nominally subject to the Eastern emperor. Alarmed by the danger that menaced Italy, the pope, Stephen II, appealed to Pepin the Little, son of Charles Martel, first Carolingian king of the Franks. In 754 Pepin marched into Italy, besieged Aistulf in Pavia, his capital, and compelled him to purchase peace by ceding to the pope the places which he had seized in the Roman dukedom, along with the Exarchate of Ravenna and the marches of Ancona. But as soon as Pepin retired Aistulf renewed the war, encamped before Rome, and demanded the pope's surrender as a condition of sparing the city. Pepin again entered Italy and enforced peace, compelling surrender of all the conquered territory. Although Aistulf secretly resolved to renew the war later, he was killed by a fall from a horse. After this the Lombard kingdom was distracted by a disputed succession].

Gangolf (Gangolfus), the holy man, was illustrious in Burgundy in the time of the aforesaid Constantine. He bought a well in Gaul and made it spring in Burgundy. Once upon a time he admonished his wife for adultery; but as she denied the charge, he said, If you wish me to believe you, bare your arm and bring me a small stone out of the well without injury to yourself. But when she put her arm into the well, the arm was burned. Because of this Gangolfus at once gave her one half of his possessions and divorced her. And he was slain in his own house by the cleric who committed the adultery. When his corpse was on the bier and was being carried to the grave, he made many sick persons well. This was made known to his wife by the maid; and she laughed and said: Gangolf performs miracles just as my ass sings. Immediately, then, her ass began to emit numerous ugly sounds without cessation. That happened to her for the rest of her life on Fridays, the day on which her husband was martyred. As often as she uttered a word, she made an offensive noise from her ass; a thing which Pepin (Pipinus) thought worthy of being tested. [Gangulf is said to have been a Burgundian nobleman. His story is pure fable. It is told of him that he bought a beautiful spring of water at Bassigny, and on reaching his castle at Varennes, he struck his staff into the ground and immediately the fountain welled up there, leaving its source at Bassigny dry—no doubt a popular tradition made to account for the drying up of one spring and the bursting out of another. During his absence, his wife associated with a man whom she passionately loved. Having learned of this, Gangulf confronted her with the accusation, which she denied. “Well, my wife,” said he, “here is this clear cold fountain. Thrust in your arm. If you are innocent it will not hurt you. If you are guilty, God shall judge.” She plunged in her arm and was scalded. Immediately Gangulf separated from his wife, gave her one of his estates and a comfortable annuity. In sorrow he lived a grave and retired life. His wife could not endure the restraint of still being the spouse of Gangulf, and she had her lover determined to do away with him so that they might marry and take his large possessions. One night the man entered Gangulf’s castle and killed him with his own sword in his bedchamber. The rest of the very amusing story Schedel has told].

Amelius and Amicus, the children, one born to a count, the other to a knight, were taken to Rome for baptism in the time of Pepin the king of the Franks. And when in the course of their journey they met at Lucca, they became so attached to one another that neither would eat or sleep without the other. They were baptized by the pope, and with great joy many Roman soldiers acted as godfathers. They performed many miracles in the course of their lives. And as God united them in life, so he would not part them in death; for although they were buried in the time of Charles (Caroli) in two different regions, the corpse of Amelius in his sarcophagus was before long found by the sarcophagus of Amicus in the royal church. [Amicus and Amelius, according to tradition, died in 773. Their story, largely legendary, is given by Schedel above. In addition, tradition states that they were both Frankish knights, that Amicus was given the honorific position as Charlemagne’s champion, and that both took part in Charlemagne’s campaign against the Lombards in northern Italy].

Burchard (Burckardus), bishop of Würzburg (Herbipolensis), was illustrious for his piety and miracles. He was born in England of very noble parents, and he and his brother, Swidimus (Suiduno), were bishops there. They were countrymen and kinsmen of Saint Boniface. Having received an education in the liberal arts, Burchard left home for Burgundy; and there he lived in a quiet place in the garb of a pilgrim. Afterwards, (in the time of Pope Zachary) he was elevated from monk to first bishop of Würzburg. This new bishopric was established at Würzburg in the Year of the Lord’s Incarnation seven hundred fifty-one because of the increase in the number of churches among the German people, but more particularly for the salvation of Eastern France. The see was established through the efforts of archbishop Boniface under Burchard, the first bishop, and was confirmed by Pope Zachary and Pepin (Pipini), the ruler of France. This Burchard lived a virtuous life of moderation and of generosity to the poor. Afterwards he gave over the bishopric to Megingold (Megingaud), and with six monks went to Hohenburg; and there in contemplation and with all holiness he journeyed to Christ in the Year of Salvation seven hundred ninety-one, after having presided over the bishoprics for forty years. [Burchard was a native of Wessex, and probably a kinsman of Boniface. He led a monastic life from early youth, and was summoned by St. Boniface in 725 to assist him in Germany. He was then in priest’s orders. He made two expeditions to Rome, once in company with St. Boniface. He was ordained bishop of Würzburg by Pope Zachary in 741, and subscribed the decrees of the Council of Leptines in 742. He built many churches in his dioceses, and translated the relics of his predecessor, the martyr Kilian. When advanced in years he resigned the see to his disciple Megingaud, and retired to Homburg (Hohenburg) a castle whose ruins may still be seen on a height above the Main, near the point where the Saale flows into it; and there he died. His body was translated to Würzburg, where it now reposes].

Carloman (Carolomannus) was the eldest son of Charles Martel (Caroli Marcelli). To him was given Swabia and Austrasia; to Pepin the Younger, Burgundy as his share. Soon after his father’s death Carloman decided to withdraw from worldly affairs. This decision he imparted to his brother; and with a few wayfarers he went to Rome. There he was consecrated by Pope Zachary, and in the garb of a monk he went to the Benedictine monastery of Cassino, and took the vow. Afterwards he journeyed to France to advise his brother Pepin against a war with the Lombards in Italy. [Carloman, son of Charles Martel, was mayor of the palace under the Merovingian kings. together with his brother Pepin the Short, he became mayor of the palace on the death of his father in 741, administering the Eastern part of the Frankish kingdom. He extended the power of the Franks in various wars, and strengthened the church in the lands under his rule. In 747 he retired to a monastery which he founded, on Mount Soracte, but subsequently entered the monastery on Monte Casino. He died August 17, 754].

Albinus, the bishop of Angers (Andegavensis) [Albinus was already mentioned on Folio CLXI verso. This is one of those inadvertent repetitions, perhaps due to chronological considerations (the earlier grouping was largely thematic)]. and Remigius, bishop of Rouen (Rothomagensis), [Remigius, like Albinus, was already mentioned on Folio CLXI verso. This is one of those inadvertent repetitions, perhaps due to chronological considerations (the earlier grouping was largely thematic)]. were at this time renowned for their piety and miracles.

Salvius, bishop of Albi, was martyred together with his disciple Valentinian. [Salvius (Sauve), bishop of Albi, was born of a noble Gallic family. He became a monk, then abbot, and finally enclosed himself in his cell after taking leave of his brethren. He fell ill and sank into a cataleptic fit that the brethren supposed was death; and they laid him out for burial. Suddenly he opened his eyes; and he arose and began to work as usual. He convoked the monks and told them his soul had gone to heaven, and he had seen an ineffable light; but a voice had cried, "Let this man return to earth; he is necessary to the church." And then Salvius found that he was again in the body. After relating this vision his tongue became coated with pimples and swelled so as to fill his mouth. He thought it was a punishment for having disclosed what had befallen him. Toward the end of 574 Salvius was elected bishop. During the plague he ministered to his people with the utmost devotion].

The body of Saint Benedict, stolen 34 years ago by the monks of Gaul and carried off together with the remains of his sister Scholastica, were awarded to the monks of Mount Cassino by Pope Zachary at the solicitation of Carloman, and were ordered returned to them from the monastery of Fleury. But some say that when the brothers of Fleury were about to be deprived of this holy father they succumbed to such prayers and tears that the body was allowed to remain with them. [According to Baring-Gould (, s.v. Benedict, March 21) the body of Benedict was carried by Aigulf, a monk of the abbey of Fleury, from Mount Cassino, which had been ruined by the Lombards, to his own monastery in France. For the biography of Benedict, see Folio CXLIV recto and note].

Pepin (Pipinus) the Younger, son of Charles Martel (Caroli Marcelli), was appointed mayor of the palace in France upon the death of his father, and excelled his father and his ancestors in glory, honor and renown. To speak of all his proceedings against the Germans, Aquitainians and Burgundians would require too much time and space. Although he was administering all the affairs of the nation of the Franks and of their king, Childeric, in his name and stead, he encountered more opposition on the part of this feeble minded King Childeric than from any other source; for which reason, as the writers of the history of the Franks state, the nobility and people of this nation, having compared the virtue and ability of Pepin with the unfitness of Childeric, sought the counsel of Pope Zachary as to whether they should any longer endure this incompetent king, or bestow the sovereignty to the more deserving Pepin. And when the pope answered that the care of the state should be in the hands of him who is most worthy of it, Pepin was declared king by the common consent of the Franks, while Childeric was consecrated as a cleric. And so ended the rule of the Merovingian house in Gaul, which had reigned under twenty-one kings over a period of 296 years. Pepin was now confirmed by Pope Zachary, and later by Pope Stephen. The Roman Church called upon him to assume leadership in a war against Aistulf, the Lombard king. He besieged him at Pavia, and Aistulf sued for peace. From that point on Pepin daily enhanced the reputation and might of France; and when he returned from Italy, Tassilo (Taxillo), duke of Bavaria, became a vassal to Pepin; and the Saxons offered him three hundred horsemen, to be employed wherever he might have occasion. And now, having participated in many wars, and being burdened with age, he resigned these matters to his son Charles. And Charles commenced his knightly career with good fortune. Seven years later Aquitaine was subjugated to the kingdom of the Franks. At the same time Pepin died at Thuron, near St. Denis. [Pepin or Pippin (III), called 'the Short' or 'the Younger', was the younger son of Charles Martel. Before his death in 741, the father had divided the kingdom of the Franks between his two sons Carloman and Pepin, giving Carloman the East and Pepin the West. Since 737 there had been no king in the Frankish realm. The two brothers were officially called majores palatii (major-domos, or mayors of the palace), while the chroniclers called them simply principes ('princes' or 'rulers'). In 743, however, the mayors decided to appoint a king, and they chose Childeric III, who was apparently connected with the Merovingian family. But Childeric was a mere figurehead, and had no power. The two brothers presided over the tribunals, convoked the councils at which the Frankish church was reformed, assembled the hosts and made war, jointly defeating and subduing Duke Hunald of Aquitaine. In 747 Carloman unexpectedly abdicated, became a monk, and retired to a monastery near Rome, leaving Pepin sole master. In 751, Pepin, after consulting Pope Zachary, took the title of king, removing the politically impotent Childeric to a monastery. He then caused himself to be crowned by Boniface. His reign was marked by important events—visits from the pope, expeditions into Italy, and the creation of the papal states by conferring on the pope the Exarchate of Ravenna, which he had wrested from Aistulf, king of the Lombards. Pepin took Septimania from the Arabs and Aquitaine from its duke. He intervened in Germany where he forced Tassilo, duke of Bavaria, to become his subject. Pepin died in 768, leaving two sons, Charles (Charlemagne) and Carloman, who divided the kingdom].

In the meantime the Turks went forth to gain better lands and homes. At first they moved against Asia, the Alani, [Alani, an Asiatic people, included under the Scythians but probably a branch of the Massagetae. They were a nation of warlike horsemen, first found about the Eastern Caucasus in the country called Albania, another form of the same name. They passed into Europe as far as the lower Danube where they were routed by and forced into an alliance with the Huns. In 406 some of them took part with the Vandals in Gaul and Spain, where they gradually disappear from history]. Colchians, [Cholchis, a country in Asia, bounded on the west by the Euxine, on the north by the Caucasus, and on the east by Iberia]. and Armenians. Later, in the Year of the Lord seven hundred fifty-five they proceeded to Asia Minor, and also against the Persians and Saracens. These Turks were Scythians from among those whom Alexander the Great, as Jerome (Hieronimus) and several other historians state, had locked up with iron chains in the Hyperborean Mountains, [Hyperborean Mountains, an imaginary range of mountains in the far north (the word 'Hyperborean' means 'beyond the north (wind)' in Greek). The term was afterwards applied by geographers to various chains—the Caucasus, the Rhipaei Montes, and a number of others]. according to Ethicus the philosopher. They had their ancestral homes in Asiatic Scythia beyond the Pyrenees and in the island of Tharaca [Probably Taurica Chersonesus, a peninsula stretching into the Euxine from Sarmatia, or the country of the nomad Scythians, with which it connected by a narrow isthmus, now the Crimea. The isthmus is so slender as to make it probable that in a remote period Taurica was an island]. in the north. They were savage and cruel, uncivilized and lewd, lacking character and honor, and were abhorred by other peoples. While Pepin (Pipino) ruled over the Franks they went forth through the passes of the Caucasus and overran Pontus and Cappadocia, and slowly but surely over time overran the neighboring people. And now the outrageous attacks of the Turks became so overpowering that the Saracens could not make peace with them by any other means than the surrender of the kingdom of Persia, which the Saracens had subjugated in the time of Phocas and Heraclius. Of the power and further conquests of the Turks more will be said hereafter.

At this time ended the government known as the Exarchate of Italy, which had endured under the rule of ten exarchs, beginning with Narses, for a period of one hundred seventy-five years. These rulers, called exarchs, were sent from Constantinople into Italy. To this Exarchate belonged many distinguished Italian cities which were taken away from the Roman Church by the Constantinopolitan emperors, but restored to the Church by Pepin (Pipinus) after his war against Aistulf.

Eucherius, bishop of Lyons, was at this time renowned for his many miracles. He was the son of a nobleman, and turned to a spiritual life. For a long time he lived in a cave, fasting and praying to God and serving him with great devotion. Pursuant to angelic revelation he was afterwards placed in the bishop's chair at Lyons. During his lifetime he was illustrious for his many miracles. [Eucherius (c. 389- c. 449), bishop of Lyons, was a native of Gaul, of illustrious parents, and married. He was the greatest light of the Church of Lyons, after Irenaeus. Probably on his wife's death he retired to the isle of Lerins, and was a monk there until 434, when he was elected bishop of Lyons. From Lerins he wrote a treatise in stylish Latin prose entitled ('Epistle to his kinsman Valerian, On the contempt of the world') an expression of the despair for the present and future of the world in its last throes shared by many educated men of Late Antiquity, with hope for a world to come].

Theodore (Theodorus), bishop of Pavia, a very holy and highly learned man, also flourished at this time. He left a number of excellent and memorable writings. [Theodore was bishop of Pavia from 743 to 778. He was an outspoken critic of Arianism, which caused his repeated exile by Lombard Arian kings].

Constantine (Constantinus), the second pope of that name, a Roman, succeeded the pontificate of Paul. He became such in this manner: Toto, Thotonem, the Nepetian (Nepusinum) duke, who was an ally of the Lombards and lived at Rome, avariciously compelled many people to leave Nepeso [Nepeso (Nepete or Nepisinus), now called Nepi: a city of Etruria, about 30 miles from Rome. It early became an Episcopal see, a religious position that it has retained without intermission to the present time, though now but a small town]. for Rome; and he so strengthened himself by the arms of these people that, influenced by various gifts and by the advice of false friends, they made Constantine pope. Another, called Philippicus, was also desired as pope by a number of others; but by force of arms he was compelled to forego the pontificate. And so Gregory, the Prenestinian [Praeneste (now Palestrina), one of the most ancient and once powerful and important cities of Latium. The modern city is built almost entirely on the site of the Temple of Fortune]. bishop, was forced to immediately consecrate Constantine, and to anoint him as a bishop, although he was still a layman. In consequence of such consecration his (Gregory's?) hands atrophied to such an extent that he could not carry them to his mouth. After Constantine had stupidly exercised his office for one year, he was cast out of the see, and Stephen the Third was regularly elected pope. Through him a council was afterwards assembled at the Lateran, and Constantine was deprived of his sight, looked up in a monastery, and deposed in disgrace. Some do not reckon him among the popes. [Constantine II, now known as an 'antipope', occupied the papacy in 767-8. During the last days of Pope Paul I in June, his brother, Toto of Nepi, and a group of Tuscans had him made pope when he was still a layman. In spring 768 he was deposed and killed by the Lombards].

Year of the World 5975 | Year of Christ 774

Stephen (Stephanus), the third pope of that name, a native of Sicily whose father was Olibus, entered upon the pontificate in the Year of our Lord 768. He was a learned and well informed man, and very strict and firm in the management of certain spiritual matters. He was welcomed by the entire Roman clergy and the people as a true guide and pope. He turned his attention to the correction of morals and assembled the clergy (particularly from Gaul and Italy) in the Lateran Church at Rome. And there was much discussion as to the ordering of ecclesiastical matters; and they deposed the aforesaid Constantine and repealed his decrees; and by the common consent of all it was ordained that no layman who had not been regularly consecrated should aspire to the pontificate, nor encumber it, under penalty of being accursed; also that all transactions of a holy nature which Constantine had handled should be regarded as improper and of no force, except those concerning baptism and the chrism. On the day following these proceedings took place a fine procession of thanksgiving to God, in which the pope and many others walk barefoot out of the Lateran Basilica to Saint Peter's with great devotion and divine service. This most industrious shepherd, true successor of Peter and imitator of Christ, at last died in the fourth year, 5th month and 27th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat was then vacant for 9 days. [Stephen III (or as some reckon, Stephen IV) was pope from 768 to 772. He was a native of Sicily, and, having come to Rome during the pontificate of Gregory III, gradually rose to high office in the service of successive popes. On the deposition of Constantine II, Stephen was chosen to succeed him. He in turn was followed by Adrian I].

Pope Adrian (Hadrianus) the First, a Roman whose father was Theodore, was born of noble parents. During his pontificate he was a zealous devotee of the nobility of virtue. By reason of his greatness of mind, eloquence and piety, he compares favorably with any other pope. Hardly had his election been made public when he released the prisoners in Africa and ordered those who had been sent into exile to return. When news of this reached the Lombard king Desiderius, the latter sought the pope's friendship and alliance, and for that purpose sent emissaries to him. To these he gave the answer that as much as he desired peace with all, and particularly with the Lombards, yet he could not give credence to the words of their king, who had so often broken treaties with Pope Stephen. After this time the pope called upon King Charles (Carolus) for help; and Charles besieged Desiderius and the Lombards at Pavia. He left the siege to Bernhard, his uncle, and proceeded to Rome. He honored this Adrian by kissing his feet, and they obligated one another to perpetual friendship. When Pope Adrian was thus restored to security against the fears of war, he turned his mind to the beautification of the churches and buildings in the city of Rome. At last he died in the twenty-third year, tenth month, and tenth day of his pontificate, and was buried with great praise in the Basilica of Peter on the sixth day of the Kalends of January. [Adrian I, pope from 772 to 795, was the son of Theodore, a Roman nobleman. Soon after his accession he found it necessary to invoke the aid of Charlemagne against Desiderius, the Lombard king, who had laid siege to Ravenna and ravaged its environs. In his contest with the Greek empire and the Lombard princes of Benevento, Adrian remained faithful to the Frankish alliance; and the friendly relations between pope and emperor were not disturbed by differences as to the veneration of images, to which Charlemagne and the Gallican Church were strongly opposed while Adrian approved the decree of the council of Nicaea (787) confirming the practice and excommunicating the Iconoclasts. Adrian restored the ancient aqueducts of Rome, and governed his little state with a firm and skillful hand].

Nicephorus, a patrician, reigned 9 years after the Empress Irene (Hyrenem), whom he craftily made a prisoner and exiled to the island of Lesbos. When he entered upon his reign he made peace with Charles (Carolo). And we read that in these same treaties it was provided that the city of Venice, which honored both emperors, might also make use of their laws; but whether in peace or war, it should not belong to either of them. Now when the emissaries submitted the form and text of the treaty to King Charles, who was then at Salzburg, in Germany, he sent them to Rome to submit these matters to the pope. In the same year, which was the first year of the reign of Nicephorus, Aron Admirhas [Aron Admirhas is the Medieval Latin spelling of the name of caliph Hārūn al-Rashīd ('Aaron the Just'; 763-809)], introduced three hundred thousand Saracens into the Asiatic provinces that were subject to the Constantinopolitan empire. Their arrival so frightened the emperor that he sued for a shameful peace, which he secured upon condition that he pay one thousand pieces of gold to save the empire, and three thousand pieces annually to keep his own head. Not long afterwards, without taking advice, Nicephorus declared his son Stauracius (Scaurationem) a fellow-ruler in the kingdom; and being a younger man, he proceeded to turn away from the base course of his father, but was harassed by the Saracens who committed much damage and mischief in many regions. Nicephorus had much success in his war against the Bulgarians; but before he was able to return to Constantinople to enter into a treaty with the emissaries of Charles, he was defeated and killed in Upper Moesia in a battle with the Bulgarian king. His son Stauracius was wounded in the same battle, and upon his return to Constantinople he received the sovereignty. Stauracius, in the third month of his reign, was deposed by his brother-in-law, Michael, who succeeded him. [Nicephorus (Nikephoros in Greek) I, Roman emperor in the East (802-811), was a native of Seleucia in Pisidia. He was raised by the empress Irene to the office of logothetes ('finance minister'). With the help of the patricians and eunuchs he contrived to dethrone Irene, and to be elected emperor. His sovereignty was endangered by the revolt of his general Bardanes. But Nicephorus achieved the submission of Bardanes, who was relegated to a monastery. A conspiracy headed by the patrician Arsaber had a similar issue. Nicephorus set himself to increase the empire's revenue, and by rigorous imposts alienated the favor of his subjects, and especially the clergy. In 803 and 810 he made a treaty with Charlemagne by which the limits of the two empires were amicably fixed. By withholding the tribute which Irene had agreed to pay, Nicephorus committed himself to a war with the Saracens. Compelled by Bardanes's disloyalty to take the field himself, he sustained defeat at Crasus in Phrygia (805), and only obtained peace on condition of paying a yearly tribute of 30,000 gold pieces. He was slain in 811 in a war with the Bulgarians].

Michael, the Constantinopolitan emperor, reigned for two years after Stauracius (Scauracium), his brother-in-law. He was a good man and a follower of the holy law. Above all things he was eager to confirm the treaty with Charles (Caroli), which Nicephorus had begun with the emissaries of Charles, who had tarried for many months at Constantinople; by which treaty the East, with Constantinople, was given to Michael, and the West, with Rome, to Charles. And he was so eager to work with Charles that he sent his emissaries to the city of Aachen to meet the emissaries of Charles and propose the treaty. When they arrived there they secured from Charles all they asked. And although said Michael for ever so long warred against the Bulgarians and defeated them, yet he was finally himself defeated to such an extent that he not only lost his army, but also his mind and heart. He abdicated and went into a monastery, and lived there to his end in the service of God. At this time the empire had hardly a name; for the barbarians ruled in the West, and the Romans, worn out by war, looked to Gaul. For this reason little mention is made afterwards of the Constantinopolitan or Greek emperors, but only of Charles the Great and his successors. [Michael I (Rhngabes), an obscure nobleman who had married Procopia, daughter of Nicephorus I, was made emperor in a revolution against his brother-in-law Stauracius, in 811. Elected as the tool of the orthodox party, Michael diligently persecuted the iconoclasts on the northern and eastern frontiers of the empire, but allowed the Bulgarians to ravage a great part of Macedonia and Thrace; having at last taken the field in the spring of 813, he was defeated near Versinikia, and relegated to a monastery in the island of Prote where he died in 845].

Irene (Hyrene), the mother of Constantine, held the Second Council at Nicaea with 330 bishops. There it was ordained that those who contended that the holy pictures were to be destroyed, were to be punished with an eternal curse. It was also ordained that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father and the Son.

Irene (752-803), the wife of Leo IV, Eastern Roman emperor, was originally a poor but beautiful Athenian orphan. She speedily gained the love and confidence of her weak husband, and at his death in 780 was left by him sole guardian of the empire and of their son Constantine VI, then ten years old. Seizing the supreme power in the name of the latter, she ruled the empire at her own discretion for ten years, displaying great firmness and sagacity. Her most notable act was the restoration of the orthodox image-worship, a policy that she always had secretly favored, though compelled to abjure it in her husband's lifetime. Having elected Tarasius, one of her partisans, to the patriarchate, she summoned two church councils. The first, held in 786 at Constantinople, was frustrated by the opposition of the soldiers. The second, to which the chronicler refers, was convened at Nicaea in 787. It revived the adoration of images and reunited the Eastern church with that of Rome.

As Constantine approached maturity he began to grow restive under his mother's autocratic sway, with the result that he was finally proclaimed sole ruler in 790. Then Irene organized a powerful conspiracy on her own behalf; the emperor was seized, and by the orders of his mother, his eyes were blinded. For five years she reigned in prosperity and splendor; but in 802 the patricians, upon whom she had lavished every honor and favor, conspired against her, and placed on the throne Nicephorus, the minister of finance. Irene was exiled to Lesbos, and forced to support herself by spinning. She died the following year. Her zeal in restoring images and monasteries has given her a place among the saints of the Eastern Orthodox Church.

The last sentence in this paragraph ("It was also ordained that the Holy Spirit proceeded from the Father and the Son.") was not part of this Council. In fact, it later became a point of serious contention, as the phrase filioque (Latin for 'and from the Son') was inserted later by the Western Church into the Nicene Creed and never accepted by the Eastern Church. Indeed, The insertion of the clause filioque became an issue between the Eastern and Western Churches first in 864 when Patriarch Photios I of Constantinople declared it heretical. It was an element that led to the East-West Schism of 1054. Schedel (or his source) has inserted this false statement here either unintentionally because of faulty historical evidence or intentionally to reflect his belief in the superiority of the Western Church over that of the Eastern Church.

Also, Pope Adrian (Hadrianus), after peace was secured with the Lombards, held the Seventh Council, attended by 350 bishops. In that Council the matter of the Felician heresy was disposed of; laymen were commanded not to interfere with the election of a Roman pope; also that persons without honor were not to be called into the priesthood; and so also that the clergy in foreign lands were not to allow themselves to be drawn into the civil courts. [During the pontificate of Adrian was held the Second Council of Nicaea (787), being the Seventh Ecumenical (i.e., General) Council, by which the worship of images was formally sanctioned, and the decrees of a council held at Constantinople, in 754, by which that worship was denounced, were condemned. The business of this council was conducted by Tarasius, of Constantinople, two legates from Rome being present; but the empress Irene declared Adrian president as being the chief bishop of the world. The decrees of this council, however, were not received in the West].

Folio CLXVI verso

At this time a golden tablet is said to have been found in the grave of a certain person. On it were written these words: Christ will be born of the Virgin Mary, and I believe in him. Under Constantine and Irene, O sun, you will see me again.

Desiderius, last of the Lombard kings, reigned 18 years after the death of Aistulf, the king; and he was at first king of the land of Etruria. When he heard of the passing of Aistulf, he collected a large army to attack the Lombard kingdom. In order to accomplish his purpose, he promised the pope and the Romans many great things against Ratchis (Rachesium), who had taken on the garb of a monk; and thereby he secured their acquiescence, and the kingdom itself by peaceable means. At this same time the power and virtue of the Lombards began to decline because of their love of pleasure. When Desiderius was relieved of his fears and concerns regarding his opponents, he departed from his promises to the pope and the Romans, and began to show ill will and oppression against them. Therefore Pope Zachary (Zacharias) called upon Charles (Carolus) the Great to warn Desiderius to desist from his unworthy proceedings against the pope. Through the emissaries of King Charles, Desiderius was requested to return to the pope what he had wrongfully taken from him. Armies were assembled by both sides; and when Desiderius came forth to engage him, Charles defeated him at two places, forcing him to flee; and he overran the country far and wide. Then Desiderius fled to Pavia, and sent his wife and children to Verona. And when the Spoletans, Reatians, and Lombards, all of whom lived in the vicinity, noted the calamity that had befallen Desiderius, they marched to Rome, submitting themselves and all their possessions to the Roman bishop. A number of other cities and communities did likewise. Charles left his uncle Bernhard to besiege Pavia, while he proceeded to Verona with a portion of the army. But Aldegisius, son of Desiderius, fled from there to the Constantinopolitan emperor. Charles took almost all the cities of Italy beyond the mountains, and then he came to Rome, from where he returned to Pavia. This he took through surrender, and he removed Desiderius to France, sending him to Lyons. And so ended the Lombard kingdom in the Year of Salvation 774, and in the fifth year of the pontificate of Pope Adrian, after having endured for nearly two hundred and thirty-two years under 22 kings from Alboin all the way up to Desiderius. [Desiderius: Aistulf did not surrender to the Roman Church all the towns included in Pepin's donation. But after Aistulf's death in 756 more favorable prospects opened, in consequence of certain disturbances among the Lombards. The duke Desiderius aspired to the kingdom; but Ratchis, brother of the deceased monarch, who had long lived as a monk at Monte Cassino, came forward as a rival. Desiderius implored the aid of the pope; and when he had promised to surrender to Peter certain towns, Stephen, the pope, called on Ratchis and the Lombards generally to offer no opposition to his claim. By these means Desiderius became firmly settled on the throne; but as he was afterwards exposed to the pope's jealousy, he endeavored to secure himself by giving his daughters in marriage to Pepin's sons and successors, Charles (the Great) and Carloman. But the alliance thus formed between the Lombard monarch and the Frankish sovereigns did not last very long. Charlemagne divorced the daughter of Desiderius (whom he had married) on the ground that she had remained childless; and he sent her back to her father. The enraged Lombard king sought revenge by endeavoring to induce the pope to anoint Carloman's children kings of the Franks, but Pope Adrian refused his request; for this reason Desiderius invaded the papal territories, laid waste the country and menaced Rome. The pope, unable to make an effective resistance, placed himself under the protection of Charlemagne, who crossed the Alps at the head of a formidable army in 774; took Pavia, the Lombard capitol, after a siege of two months; made Desiderius a prisoner, and thus put an end to the Lombard kingdom, which had been the chief power in Italy for two centuries (571-774). Desiderius and his family were sent to France, where they died in obscurity, Desiderius himself ending his days in a cloister. Charlemagne, as conqueror, received the Iron Crown of Lombardy].

Paul (Paulus), the Lombard historian, and a deacon of the Aquilaean patriarchate, was beloved by his king, Desiderius, for his wisdom and intelligence. Charles (Carolus) took him to Gaul, and gave him his freedom, holding him in high esteem for a long time; but when Charles observed that Paul sought Desiderius, he sent him to the island of Diomedes. Paul fled from there, and at the request of the wife and daughter of Desiderius, he wrote the entire history from the Emperor Julius to the time of Justinian I. Afterwards he went to the monastery of Cassino, where he spent the rest of his days in devout service to God. He also wrote about many good Christian matters.

Paul the Deacon (Paulus Diaconus, also known as Warnefridi or Casinensis) (c. 720–c. 800), the historian of the Lombards, belonged to a noble Lombard family and flourished in the 8th century. An ancestor named Leupichis entered Italy in the train of Alboin and received lands at or near Forum Iulii (Friuli). During an invasion the Avars swept off the five sons of this warrior in Illyria; but one, his namesake, returned to Italy and restored the ruined fortunes of his house. The grandson of the younger Leupichis was Warnefried, who by his wife Theolinda became the father of Paulus. Born between 720 and 725, Paulus received an excellent education, probably at the court of the Lombard king Ratchis in Pavia, and it is probable that he was secretary to the Lombard king Desiderius, the successor of Ratchis. It is certain that this king's daughter, Adelperga, was his pupil. After Adelperga had married Arichis, duke of Benevento, Paulus at her request wrote his continuation of Eutropius. It is possible that he took refuge at Benevento when Pavia was taken by Charlemagne in 774, but is much more likely that his residence there was anterior to this even by several years. Soon he entered a monastery on Lake Como, and before 782 he had become a monk of the great Benedictine house of Monte Cassino, where he made the acquaintance of Charlemagne. About 776 his brother Arichis had been carried as a prisoner to France, and when five years later the Frankish king visited Rome, Paulus successfully wrote to him on behalf of the captive. His literary attainments attracted the notice of Charlemagne, and Paulus became a potent factor in the Carolingian renaissance. In 787 he returned to Italy, where he died between 794 and 800.

The chief work of Paulus is his Historia gentis Langobardorum. This incomplete history in six books was written after 787 and deals with the story of the Lombards from 568 to the death of King Liutprand in 747. The story is told from the point of view of a Lombard patriot and is especially valuable for the relations between the Franks and the Lombards. Paulus wrote at the request of Angilram, bishop of Metz (d. 791) a history of the bishops of Metz to 766, the first work of its kind north of the Alps.

Usuard (Isuardus), a monk, and a native of Gaul, is also said to have flourished at this time for his very great knowledge in every field of study. At the command of Charles (Caroli) the Great he compiled all the dealings, works and histories of the saints in a beautifully written book called a martyrology; and he found that more than three hundred festivals come together every day. [Usuard (Isuardus) wrote his martyrology after a request from Charles the Bald (Charles the Bald; 823 – 877), not Charles the Great. He appears to have died sometime around the year 875].

Alcuin (Alcuinus), also a native of Gaul, was a preceptor and tutor of Charles (Caroli) the Great in the Greek and Latin tongues. He was highly learned, versed in all branches of philosophy, and a prince among teachers in the Holy Scriptures. For these reasons King Charles greatly respected him and held him in high esteem. He taught Charles some of the liberal arts. At the request of Boniface, archbishop of Mainz, he completely restored the prayers of the mass and other things pertaining to the divine service, which had been lost during the ravages of the Goths. And so, at his request, the said Charles transferred the university from Rome to Paris. And the university of Athens was also brought there. This Alcuin, by the grace of Charles, also presided over the Monastery of Saint Martin at Tours; for all the brethren there, having become addicted to sensual pleasures, had been ingloriously destroyed one night by an angel. As he was considered a highly learned theologian he also wrote books: On the Trinity, The Mirror of Little Boys (Little Things? Glosses?) with Questions, [The title of this work(s) is unknown to me. The Latin runs thus: cum qu(a)estionibus speculum parvulorum]. On Ecclesiastical Dogma, On the Reason of the Soul, and many other books pertaining to the Christian religion. [Alcuin, born in 725, the famous Anglo-Saxon monk, was one of the greatest scholars of his time, and the most trusted friend and counselor of Charlemagne. He took up his residence at Charlemagne's court in 741, and died in 804. He was the emperor's tutor during this period, and instigated many of that sovereign's most useful acts. History furnishes few more striking spectacles than that of the great Western Emperor, surrounded by the princes and princesses of his family and the learned personages of his brilliant court, all sitting as pupils at the feet of their Anglo-Saxon preceptor Alcuin, in the "school of the palace" at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aachen). The course of study that these academicians pursued embraced the trivium and quadrivium, or "the seven liberal arts," with special attention to grammar, psalmody, and the theory of music; and as Alcuin excelled in the exposition of the Scriptures, the mysteries of theology were not forgotten in his lectures. As early as 789, acting on Alcuin's advice, the emperor addressed a circular letter to the bishops, ordering them to establish elementary schools in their cathedral cities, for the free instruction of the children of freemen and the laboring classes. Each monastery was required to maintain a school for the higher branches of learning].

Charles (Carolus), king of the Franks, who because of his deeds was later surnamed the Great, reigned for 46 years after the death of his father Pepin (Pipino). Pepin had reigned 15 years and left his kingdom in equal parts to Charles and Carloman; but as Carloman died soon afterwards, the Franks gave over the care of his share to Charles. This Charles (it is said), was born at Ingleheim, situated four miles from Mainz. Now when Pepin died, Charles made war against the Aquitanians; and he returned home victorious. After this the pope called upon Charles for support against Desiderius, the Lombard king; so Charles, with a large army, moved against Desiderius, who also armed with a great force and went forth to meet him; and they came together in battle. But the Lombards were defeated and took to flight. Desiderius, with a few of his soldiers, fled to Pavia, and Charles pursued him with his army. Finally, Desiderius and his wife and children were made prisoners. And from the first, Italy re-established itself through the good works of Charles. When the war with the Lombards was ended, the pending war with the Saxons, which had been carried on for two years by his generals, compelled him to return home. Now the Saxons were a very great and warlike people. They honored false gods, and continually carried on hostilities with the Franks; and although the Saxons were often defeated, making treaties and giving hostages, nevertheless, until the advent of Charles, none of the Franks had won a complete victory nor subdued the Saxons in their infidelity. Charles armed a mighty force, and determined upon a day on which all the men on the Rhine were to assemble; and the Franks armed with great joy. And so the Saxon war was renewed, and there had never been a greater, longer, or severer war with the Saxons; for it is known that this war lasted 33 years. Finally the Saxons were so hard pressed that they gave themselves up to Charles, with everything in their power; and they abandoned their ways and all their false gods, and were compelled to accept the Christian faith. But as the people of Spain were at this time also held in severe subjection by the barbarians, Charles turned his mind to their relief; and he marched against the enemy. Before long a number of cities surrendered, while others were captured by force; and so nearly all of Spain came into the power of the Franks. In the meantime Tassilo (Taxilo), the Bavarian duke, roused his near neighbors against the Franks; but he afterward surrendered and gave hostages. And now as the kingdom of Charles and all the affairs of the Franks attained to great renown, and the kingdom became rich in possessions, Charles proceeded against the Hungarians, who had given aid and support to his enemies in war. And Charles never conducted a war in which more people were slain; for a great number of Hungarians, and among them the most noble, perished. And the Franks carried home with them a very large amount of gold and silver. [Charlemagne (Charles the Great; Carolus Magnus in Latin), king of the Franks and emperor, born April 2, 742, was the eldest son of Pepin III, called the Short, and grandson of Charles Martel. On Pepin's death in 768, Charles and his brother Carloman jointly succeeded to the throne; and on Carloman's death, three years later, Charles became sole king. At the request of Pope Adrian I, he crossed the Alps in 773, and overthrew the Lombard kingdom, confirming Ravenna to the papal see. In 771 and again in 775 he made war against the Saxons, securing the submission of their chieftains in 777. But the Saxons rose again in 782 and destroyed a Frankish army, which Charles avenged with fearful severity. In 788 Bavaria was absorbed in his dominions, and next the country of the Avars to the Raab. In 800 he marched into Italy to support Pope Leo III against the rebellious Romans, and on Christmas day of that year he was crowned by the pope in St. Peter's and saluted as the emperor of the Romans. The remaining years of his reign were spent in further consolidations of his vast empire, which extended from the Ebro to the Elbe. Bishoprics were founded in the Saxon country; many of the Slavs beyond the Elbe were subjugated. The emperor promoted education, agriculture, arts, manufactures and commerce. He built sumptuous palaces, particularly at Aix-la-Chapell (Aachen) and Ingelheim near Bingen, and many churches. He died January 28, 814].

Roland (Rolandus), a count Palatine and grandson of Charles, was a man of inestimable strength and greatness, for which he was renowned throughout the world. When Charles again led his forces into Gaul, he was surprised by the Vasconians [The Basques]. near the Pyrenees. And although many of the enemy were slain in this battle, yet Anselm (Anshelmus) and Eggihard (Egibardus), the highest officers in Charles's army, as well as this Roland (referring to the portrait opposite the text), were slain; although some say Roland died of thirst. [Roland, hero of the great French epic ('The Song or Lay of Roland'), was an historical character. Charlemagne invaded Spain in 778, and had captured Pamplona, but failed before Saragossa, when the news of a Saxon revolt recalled him to the banks of the Rhine. On his retreat to France through the defiles of the Pyrenees, part of his army was cut off from the main body by the Basques, and entirely destroyed. The incident is related in Einhard's ('Life of Charles'), where the names of the leaders are given. "In this battle were slain Eggihard praepositus ('chief' or 'general') of the royal table; Anselm, count of the palace; and Hruodland, prefect of the Breton march. . ." The scene of the disaster is fixed by tradition at Roncevaux on the road from Pamplona to St. Jean Pied de Port. There is evidence of a continuous tradition dating from the original event, and as Roncevaux lay on the route to Compostella, the many pilgrims who must have passed the site, from the middle of the 9th century onwards, may have helped to spread the story. In addition to France, it was in Italy that the Roland legend had some of its greatest legacy: Charlemagne and Roland appear in the (Canto XVIII) of Dante, and statues of Roland and Oliver appear on the doorway of the cathedral of Verona].

Tassilo (Taxilo), duke of Bavaria, at the instigation of his wife, at this time provoked his neighbors, and made an alliance with the Hungarians. His wife was the daughter of Desiderius, the Lombard king, and being dejected by her father's misfortune, she reminded Tassilo of it day and night, urging him to come to the relief of her father from sorrow and misery; for no one but Tassilo could restore him to freedom. With such pleadings she moved him to equip an army. But Charles soon came to Bavaria, and Tassilo was so frightened that he surrendered and gave Theon, his son, and other select youths as hostages. [Tassilo (Taxilo), duke of Bavaria, of the lineage of Agilulf, was born in 742 and became duke in 749. Eight years later he was compelled to acknowledge his uncle Pepin, the Frankish king, as his overlord. However, under Charlemagne he attempted to achieve independence, entering into a secret alliance with his brother-in-law, the Lombard Adalgis, and the Avars. But in 787 he was again compelled to submit. A year later he renewed the old alliance and was condemned to death, but pardoned and locked up in a monastery. He died in 794, the last of the Agilulfian line].

Adalgis (Aldegisius), son of Desiderius, who during the siege of Pavia fled to Greece, at this time, by the help of many Greeks, came into Italy with a great force to demand the return of his father's kingdom. But he was defeated by the Franks, imprisoned, and subjected to so many tortures that his misery ended in martyrdom. [Adalgis (also spelled Adelchis; Aldegisius in Latin) was the son of Desiderius and a prince of the Lombards in Italy. After his father was defeated by Charlemagne in Pavia in 774, Adalgis took refuge in Constantinople. He hoped to recapture Lombardy with the aid of Empress Irene, but when finally given a chance in 787, he was defeated by a coalition consisting of the Franks and the new prince of Benevento, Grimoald III, a vassal loyal to Charlemagne. Adalgis fled to Constantinople (contra the story of his being captured in the), where he died in 788].

Leo, the third pope of that name, whose father was Arrupius, was elected pope. He was a highly learned man, and so reared and instructed in ecclesiastical and spiritual training, that he was worthy of elevation above all others. He was a virtuous, wholesome, well disciplined, eloquent man, and such a lover of the learned that by means of compensatory inducements he attracted them to himself from many places, and found great pleasure in their instruction and company. He showed great zeal in teaching, preaching, visiting the sick, and in giving alms. After he had admonished two priests for their misconduct, they decided upon revenge, and in the course of a litany and procession he was stopped, made a prisoner, deprived of his papal ornaments, his tongue and his sight, and was placed in custody in the monastery of Saint Erasmus. But his speech and sight (as Bibliothecarius testifies) were restored to him by divine grace. Through the assistance of a faithful chamberlain he was led to the Basilica of the Blessed Peter, and Winegis (Vinisigius), the duke of Spoleto, was appealed to for help. Leo stayed there only a few days, proceeding to King Charles (Carolum) in Saxony; but upon the latter's orders he returned to Rome. The Roman clergy and the people came some distance to meet him. Later Charles also came to Rome, being received by the pope and the people with great glory, honor, and joy. Soon afterwards the king called the clergy and the people to the Basilica of the Blessed Peter. There the pope, placing the Gospel of Christ on a lectern, swore on it that he was innocent of all that of which he stood accused. This occurred on the Ides of December in the Year of Salvation eight hundred. On the day of the birth of our Lord (i.e. Christmas day), following, Leo crowned Charles as Roman emperor, and anointed his son Pepin as king of Italy. Finally this Leo built from the ground up a large hospital, which the Greeks call xenodochion, near Saint Peter's. He died in the twenty-first year of his pontificate. [Leo III, whose pontificate (795-816) covered the last 18 years of the reign of Charlemagne, was a native of Rome, and succeeded Adrian I. His first act was to send to Charles as patrician the standard of Rome along with the keys of the sepulcher of St. Peter and of the city, and other presents, with a request that he send an ambassador to Rome to receive the oath of allegiance. Thus Charlemagne was put in full possession of the city; and the pope having renounced subjection to the Greek emperors, their sovereignty over Rome ended. In 799, while riding in a procession, Leo was attacked at the instigation of the nephews of Adrian I with the idea of depriving him of his eyes and tongue in order to disqualify him for the papal office; but this barbarous intention was not executed. Leo sought the help of the Frankish duke of Spoleto. Having vainly requested the presence of Charles in Rome, Leo crossed the Alps to meet the king at Paderborn. He was received with ceremony and respect, but Charles appointed both pope and his accusers to appear before him at Rome. Charles appeared at Rome the following year and acquitted the pope, who was, however, required to clear himself by the oath of compurgation. The coronation of Charles took place two days later, on Christmas day, 800; and Leo also anointed his son. After Charles's death Leo's enemies renewed their attacks, and serious charges were pending against him when he died in 816]. A comet appeared in the year in which the said Pope Leo died; and which, according to some, was an omen of this calamity. And he was buried in the Basilica of Peter on the day before the Ides of June. After his death the seat was then vacant for ten days.

Stephen the Fourth, a Roman whose father was Julius, in the third month of his pontificate journeyed to Emperor Louis (Ludovicum) in Gaul. He respectfully sent forth Theodolphus, the local bishop, together with the clergy, to meet him, and also personally received him with great honor and respect. This Stephen was born of noble parents, and possessed such scriptural wisdom and wholesome disposition that he was piously regarded by all. And, as they say, he anointed and crowned said Louis. After various dealings between them, involving the peace of Italy, Leo returned to Rome, bringing with him a very costly cross of great value, which Louis presented to Saint Peter's at his own expense. And this very holy pope died in the seventh month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat, by his death, was then vacant eleven days. [Stephen IV, pope from June 816 to January 817, succeeded Leo III. He was consecrated immediately, and promptly ordered the Roman people to swear fidelity to Louis the Pious, to whom he paid a personal visit at Rheims. There he crowned the king and queen, but not until he had received homage from the emperor, who recognized him as his spiritual superior. Stephen died the year after his return to Rome].

Paschal (Pascalis), the first pope of this name, a Roman whose father was Bonofus, was elected pope without the sanction of the emperor. As soon as he received the pontificate, he sent his emissaries to Emperor Louis to inquire whether he was obliged to accept the pontificate at the hands of the clergy and the people who had elected him; but Louis was satisfied with the proceedings, and said that the decision of the clergy and the people was to be observed; but that in future they were to be careful not to offend his majesty. Pope Stephen, while he still lived, placed this man (i.e. Paschal), on account of his virtue and learning, in charge of the monastery of Saint Stephen the Martyr in the Vatican; and he erected several churches and repaired others, and translated a number of holy bodies to worthy places. He died in the seventh year, third month and seventeenth day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat then was vacant for four days. [Paschal I, native of Rome, was raised to the pontificate in 817 by acclamation of the clergy, and consecrated without imperial sanction. The new pontiff laid the blame for this hasty procedure on the clergy and people of Rome; and although Louis the Pious accepted the excuse, he gave warning that in the future his sovereign rights must not be so abused. Paschal's relations with the imperial house were never very cordial, and he failed to win over the Roman nobles. He died in 824, and was succeeded by Eugenius II].

Charles (Carolus) was surnamed the Great because of his distinguished services, his great faith, and his liberality toward all Christians. After he had added to his paternal kingdom, not only Gaul, on the Rhine and on the sea; and Germany, on the Danube and the river Saale; also Aquitaine, [Aquitaine was a Roman province in southwestern Gaul; later a French duchy united with England in 1154; conquered by the French in 1451]. Vasconia, [Vasconia, the country of the Vascones, in the northeastern part of Hispania Terraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyrenees, and stretching as far as the north coast in the present Navarre and Guipuscoa. Their name is preserved in the modern one of the Basques, although the people do not call themselves by that appellation, but Euscaldunac, their country Euscalaria, and their language Euscara. They went into battle bareheaded, and passed among the Romans for skillful soothsayers. Their principal town is Pompelo (Pamplona)]. and nearly all of Spain; and had engaged the Lombards in Italy and by might and force added them to his kingdom; but also Saxony, which is no small part of the German nation, and both Pannoniae, [Pannonia was one of the most important provinces of the Roman Empire, on the south and west of the Danube, which forms its boundary on the north and east; to the south lie Illyricum and Moesia; while in the west it was separated from Noricum by Mount Cetius, and from Italy by the Julian Alps. The country extended along the Danube from Vindobona (Vienna) to Singidunum, and accordingly comprised the eastern portions of Austria, Carinthia, Carniola, the portion of Hungary between the Danube and the Save, Slavonia, and portions of Croatia and Bosnia. The Romans divided it into Pannonia Superior and Inferior, and Upper and Lower Pannonia, and in consequence of this division the whole country is sometimes called by the plural name Pannoniae]. and beyond the Danube, Dacia [Dacia, between the lower Danube and the Carpathian mountains was the country of the Daci or Getae, a Thracian people]. and Istria, [Istria, a peninsula in the Adriatic, running out from the coast of Liburnia, between Trieste and the Gulf of Quarnero]. and the entire Liburnian kingdom; [Liburnia, a district in Illyricum, occupied by the Liburni. Driven out from the countries between Pannonia and Venetia by the Gallic invasion, they were compressed within the district from the Titius to the Arsia, which assumed the name of Liburnia. It was afterward incorporated into the province of Dalmatia and made a Roman colony]. also all the barbarian people living in Germany between the Danube, the sea, and the Rhine—partly by force of arms and in part by kindness—so with these possessions and distinguished deeds he attained to this name and renown through force of his arms, not only in Gaul, but throughout the world. In the Year of Salvation eight hundred and one, being the fifth year of Pope Leo, (after Constantine the Great left Rome and went East to Constantinople, and the Roman Empire in the West had been dormant for two hundred thirty years after Augustulus), this Charles, through his virtue and power, brought the empire back to the West; and he received the name and office of emperor with the consent of the Roman people, and to their great joy; and as such emperor he reigned for fourteen years. In commemoration of this imperial honor he restored to its former state the city of Florence, the greater part of which had been destroyed by the Goths; and he brought back into the city all the nobles who had been dispersed among the neighboring towns, castles and marches; and he encompassed it with new walls, and adorned it with churches. Charles was erect in body, had a broad chest and shoulders, large bright eyes, slightly elevated nose, well-formed fine mouth, and a clear voice. He was dignified and courageous in bearing, manner and action. He had a long beard, healthy complexion and, according to Gallic custom, was devoted to the chase, which he believed conducive to health. It is said that he also derived much satisfaction and pleasure from the bath and from natural warm springs. He built a church to the Holy Virgin Mary at great cost and expense in the city of Aix-la-Chapelle (Aquisgrani), the capital of the empire, where he maintained his royal seat; and to this church he gave the handkerchief and shift of the most blessed Mary. In addition to his royal virtues he was well spoken, versatile, and learned in the fine arts. He had many beautiful children by many wives, especially by his wife Hildegard, namely, Charles (Carolus), Pepin (Pipinum), Louis (Ludovicum), and a number of daughters. The sons he placed under the tutelage of highly learned men for instruction in letters and in wisdom; but in order that the daughters might not become indifferent through idleness, he accustomed them to good works. When he became burdened with years, and his son Pepin, the king of Italy, had passed away at Milan, he made provision that his son Louis should be king of Aquitaine and successor to the Empire, while his grandson Bernhard should be king of Italy and obedient to Louis in all things; and he confirmed to his successors not only the kingdom of the Franks, but also the title or emperor. He left Aix-la-Chapelle to participate in the chase, but returned with a fever, and a pain in his side. And he died in the seventy-second year of his age and the forty-seventh year of his reign, in the eight hundred and fifteenth year of Christian salvation on the fifth day of the Kalends of February. His body was buried with a solemn funeral in the Basilica at Aix-la-Chapelle with (his sepulcher) bearing the following epigram: The Body of Charles the Great, a Most Christian Emperor of the Romans, Lies Buried under this Sepulcher. [The inscription is not in the German edition of the chronicle]. Three years before his death he made a will, dividing his estate into three parts, two of which he bequeathed to the principal bishops for the use of the churches and the benefit of the poor, while the third part he gave to his children and grandchildren according to their respective shares. Among his treasures were three silver tables, and a very large golden one. On one was engraved the city of Constantinople, and this he sent to St. Peter's Church in Rome. On another was engraved the city of Rome, and this he gave to the church at Ravenna. The third one contained a description of all the country round about. This third silver table, as well as the golden one, he left to his sons. [See Folio CLXVII recto, and note].

At this time a Jew in Syria, to the grief of the Christians, pierced an image of Christ with a lance; and soon blood flowed from it continuously. The Jew becoming frightened, held a vessel under the wound, and collected the blood. By this many people were cured, and more Jews were converted to the Christian faith. The same blood was later brought to Mantua, where it was held in great veneration because of the miracles which occurred in its presence. When Charles (Carolus) the emperor heard of this, he wrote to Pope Leo to apprise him of these things. Upon learning of this the pope went to Mantua, and after preserving the blood, he went to Charles and advised him of the truth of this miracle.

Eugenius, the second pope of that name, a Roman whose father was Bohemund (Boemundo), succeeded Paschal (Pascali). At this time occurred the eighth schism, between this Eugenius and one named Zinzinnus (Zinzinum); but Eugenius was worthy and honorable, and a man of distinction. And by reason of his amiability and eloquence he was given the preference. He was so industrious in the harvesting of the crops, that at no time was grain marketed in Rome at a lower price. And he protected the widows and orphans, and therefore he was deservedly called the father of the poor by many persons. After having officiated for four years he died, and was mourned by all. Some write that his enemies deprived him of his eyesight, and that thus he was crowned with martyrdom. His body was buried with every devotion in the Basilica of Peter, prince of the Apostles. [Eugenius (sometimes called Eugene in English) II, a native of Rome, succeeded Pope Paschal I in 824. He was the candidate of the nobles, while the clerical faction brought forth a competitor. But the monk Wala, representative of the emperor Lothair, succeeded in securing the election of Eugenius. Lothair, however, took advantage of this opportunity to redress many abuses in the papal administration, to vest the election of the pope in the nobles, and to confirm the statute that no pope should be consecrated until his election had been approved by the emperor. A council, which assembled at Rome, passed enactments for the restoration of church discipline, took measures for the foundation of schools and chapters, and decided against priests wearing secular dress or engaging in secular occupations. Eugenius died in 827, and was succeeded by Valentine].

Pope Valentine (Valentinus), a Roman whose father was Leontius, was a man who from his tender years until a mature age learned from Paschal and Eugenius, very holy men, knowledge, reason, and how to lead a good and holy life. He was not inclined to gaming, quarreling and wanton pleasures, which youths indulge in, but took the teachings and regulations of a worthy life from the writings of the ancients and the examples of the holy popes. And having thus led a holy, virtuous, good and kind life, he was elevated to the pontificate, of which he was well worthy. But he died on the fortieth day of his pontificate, possibly through the fault of his contemporaries, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. When he was alive scarcely could Roman freedom or the Christian religion be weakened.

Valentinus, successor of Pope Eugenius II, a Roman by birth, held the pontificate, in 827, for only 40 days. He was first made a deacon by Paschal I. Nothing further is known of his history. He was succeeded by Gregory IV.

The last sentence is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Pope Gregory (Gregorius) the Fourth, a Roman whose father was John (Ioanne), and a priest of the parish church of Saint Mark, of noble birth, renowned piety, distinguished scriptural wisdom and learning, and possessed of eloquence, was a man of such discretion that upon his election as pope by the Roman clergy and the people he was not willing to obtain this office until the ambassadors of Emperor Louis (Ludovici), who were to carefully discuss and confirm the election, arrived. And Emperor Louis did not send them on account of pride, but to serve the interests of the empire. At his behest Gregory instituted the feast of All Saints, to be celebrated on the Kalends of November, and the Gauls and the Germans were the first to observe it. After many good deeds Gregory died in the 16th year of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. After his death the seat was vacant for 15 days. [Gregory IV, pope from 827 to 844, is chiefly associated with the quarrels between Lothair and Louis the Pious. The institution of the feast of All Saints is usually attributed to him. He died January 25, 844].

Pepin (Pipinus), Emperor Charles's (Caroli) eldest son, reigned as king of Italy for 13 years. He was a man of high renown, and not unlike his father in a number of ways. His father sent him against the Hungarians, whom he subdued by force of arms; also the Beneventans who were oppressing the adjoining papal lands; and against the Venetians. He also attacked Heraclaea and Aquilaea, on which account many of the nobility went to Venice. And when he had accomplished these things and concluded many other wars, he went to Milan and there ended his life in renown and peace. [Pepin, king of Italy, second son of Charlemagne, by Hildegard, was born in 777 and died in 810. He was baptized and crowned king of Rome by Pope Adrian in 781. He carried on several wars with the Avars. In 797, together with the Bavarians and Lombards, he devastated the land of the Slavs, and in 799 marched with his father against the Saxons. In the division of the empire of Charlemagne in 806, he received Bavaria and Italy. He drove off the Moors and Corsicans, Captured Venice in 810, and subjugated the Dukes Wilheran and Beatus. His son Bernard (who died in 818) was made king of Italy by Charles the Great, his grandfather].

Bernard (Bernardus), grandson of Charles (Caroli) the Great, was declared king of Italy by the emperor, after Pepin (Pipinum); and he reigned 9 years. Although the emperor Charlemagne had commanded him to obey his son and successor (Louis) in all things, yet after Charlemagne's death, Bernhard refused, being influenced by a number of Italian bishops and quarrelsome citizens. He took up arms and a number of cities were compelled to submit and the people to take an oath. When knowledge of this came to the emperor, he adjudged Bernhard guilty of lese majesty [The phrase 'lese majesty' translates the Latin l(a)esa maiestatis crimine of the . Best known by its French spelling, lèse majesté, the phrase in any language translates as '(crime of) injury to the Majesty'. It is the crime of violating majesty, an offense against the dignity of a reigning sovereign or against a state], and declared him an enemy. And the emperor, together with an army collected from Gaul, Germany and Bavaria, marched into Italy. Those of the nobility who were to blame were strangled, Bernhard was beheaded, and the bishops were deposed and sent into monasteries. [Bernhard, king of Italy, (illegitimate) son of Pepin and grandson of Charlemagne, was appointed king by the latter, and crowned in 813. When Louis the Pious, in 817, decided to divide the empire among his sons, and to appoint his son Lothair as his successor, Bernard felt himself aggrieved, and took to arms. On the pretence of a settlement he was enticed to Chalon on the Saons, and in 818 was blinded. He died on the following April 17th. Louis the Pious rued this gruesome deed, and in 822 did public penance in church for it].

Louis (Ludovicus), the first of that name, surnamed the Pious, received the empire in the Year of Salvation 815, after the death of his father, Charles (Carolus) the Great; and with his son Lothair (Lothario) he reigned 25 years. In the winter, while in Aquitaine, Louis received notice of his father's death; at once he returned to Aix-la-Chapelle (Aquisgranum), and there he first heard the messengers who had journeyed after his father. Afterwards he transacted business with an assembly of the country, concerning matters affecting the Empire and the kingdom of France. Emperor Leo's ambassadors from Constantinople were also there at that time, and the treaties were renewed. Said Louis, together with King Bernard, undertook a military expedition against the people of Danorum; but as the seas were too frozen in the depth of winter, the emperor and the king were so delayed in their undertaking that when they had covered half the distance to Paderborn, in Saxony, they encamped the army for the winter. There the emperor received news that the most distinguished persons in Rome had sworn to assassinate Pope Leo; at once the emperor sent the king to Italy with the command to prevent diminution of the kingdom or secessions from it. When King Bernard arrived in Italy he became very ill, and he silenced affairs at Rome through Gerardus, the count. Afterwards Pope Stephen the Fourth went to France, and crowned Louis as emperor. Now when he came into the sovereignty, Louis conducted serious wars against the Vasconians and the Britons or English, and also against the Saracens, and he reduced these people to obedience, subordination and peace. With an armed force he also restored to his paternal kingdom, Harold (Heroldum), who had been driven out of Dacia. After many such well managed campaigns, this King Louis held a diet at Aix; and after making peace in ecclesiastical affairs, he declared his first-born son Lothair an associate sovereign, while he appointed Pepin, the second son, to Aquitaine, and designated Louis, the third son, king of Bavaria. In the course of these events Bernard, the king of Italy, at the instigation of certain Italian lords, became antagonistic to the emperor; but he was punished and beheaded as stated previously. Afterwards the king was informed that the Britons were in revolt; but when he had armed to silence them, and had arrived there, he found all things at peace. In the meantime his wife, Irmengard (Ermelgardam), who had born him three sons, died. Afterwards he appointed his son Lothair king of Italy in lieu of the deceased King Bernard. He was called to Rome by Pope Paschal (Pascali) and the Roman people, and was there first anointed and crowned as king by the pope, and after that acclaimed emperor. This Louis, a mild man, so conducting himself toward the papal see that the four popes who succeeded one another over a period of twenty-seven years, during the term of his sovereignty, were never without his support and assistance. This Louis was afterwards imprisoned by his son Lothair; but he was later released and restored to his throne. At last died the following: Firstly, the Greek emperor Michael; shortly afterwards Pope Gregory; and the emperor (Louis) followed in less than a month. He himself was buried in the Basilica of the Blessed Arnulf (Arnolphi).

Louis I, surnamed the Pious, Roman Emperor, a third son of Charlemagne and his wife Hildegard, was born at Chasseneuil in central France, and was crowned king of Aquitaine in 781. His tastes were ecclesiastical rather than military, and his government was conducted mainly by counselors. After the deaths of his two elder brothers, Louis, at his father's command, crowned himself co-emperor at Aix-la-Chapelle on September 11, 813, and became sole ruler the following January. He earned the surname of the Pious by banishing his sisters and others of immoral life from court, by attempting to reform and purify monastic life, and by showing great liberality to the church. In 816 he was crowned emperor at Rheims, and the following year at Aix. He arranged a division of his empire among his sons, which was followed by a revolt by his nephew Bernard, king of Italy; but the rising was suppressed and Bernhard slain. In 819 he married Judith, daughter of Wolf I, count of Bavaria. She bore him a son, Charles the Bald. A district was now carved out for Charles, but discontent over the arrangement resulted in a rebellion in the following year, provoked by Judith's intrigues. Lothair and his brother Pepin joined the rebels, Judith was sent to a convent, Louis was deposed, and Lothair became the real ruler of the empire, for a brief period, when his father was again restored to power.

Further trouble between Pepin and his father led to the nominal transfer of Aquitaine from Pepin to his brother Charles in 831. The emperor's plans for a division of his dominions led to a revolt of his three sons. He met them in June 833, near Kolmar, but owing to the influence of Pope Gregory IV he found himself deserted by his supporters; and the treachery and falsehood which marked the proceedings gave to the place the name Lügenfeld, or "field of lies." Judith was again banished, Louis was sent to a monastery, and the government of the empire was assumed by his son. But when the younger Louis had failed to induce Lothair to treat the emperor in a more becoming fashion, he and Louis took up arms in behalf of their father. As a result, Louis the Good was again restored to power in 834, Judith returned, and the kingdoms of Louis and Pepin were enlarged. The struggle with Lothair continued until fall, when he submitted to the emperor, and was confined to Italy. Louis the Pious was publicly restored to full power. In December 838 Pepin died, and the empire, except Bavaria which was the kingdom of Louis, was now divided between Lothair, reconciled to this father, and Charles. The emperor was returning from the suppression of a revolt on the part of his son Louis, when he died June 20, 840 on an island in the Rhine near Ingelheim.

The Mauri, a people thus called, at this time came to Sicily in ships and devastated everything. In consequence of which the Venetians also sailed there; and when the unbelievers saw their sails from afar, they returned to Africa. [Mauretania, most western of the principal division of North Africa, lay between the Atlantic on the west, the Mediterranean on the north, Numidia on the east, and Gaetulia on the south; but the districts embraced under the name Mauretania and Numidia were of very different extent at different periods. One of the chief tribes occupying this territory were the Mauri, who possessed a great breadth of fertile country between the Atlas mountains and the coasts, and seemed to have applied themselves to the settled pursuits of agriculture. From 429 to 534 Mauretania was in the hands of the Vandals, and in 650 and the following years it was conquered by the Arabs. Its ancient inhabitants still exist as powerful tribes in Morocco and Algiers under the names of Berbers, Schillus, etc]. The body of Saint Mark, the Evangelist was brought to Venice from Alexandria by certain merchants through a cunning deceit; for the priests, at the request of the merchants, placed the little casket containing the remains in a basket at a designated place. And the merchants covered the casket with vegetables and pork and carried it through the market. When the toll-gatherers sought to collect duty from it as merchandise, and found pork under the vegetables—having a horror of such meat, they searched no further; and so the body was placed on board a ship and brought to Venice. [According to legend, at the command of the Apostle Peter, Mark, whom he converted, went to preach the gospel in Egypt and founded the church of Alexandria. His miracles aroused the anger of the pagans, who reviled him as a magician. They seized him during the feasts of their god Serapis and dragged him along the streets and highways and over stony and rocky places until he perished. The Christians of Alexandria buried his mangled remains, and his sepulcher was regarded with the great reverence for several centuries. About 815, some Venetian merchants carried off the supposed relics to Venice, where the famous Basilica of St. Mark, perhaps the greatest Christian church in a country full of such lovely edifices, was built over them, St. Mark becoming the city's patron saint].

Rabanus, a monk and German abbot at Fulda, later archbishop of Mainz, and a very famous and distinguished theologian and poet, at this time through the greatness of his intelligence wrote many excellent books, especially that miraculous work On the Praises of the Holy Cross. [One of Rabanus Maurus' most popular works was a collection of poems centered around the cross, called De laudibus sanctae crucis ('On the Praises of the Holy Cross'), a set of learned, complexly arranged poems that present the cross (and often a monk kneeling before it) in word and image, and sometimes also in numbers]. This same man also commented on Chronicles and Maccabees, and wrote quite elegant sermons for very powerful people in celebration of all the saints. And he sat (in office as archbishop of Mainz) for 10 years (starting) in the Year of Salvation 846. [Rabanus (also spelled Hrabanus) Maurus, born at Mainz c. 776, was reared in the Benedictine monastery at Fulda. After considerable study he became a distinguished scholar and abbot of the monastery. In 847 he was elevated to archbishop of Mainz. His monastery school became the most celebrated in Germany, and he was surnamed Praeceptor Germaniae ('Teacher of Germany'). He died February 4, 856].

Strabo, also a monk from Gaul, was a very eminent Gaul and a most diligent commentator. He was a disciple of the previously mentioned Rabanus, and was a teacher of no less importance during this time than his master. He commented very beautifully on the books of the Bible, and he wrote about the duties of the Church to the emperor Louis (Ludovicum), as well as many other things.

Sergius, the second pope of that name, a Roman whose father was Sergius from the fourth region [The 'fourth region' is the shortened name of the fourth region of Augustus, a neighborhood or quarter of Rome also named Sacra Via from the historical street which formed its southwestern boundary], was elected pope to succeed Gregory, and until then he had been called Pig's Snout; but because of the offensive significance of his name, he was compelled to adopt another—Sergius. From this originated the custom of the Roman bishops (although all did not follow it) of changing their names when entering upon the pontificate. During the pontificates of his predecessors, Leo the Third, Stephen the Fourth, Eugenius the Second, and Gregory the Fourth, Sergius so demeaned himself in the practice of good morals and learning, that upon the death of Gregory he alone was considered worthy of the office. After entering upon his pontificate he directed his attention to the adornment of the houses of God. He restored the Basilica of Saints Sylvester and Martin that had collapsed on account of its age, and placed many holy relics in it. In the vicinity of these churches he also built a monastery in honor of Peter and Paul for perpetual service of God. The Romans, who through his intercession were relieved of their fears of tyrannical cruelty, loved this pious pope as a true vicar of Christ, and as the sole father of their country. At last, with ecclesiastical matters well and properly managed, he died in the third year of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. After his death the Roman seat was vacant for two months and 15 days. [Sergius II, a Roman, succeeded Gregory IV in 844, and was consecrated without the emperor's confirmation. Lothair, resenting this insult, sent his son Louis, king of Italy, to Rome. After exacting a promise of more regularity in the future, he confirmed the election, and the pope, in turn, crowned Louis as king of the Lombards. At this time the Saracens, who had established themselves in Sicily and Calabria, penetrated as far as Rome and plundered St. Peter's. Martinus Polonius affirmed that the pope changes his name, as stated in the text, and that this gave rise to the custom of setting aside the family name on elevation to the papacy].

Pope Leo the Fourth, a Roman whose father was Rudolf (Rodulfo), was elected pope, in the Year of the Incarnation eight hundred forty with the unanimous consent and good will of all the people; and deservedly so, for throughout life he was blameless in his service of God, renowned for his kindness, magnanimity, grace, generosity and spiritual learning. Some say that God, pursuant to the prayers of this pious man, caused the Saracens to be shipwrecked and drowned while homeward bound with Christian plunder; and he silenced them. His piety was such that his prayers exorcised a venomous serpent, the basilisk, [A basilisk (Greek for 'little king') is a mythological creature whose breath and look were considered fatal. It was shaped like a reptile and, as its name implies, reputed to be king of serpents. According to Pliny the Elder (8.33) the basilisk is a small snake native to North Africa that is not more than 12 inches in length with a bright white marking on its head resembling a diadem. In addition to killing any creature that looks into its eyes, it can destroy bushes not only by its touch but by its breath, as well as scorch grass and burst rocks]. out of the vaults of Saint Lucia the Virgin into a cave. This serpent by its breath and poison had destroyed many people. By the sign of the cross he also extinguished a dangerous fire in Rome. He restored many old ruined buildings there, and added fifteen towers. He also discovered the bodies of the Four Crowned Martyrs. [Probably the Four Martyrs of Gerona, adapted from the Acts of the "Quatuor Coronati," whose story, according to Baring-Gould (June 8) is devoid of foundation in truth]. The Saracens, having attacked the Romans and Neapolitans with a large fleet, the pope took up arms against them, and proceeded as far as Ostia; and in tears he appealed to God and made the sign of the cross over his forces; and in consequence the enemy was defeated and routed. At last he, who was exceedingly well-deserving of the name of a Christian concerning both the Church of God and the city of Rome, died in the eighth year, third month, and 6th day of his pontificate on the 16th day of the Kalends of August, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat was then vacant for two months and fifteen days. [Leo IV, pope from 847 to 855, was a Roman by birth, succeeding Sergius II. His pontificate was distinguished chiefly by his efforts to repair the damage done by the Saracens. He built and fortified the suburb on the right bank of the Tiber, still known as Civitas Leonina. A conflagration that he is said to have extinguished by his prayers is the subject of Raphael's great work in the of the Vatican. Leo held three synods].

John (Ioannes) of England (and, as they say) born in Mainz (Mogunciaco), secured the pontificate through evil arts; for although she was a woman, she traveled in the guise and manner of a man. In early youth she went to Athens with her lover, a learned man. There she became so highly educated in the Scriptures that when she came to Rome there were but few equal to her in the Holy Scriptures. In the guise of a man, having concealed her sex, she acquired such favor and credence by her lectures and subtle disputations, that upon the death of Leo she was elected pope in his stead (as Martin states) by common consent. But afterwards she became pregnant by one of her attendants; and having carried it in her womb for sometime, and having one day decided to go to the Lateran Basilica, she was taken in labor on the way, between the Colossus of Nero (i.e. the Colosseum) and Saint Clements; and there she gave birth, and died on the spot. Some say that when a pope desires to go to the Lateran Basilica, and reaches the vicinity where this happened, he avoids the same highway in detestation of the memory of such event. And secondly, when a pope has been newly elected, he is placed upon Peter's perforated chair; and in order to avoid a repetition of such an error in the future, the youngest deacon touches his genitalia through this perforated chair.

John VII (Pope Joan), by some regarded as a fact, by others as a fiction, has been the subject of much dispute. If fact, then she succeeded Leo IV in 853; held the pontificate for two years, one month and four days, and was succeeded by Benedict III. She is now omitted from the list of the popes, the pontificate of her predecessor, Leo IV, being reckoned from 847 to 855, and that of her successor Benedict III from 855 to 858. The authority invoked by Schedel, the chronicler, Martin of Troppau, also called Martinus Polonius, or Martin the Pole, was a devout Roman Catholic historian. Just before his death, about 1278, he completed his huge Chronicon pontificum et imperatorum ('History of the Popes and Emperors'). Martin was born at Troppau in Silesia. In youth he entered the order of St. Dominic at Prague, and later proceeded to Rome, where Guy Fucoldi, surnamed the Fat—a Languedocian warrior and lawyer before he turned priest—held the pontificate as Clement IV. Clement soon named Martin his papal chaplain and confessor; and it was at the pontiff's request that Martin commenced his great history. While engaged in this work Martin saw five more popes elevated in six years. After completing his book, the then pope appointed Martin Archbishop of Gnesen; but he died while on his journey to Poland to take up his new office. In his history, after speaking of the conclusion of the pontificate of Leo IV in 853, he states:

After the aforesaid Leo, John, an Englishman by descent, who came from Mainz, held the see two years, five months and four days. And the pontificate was vacant one month. He died at Rome. He, it is asserted, was a woman. And having been in youth taken by her lover to Athens in man's clothes, she made such progress in various sciences that there was nobody equal to her. So that afterwards lecturing on the Trivium, at Rome, she had great masters for her disciples and hearers. And for as much as she was in great esteem in the city, both for her life and her learning, she was unanimously elected pope.

But while pope she became pregnant by the person with whom she was intimate. But not knowing the time of her delivery, while going from St. Peter's to the Lateran, being taken in labor, she brought forth a child between the Coliseum and St. Clement's church. And afterwards dying she was, it was said, buried in that place. And because the Lord Pope always turns aside from that way, there are some who are fully persuaded that it is done in detestation of the fact. Nor is she put in the catalogue of the popes, as well on account of her female sex, as on account of the foul nature of the transaction.

The story of a female pope was current in Christendom for several centuries, fully attested by writers of the Catholic faith, and was not a Lutheran slander, as some have supposed. Martin of Troppau is not the only witness. Ranulph Higdon, an English Benedictine chronicler from the monastery of Werberg in Chester, whose life reached from the end of the 13th century to about 1363, included the account of Joan's tenure in his celebrated Polychronicon, a universal history from the beginning of the world to the death of Edward III, in 1377. He credits Martin of Troppau as his source. Both books were regarded as standard histories during the 15th century. Some historians also mention a marble statue of the woman pope, erected on the narrow street between the Coliseum and St. Clement's Church, at the point where she died – a statue showing her with her young baby in arms.

In recent years there has been much controversy as to whether Pope Joan was a fact or a myth, brought on no doubt by the fact that the Catholic Church has thought it was to suppress all matters that scandalize it. The Encyclopaedia Britannica, 14th Ed, refers to Joan as a "mythical pope (fl. 855), between Leo IV (847-855) and Benedict III (855-858)." Authorities are cited which are said to explode the tale, but they do not, as Clement Wood has shown in Part I of his book "The Woman Who was Pope," published in 1931. In addition to citations already referred to, he quotes from other authorities, and also analyzes the evidence as to:

- The marble statue of the woman and child;
- The inscription on it;
- The street avoided in the papal processions;
- The perforated chair.

He establishes that the statue did exist and that it was of the female pope; that the inscription "P. P. P. P. P." which the ancient chronicler Jean de Mailly said stood for Peter pater partum papissae prodito partum establishes that the woman pope had born her child here. So too, there is no question that the narrow street existed and that church processions did formerly pass that way, but avoid it now. No other reason for the change has ever been assigned. The story of Joan fits in perfectly.

Now as to the pierced chair. The authorized Catholic Encyclopedia disingenuously refers to it thus:

Further, on the occasion of his formal inauguration, in front of the Lateran Basilica, the newly elected pope always seated himself on a marble chair. The seat was a marble bath-stool, of which there were many in Rome; it was merely made use of by the pope to rest himself. But the imagination of the vulgar took this to signify that the sex of the pope was thereby tested, in order to prevent any further instance of a woman attaining to the chair of St. Peter.

However, according to authorities much nearer to this custom, this chair did exist and was used to test the sex of persons about to be elevated to the papacy. In the Latin texts it is variously referred to as sella stercoraria, sella perforata, and exploratoria. The examination was made by one of the youngest deacons present, who, if the result was favorable, made the fact known by the exclamation, Habet! ('He has (testicles)!'). Apparently, this test is no longer made.

Needless to say, the jury is still out on this one, though the preponderance of most contemporary scholarly opinion is that there never was a Pope Joan.

Theodolphus, bishop of Orleans, distinguished by birth and celebrated for his art and learning, was held in great esteem in the above mentioned times. He was falsely accused to Emperor Louis (Ludovicum), and imprisoned. While in prison he wrote many excellent poems, particularly the hymn of praise, Glory, praise, and honor to you, Christ, the redeemer, which is sung on Palm Sundays before the doors of the churches. Now when the emperor on Palm Sunday heard this song, and was informed that it was written by this bishop, he relented; and he caused the bishop to be released, sent for him, and reinstated him in his bishopric. [Theodulf, bishop of Orleans, was born about the middle of the eighth century, of a noble family of Gothic extraction, probably in Spain. He was abbot of Fleury and Saint Aignan, and in 781 became bishop of Orleans. He supported Charlemagne's principles of government and educational reforms. He established schools, and was a member of the learned circle that graced the Carolingian court. In 798 he was appointed missus dominicus ('envoy of the lord/ruler') and two years later performed such great services for Leo III as judge in the cause between the pope and his enemies, that he returned from Rome with the pallium. After the death of Alcuin he became the king's principal theological adviser. At Charlemagne's request he made a collection of the opinions of the fathers on the disputed question of the procession of the Holy Spirit. After the death of Charlemagne, he was accused, perhaps unjustly, of having taken part in the conspiracy of Bernard of Italy, and in 818 was deposed and imprisoned in the monastery at Angers. He died in prison, probably from poison, in 821].

LINEAGE OF THE POPES

John the Seventh (Joannes Septimus), i.e, Pope Joan. The young papess is represented in triple crown, her newly born child in her arms. The history of Pope Joan as recorded in the Chronicle has been the cause of the mutilation of many copies of this work. In some cases the portrait, as well as the text, has been cut away; in other instances ink has been employed to blot out the child in the arms of the papess, or to obliterate the woodcut altogether, and the text has been struck out. Sometimes scathing notations are written in the margin. And so in the copy of the first German edition from which this translation into English is made [That is, the copy used by Walter M. Schmauch, the principal translator of this text], (once the property of J.A. Fuller Maitland), the following notation has been written below the text, although the portrait remains un mutilated:

N.B. Was Martiny Polony von dieser schwangeren Papstin schreibt, ist eine scheinbare Lüge. Dann dieser gedachte Polony und Johannes der 7 (haben) fast über 200 Jahre von einander gelebt. Hat also mit dieser Fabel die Warheit gelehrt; wie der Fleischlich gesinnte Luther, welcher auch durch Hülfe des Tufels die heilige Schrift besser verstanden den als viel hundert Bischöfe. Ja, was nur aus den Teufel gesprochen ist. NOSCE TE IPSUM

The translation into English follows:

N.B. What Martinus Polonius writes of this papess is an apparent lie. For said Polonius and John VII lived over 200 years apart in point of time. So with this fable he taught the truth, like the sensually-minded Luther, who by the help of the Devil better understood the Holy Scriptures than many hundreds of bishops. It was stated that she was a woman, qui tam non est ('which is not so'). So the papacy was not perverted on that account, for without doubt the Devil himself, according to Luther's teachings, can administer the spiritual official, where the right sacraments are employed. Yes, which is spoken only out of the Devil. KNOW YOURSELF

The "Lover of Truth," who in 1675 wrote "A Present for a Papist: or the Life and Death of Pope Joan," in submitting his authorities that such a woman pope actually existed makes the following interesting reference to the author of the Chronicle (pp. 31-32).

Laziardus is of the same opinion; so is Hartmannus Schedel a Doctor of Physick, yet not ignorant of holy Scriptures, nor atheistically inclined, as it is bewailably common for such to be, yet by Florimondus he is accused for being one of the brood of the Hussites, and lived in Nurimberge when that City was infected with Husses Heresy, and therefore would fain persuade his party that no credit is to be given him, because whatever he writ concerning the pope dome of Joan the Woman was partial. In answer to this, I rather believe Florimondus to be one of the brood of abominable Lyars; for Hartmannus Schedel, born in Nurimberg, was y (a?) student in Padua where he was created Doctor of Physick by the great Matthiolus, and he was so far from Husses opinion, that in the same book quoted in the Margint he hat inserted one whole Chapter about the Heresy of the Hussites, and their original.

Lothair (Lotharius), son of the aforesaid emperor Louis (Ludovici), reigned after his father for 15 years, together with Louis, his son, whom he made an associate in the sovereignty; and after the death of his father he had the Roman Empire to himself. Louis was hardly in his grave when his three brothers, Lothair, Louis and Charles (Carolus) became embittered toward one another on account of Italy; and they entered upon a great war, the like of which had not occurred since the Catalanian battle with Atilla (Athila) in Gaul; for each came on with his greatest power and might, and they met in the field of Auxerre (Antesiodorensi); and there they fought a battle in which more Franks were slain than ever before. And although Louis and Charles held the field, they were as much impaired in strength as Lothair was, and each found it impossible to protect his own country against the enemy. Lothair fled from the field to Aix-la-Chapelle (Aquisgranum), and his brothers pursued him. With his wife and children he escaped to Vienne by way of Lyons (Lugdunum); and there he assembled another army. Emissaries from Italy, Gaul and Germany urged the three brothers to make a treaty, and negotiations were commenced to secure peace and divide the paternal inheritance. The three brothers agreed that Charles the Bald possess the paternal kingdom to the north, from the English Sea to the river Mosa; Louis, all of Germany to the Rhine, and what his father had possessed beyond the Rhine; Lothair to have the imperial title, together with Rome, Italy, the provinces of Narbonne, and Lotharingia. Now after these matters had been settled, Lothair gave the sovereignty to his son Louis, and then entered a monastery. In the meantime the other Louis, his brother, died in his German Empire. And as he had divided the kingdom among his sons, and had now grown old, he left the imperial title to Louis. Not long afterwards Lothair died.

Lothair I was the son of Louis the Pious. His father, by his first wife had three sons—Lothair, Pepin and Louis; by his second wife, Judith, his son Charles the Bald was born. In 816, two years after his accession, Louis the Good received the imperial crown from Pope Stephen V, and soon afterwards divided the empire among his three sons. By this arrangement he made Lothair, the eldest his partner in the imperial government. Upon Pepin he conferred Aquitaine; and upon Louis, Bavaria. However, the child of the second wife, Charles the Bald, seemed to have been excluded from the succession by this partition, but the emperor was persuaded to make a new division. In 829, however, the three princes united in a project to restore the original agreement. The imbecile emperor was compelled to humble himself before the rebels and the empress was confined in a cloister. But soon Louis again recovered his authority, and his wife Judith was recalled to court. She proceeded to avenge herself on her enemies. The emperor finally disinherited his sons Lothair and Pepin. The three sons, Lothair, Pepin and Louis, assembled their forces in Alsace in 832, and prepared to march against their father. The crafty Lothair sent the pope to propose terms of peace to the emperor; and by the intrigues of Gregory IV, the emperor suddenly lost all support, and was obliged to surrender. He was dethroned and the imperial crown conferred on Lothair. The prelates subjected his father to penance, an act which it was calculated would forever bar his return to the throne. But the prelates had ventured too far. Lothair became universally detested, and a new revolution restored his father to the Frankish throne. On the death of Pepin in 840, Louis the Good divided his dominions between Lothair and Charles, thus excluding his son Louis, who immediately appealed to arms. While marching against his rebellious son, the emperor died in the 28th year of his reign in 840, near Mainz, after bequeathing to his favorite son Charles the provinces of Burgundy and Neustria (later called Normandy).

No sooner had Lothair ascended the throne than he planned to deprive his brothers Louis and Charles of their dominions; but they took the field and defeated him in a bloody 3-day battle at Fontenay, in Burgundy, in 841. On this occasion so many Frankish nobles and soldiers were slain that no successful resistance could be made against the ravages of the Norman freebooters. However, Lothair was still formidable, and forced his brothers to a new partition, which was accomplished at Verdun in 843. By this treaty the three sons divided the great Frankish empire that their grandfather Charlemagne had built up. Lothair took Italy, Burgundy and Lorraine; Louis received Germany, and was therefore called Louis the German. Charles the Bald, received France.

Lothair's kingdom extended from the Duchy of Beneventum and the Mediterranean on the south, to the North Sea on the North, lying between Germany and France; the Rhine dividing it from the former, and the Rhone separating it from the latter. Lothair, who took the imperial title, associated with him in the government his son Louis, making him ruler over Lombardy. Lothair's capital was at Aix-la-Chapelle.

The dominion of Louis the German, who was called King of the East Franks, embraced all the German territory east of the Rhine. The principal state of Germany was East Francia, or Franconia, which comprised the valleys of the Main, the Neckar, and the Lahn; Saxony and Thuringia lying to the north of it, and Swabia and Bavaria embracing the ancient territory of Alemannia, to the south and southeast.

The dominions of Charles the Bald, who was styled King of the West Franks, embraced all the territory of modern France, except the eastern portion comprised in Lorraine, Burgundy, and the provinces east of the Rhine. Paris was the capital of this kingdom.

At this time Gaul, like Italy, suffered great evil and damage at the hands of the Saracens, due to the dissensions between Lothair and his brothers. The Normans forded the Ligeris, [Liger or Ligeris, the Loire, one of the largest rivers in Gaul]. and ravaged Aquitaine and the island of Heria, [This may refer to Uliarus Island (Oleron)]. and destroyed ever so many monasteries. Sweeping through Gaul, far and wide, they plundered, robbed and ravaged many cities and fortresses; but they dared not tarry for long in the Frankish cities, returning to Aquitaine where they set up their royal seat. [During the reign of Louis the Pious the Saracens, who had subdued Sicily, spread all over the Mediterranean and threatened to make themselves masters of Italy; while the Normans continued their ravages on the coast of Germany and France. Thus Western Europe at this time was troubled with enemies on the North and South, and by war within].

At this time marvelously large hailstones (they say) fell in Gaul, killing many people and animals. These stones had hard centers of marvelous length.

In Italy occurred an earthquake as well, destroying cities and mountains.

Locusts, in inconceivable numbers, having six wings and two teeth harder than stone, covered the earth like snow in Gaul, and destroyed all the vegetation. When they finally fell into the sea, and were afterwards thrown back on the seacoast, they gave off such a foul stench that the air was polluted, resulting in a great number of deaths among the populace. A comet also appeared in the second year of the reign of Lothair.

The Africans at this time proceeded to Italy, where they were engaged at the city of Ostia by the Romans. The Saracens invaded Italy, plundered the city of Ancona and ravaged it with fire.

Adeulphus, the English king, and a most Christian man, at this time exercised sole sovereignty over all England, which now occurred for the first time. Through his special leaning in favor of service to God, he made the island tributary to the Roman see, ordaining that every house should pay a tribute of one silver penny to the church and Saint Peter annually. [The text probably refers to Ethelwulf (Aethelwulf), king of the West Saxons, who died in 858. He is best known by his famous "Donation," which is said to have originated the system of tithes. In reality it was merely "the devotion of a tenth part of his private estate to ecclesiastical purposes, the relief of a tenth part of the folk land from all payments except Trinoda necessitas, and the direction that every ten hides of his land should provide for one foreman or stranger." During the pontificate of Benedict III, Ethelwulf made a pilgrimage to Rome, and presented a golden crown and other valuable offerings, made rich presents to the clergy, the nobles and the people; promised an annual payment to the pope, and rebuilt the English school at Rome, which had been destroyed by fire].

Edmund (Edmundus), afterwards king of the English, was celebrated for his piety and service to God, and was an earnest defender of the Christian faith, conducting many battles against the unbelieving Danes. He finally received the crown of martyrdom. After his decapitation his head was preserved by a wild wolf. [The text probably refers to Edmund, King of East Anglia, (855-869), also referred to as Edmund the Martyr. Having been defeated and taken prisoner by the Danes, he was offered his life on condition that he give up Christianity and acknowledge the Danish supremacy. Refusing these terms, he was bound to a tree and shot at with arrows. He was finally beheaded at the town called St. Edmondsbury in his honor. His constancy in faith earned him canonization, and the English Church still holds his name in remembrance on November 20th, the day of his martyrdom].

Pope Benedict the Third, a Roman whose father was Peter, was by reason of his piety deservedly called Benedict [Benedict means 'the blessed one']; for under Gregory, and also afterwards, he conducted himself so honorably that upon the death of Leo he was elected to succeed him. He was regarded by the people as a sacred bright star sent down to earth by God. Nevertheless, he pleaded with God and his saints, regarding himself as unworthy of the papal see. After having received the pontificate against his will he fasted for three days, and prayed within his heart that God grant him a holy life and the rule of the entire church. And although some, under the leadership of Rhodoald, bishop of Porto, wished to elevate another to the pontificate, they later realized their mistake, asked mercy of this holy man, and worshipped him according to custom. And the emissaries sent by Emperor Louis (Ludovici) to Rome to confirm the papal election did likewise; for Benedict was a man of such kindness and worthiness in soul and body, that during his pontificate and before that time, he was esteemed and loved, and acceptable to all men. What he undertook he accomplished, not alone in word but in deed. He was always present when a priest passed away; and he visited the sick, fed the poor, comforted the miserable, and industriously protected widows and orphans. And thus with these acts he was continuously leading. While dying he ordered that his body be buried before the doors of the Church of the Blessed Peter the Apostle. He died in the second year, sixth month, and ninth day of his pontificate. Meanwhile the bishop's (seat) was vacant 15 days. [Benedict III succeeded Leo IV in 855, and held the pontificate until 858. He was opposed by Anastasius, who had been chosen by the Roman people, but over whom he finally prevailed by the support of the bishops and the clergy. He was consecrated in the presence of the imperial ambassadors, and confirmed by them].

Nicholas (Nicolaus), the first of that name, [Nicholas I, called the Great, succeeded Benedict III in 858, owing his election to Emperor Louis II and his nobles. His pontificate of nine and one-half years was marked by at least three memorable contests: In the first he supported the unjustly degraded patriarch of Constantinople, Ignatius; but two of its incidents, the excommunication of Photius, rival of Ignatius, by the pope in 863, and the excommunication of Nicholas by Photius in 867, were steps of serious moment in the separation of the Eastern and Western Church. The second struggle was with Lothair, king of Lorraine (second son of Emperor Lothair I, and brother of Emperor Louis II) about the divorce of his wife Theutberga. The pope not only quashed the whole proceeding, but deposed Gunther and Thietgaud, the bishops who brought to Rome the "libellus" of the synod which had given judgment. The third involved the rights of Bishops to appeal to Rome, against their metropolitan, and this right was sustained. Nicholas died in 867 and was succeeded by Adrian II]. a Roman whose father was Theodosius, was well reared and piously instructed from youth. He was consecrated a subdeacon by Sergius, and later a deacon by Leo. With his own hands, and not without tears, he lowered the body of Benedict into the grave. After much watching and praying, they elected him pope in his absence. And although he fled, they found him and brought him to the atrium of the Lateran against his will, and placed him in the apostolic chair. After he was consecrated at the Basilica of Peter and crowned with the papal tiara, [Emperor Louis II was present at the consecration and coronation of Nicholas in 858. This is the first instance on record of the coronation of a pope—a new measure for placing him, as to outward pomp and circumstance, on a level with temporal princes, to whom Nicholas already believed himself superior as bishop]. he constantly conferred with Emperor Louis (Ludovico) on matters of church and state. Emperor Michael of Constantinople sent him his messengers with gifts and presents. This pope in the exercise of his worthy dignity, deposed John (Ioannem), archbishop of Ravenna, who refused to obey a summons to appear in connection with proceedings previously held; but he was later pardoned. [John, archbishop of Ravenna, maintaining the independence of his see, refused to appear before a council at Rome, at which he had been required to answer a charge of unlawful proceedings in deposing certain bishops of his province; and sentence of excommunication was passed against him, notwithstanding the interposition of Louis in his behalf. The archbishop was compelled to submit, and the see of Ravenna became from that point on entirely dependent on Rome]. The king of the Bulgarians, with all his provinces, was converted to the Christian faith through his writings and wholesome admonitions, and was given bishops and priests; and peace was made between Louis and the Duke of Benevento. With the cooperation and confirmation of Emperor Louis, many statutes and ordinances were enacted. Finally this man died adorned by every type of virtue in the ninth year, ninth month and 13th day of his pontificate, and he was buried before the gates of the Basilica of the Blessed Peter in accordance with his will after the example of his predecessor. There are some who write that after his death the seat was vacant for many years.

Adrian (Hadrianus), the second of this name, also a Roman whose father was Talarus, a bishop, was related to Pope Sergius. He was very virtuous, and mild, and liberal in his gifts to the poor. For these and other qualities he was held in such great esteem by the people, that when the election of a new pope was under discussion, the people thought of Adrian alone; and at the Lateran Basilica they elected him against his will. When Emperor Louis (Ludovicus) heard of this he speedily sent his emissaries to Rome to confirm the election. And when Adrian entered upon the duties of his office, he zealously considered all things pertaining to the honor and service of God, by word, example and teaching, and by admonitions to a good and blessed life. He also zealously protected those oppressed by judgments and force. With all his might he opposed the enemies of the church. He died in the fifth year, ninth month, and twelfth day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. And then the papal (seat) ceased (to be occupied) for twelve days. [Adrian II, pope from 867 to 872, was of a noble Roman family, and became pope at an advanced age. He was married in his youth, and his wife and daughter were still living. They were carried off and assassinated by Anastasius's brother. Adrian died in 872].

Louis (Ludovicus), the second of that name, after the death of his father Lothair (Lothario), in the Year of Salvation, 856, ruled the empire alone for 21 years. He was anointed king by Pope Sergius. Lothair sent his son Louis into Italy with a mighty army, commanding him to avail himself of the advice of Drogo (Drogonem), bishop of Metz, and other spiritual men of the faith. But as this Louis was still young, proud, and puffed up with an excess of good fortune, he devastated all things wherever he went, with murder, theft and fire. But when he approached Rome, and the Romans came forth to respectfully receive him, he laid aside his Gallic cruelty and became more kind. The pope anointed him king of Italy, and soon afterwards invested him with the imperial crown. In his time the Saracens invaded and ravaged Benevento. And Louis called upon his brother Lothair for assistance against them. And he came to Italy with an army, but becoming ill, died at Placentia. When Charles (Carolus), king in Gaul, heard of the death of Lothair, he coveted Lorraine; and the Emperor Louis divided Lorraine with Charles, his uncle, on condition that Louis receive the palace and court at Aix-la-Chapelle (Aquisgrani) with his share.

Louis II, Roman emperor, eldest son of Emperor Lothair I, was designated king of Italy in 839, and crowned king of Rome by Sergius II on June 15, 844. In 850 he was crowned joint emperor at Rome by Leo IV, and soon after married his cousin Engelberga, daughter of King Louis the German, and undertook the independent government of Italy. When his father died in 855 he became sole emperor. In 857 he allied himself with Louis the German against his brother Lothair, king of Lorraine, and king Charles the Bald; but after he had secured the election of Nicholas I as pope in 858, he became reconciled with his brother. In 863, on the death of his brother Charles, Louis received the kingdom of Provence. In 864 he quarreled with Pope Nicholas I over his brother's divorce, which the pope had declared invalid; but peace was made.

In 866 he routed the Saracens, but could not follow up his successes for want of a fleet. In 869, with the assistance of his ally, the eastern emperor, Basil I, he captured Bari, headquarters of the Saracens. He had withdrawn into Benevento to prepare for a further campaign when he was imprisoned by the prince of Benevento. He was, however, released a month later. Returning to Rome he was crowned the second time in 872 by Pope Adrian II. After further successes against the Saracens, who were driven from Capua, he returned to the north of Italy. He died somewhere in the province of Brescia, on August 12, 875, having named as his successor in Italy his cousin Carloman, son of Louis the German.

In the time of Emperor Louis (Ludovici), blood rained from the heavens for three days and nights at Brescia, as the historians say. [Brescia, also known as Brixia (Brixianus in Latin), was a town in Gallia Cisalpina ('Cisalpine Gaul')].

In this year the river Tiber (Tyberis) inundated the city of Rome to such an extent that it became necessary to travel from one highway to another by boat. A number of other places were so flooded that one might believe the Deluge at hand. In this flood many houses were upset, many trees uprooted, and hedges washed out. This occurred twice in a single year at Rome. Pope Nicholas (Nicolaus) spared no manner of benevolence toward his people in alleviating the losses thus sustained.

Bulgaria, together with its king, was at this time converted to the Christian faith through the letters and admonitions of Pope Nicholas (Nicolai); likewise Suerophilus, king of Dalmatia, together with his subject people, a nation of the Slavs, who had their origin in German Bohemia. And now the pope sent there, (as above stated) a number of bishops and priests, who, after the expulsion of Photius the heretic, were to firmly establish the people in the faith; for this heretic kept all the Bulgarians in error. However, their king was a man of such perfection and piety that he installed his eldest son in the sovereignty, himself assuming a monastic status. But when his son allowed himself to be misled into idolatry, the king through devotion to the faith, deposed him and, caused him to be imprisoned and blinded, while he himself resumed his reign. Afterwards he gave over the sovereignty to his youngest son, and again assumed the monastic habit. Soon after his death the Bulgarian people were so deceived by the priests of Constantinople that they drove out the Latin priests, and welcomed back the Greek. This aroused much dissension between the Latins and Greeks. At this time a division took place in the kingdom of Dalmatia; for Dalmatia, the first region of Greece, was bounded on the east by Macedonia, on the west by Istria (Hystrum), on the south by the Adriatic Sea, and on the north by Pannonia. In this new partition the plains of Dalmatia to Istria became White Croatia; and from these same plains to Diarchium, Red Croatia; and the region from the river Drinus to the mountains, and over the same river to Macedonia, was called Rassia. And beyond the river it was called Bosnia; and Rassia and Bosnia are two regions of the Croatian kingdom.

At this time the Saracens attacked and conquered the entire island of Crete; and sailing to Italy, captured many cities which they burned after the inhabitants had fled.

At this time Pope Nicholas (Nicolaus) made peace between Louis (Ludovicum) and Andalusius, the antagonistic duke of Benevento, whom Louis had besieged in the city of Benevento until compensated for losses sustained; in consequence of which he lifted the siege.

There are some who write that Saint Cyril at this time brought to Rome from Cherson the remains of Saint Clement, and interred them at a church called Saint Clement's. Not long afterwards Cyril died and was buried at the same place.

Arioldus, king of the people of Denmark, was (as they say) at this time baptized at Mainz (Magnuncie) with his wife and children. The emperor gave him Friesland (Frisiam).

Pope John the Eighth, a Roman whose father was Gundus, upon his elevation to the pontificate, declared Charles (Carolus), who at that time came to Rome, emperor. Later, in the course of a quarrel, he was thrown into prison by the Romans; but before long, through the help of some of his friends, he regained his freedom; and he fled to Louis, surnamed Balbus in France. [Louis II, surnamed Balbus ('the Stammerer'), was born in 846, and died in 879. He was the son of Charles the Bald, and was named king of Aquitaine by his father, whom he succeeded in France in 877. He was married to Angarde of Burgundy, and by her had two sons, Louis III and Carloman; by his second wife Adelaide he had one son, Charles the simple, born after his death. The first two divided the kingdom on the death of their father]. He lived there a year and anointed him as king. He also disposed of several misunderstandings which had occurred among the clergy. Then he left the place, and held a council at Treca, [Troyes: At the beginning of the Roman period Troyes was the principal settlement of the Trecassi, from whom it derives its name. In the early Middle Ages the bishops were supreme in Troyes, but in the 10th century the supremacy was transferred to the courts of Troyes, who from the 11th century were known as the courts of Champagne]. in which were established many things pertaining to the faith. He gave a bishop to the people of Flanders, who were then just emerging from the wilderness and becoming accustomed to better discipline and to religious services. But as the Saracens invaded Italy at this time, John was recalled to Rome; and with the assistance of the Christian princes he drove a large number out of Italy and Sicily. He was learned in the Greek and Latin tongues; and being a highly learned man he wrote many things, translating from the Greek into the Latin. He died after having been pope for ten years and two days, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. He also wrote the life of Gregory the First in four books when he was a deacon.

John VIII, pope from 872 to 882, successor to Adrian II, was a Roman by birth. He defended the Roman State and the authority of the Holy See from the Saracens, and from the nascent feudalism which was represented outside by the dukes of Spoleto and the marquises of Tuscany, and within by a party of Roman nobles. In 875 he agreed to bestow the imperial crown on Charles the Bald. About the time of the death of Charles he was compelled to come to terms with the Saracens, who were only prevented from entering Rome by the promise of an annual tribute. Carloman, the opponent of Charles's son Louis, then invaded northern Italy, and demanded the imperial crown. John attempted to temporize, but Lambert, duke of Spoleto, a partisan of Carloman, whom sickness had recalled to Germany, entered Rome in 878 with an overwhelming force, and for 30 days virtually held John a prisoner in St. Peter's. Lambert, however, won no concession from the pope, who after his withdrawal went to France. There he presided at the council of Troyes, which excommunicated the supporters of Carloman—amongst others, Adalbert of Tuscany, Lambert of Spoleto, and Formosus, bishop of Porto, later a pope. In 879 John returned to Italy, accompanied by Boso duke of Provence, whom he adopted as his son. He was compelled to promise his sanction to the claims of Charles the Fat, who received from him the imperial crown in 881. In order to secure the aid of the Greek emperor against the Saracens, he had already agreed to sanction the restoration of Photius to the see of Constantinople, and had withdrawn his consent on finding that he gained nothing from the concession. Charles the Fat also gave him no effectual aid. According to the annalist of Fulda he was murdered in 882 by members of his household. His successor was Marinus I, better known as Martin II.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Martin (Martinus) the Second, a native of Gaul whose father was Palumbus, became pope after John (Ioannem). There are some who call him Marinus. And so this Martin, whose life was rather short, lived as pope for only a short time. There are some who write that Martin through deceit and with such persecutions had so agitated Pope John that when he had been thrown into chains it was necessary for him to escape. And as Martin had attained to the pontificate by evil means, he died shortly, having lived as pope only a year and five months. On account of the shortness of time, he carried out nothing memorable. [Martin II, (sometimes called Marinus I), pope from 882 to 884, son of a Tuscan priest, entered the church at an early age, and became a deacon about 862. Three successive popes sent him as a legate to Constantinople, and he also on behalf of pope John VIII negotiated with Charles the Fat. At the end of 882 he succeeded John VIII. Having secured his pontificate, he restored Formosus, cardinal bishop of Porto, and anathematized Photius. He was on friendly terms with Alfred the Great. Martin died in 884 and was succeeded by Adrian III].

Pope Adrian (Hadrianus) the Third, a Roman whose father was Benedict, was a man of such temper and keenness that at the inception of his pontificate he insisted, and so advised the Roman senate and the people, that imperial power and confirmation were unnecessary to the elevation and creation of a pope. Such a law is said to have been first pronounced by Pope Nicholas (Nicolai) the First. But this Adrian, in whom, on account of his virtue and pride, the Roman clergy and people had placed great hope, died in the first year and second month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter accompanied by the tears and lamentations of all since such a father had been taken so suddenly from them at so unjust a time.

Adrian III, pope, a Roman, succeeded Martin II in 884, and died in 885 on a journey to Worms.

The final clause ('and was buried in the Basilica of Peter accompanied by the tears and lamentations of all since such a father had been taken so suddenly from them at so unjust a time') is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Stephen (Stephanus), the fifth pope of that name, a Roman, secured the pontificate in the time when the Normans with the assistance of the people of Decii, devastated Gaul. This Stephen, during all his life, was greatly troubled and distressed by the attacks of the Normans, Hungarians and Italians; however, during such attacks he found great satisfaction in the piety of the celebrated men who lived during his time, particularly Luitprand, the Pavian deacon; Valdrinus, the Bavarian bishop, and Berardus, the bishop of Pictavi. [Poitiers, formerly Limanum, chief city of the Pictavi, a powerful people on the coast of Gallia Aquitanica]. Through their good lives and morale, the Christian faith, at this time, grew so, that many churches and monasteries, in fine style and at great cost were erected in both regions of Gaul. But Stephen died in the 6th year and 11th day of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for five days. [Steven V, pope from 885 to 891, succeeded Adrian III, and was in turn succeeded by Formosus. In his dealings with Constantinople in the matter of Photius, as also in his relation with the young Slavonic Church, he pursued the policy of Nicholas I].

The Fifth Council at Constantinople was held at the instance of John VIII. He reunited the Greek and Latin churches with the hope and intent that this measure would be conducive to the expulsion of the Saracens. In this council three hundred eighty-three fathers were present. The books on the canon laws show how useful this Council was in the declaration of the articles of Christian faith. But this accord of the two tongues was not found sufficient to drive off the Saracens; for in the same year they proceeded from the island of Crete and ravaged the regions of Dalmatia, spreading themselves out over land and sea and overrunning peoples cities and country; and they besieged the city of Gradus, but it was rescued by the Venetians, who drove the Saracens across the sea; for the Venetians were concerned lest the Saracens extend their conquests still further if they did not come to the assistance of their neighbors.

Folio CLXXII recto

Charles (Carolus), the second of that name, surnamed the Bald, began to reign in the first year of Pope John; and reigned for 6 years. For five consecutive years he was at war with the Britons. He fought, firstly, Homevoius the duke, and then his son Crispoiuis, and he killed them both. He conquered Britain, and caused himself to be anointed king in the city of Lemonice. With his army he returned home to France. During this same period Charles's brother, king of Bavaria and Germany, died in Frankfurt. And although the passage of the empire to this Charles is not mentioned, yet it appears according to all historians that he assumed the imperial title, journeyed to Rome, received the crown from Pope John the Eighth, and then returned to France. When peace was restored he again journeyed to Rome. In the meantime Carloman and Charles, his nephews, assembled an army from all the regions of Germany, to be sent against their uncle in Italy. But Charles took up arms against them, and decided to intercept their invasion at the city of Trient. But as he became afflicted with illness at Mantua, he was poisoned by a drink given him by Sedechias, a Hebrew (whom he employed as his doctor). This Charles the Second was a very devout Christian who built many monasteries and churches all over, and at the same time enhanced things divine. [Charles II called the Bald (823-877), Roman emperor and king of the West Franks, son of Emperor Louis the Pious, was born in 823. The death of the emperor in 840 was the signal for the outbreak of war between the sons. Charles allied himself with Louis the German to resist the pretensions of the emperor Lothair, and the two allies defeated him at Fontenoy on June 25, 841. In the following year the two brothers confirmed their alliance by the celebrated oaths of Strasbourg. The war was ended by the treaty of Verdun, in 843, which gave Charles the Bald the kingdom of the western Franks, which practically corresponded with what is now France, as far as the Meuse, the Saone, and the Rhone, with the addition of the Spanish March as far as Ebro. The first years of his reign up to the death of Lothair I, in 855, were comparatively peaceful, and during this period was continued the system of "confraternal government" of the sons of Louis the Pious, who had various meetings with one another. In 858 Louis the German invaded the kingdom of Charles. In 860 he in his turn tried to seize the kingdom of his nephew, Charles of Provence, but he was repulsed. On the death of Lothair II, in 869, he tried to seize his dominions, but was compelled to share them with Louis the German. Beside this, Charles had to struggle against incessant rebellions in Aquitaine against the Bretons, who defeated him in 845 and 851, and especially against the Normans, who devastated the country in the north of Gaul, the valleys of the Seine and Loire, and even the borders of Aquitaine. Charles led various expeditions against the invaders. In 875, after the death of Emperor Louis II, Charles the Bald, supported by Pope John VIII, descended into Italy, receiving the royal crown at Pavia, and the imperial crown at Rome. But Louis the German avenged himself for Charles's success by invading and devastating his dominions. Charles was recalled to Gaul, and after the death of Louis the German, in 876, in his turn made an attempt to seize his kingdom; but he met defeat in the same year. In the meantime John VIII, who was menaced by the Saracens, was continually urging him to come to Italy. Charles again crossed the Alps, but at the same time Carloman, son of Louis the German, entered northern Italy. Charles started back to Gaul, but died while crossing the pass of Mont Cenis, in October 877. He was succeeded by his son Louis the Stammerer].

Charles (Carolus) the Third, surnamed the Fat, reigned 12 years from the Year of the Incarnation eight hundred eighty-one. He was a king of Gaul and Germany. He marched into Italy with a great army of remarkable strength and conquered entire Lombardy. Coming to Rome, he received the imperial crown from Pope John (Ioanne). Not long thereafter, with an army, he marched against the Normans who were ravaging France and Lorraine with plunder and fire. After learning of the death of Emperor Louis they besieged the noble city of Trier and devastated the vicinity with fire. Afterwards this Charles was recalled from Italy by the German and Gallic princes to protect his fatherland against the Normans. So he assembled an army against the Normans out of the Lombards, Bavarians, Saxons, Frisians, Alamanni, and Thuringians; and in a short time he pressed them so mightily that Rothfred, their king, sued for peace, and allowed himself to be made a Christian; and he was baptized, the emperor acting as godfather. Some state that in the time of Pope Stephen the Fifth, Charles, after having reigned 12 years, was relieved of his authority by the leaders, because of his physical sluggishness and mental dullness, and that Arnulf was put in his stead. In the following year, Louis, son of Charles, the king of France, died and was buried in the monastery of Saint Dionysius, leaving Carloman as heir to the throne. Not long afterwards, during a chase, Carloman was injured by a wild boar, and died. After this they were subject to Charles the emperor, who alone was seen to survive of the family line of Carolingians. Some say that Charles, while ill, fell into such necessity, poverty and want that he gratefully received a small income or quantity of gold from Arnulf gratis. [Charles III, surnamed the Fat, Roman emperor and king of the West Franks, was the youngest of three sons of Louis the German, and received from his father the kingdom of Swabia (Alamannia). After the death of his two brothers, Carloman, in 881, and Louis the Younger, in 882, he inherited his father's entire dominions. He was crowned emperor by John VIII in February 881. On his return to Germany he led an expedition against the Norsemen of Friesland; but instead of engaging with them, he preferred to make terms and pay them tribute. In 880, by the death of Carloman the West Frankish realm came into his possession, while in 885 he got rid of his rival, Hugh of Alsace, an illegitimate son of Lothair II. In spite of six expeditions into Italy, he failed to pacify the country, and did not deliver it from the Saracens. He was equally unfortunate in Gaul and Germany against the Normans who besieged Paris in 886-887. The emperor appeared before the city with a large army in October 886, but contented himself by buying the retreat of the invaders at the price of a heavy ransom, and his permission for them to ravage Burgundy without interference. On his return to Alamannia the general discontent showed itself openly and a conspiracy was formed against him. He was deposed by an assembly in 887, and died at Neidingen on the Danube in January 888].

The County of Flanders had its origin in the time of Charles (Caroli) the Bald, although at that time it was not as rich and mighty as now, and was governed by the chief foresters of the king of France. One of these, named Audacrus, had a son named Baldwin (Baldvinus), who eloped with the king's daughter Judith, and was therefore banished. However, he was later reconciled, and the emperor gave Baldwin and Judith, and their heirs the County of Flanders to be theirs forever.

Johannes (Ioannes) Scotus, a brilliant man of subtle comprehension, honeyed speech, and highly informed in the Holy Scriptures, was held in great esteem by the aforesaid Charles (Carolus). He came from Scotland and went to France, and at the request of the emperor translated the books of Dionysius the Areopagite, concerning the hierarchy, from Greek into Latin. He composed four books (entitled) On the Division of Nature. Finally, attracted by the munificence of Alfred, he went to England, where at the monastery of Malmesbury, having been stabbed by the students he was teaching with their pens, he died and achieved martyrdom. His book On the Eucharist, afterwards celebrated in the Vercelli Synod by Leo the Ninth, was (at first) condemned. And he made commentaries On the Hierarchy [Perhaps this refers to Johannes Scottus' long commentary on Pseudo-Dionysius' ('Celestial Hierarchy')]. [Johannes Scotus (better known as Eriugena ('Irish-born'), but also John the Irishman, John the Scot, etc.), born c. 815, was doubtless a native of Ireland (then 'Scotia'). He was a theologian, Neoplatonist philosopher, and poet who seems to have spent most of his life at the court of Charles the Bald in France, where, from about 843 he was the head of the 'court school.' One of the most original philosophers of the Middle Ages, in 851 he came to the assistance of Hincmar in the Predestination controversy with the doctrine that evil is simply that which has no existence, and that therefore damnation consists only in the consciousness of having failed to fulfill the divine purpose. The council of Valence condemned this pultes Scotorum ('Scots/Irish porridge') as an invention of the devil. He translated into Latin the writings of the pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite, and the Greek scholiast to Gregory Nazianzen. His chief work (854) was condemned by a council at Sens and by Pope Honorius III in 1225. It was edited by Schuler in 1638, and by Gale in 1681, and was placed in the Index by Gregory XIII, in 1685. In it he sought to reconcile the fundamental truths of Christianity with human reason. He died in 877. The story of his death as recorded in the is most likely a fiction].

Anastasius, the Roman church librarian, very learned in Greek and Latin, made many translations from one language into the other at this time. []

Folio CLXXII verso

Year of the World 6093 | Year of Christ 894

Formosus the pope was made pope after Stephen. He was a bishop of Porto. Fearing Pope John, he left his episcopate and fled to Gaul. When asked to return to Rome, he ignored the summons, and was excommunicated. When he came to Rome he was deposed and obliged to wear lay dress and adopt worldly manners. Some say this happened to him because he instigated the imprisonment of John and was an accomplice in that matter. Formosus was so moved by his misfortune that he left Rome, taking an oath never to return to Rome nor to resume his episcopate. However, Pope Martinus absolved him of his oath and restored him to his former dignity. Finally he died, in the fifth year and sixth month of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for two days. [Formosus, Pope, 891 to 896, first appears in history when, as bishop of Porto, he was sent on an embassy to the Bulgarians. Having afterwards sided with a faction against John VIII, he was excommunicated; but Marinus (also known as Martin II), successor to John VIII, restored him to his dignities. In 891 he was chosen pope. At that time the Holy See was engaged in a struggle against the oppression of the princes of Spoleto. And Formosus was forced to consecrate as emperor, Lambert, the young son of Guy of Spoleto. In 895, Arnulf, king of Germany, at the instigation of Formosus, seized Rome, and Formosus crowned him emperor with the full consent of the Roman people. But as he was advancing on Spoleto against Lambert, Arnulf was seized with paralysis, and forced to return to Germany. Overwhelmed with chagrin, Formosus died on April 4, 896. The validity of his acts was contested on the pretext that, having been originally bishop of Porto, he could not be a legitimate pope. His body was disinterred in 897 by Pope Stephen VI, and was treated as that of a usurper of the papal throne. However, Theodore II restored it to Christian burial, and at a council, presided over by John IX, the pontificate of Formosus was declared valid].

The Lateran librarian wrote a very accurate history comprehending twenty-one popes, covering a period of sixty years, giving their parentages, places of birth, and terms of office; for although the other historians wrote a number of histories, containing trifling and superfluous matters, they wrote little about the Roman Empire and gave little enlightenment upon the Roman pope. But I know not through what circumstances the decline and diminution, not only in imperial honesty and stability, but also in papal power and integrity, came about. But these were unhappy times, and (as Plato says) the citizens and the people are not unlike their princes. The eight popes named below sat for unusually short periods of time, and were affected by various disturbances and dissensions. Thus Stephen confirmed the acts of John, but condemned Formosus, and caused two fingers to be cut from the corpse of Formosus, and the body thrown into the waters of the Tiber; while Theodore, on the other hand, nullified the acts of Stephen and confirmed those of Formosus. Succeeding popes performed but few praiseworthy deeds.

Pope Boniface (Bonifacius) the Sixth, a native of Tuscany, was elected pope after the death of Formosus; but how long he lived as pope, the historians do not agree. The majority state that he lived in his pontificate for 26 days. After he died he was buried in the Basilica of Peter. [Boniface VI was elected pope in April 896, and died fifteen days later].

Stephen, the sixth of this name, a Roman, bishop of Agnano, was elected pope; and he assailed the reputation of Formosus. He immediately recalled his proclamations and set aside his acts, and is said to have so raged against Formosus that, after a council was held, he caused the body of Formosus to be disinterred, his papal robes removed, lay garments placed upon him, and the body reburied as that of a layman. And he caused to be cut off the corpse and to be thrown into the Tiber the two fingers which Formosus had employed in consecrations and blessings, and with which he had foresworn his home land and his priestly office. He died in the first year and second month of his pontificate. The seat then after his death was vacant for three days. [Stephen VI (or VII) succeeded Boniface VI in 897. He belonged to the party opposed to that of Formosus, whose remains he caused to be disinterred, to be clothed with Episcopal vestments and placed upon the papal chair. He then held a council over him, and addressed him with these words: "Since you were bishop of Porto, why did you so yield to your ambition as to grasp at the Episcopal chair of the see of Rome?" A deacon was suffered to act as his advocate, but of course, he lost the cause. Stephen then caused the corpse to be stripped, and the fingers, with which the papal benediction had been given, were cut off, and the body thrown into the Tiber. At the same time, also, the ordinations of Formosus were declared invalid, and the parties who had received them were re-ordained by Stephen. Stephen's conduct against the remains of Formosus excited a tumult, which ended in the imprisonment and strangulation of Stephen VI in 897].

Romanus, a Roman, secured the pontificate after Stephen—not through ambition or with gifts, but in the manner of Peter. He soon nullified and repealed the ordinances and acts of Pope Stephen; for the whole intent and purpose of those popes appears to have been to destroy and uproot the honor and dignity of one another. Romanus died in the third month. [Romanus succeeded Stephen VI in 897, and held the pontificate for about four months. Platina says he reversed the decrees of Stephen].

Pope Theodore (Theodorus) the Second, a Roman, reconfirmed the ordinances of Formosus. Otherwise, because of the short duration of his pontificate, nothing remarkable occurred, for this Theodore died on the twentieth day of his pontificate. [Theodore II succeeded Romanus, but held the see for only 20 days. The bishops and priests ordained by Formosus, whom Stephen refused to acknowledge, Theodore restored to office, and gave an honorable burial to the corpse of Formosus. Tradition says that the Tiber repeatedly threw up the body, and that when it was brought into St. Peter's, several images of the saints saluted it].

Normandy (Normannia), which is part of the kingdom of the Gauls, received its name from the people called Normans, who had recently been converted to the Christian faith. Some say they came from Norway and migrated to Gaul. By wars Charles (Carolo) forced them into the faith and gave them a region in Gaul, which is still called Normandy, on a condition, however, in compliance with which they paid tribute to a number of Frankish kings.

Arnulf (Arnulphus), the seventh emperor of the Gauls, reigned after Charles (Carolum) the Great. He was elected emperor in the Year of Salvation eight hundred ninety-one in the place of Charles the Third, and reigned 12 years. After he became king of Germany, Pope Formosus, who had been overpowered by his persecutors, asked him to come to Italy to protect him. During his first invasion Arnulf took the city of Bergamo and hanged its duke. Proceeding to Rome, he restored Formosus to his former dignity; and Formosus having crowned him, Arnulf returned to France. This emperor vigorously fought those of Mainz; and he pursued the Normans, who, together with the Danes had done great damage for forty years in Gaul; and he tamed them by great battles. Afterwards he ruled over eastern France, called the German Empire, such as Bavaria, Swabia, Saxony, Thuringia, Friesland, and Lorraine; but Odo (Oddo), son of the Duke of Saxony, through the Emperor Arnulf, had retained possession of France; and so he gave Lorraine to his son Cendebuldu, who was born to him by a concubine. But afterwards Arnulf, due to too much good fortune, became vain and haughty toward the people, and particularly toward the clergy. And as a punishment lice and maggots crawled about his body, and no cure could be found for it. He died of this malady at Otting, in Bavaria. With Arnulf the nobility and supremacy of the Franks over the Roman Empire, which had endured about one hundred years, came to an end. [Arnulf (850-899), Roman emperor, illegitimate son of Carloman, king of Bavaria and Italy, was made margrave of Carinthia, about 876, and on his father's death in 888 his dignity and possessions were confirmed by the new king of the East Franks, Louis III. He did homage to the emperor Charles the Fat in 882, and spent the next few years in warfare with the Slavs and Northmen. In 887, however, Arnulf identified himself with the disgust felt by the Bavarians and others concerning the incapacity of Charles the Fat. Gathering a large army, he marched to Tribur; Charles abdicated, and in 888 the Germans recognized Arnulf as their king, a proceeding described as the first independent action of the German secular world. Arnulf's real authority did not extend far beyond the confines of Bavaria, and he contented himself with a nominal recognition of his supremacy by the kings who sprang up in the various parts of the empire. He continued the struggle with the Normans, and gave effective aid to the king of Moravia in his struggle with the nobles. Invited by Pope Formosa to deliver him from the power of Guido III, duke of Spoleto, who had been crowned emperor, Arnulf went to Italy in 894; but after storming Bergamo and receiving the homage of some of the nobles at Pavia, he was compelled by desertions from his army to return. He succeeded in establishing his illegitimate son, Zwentibold, as king of Lorraine. The restoration of peace with the Moravians, and the death of Guido, prepared the way for a more successful expedition in 895, and Arnulf was crowned emperor by Formosus in 896. He set out to establish his authority in Spoleto, but was seized with paralysis on the way, and died in 899. By his widow Ota he left a son, Louis, surnamed the Child].

The Huns, a people of Scythia, in bygone days, migrated in a great and mighty force from their homeland, and they did not settle down until they had reached their blood relations, the Hungarians, in Pannonia. They were so powerful that they drove out the Hungarians. When they first came there they were so barbarous that they ate raw meat, and at times human flesh. A few years after their arrival, and when Arnulf had been elected emperor in France, the Lombards, hoping for assistance from the Hungarians against Arnulf, or taking advantage of evil conditions and dissensions in Italy, had decided that they would ignore the Romans, whom they considered of minor importance; and they carried on open feuds and hostilities against them. When the Romans and other Italians learned that they could secure no assistance against the Lombards from the emperor, who was troubled with fresh dissensions in France, they elected as emperor Berengar (Berengarium), duke of Friuli, a native of Rome. [See the note to Benedict IV, Folio CLXXII verso, below]. In the meantime the Huns overran the Germans and the Gauls. In the first invasion they made many prisoners from among the Germans, or killed them; plundered and robbed many churches, and ravaged and destroyed them with fire and sword. Likewise they took and carried away a remarkable quantity of loot from Gaul—gold, silver, gems, and ornaments, and destroyed many beautiful and costly buildings.

William (Guilliclinus), surnamed the Pious, a duke of Aquitaine and count of Alvernia, was, at this time, held in high esteem for his faith, conduct, morals, learning, and his service to God. Having no male heir, he built the monastery of Cluny on his paternal soil in Burgundy, and appointed over it as abbot, Berno, a highly learned man. He endowed it with a large quantity of money, rents and revenues. [The Monastery of Cluny was founded in 910 by William I, surnamed the Pious, count of Auvergne and duke of Guienne (Aquitaine). The first abbot was Berno, who had two monasteries in the neighborhood under his rule. Just before his death in 927, two or three others came under his control, so that he bequeathed to his successor the government of a little group of five or six houses, which became the nucleus of the Cluniac Order. Berno's successor, Odo, armed with papal privileges, set out to make Cluny the center of a revival and reform among the monasteries of France. He also exercised some influence over the Benedictine houses in Italy. The process of extension went on under his successors, so that by the 12th century Cluny had become the center and head of a great order embracing the 314 monasteries in all parts of Europe].

Berno, the abbot of the monastery just mentioned, a native of Burgundy and born of noble ducal ancestry, was held in great esteem in these times for his piety and distinguished teachings.

Rudolph (Rudolphus), was appointed king of the Burgundians. This kingdom endured for a long time. [Rudolph, or Raoul, king of the Franks, and duke of Burgundy, was a son of the Burgundian duke Richard, and probably a member of the Carolingian family. He succeeded his father in 921, married Emma, daughter of Robert, duke of the Franks, and assisted his father-in-law in driving the Frankish king Charles III ('the Simple') from the throne. Robert then became king of the Franks, but was killed in battle in 923, and was succeeded by Rudolph. At Limoges, Rudolph defeated the Normans, the Aquitanians, and Herbert of Vermandois. Rudolph died at Auxerre, leaving no sons, on January 14, 936].

Sunderold (Sunderoldus), archbishop of Mainz, was martyred at Worms by the Normans. [Sunderold was the Archbishop of Mainz from 889 until 891. He died on June 25th, 891, while leading an army against the Normans].

Remigius, bishop of Auxerre (Autesidorensem), was at this time renowned for his interpretation of divine and profane scriptures. []

Folio CLXXIII verso

Pope John (Ioannes) the Ninth, a Roman, was elected pope after Theodore. The greater portion of the Roman populace being opposed to the proceedings against Formosus, John soon brought the entire matter up for reconsideration. The situation had caused such a tumult that it almost resulted in war. John proceeded to Ravenna, assembled 74 bishops, nullified the acts of Pope Stephen, and confirmed those of Formosus. The decree of Stephen that those who had been consecrated and ordained by Formosus should, be re-ordained, was held unlawful. This came about because the popes had departed from the footsteps of Peter, and because the government of the Christian order had fallen into indolence, indifference and neglect. This John died in the second year and 15th day of his pontificate, and left nothing memorable, except that he renewed a number of dissensions which had almost been extinguished.

John IX, a Roman, succeeded Theodore II as pope in 898. He undertook a solemn vindication of Formosus through a council at Rome. Those who had thrown the corpse of Formosus into the Tiber were excommunicated unless they should repent. John supported Lambert in preference to Arnulf, but Lambert's sudden death shattered the hopes which this alliance seemed to promise. John died in 900.

When the estates of Germany deposed Charles the Fat, followed by his death in 888, a powerful party of nobles was formed in Italy to shake off Franco-German dominion, and Guido, or Guy, duke of Spoleto, was chosen future ruler of Italy. A rival appeared in Berengar, duke of Friuli. A protracted civil war followed. Stephen V, who succeeded to the pontificate in the meantime, was chiefly instrumental in procuring the acknowledgment of Guido as king of Italy, and in 891 he was crowned by the pope. He became so powerful that in 894 he was able to compel Formosus, successor of Stephen V, to secure to his son Lambert the succession to the empire. But Formosus instigated Arnulf, king of Germany, to enter Italy and possess the kingdom which belonged to him. Berengar, in his jealousy of Guido, supported Arnulf, and defeated Lambert in 895, and in the same year Arnulf received the imperial crown from the pope with the consent of the Roman people. Formosus died in 896, and his successor Boniface VI held the pontificate for but fifteen days. The next pope, Stephen VI (or VII) was imprisoned in 897 and strangled. His successor, Romanus, held office for four months, and was followed by Theodore II, whose pontificate lasted only twenty days. In 898 John IX assumed the pontificate after gaining the upper hand over his rival Sergius. The restored German dominion over Italy lasted only until Arnulf returned to Germany, and in 897 Lambert again became emperor and was recognized by the pope; but his death in 898 led to a new change. Berengar again put forth his claims, but his enemies called in Louis, king of Burgundy, who defeated him and compelled him to flee to Germany. The imperial crown now went to Louis. In 905 Berengar returned with a strong force from Germany, compelling Louis to retire to Ravenna, while he himself not only remained in Italy, but received the imperial crown from Pope John X in 916.

Pope Benedict (Benedictus) the Fourth, a Roman, was elected pope for his goodness and mildness; and in spite of the disordered morals of the popes who preceded him, he lived a stable and praiseworthy life without blame or a single calumny. However, he accomplished nothing praiseworthy, for in these disastrous times all morals in the head and in the members (of the body) were consumed by the neglect and indolence of the people. He died in the third year and fourth month of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for six days. [Benedict IV, pope from 900 to 903 was a Roman of noble birth, and the chronicler assures us that in spite of the loose morals of his predecessors he lived a stable and commendable life without a single blemish].

Pope Leo the Fifth (the land of whose origin historians do not mention) was apprehended and thrown into prison by Christopher, his attendant, who aspired to the pontificate, but did not attain it without a great tumult and the destruction of many people. He encumbered the papal see for 40 days of Leo's pontificate. When Leo saw himself robbed of his office by a servant whom he had shown much kindness, he soon died of grief. [Leo V succeeded Benedict IV in 903. At the end of two months a presbyter, named Christopher, took him prisoner and possessed himself of the papal chair. Christopher himself, in turn, was expelled in the following year by Sergius III].

Pope Christopher (Cristoferus), whose surname and place of origin are unknown because of his ignoble birth, secured the pontificate by evil arts and cunning means after the ejection of Leo; and by the same evil methods he again lost it. For he was deservedly deprived of it seven months later, and forced into a monastery. Later Sergius, his successor, took him out of the monastery and imprisoned him. Before long he was subjected to severer punishment by being placed in harder confinement, where he finally died in wretchedness. [Christopher (Christophorus), pope or anti-pope, was elected in 903 against Leo V, whom he imprisoned. In January 904 he was treated in the same manner by his rival, Sergius III, who had him strangled].

Michael (Michaelis), the archangel, appeared in these times at Apuleia, on Mount Gargano, near the city of Sypontum. In commemoration of this a city, with a temple and other beautiful structures, was built there. Even unto the present many people from all Christian lands make pilgrimages to this place.

In these times fiery brands appeared in the heavens; and intermingling stars of unusual brilliance were seen. Soon afterwards a famine occurred in Italy, and many great battles on both sides. A comet of unusual brilliance appeared. It was followed by a great flood, particularly in Saxony.

Sergius, the third pope of this name, a Roman, during his pontificate, caused the Lateran Basilica, which had fallen into disrepair, to be restored. While still a deacon he employed his zeal to prevent Formosus from becoming pope. For this Formosus persecuted him, and upon his election Sergius went to Gaul. By the good will and grace of Lothair he returned to Italy, and seized and imprisoned Christopher, the successor to the see; and he nullified the acts of Formosus so that it became necessary to reconsecrate those whom Formosus had regarded worthy of priestly consecration; and in revenge he caused his corpse to be drawn from the grave and to be decapitated as though Formosus were living, and the body thrown into the Tiber as unworthy of interment and human respect. [Sergius III, elected pope by one of the factions of Rome in 898, simultaneously with John IX, was expelled from the city by his adversaries. He reappeared in 904, seized the two claimants, Leo V and Christopher, who were disputing the succession of Benedict IV, and then strangled them. His adherents rallied round the sacristan Theophylact, a powerful Roman functionary, and his wife Theodora, with whose daughter Marozia, Sergius lived in concubinage, and by whom he is said to have had a son who became pope as John XI. Sergius did not hesitate to yield all the treasures of the Roman church as plunder to his party. All posts of influence were occupied by his preachers. The fortress of St. Angelo (Casta Sant'Angelo) was placed in his hands. He was hostile to the memory of Formosus, and refused to recognize any of the ordinances made by him, thus causing grave disorders. He also affected to consider as anti-popes, not only John IX, but also his successors to and including Christopher. He restored the Lateran Basilica that had fallen down in 897. He died in 911, and by the influence of his party he was succeeded by Anastasius III; and when the latter died in 903 they caused Landus to be nominated as his successor. In 914 Leo X, the favorite of Theodora, was elevated to the see by the influence of his mistress].

Folio CLXXIII recto

Louis (Ludovicus), the third of that name, son of the emperor Arnulf (Arnolphi), succeeded his father in the government in the Year of Salvation 903; and he reigned 10 years. But as the empire was in a state of dispersion, he did not attain to imperial coronation. But the Franks, after his father's death, constituted him king of the Franks and the Germans, and gave him the title of emperor. He was made king in the little town of Forcheim (Forchem). In order that he might resist Cendebald (Cenebuldus), to whom the princes of Lorraine were opposed, he was appointed to the sovereignty of the entire Belgian lowlands. In consequence of that Cendebald ravaged and devastated Lorraine with fire and sword, but he was finally slain by Counts Stephen (Scephano), Gerard and Manfred. [Louis, surnamed the Child, king of the Franks, last of the German Carolingians, son of the emperor Arnulf, was born at Ottingen. He was designated by Arnulf as his successor in Germany in 897, and crowned on February 4, 900. His chief adviser was Hatto I, archbishop of Mainz, and during his reign the kingdom was ravaged by Hungarians and torn with internal strife. He died in August or September 911, and was buried at Regensburg]. In the year 905, after the incarnation of the Lord, Louis, a son of Boso, king of the Roman territories and of Burgundy, marched into Italy, and subjugated everything to his power. He left his army, and with a small number of men went to Verona. There he was imprisoned through treachery and deprived of his eyesight, while Berengar was made emperor in the kingdom of Italy. [Louis III (c. 880-928), surnamed the Blind, Roman emperor, was a son of Boso, king of Provence or Lower Burgundy. The emperor Charles the Fat took him under his protection on the death of Boso in 887, but Louis was not recognized as king of Provence until 890. In 900, after the death of the emperor Arnulf, Louis went to Italy to obtain the imperial crown. He was chosen king of the Lombards at Pavia, and crowned emperor at Rome in 901. He gained a temporary authority in northern Italy, but was soon compelled by his rival Berengar, margrave of Friuli, to leave the country. In 904 he returned and secured the submission of Lombardy; but in 905 he was surprised at Verona by Berengar, who blinded him and sent him back to Provence, where he remained until his death in 928. He married Adelaide, possibly a daughter of Rudolph I, king of Upper Burgundy. His eldest son, Charles Constantine, succeeded only to the county of Vienne]. Louis, king of Germany, and emperor of the Franks and Germans, died without heirs. It is said that with him and his brother Cendebald the Carolingian line came to an end; and so the empire which the line of Charlemagne had possessed for one hundred and ten years shifted to the Lombards. After the death of the emperor Louis, the people requested Otto, the duke of Saxony, a highly renowned and aged prince, to assume the sovereignty; but because of his years he refused to be burdened with it.

Conrad the First, a son of Conrad, whom Count Adelbert (Albertus) killed, was, upon the advice of duke Otto, and with the consent of all the Franks, elected king in the Year of the Lord nine hundred thirteen. He was not crowned; nor is he reckoned among the emperors by the Italians over whom he did not reign. He did, however, reign over the Germans and the Gauls for seven years. During the first year of his reign the Swabians and Bavarians defeated the Hungarians who had come forth to devastate the earth. In consequence of that Arnulf (Arnulphus), the duke of Bavaria, who was antagonistic to king Conrad, fled to Hungary with his wife and children; and there he remained until Conrad died. [Conrad I, German king, was the son of Conrad, count of Lahngau. When Louis the Child died, in 911, Conrad was chosen German king at Forcheim, owing to the efforts of Hatto I, archbishop of Mainz, and to the reputation he appears to have won in peace and war alike. He found the unity of Germany threatened by the Magyars and the Normans from without, and by the growing power of the stem-duchies from within. He failed to bring Lorraine into subjugation and was finally unsuccessful in his struggle with Henry, duke of Saxony, afterwards King Henry the Fowler. He died September 23, 918, and was buried at Fulda. He named his former enemy, Henry of Saxony, as his successor].

Henry (Heinricus) the First, called the humble, a duke of Saxony, and son of duke Otto, reigned in Eastern France. In the Year of the Lord 920 he became emperor of Germany, and he reigned 18 years, while Charles (Carolus), the king at Paris, reigned over Lower France. He gave battle to the Hungarians and Bohemians who overran Saxony. His spouse Mathilda was an illustrious woman of wonderful sweetness, grace and mildness, and endowed with all the other virtues. She bore Otto the Great, of Saxon lineage, and Henry the duke of Bavaria. But Baba, the sister of Henry, bore Count Adelbert (Albertus), who is mentioned below. This Henry, by means of threats, secured from Rudolph, the king of Burgundy, the holy spear and the nails of Christ; and he also gave him a number of presents, and a portion of the Swabian lands; and he left the spear to his successors as a treasure and protection for the empire. [Henry I, surnamed the "Fowler," German king, son of Otto the Illustrious, duke of Saxony, shared in early life various campaigns for the defense of Saxony. He married Hatburg, a daughter of Irwin, count of Merseburg, but as she had taken the veil on the death of a former husband this union was declared illegal by the Church, and in 909 he married Mathilda, daughter of a Saxon Count, named Thiedrich, and a reputed descendant of the hero Widukind. On his father's death in 912 he became duke of Saxony, which he defended against the Slavs. In 918 the German king Conrad I advised the nobles to make the Saxon duke his successor, and when they met in 919 they chose Harry as German king. Henry refused to allow his election to be sanctioned by the church. His authority, save in Saxony, was merely nominal, but he secured a recognition of his sovereignty from the Bavarians and Swabians. In 921, Charles III of France recognized Henry as king of the East Franks, and when in 923, the French king was taken prisoner by Herbert, count of Vermandois, Lorraine came under Henry's authority. Henry reduced various Slavonic tribes in the east to subjection and secured both banks of the Elba for Saxony. In 923 he bought a truce of ten years with the Hungarians by a promise of tribute, and on its expiration he gained two victories over them in 933. The Danes were defeated, and territory as far as the Eider secured for Germany. The king sought further to extend his influence by entering into relationships with the kings of England, France, and Burgundy. He died at Memleben on July 2, 936. By his first wife, Hatburg, he left a son, Thankmar, who was excluded from the succession as illegitimate. By his second wife Mathilda he left three sons, the eldest of whom, Otto (afterwards the emperor Otto the Great), succeeded him, and two daughters].

In the time of Louis (Ludovici) the Third, the noble Adelbert (Albertus), count of the Franks, grandson of Duke Otto of Saxony, killed Conrad, king Louis's son. In consequence of which king Louis besieged the said Adelbert in the castle of Babenberg. Through the treachery and cunning of Hatto, the archbishop of Mainz, he was brought before the emperor and beheaded. Out of his blood, Adelbert, who afterwards is said to have brought Austria into the Roman Empire, is said to have had his origin.

Hatto, archbishop of Mainz, who succeeded Sunderold after he was killed by the Normans. He is the person through whose treachery Adelbert, duke of Babenberg, came to his death. This Hatto, at the instigation of King Conrad, caused a golden necklace to be made in expectation of Henry, duke of Saxony, who was King Conrad's enemy, in order to entrap him with it. But Duke Henry was warned and the bishop was defeated in his wicked proposal. Three days later the bishop was killed by lightning, and snatched away by demons. As he fell from a mountain in Sicily into a fiery spring, a voice in the air said: Thus may you pay for your sins, and thus by falling down may you be ruined.

Hatto I (850-913), archbishop of Mainz, belonged to a Swabian family, and was probably educated at the monastery of Reichenau, of which he became abbot in 888. He was appointed archbishop of Mainz by the German king, Arnulf, in 891. In 899, when Arnulf died, he became regent of Germany, and guardian of the young king, Louis the Child. He assisted the Franconian family of the Conradines in its feud with the Babenbergs, and was accused of betraying Adalbert (most likely the Albert of the Chronicle), count of Babenberg, to his death. He retained his influence during the whole reign of Louis, and on the latter's death in 911 helped to secure the election of Conrad, duke of Franconia, to the vacant throne. When trouble arose between Conrad and Henry, Duke of Saxony, afterwards King Henry the Fowler, the attitude of Conrad was ascribed by the Saxons to the influence of Hatto, who wished to prevent Henry from securing authority in Thuringia, where the see of Mainz had extensive possessions. He died in 913. Stories of cruelty and treachery gathered about his name.

The last clause ('a voice in the air said: Thus may you pay for your sins, and thus by falling down may you be ruined') is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Folio CLXXIII verso

Bamberg (Babenerga) is a very renowned Franconian city, divided by the river Regnitz (Radiantia) and located in a fair and fertile region. Not far below Nuremberg this river receives the waters of the Regnitz. The Regnitz affords the inhabitants of Bamberg various diversions and is useful and convenient for shipping. From here the Regnitz flows down into the river Main (Morganam), which passes by no small number of cities in Franconia. Above the city, on a high elevation, is the citadel or castle, naturally and artificially fortified. Luitolfus, duke of Saxony, had a son named Otto, to whom was born Henry (Heinricum), surnamed the Humble (who later became king of Rome and ruler of Germany), and a daughter called Baba, for whom this city of Bamberg (Babenerga) was named; although some call the city after Mount Pavonis. Baba, countess of Babenberg, bore two sons, Reynoldus (whom duke Conrad slew) and Adelbert, the most noble count of the Franks, who was a grandson of the aforesaid Otto, duke of Saxony and Thuringia, and who because of the slaying of his brother, in turn slew Conrad, the brother of King Louis, and for that reason went to the aforementioned citadel, and for a long time endured a siege by the king. But the capture of the citadel being considered difficult, cunning and treachery were invoked. Hatto, the archbishop of Mainz, was resorted to as an instrument to carry out the evil design; and he went to Count Adelbert at the castle, and offered to act as arbitrator of the controversy, and he asked the count to come down to the camp of the emperor, where peace could be made, or the count returned to the castle unharmed, Count Adelbert believed him, and accepted his promise and his oath. Adelbert went out with Hatto; but they were hardly out of the castle when Hatto said that the matter before the emperor might take some time, and for this reason it might be wise to dine first. And the count was pleased with the words of the bishop; and he went back into the castle and had breakfast with the bishop, asking no further security of him. Now having dined, Count Adelbert went to the king with the bishop. But he was taken prisoner and condemned to death. The count having reminded the bishop of his vow and assurances of security, the bishop, possessing little fear of God, answered and said that he had sufficiently kept his faith and assurances in the first instance, inasmuch as he had brought him out of the castle, and then brought him back into it for breakfast unharmed; for he had not promised to bring him back a second time. So the unfortunate Adelbert was beheaded. The Romans, who employed like cunning, acted better; for when Hannibal sent one of his prisoners to Rome, they sent him back in bonds. The landed estates which Count Albrecht owned, passed to the empire. So Emperor Otto III gave Henry the Saint many landed properties, as is stated in his franchise, which runs thus: Let it be known to all persons of the Christian faith that pursuant to the wishes and requests of our most beloved mother Adelaide, we have, by virtue of our imperial authority and might, enfeoffed and firmly given over our city called Bamberg, together with all things thereunto belonging, to our beloved grandson, Duke Henry, for his sole use forever, etc. Afterwards Emperor Henry the Saint, beautified this city, and together with his spouse, the holy virgin Kunigunde, there founded a worthy Episcopal church and court; for while living they passed by nothing that they considered serviceable to the veneration of God and in promotion of it. After death they were also illustrious for many miracles in the same royal cathedral. There also lies buried Berengar, who conquered the kingdom of Italy, and was made prisoner by Otto the First and taken to Germany, where he died in exile. This city was adorned with public edifices and very beautiful churches. Saint Otto, its bishop and an apostle to Pomerania, together with the banner of Saint George, is also at Bamberg. And it is believed that here are two of the six jars in which the Lord our Savior made wine out of water, as the Gospel states; also the sword with which Peter struck off the ear of Malchus. The praises and a description of the city are set forth in a beautifully and artistically bound poem, written by Godfrey of Viterbo, the distinguished historian [Godfrey of Viterbo (c. 1120 – c. 1196), was a medieval chronicler and secretary to the Holy Roman Emperor Frederick I Barbarossa. Educated at Bamberg, he wrote several historical works, some in a mixture of verse and prose].: [In an extremely rare (unique?) cross-reference between the two editions of the , the German text (published 6 months later than the Latin in December of 1493) ends its paragraph on Bamberg not with Godfrey's poem, but with the following text: "He who wishes to benefit by its instruction should consult the Latin text following the description of the city of Bamberg."]

[First Column]

A Bavarian river called by the common people Regnitz (Radiantia)
Sustains the lands of Noricum, and wandering far off departs
And nourishes the lovely parts of the city of Mount Pavo,
Which in the common tongue is called Mount Bamberg.
By the river the neighboring land is made fertile(?) and is irrigated.
And a bridge built over it links both sides.
This extremely praiseworthy city grows from the lowest parts of the mountain
And from there it takes flight with its towers first in place.
The clergy, however, occupies the peaks of the mountain from the city.
A row of homes surrounded by a host of walls,
With the laity shut out, is the lords' fort.
The shape of the church enlarges and adorns the mountain's peak.
Mount Pavo possesses hills at its flanks,
Three as if the same, and also the principal (peaks?) of the city.

[Second Column]

It itself shining in the middle is preeminent and without equal.
More beautiful (than the other mountains?) it gives very large places for those monks.
The remaining (mountains?) give (space for) the churches of many canons.
One quarter offers a market place on both sides of the river.
In the manner of a cross, therefore, has Pavo (i.e., Bamberg) placed its settlement.
Peter [The name of a church. Today known by the name of Dom ('Cathedral') in Bamberg]. stands in the middle, Stephen [The name of a church, called St. Stephan in Bamberg]. holds itself to its right.
At the peak stands James [The name of a church, called Jakobskirche and located on the Jakobsberg in Bamberg today], on the left Michael [The name of a church, called Michelskirche and located on the Michelsberg in Bamberg today]. keeps itself.
Along the river, the virgin Maria carries the glory
Of the holy emperor Henry, surnamed the Lame.
These and yet many more good things of his
Were, he whose bones are good at working miracles.
(My) history calls me; farewell, blessed Pavo!

Bamberg (Babenberg) is a city of Upper Franconia, in Bavaria, and lies in one of the most fertile regions of Germany. It is located in great part on the left shore of the left arm of the Regnitz, and extends, like an amphitheater, over five hills. The Part of the city beyond the right arm of the Regnitz is in communication with the city by means of ten bridges, of which the most important and most centrally located is the Obere Brücke (or Upper Bridge) built by Forcheimer in 1452-56. The city is first mentioned about 902, and was originally located beside the Castrum Babenberch, which was built in the ninth century and belonged to the family of the counts of Babenberg. After the fall of the Babenbergers the city became part of the empire, and later by grants passed to the Bavarian duke Henry the Quarreler, whose son Emperor Henry II particularly favored the city and founded the cathedral and Episcopal see of Bamberg. In the 15th and 16th centuries bloody feuds occurred between the bishops and the citizens, who refused to sacrifice the independence they had enjoyed in the past; and later there were other feuds, with the margraves of Brandenburg. In the Thirty Years War the city suffered severely at the hands of the Swedes; in the Seven Years War, through the Prussians; and finally, in the 19th century, at the hands of the French troops. City and see were assigned to Bavaria in 1802.

Bamberg lies in an open plain on the Regnitz, two miles above its junction with the Main, and thirty-nine miles north of Nuremberg. It grew up beside the castle of Babenberchem, which gave its name to the Babenberg family. The cathedral, a late Romanesque building, with four imposing towers, founded by Henry II in 1004, was later partially destroyed by fire, and rebuilt in the 13th century. The original building was a flat-roofed basilica, but in its present form it dates from the close of the 12th and beginning of the 13th century. The four eight-storied towers are 265 feet in height. In the center of the nave is the sarcophagus of the founder, Henry II (who died in 1024) and his consort Kunigunde (who died in 1038), executed in a fine-grained limestone resembling marble—the work of Riemenschneider (c. 1500). On the highly ornate sarcophagus repose the emperor and the empress, over life-sized, in the fantastic costumes of the 15th century.

Other noteworthy churches are the Jakobskirche, and 11th century Romanesque basilica, and St. Martinskirche and Marienkirche (1320-87). The Michaelskirche, 12th century Romanesque (restored) on the Michaelsberg, was formerly the church of the Benedictine monastery, secularized in 1803. Picturesque Old Palace (Alte Residenz) was built in 1591 on the site of the old residence of the courts of Babenberg. The New Palace (1698-1704) was formerly occupied by the prince-bishops; for from the middle of the 13th century the bishops were princes of the empire. The schools include the lyceum for philosophy and Catholic history, a survival of the university suppressed in 1803. The industries of the town include cotton spinning, the manufacture of shoes, calico, and ropes. The market gardens of the neighborhood are famous, and there is considerable shipping by the river and the Ludwigskanal.

ILLUSTRATION

CITY OF BAMBERG (BAMBERGA)

Bamberg is represented by a large woodcut extending over Folio CLXXIV verso and CLXXV recto. From the foreground the river Regnitz, crossed by a single bridge, winds through the city on the right. We are reminded that Bamberg nestles at the foot of a number of hills, among the most prominent of which are the one on the left, occupied by the citadel, and the elevation on the right, known as Michelsburg, with its conspicuous church and the buildings of the old Benedictine abbey founded by the emperor Henry II.

Bamberg is a city of many churches, most of which cannot be identified on this woodcut. Of the ten bridges which cross the Regnitz, we here see only one. The two textual designations, BAMERGA on the left hand of the woodcut, and MONS MONACHORUM ('Mountain of the Monks' or 'Monastery Hill'), on the right, are not clear, unless they were intended to apply to the city as the residence of the Babenberg counts, on the left, and to the old Benedictine monastery located on the elevation at the right, called Michelsburg.

Pope Anastasius the Third, a Roman, was pope after Sergius. In his time Landulphus, the Beneventan prince of Apuleia, fought against the churches and was victorious. This pope, during his pontificate, lived a discreet and full life, and was without fault. He is much praised because he spoke no evil of any pope who preceded him. He died in the second year of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. [Anastasius III, pope from 911 to 913, was a Roman by birth. Practically nothing is recorded of him, except that he took an active part in the ecclesiastical division of Germany, his pontificate falling in the period when Rome was in the power of Roman nobles].

Pope Lando, a Roman, was of such an obscure and unknown career that some do not reckon him among the popes, particularly the historian Vincent (Vincentius); but Martin (Martinus) and Godfrey (Gotheфридus) hold otherwise; for they say that Lando, by his authority and decrees, prevented war between Berengar and Rudolph, the son of Guido. This Lando died in the sixth month and 21st day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. [Lando succeeded Anastasius III on the latter's death in 913, and was himself succeeded by John X, the favorite of Theodora, in the following year. Little of consequence seems to have occurred during Lando's pontificate].

The Cluniac Order had its inception in the Year of the Lord nine hundred thirteen, under the rule of the Holy Father Benedict, with the abbot Odo (Oddo), a very holy man; for when Berno the abbot was about to die, he appointed this Odo abbot of the monastery of Cluny, on condition, however, that the church of Cluny pay the Church of Guienne (Gigniacensi) 12 denarii annually. And after the monks had departed from the rule of Father Benedict, this Odo nevertheless lived among them in such strict discipline that although half dead, they were fired with the man's piety and moved to ardent devotion; and so the worthy foundation of the holy father Benedict again took on life. This Odo was first instructed in music and dialectics by Remigius, bishop of Auxerre (Antesiodorensi), and wrote the history of Saint Martin. [See note to Monastery of Cluny, Folio CLXXIII recto, above].

John (Ioannes), the tenth of that name, a Roman whose father was Pope Sergius, entered the pontificate in the Year of the Lord nine hundred nine. He had been a bishop of Ravenna. In a revolt of the people he had been ejected from the bishopric. While pope he was more inclined to military affairs than to spiritual matters; and such a pope the church now needed; for he, together with Alberic, the margrave of Etruria, fought against the Saracens, who harassed many regions of Italy; and they defeated them and drove them out of the Roman provinces. Then the pope returned to Rome and celebrated a triumph. This aroused the hatred of Alberic. When the pope drove Alberic out of Rome, Alberic invited the Hungarians to Italy. They caused more grief in Italy than the Saracens had done. This John was taken prisoner by the soldiers of Guido, and suffocated with a pillow in the 13th year, second month, and third day of his pontificate. And although another John took his place, attaining the papal office by force, he too was soon deposed, and is not reckoned in the number of the popes. [John X, pope from 914 to 928, was deacon at Bologna when he attracted the attention of Theodora, wife of Theophylact, the most powerful noble in Rome, through whose influence he was elevated first to the see of Bologna, then to the archbishopric of Ravenna, and finally to the papal chair, as successor of Lando. He allied himself with Theophylact and Alberic, marquis of Camerino, the governor of the duchy of Spoleto. In December 915, he granted the imperial crown to Berengar. He took the field in person against the Saracens, over whom he gained a great victory on the banks of the Garigliano. The defeat and death of Berengar through the combination of the Italian nobles again frustrated the hopes of a united Italy. John perished through the intrigues of Marozia, daughter of Theodora. His successor was Leo VI].

Leo the Sixth, a Roman, was made pope by means of legitimate votes. He was a good pious man, leading a worthy life, silencing dissensions, making peace, holding off the enemy, etc. He died in the seventh month and fifteenth day of his pontificate, and was buried in Saint Peter's. [Leo VI succeeded John X as pope in 928, and held the pontificate seven months and a few days; he was succeeded by Stephen VIII, or, according to the , Stephen VII].

Stephen (Stephanus), the seventh of this name, a Roman, became pope at the time the Hungarians devastated Alamannia and Saxony. They were defeated with great slaughter at Merseburg by Henry (Heinrico), king of Germany. This pope led a life of kindness and piety. He died in the second year, first month and 12th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of the Blessed Peter. [Stephen VII (or VIII) held the pontificate from January 929 to February 931. He was virtually a nonentity, the real direction of the pontifical state being in the hands Marozia, and later in the hands of her son Alberic, senator of the Romans].

Folio CLXXVI recto

Berengar (Berengarius), the first of that name, a Roman, duke of Friuli, born of royal Lombard lineage, and highly informed in matters of war and martial transactions, after defeating the aforesaid Louis (Ludovico), secured the sovereignty of Italy, and reigned for 4 years. But in his elevation the Italians were not unanimous, for some chose Guido, duke of Spoleto, as king of Italy. Under these newly elected princes a revolt occurred which was followed by war. In the first onslaught Guido defeated Berengar; but Berengar, being a magnanimous man and well versed in military matters, regained the field in a short time, forcing Guido to remain in his duchy. Thus he also treated Ambrosius, the count of Bergamo. And after both these warriors were slain Berengar fought the Romans. In this period a serious controversy arose between the Germans, Italians and French for the possession of the empire. This was followed by a severe war, resulting in great property damage and loss of life before it ceased. The Romans and Italians, however, managed to retain the sovereignty in their country. Some say that Berengar was crowned as emperor by Pope Lando. [Berengar I, king of Italy, was the son of Eberhard, margrave of Friuli and Gisela, daughter of emperor Louis the Pious. Between 871 and 875 he succeeded his brother in the March of Friuli, and after the deposition of Charles III, he assumed the throne as grand-nephew of Charles the Great. In 888 he was crowned as king of Italy at Pavia, but found a dangerous rival in Guido the duke of Spoleto, who, after a decisive victory on the Trebbia, in 889, likewise assumed the kingship and attained to the imperial crown at Rome in 891. Berengar and Pope Formosus called upon the German king Arnulf for help against Guido. Arnulf came and occupied Lombardy in 894, but soon returned to Germany. During Arnulf's second invasion of Italy in 896 Berengar opened negotiations with Lambert, son of Guido, and after the retirement of the Germans, entered into a treaty with Lambert by which he secured northeastern Italy as far as Adda. On Lambert's death in 898, Berengar aspired to the entire empire. However, about 899, he was defeated by the Magyars on the Brenta, and after 902 was attacked by Louis of Burgundy, who assumed the Italian throne and the imperial purple. In 905 Berengar surprised Louis at Verona, and blinded him, and in 915 Berengar was crowned as emperor by Pope John X. Berengar maintained himself in office for 8 years, but not without continued warfare with the nobles, who finally offered the Italian crown to king Rudolph II of Upper Burgundy. On July 17, 923, Rudolph decisively defeated Berengar, who then called upon the Hungarians for assistance, thereby estranging the few who were still faithful to him. At Verona, which had always been loyal to him, a sworn confederacy was organized, in consequence of which Berengar lost his life on April 7, 924].

Hugh (Hugo), count of Arles, ruled in Italy for ten years after Berengar. He was elected in opposition to Rudolph, the Burgundian, who had robbed Berengar of his empire. Rudolph abandoned the controversy and returned to Burgundy. Now this Hugh, having been warned by Rudolph, entertained mistrust and hatred against those who had elected him; and accordingly, he ordered one of his generals to take charge of the army while he sent the rest into exile. But the exiles, as well as other Italians at home, incited Arnold, duke of Bavaria, to come to Italy against Hugh with a well organized army. Hugh took up arms and defeated him. Not long afterwards he died.

Hugh (Hugo), king of Italy, son of Thietbald, duke of Provence, and Bertha, daughter of Lothair II, king of Lorraine, maintained a position of leadership in Lower Burgundy, even while the blinded emperor Louis III, its king, was still living; and answering a call for assistance from the enemies of king Rudolph in Italy, Hugh was elevated to the kingship of Italy at Pavia in July 926. After the death of Louis, in 928, Hugh secured his supremacy in Lower Burgundy still further. However, in 933, he ceded that country to Rudolph, who in turn gave up his claims to Italy. In Italy Hugh ruled with great vigor, and with harshness and cruelty. Spiritual and temporal offices he gave to his bastards and Burgundian favorites.

In the last years of the emperor Lambert a coalition had been formed among the Roman nobles. At its head stood Adelbert, count of Tuscany, supported by the influence and intrigues of the notorious Theodora, who was connected with some of the most powerful families of Rome, and who by means of her infamous daughters, Theodora the younger and Marozia, drew an additional number to the party. Marozia was notorious as the mistress of one pope, the mother of a second, and the grandmother of a third. The account of her career constitutes the most morally problematic page in the history of the papacy. On the death of Berengar Marozia sought to strengthen herself by marrying Hugh, whom her son, Pope John XI, had recognized as king of Italy. But the alliance proved of no avail to either party. Marozia introduced Hugh into the Castle Angelo; but the Romans under the leadership of Alberic, Marozia's illegitimate son, refused to permit Hugh to enter Rome, and confined him to the Castle from which he was soon driven by Alberic. Marozia was cast into prison, and the pope restricted to his spiritual functions.

Equally unsuccessful were Hugh's efforts to deprive Rudolph's son Conrad of Burgundy, even though Hugh and married Rudolph's widow Bertha with that in view. He meditated a scheme to imprison and to blind Berengar, margrave of Ivrea, but in this project he worked his own downfall. Berengar made a timely escape, taking refuge with Otto I, emperor of Germany. In 945 Berengar returned to Italy with a small army raised in Germany, and in a brief time won over the discontented nobles and assumed the sovereignty. Hugo and his son Lothair, whom he had made co-ruler, retained but the shadow of sovereignty, while Berengar exercised all the authority.

Dissatisfied with this situation, Hugh returned to Provence in 946, and died at Arles in 947. When he left Italy his son Lothair remained as the reigning king.

Berengar (Berengarius) the Second reigned after Hugh (Ugonem) for 7 years. He so confounded the Hungarians that they retired to Etruria; and after they had devastated its cities they carried off a great amount of plunder. And while Berengar was considering how the Italian sovereignty might be restored by common consent, the Italian tyrants who feared his power and might, sought to prevent this; and they requested Rudolph, the Burgundian king to march into Italy. Rudolph came and drove out Berengar, and reigned there three years. But vengeance was not withheld from the Italians for long, for the Hungarians to whom Berengar had fled, came into Italy under the leadership of Salardus, and ravaged everything on the way. They besieged and captured Pavia, consuming everything with fire and sword. Finally this Berengar died in Hungary, or (as some historians state) in Bavaria.

Berengar II. According to reliable sources the margrave of Friuli who became king of Italy as Berengar I and was assassinated in 924, and the margrave of Ivrea, who assumed the sovereignty as Berengar II, and was deposed by Otto I, the German emperor in 966, are the only two kings of that name who entered upon the sovereignty of Italy. Berengar II was a grandson of Berengar I through the latter's daughter Gisela. The person here referred to as Berengar II is neither of these.

Further confusion arises in the Chronicle by the introduction of a third Berengar; but what has been noted as to the second is equally true of the third. That the chronicler himself was confused in these matters becomes still more apparent from Folio CLXXVII recto, where "Berengar IV" is introduced, whose biography there corresponds to that of the real Berengar II (margrave of Ivrea), upon whose career a historical note will be found there. Schedel admits the confusion but blames it upon the uncertainty of his authority. It will be noted that in introducing "Berengar II," at Folio CLXXVI recto, Schedel assigns no parentage and no place of birth to this sovereign; nor does he specify the date of his death, nor his place of death with certainty. He introduces "Berengar III" as the grandson of Berengar I, but does not know how he came to Italy, whether with an army, with the help of the Italians, or through the assistance of others, and adds that no one has explained the matter. He cautiously states that 'some write' that he reigned eight years. It is difficult to even speculate upon the matter.

It is difficult to even speculate upon the matter. Different sources may have presented varying accounts, resulting in duplication, and giving the impression that there were four Italian kings of this name instead of two.

Berengar (Berengarius) the Third, grandson of Berengar I, came into Italy, and in the year of the Lord 935, secured the sovereignty. Whether he came there with a large army, or with the help of the Italians, or through the assistance of others, no one has written. But it is known that he came to Italy in the time of Pope Stephen VII. In the meantime the Saracens living about Mount Garganum overran the people of Apuleia and Calabria in a new revolt; and they besieged the city of Beneventum, captured and plundered it, and set it on fire. And as the Roman provinces had not yet been attacked by them, the Romans and Italians hurriedly collected an army under Count Guido as general. With this army he proceeded against the enemy, compelling the enemy to retreat. This Berengar made peace and entered into an alliance with the Hungarians, so that they directed against other peoples the raging madness which they had for ever so long practiced against the Italians. Some write that this Berengar reigned for eight years. [See note to "Berengar II," above].

Folio CLXXVI verso

Year of the World 6933 | Year of Christ 934

Pope John (Ioannes) the Eleventh, a Roman, entered the pontificate at this time, when a bloody spring gently flowed at Genoa, as a sign of an impending calamity; for Genoa was captured and devastated by the Saracens, who came from Africa. And so also the Hungarians spread over Italy far and wide and overran and devastated everything. This John died in the fourth year, tenth month, and 15th day of his pontificate. The seat was then empty for 12 days. [John XI, pope from 931 to 935, son of Marozia and reputed son of Sergius III, was chosen to succeed Stephen VII, at the age of 21. He was the mere exponent of the purposes of his mother, until her son Alberic in 933 overthrew their authority. The pope was a virtual prisoner in the Lateran, where he is said to have died in 935. He was succeeded by Leo VII].

Pope Leo the Seventh, a Roman, was elected pope at the time of Hugh (Ugone) and Lothair (Lothario), who then reigned in Italy. He was a neglectful man, and did nothing worthy of remembrance. He died in the third year and tenth day of his pontificate. The seat was then empty for three days. [Leo VII, pope from 936 to 939, was preceded by John XI, and followed by Stephen IX. The chronicler's observation that he accomplished nothing memorable is apparently true].

In the year nine hundred thirty-five, while John (Ioanne) the Eleventh was pope, Saracens (as above stated) came from Africa with a great and mighty fleet and ravaged all the seaports of Etruria; and they captured the city of Genoa, and there committed many cruel and lamentable deeds. They killed the people who resisted them, and carried off in ships the adolescent youths; but, as some write, these were sent back home from Africa after a short time.

When Pope Leo the Seventh was elected, William (Guilhelmus) wrote that Henry, king and emperor of Germany, died. Otto, as hereafter stated, succeeded him in the kingdom and in the imperial title.

Pope Stephen (Stephanus) the Eighth, a German, after receiving the pontificate was persecuted by the Romans with so much enmity that he was unable to accomplish anything worthy of remembrance. As Martin (Martinus) states, he was so maimed during this persecution that he lived in disgrace for ever so long, being ashamed to appear before the people on account of his wounds. King Hugh (Hugo) took up arms to avenge this disgrace and outrage, but he died in the course of these preparations. He was succeeded by his son Lothair (Lotharius), who made no mention of the matter, probably because he was a friend of the Roman people, or because his reign was short, for he died two years after his father. Stephen died in the third year, fourth month and 12th day of his pontificate. The seat was then empty for ten days. [Stephen IX (or VIII) held the pontificate from 939 to 943, while the real direction of the papal see was in the hands of Marozia, and later in those of her son Alberic].

Bipert (Bipertus), whom others call Ugibert (Ugibertus), a noble prince of Lorraine, celebrated for his piety and other virtues, was at this time enrolled in the number of the saints because of his illustrious miracles. Among others of the virtuous works of his life, he built, at his own expense, the monastery of Cemalta in France, and in a short time enhanced it with great and mighty structures.

In this year, as above stated, and as historians testify, a bloody spring gently flowed for an entire day in a district of Genoa, called Fontanella; which was a sign to the citizens of a future calamity that faced them (as above stated) when the Saracens sailed from Africa.

Pope Martin (Martinus) the Third, a Roman, was a gentle and good man, and in that respect a follower of Pope Stephen the Seventh. When he entered upon the pontificate he declined participation in all military affairs, concerning himself only with spiritual and divine matters. However, this part of Europe was not free of the turmoils of war. And when Otto decided to invade Italy, and he encountered the resistance of Lothair (Lothario), and much slaying and bloodshed occurred on both sides, Pope Martin admonished them to stay their weapons because every land was being ravaged by famine and destitution. He died in the third year, sixth month, and tenth day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat was empty for twelve days. [Martin III (also known as Marinus II), pope from 942 to 946), was merely a puppet of Alberic (d. 954) prince and senator of the Romans. He died in May 946, and was succeeded by Agapetus II].

Pope Agapetus (Agapitus) the Second, a Roman, was elected pope during the turmoil of war in Italy. He was a man of strong disposition, and succeeded in enlisting the aid of Otto, king of Germany, against Berengar, the Italian emperor, after making his arrogance known. Through Otto's help and assistance the discord and war between the pope and Berengar, who, contrary to justice and fairness, sought to acquire dominion over every thing, were avoided and abandoned. Agapetus was a very blameless man, and a distinguished lover of Christian life and purposes. He died in the ninth year, seventh month, and tenth day of his pontificate, at nearly the same time in which Odo of Cluny, abbot of the monastery, found peace in the Lord. And he was buried in the Basilica of the Blessed Peter.

Agapetus II was pope from 946 to 955 at the time when Alberic, son of Marozia, was governing the independent republic of Rome under the title of "prince and senator of the Romans." He endeavored to restore church discipline and to regain temporal power. His appeal to Otto the Great to intervene in Rome remained without immediate effect, since Alberic's position was too strong to be attacked; but it bore fruit after his death. Agapetus died in 955.

The last part of this paragraph ("at nearly the same time in which Odo of Cluny, abbot of the monastery, found peace in the Lord. And he was buried in the Basilica of the Blessed Peter.") is not in the German edition of the chronicle. Odo of Cluny died in 942.

Lothair (Lotharius), the second of that name, son of the aforesaid Hugh (Hugonis), received the kingdom upon the death of his father, and reigned 2 years. Afterwards Berengar III enlisted many foreign peoples and with these he invaded Italy. And when the news reached Italy numerous opponents sprang up in many places. When Hugh saw that he could not overcome Berengar by force, he tried negotiation; and he sent an emissary to the enemy, and a treaty was made to the effect that his son Lothair and Berenger should share the sovereignty, with equal rights. This joint rule lasted for several years, but in name only; for Berengar, a sharp-witted man, ignored Lothair, who maintained himself and his wife Adelaide (Alunda) at Pavia, enduring Berengar's scorn and tyranny. In the meantime Hugh died. Lothair, a friend of the Romans, entered upon a desperate war with Otto, the son of Henry (Heinrici); for when Otto began his march against Rome, Lothair resisted him, and in consequence many great battles were fought and much blood was spilled. [Lothair, king of Italy, was son of Hugh, king of Italy, and was co-ruler with him subsequent to 931. In 937 he married Adelaide, daughter of Rudolph II of Bavaria. In 947, upon the death of his father, he became sole ruler of Italy. But his sovereignty was only nominal, for after 945 the government was actually in the hands of Berengar, margrave of Ivrea. Lothair died in 950, poisoned by Berengar, as is generally surmised].

Rudolph (Rudolphus), who defeated Berengar at Verona, was a duke of Burgundy. He had previously relinquished his sovereignty in Italy to Hugh (Hugoni), the Count of Arles; and in turn afterwards became king of France. He reigned two years. [Rudolph II, king of Burgundy (apparently the person here referred to), succeeded his father Rudolph I in 912. He conducted endless warfare to enlarge his dominions. He was raised to the Italian throne in 921 by Adelbert of Ivrea, and in 923 defeated his rival Berengar. He left Italy in 925. In 933 he relinquished his sovereignty in Italy in return for that of Burgundy. He died in 937].

Lack of historians in this period accounts for our want of knowledge as to the dealings of Berengar and Lothair (Lotharii). We do not know whether there were three or four Berengar's, which is not a great surprise, the references to them being obscure. The historians are confused; some say that Berengar I reigned four years and that Berengar II reigned 12; and that the reign of Lothair and Berenger lasted 13 years. And so, as Ptolemy de Lucca writes, five Italian emperors, including kings and tyrants, reigned in Italy over a period of thirty-two years. Many historians neither give the length of the reigns of these emperors, kings and tyrants, nor distinguish between them. It is apparent that about fifty years elapsed between the inception of the reign of Berengar I and the coronation of Otto I as German emperor by Pope John the Twelfth. Otto I afterwards sent into exile the Berengar who first reigned in Lombardy. [See notes to Berengar I, II and III, Folio CLXVI recto].

Berengar the Fourth, whom some call the third, entered upon the sovereignty of the empire with his son Adelbert after the death of Lothair (Lothario); and they reigned 11 years. Berengar was an honorable, candid, and distinguished man; for when Henry (Heinricum), the duke of Bavaria, defeated the Hungarians in Italy, and ravaged and plundered the richest regions lying between Aquileia and Pavia, Berengar speedily raised an army and proceeded against him. When Duke Henry learned of this, he departed from there to Austria. After this Berengar conquered all Italy, assumed the imperial title, and named his son Adelbert king. But Berengar ruled his subjects with tyrannic severity. He imprisoned his spouse Adelaide (Alundam); and by such conduct the Italians, through Pope Agapetus, were moved to call upon Otto to make himself king of Italy. And he came into Italy and avenged them, and espoused Adelaide.

Berengar II (here called Berengar IV), son of Adelbert, margrave of Ivrea, and of Gisela, daughter of Berengar I, was one of the mightiest Italian princes of his time. In 940 he fled before Hugh, the tyrannical king of Italy (whose niece Willa he had married) to Otto, king of Germany, to whom he did homage. In 945 he returned with a small army and was greeted by the nobles and the cities as a liberator. Although Hugh and his son Lothair had retained the royal title, Berengar alone exercised the authority. When Lothair died unexpectedly at Turin in 950, Berengar called a council of Italian nobles at Pavia, and caused himself and his son Adelbert to be elected kings of Italy. Berengar ruled with great severity and cruelty, and in their despair the people turned to the beautiful and pious Adelaide, widow of Lothair and daughter of Rudolph of Burgundy. She had made a large number of adherents in Burgundy and Italy, causing Berengar so much concern that he requested her to marry his son Adelbert, although her period of mourning had not yet expired. Rejecting this proposal she found herself exposed to the persecution and abuse of Berengar, who made her a prisoner at Como. She was later given over to one of Berengar's nobles, who was charged to keep her securely in his castle at Lake Garda. She escaped to the castle of Canossa where she availed herself of the protection of Bishop Adelhard of Reggio. Her fate aroused the sympathy of King Otto, who became her avenger and at the same time availed himself of the occasion to seize Italy and to unite the imperial crown of Rome with that of Germany. Fearing that as a stranger in Italy he could not hope for support, and now being a widower, he offered to marry Adelaide, thus uniting their interests and acquiring a powerful ally in Italy.

In 951 Otto marched into Italy. Berengar, finding himself deserted by his vassals, as well as by the bishops whom he had sorely oppressed, fled to one of his castles. In a brief time Otto made himself lord of Upper Italy, and without election by the nobility, styled himself "King of the Lombards," or "King of Italy." Adelaide was brought to Pavia and the marriage was celebrated. In 952 Otto returned to Germany with his bride. Thus Italy was annexed to the Germano-Roman Empire.

Otto left his brother-in-law, Duke Conrad of Lorraine, in charge of Lombardy. But Berengar again became unruly. Through Conrad a conference was arranged between Berengar and Otto in Germany, and at the Reichstag of Augsburg, in 952, Otto restored the Lombard kingdom to Berengar and his son Adelbert, but only as vassals, and both were obliged to swear allegiance to Otto and to obligate themselves to pay tribute.

After his restoration Berengar ruled with cruelty and despotism; for which reason Otto, in 956, sent his son Liudolf to Italy. Although victorious, Liudolf died the following year.

But Berengar's ambition remained unappeased, and he made a further attempt to free himself from Otto. In response to fresh appeals from the Italians and the pope, Otto crossed the Alps a second time and reconquered Italy. He entered Rome in triumph, and then pursued Adelbert who fled to the Arabs in Corsica. Berengar himself, and his wife, Willa, fled to the mountain fastness of Saint Leo, or Montefeltro (near San Mareno). There Berengar was forced to surrender to Otto and was exiled to Bamberg, where he died in 966. His wife Willa entered a monastery, and his son died in exile.

Adelbert (Albertus), son of the said Berengar, living at Ravenna, burdened the Venetian merchants with many mischiefs; for in the vicinity of a certain city he had the shipping within his power, and on the sea there he legalized piracy. But the Venetians, determined to no longer endure this, surprised the city in ships and captured the citizens there and obligated them under oath not to permit such piracy in the future. Afterwards Otto proceeded into Italy against Berengar, fought him and brought him into his power, and soon afterwards he exiled one to Constantinople and the other to Germany; and both died in exile.

Taxis, king of the Hungarians, determined to avenge his subjects, whom he wished to rule in Italy, but who had been driven out by the Bavarians; and he rapidly overran Italy with an army. For this reason the Italians were so frightened that they feared that this was to be their final extermination. But Berengar sent to Taxis his son Adelbert, who mollified him to such an extent that for ten pecks of silver coins (as they report) he spared Italy.

The Hungarians first overran Germany, then Gaul, destroying everything. Later they made the Bulgarians tributary. Then followed a deluge of barbarous people which overflowed many countries without restraint. These barbarians also passed through Friuli in Italy, and devastated and destroyed everything by fire and pillage. Alberic the margrave, who through envy and ingratitude had been driven out of Rome, called in the Hungarians to oppress the city; but they did not reach the Roman borders. They did, however, overrun and devastate almost all Etruria, causing much grief by fire and murder, carrying off with them to Hungary all the women and boys who could not escape. Afterwards, in the time of Emperor Otto I, they overran Germany.

Before this time Bohemia was converted to the faith; and there Borivoj (Worzivous), the last pagan duke, and his spouse Ludmila (Ludimilla) were baptized by Saint Methodius, the archbishop of Moravia, in 905. Of the said Ludmila it is said that she was such a holy woman who performed miracles. Both, after accepting the truth of Christianity, greatly enhanced and spread the Christian religion among the Bohemians. [The early history of Bohemia is involved in obscurity. The first attempts to introduce Christianity undoubtedly came from Germany, but met with little success, due to distrust between these nations. Matters were different when Christianity approached them from Moravia where its doctrines had been taught by Cyril and Methodius – Greek monks of Thessalonica. About 873 the Bohemian prince Borziwoj was baptized by Methodius, and the Bohemians rapidly adopted the Christian faith. Among the rulers of Bohemia the most famous in this period was Wenzel, or Wenceslaus, surnamed the Holy, who, in 935, was murdered by his brother Boleslas, and was afterward canonized by the Roman Catholic Church.]

Spytihnev (Spitigneus), the son of Borivoj (Borziwogii), the first Christian duke of Bohemia, attained the dukedom after the death of his father; but he died without male heirs, leaving the dukedom to his brother Wratisslas (Vratisslai). Now Drahomira (Drahomitia), wife of said Wratisslas, a cunning and wicked woman, bore unto her husband two sons, namely Wenceslas (Ventzeslaum) and Boleslas. The elder she placed in the care of her mother-in-law; the younger she nurtured herself. Each of the children adopted the morals of his foster-mother, Wenceslas being good and inclined to all the virtues, while Boleslas was an idolater and inclined to every vice. The father (Wratisslas) ordered the children placed under the guidance of Ludmila until their majority. This offended Drahomira so sorely that she caused Ludmila her mother-in-law to be strangled in the castle of Tetin (Thetin). And thereupon she undertook the regency for the children. She was cruel to all persons, despised Wenceslas, and sought to advance his brother before him. [See note to Wenceslas, below].

Wenceslas (Wenceslaus), duke of Bohemia, son of the aforesaid Wratisslas (Vratisslai), was reared by Ludmila (Ludimilla), the holy woman, as aforesaid, and was educated in wisdom, church lore, and the Holy Scriptures. He was, as they say, a man of moderation in food and drink, erect and handsome in person, and retained his virgin chastity to the end. Neither by night nor day did he neglect a single divine service or office. At night he walked barefoot on ice and snow, yet suffered not from the frost. At the request of the people he took over the dukedom while his mother still lived. And so the name and fame of Wenceslas marvelously grew, and he became illustrious among the people. But the more he was loved by others, the more he was hated by his mother and brother. Now a feast was provided for him, and he was invited. And having foretold his own death, and availed himself of the confessional according to Christian custom, he went into his brother's house; and there his brother murdered him. For the miracles he performed the church enrolled him among the saintly martyrs.

Wenceslas. After the death of Borziwoj of Bohemia, who had introduced the Christian faith into the country, the throne was occupied by his son Spytihnev I and Wratisslas I in rapid succession. Both were Christian princes who labored to advance the faith among their subjects, and built several churches. Wratisslas I had married Drahomira, daughter of the heathen prince of the Luticians; and by her he became the father of two sons, Wenceslas, (old bohemian, Waceslaw; German, Wenzel) and Boleslas, and four daughters. Duke Wenceslas, who succeeded his father about 926, was then nearly 18 years of age. He had been brought up by his gentle and Christian grandmother, Ludmila. His mother Drahomira, an ambitious woman, at once seized the regency, and to put away the woman whom Bohemia loved and honored, and who might have disputed her right to act as regent, she sent assassins to Tetin, where Ludmila had fled to escape her, and had her strangled with her own veil. The rule of Drahomira was not beneficial to the country for she stirred up a powerful enemy in Henry the Fowler, king of Germany and Emperor of the East, who in 928 invaded Bohemia and appeared before Prague in 928. In the meantime Wenceslas, though only twenty years of age, had assumed the government independently of his mother; and he speedily came to terms with the emperor without bloodshed, engaging to pay him an annual tribute of 500 marks of silver and 120 head of oxen; and he took the oath of allegiance to the imperial crown. He remained true to Henry I throughout his reign, and never allowed his kinsmen or nobles to shake his fidelity. His brother Boleslas, an ambitious headstrong youth, was an element of discord and danger. He had received the district of Bunzlau as his portion, and although he recognized Wenceslas as his sovereign, yet he exercised within his district all the rights of an independent prince. He was the very opposite of his brother, who always tempered justice with mercy. Boleslas treated his subjects with harshness and rapacity. Drahomira and Boleslas were discontented with their position of inferiority. They were on the side of those who looked upon the German alliance with disfavor, and even plotted against Wenceslas, so that the duke was forced to banish his mother from Bohemia, although she was later permitted to return.

With Wenceslas religion was a passion, not a matter of politics as with his brother. He built churches in every city and invited priests to Bohemia. He was skilled in reading, fed and clothed the poor, protected widows and children and purchased the freedom of hapless prisoners. The story is told of how on a winter's night he carried a bundle of sticks to a poor old man who was suffering from the cold. Its most famous version today is found in the Christmas carol "Good King Wenceslas."

Noting the discontent of the pagan party, and those opposed to the German alliance, which was gradually spreading over the land, Boleslas resolved to take advantage of it to seize the helm of government. Duke Wenceslas was accustomed to make yearly visits to the principal cities of the realm at the dedication festivals of their churches. On the feast of Saints Cosmos and Damian (September 27) in 936 he came to Altbunzlau, the castle of his brother Boleslas, to be present at the celebration of the feast of these saints, to whom the church there was dedicated. His purpose was to return to Prague after high mass, but Boleslas entreated him to remain for the banquet he had prepared in honor of his presence. Although private warnings of treason reached Wenceslas, he refused to distrust his brother; but when on the following morning Wenceslas went to church, Boleslas met him at the door, and with the assistance of three servants slew him.

Otto, King Henry's (Heinrici) son, born to him by Matilda (Mathildo), the daughter of King Theodoric of Saxony, was the successor of his father in the kingdom. This Otto performed many celebrated deeds in the German and French kingdoms. And after the praise and fame of his virtues had spread into Italy, and Pope Agapetus and many of the Italian nobles had been distressed by the tyranny of Berengar and his son Adelbert, they appealed to this king Otto for help against them. At once, then, with fifty thousand warriors he marched through Friuli in Italy and deposed Berengar from the empire and Adelbert from the kingdom; and he took over Italy, released Adelaide (Alundam) from imprisonment, and took her to wife. [A repetition. See Berengar IV, Folio CLXXVII recto, above].

Folio CLXXVIII recto

OF THE GROWTH OF THE EMPIRE AND ITS TRANSFER TO THE GERMANS.

The imperial sovereignty taken from the Romans, Gauls and Lombards, and now received through the aforesaid Otto, from here devolved for the first time upon the German nation, and has been there maintained to the present time. In praise, commendation, and recognition of this most excellent imperial dignity, it is to be remarked:

That the Roman royal power (called the Holy Roman Empire) had its origin in innate human reason, which is a guide of the best mode of living and which all must obey; for when our first parents were driven out of Paradise and the Garden of Pleasure, and mankind roved about in the fields and forests like cattle, man, whom God had endowed with reason, bethought himself that man might be highly useful to mankind in living a righteous life. Accordingly some of the people who had formerly lived in the forests according to the habits of wild animals, were drawn together either through the guidance of nature, or by the will of God, the Master of all nature; and they formed associations, built houses, surrounded the cities with walls, devised all manner of arts, and led an agreeable and amiable civic life. But just as one person may derive much usefulness from another, so also one may acquire various evils from another. And so men began to wrong society, to violate faith and confidence, to break the peace, to harbor secret animosities against one another, to deprive one another of their possessions, and to stray from the paths of virtue into those of error. When the masses were oppressed by the powerful and mighty among them, they decided to take refuge with a man of exceptional virtue, who would protect the poor against the rich and powerful, and treat the masses with equality, righteousness and fairness. Accordingly many people elected kings, and the principalities multiplied. The multiplication of kings and princes resulted in many dissensions and revolts. And in time they fell out with each other as to their landed possessions, and at other times as to their jurisdictions. As there was no tribunal to pass upon their differences; and as neither would submit to being less respected than the other, so they took to arms and decided the matter by war. Thus the most amicable associations of men were dissolved. But the benign forethought of human nature, always inclined to the best, thought of consolidating everything into a single principality, without which a general peace was not possible. Thus originated the Assyrian kingdom. In the same manner the Greek state expanded from Europe to Asia and Lybia, under the power and good fortune of Alexander the Great; and Carthage did likewise. But as these empires never succeeded in subjugating the whole world, nor in bringing about universal peace, therefore it pleased human nature, or God the Lord and ruler of such nature, to revive the Roman Empire. In the beginning Rome was ruled by seven successive kings; and after their passage, was governed by men elected in pairs; but finally by a single ruler. Julius Caesar was the first sole ruler of the empire, and to him the people gave all power and authority. And although at times two emperors ruled jointly, as Diocletian and Maximian, yet at other times there were even more; but this occurred by might rather than as a matter of right. To such imperial dignity some were elevated by senatorial election, and others by acclamation of the people; some were chosen by the nobility, and others were appointed by order of the emperors. The sovereignty was at various times exercised by Italians, Spaniards, Africans, Dalmatians, and Greeks, and for ever so long from Constantinople, with great dignity. But when the Greeks became so neglectful of Rome that they permitted the Romans to be oppressed with the burdens of various wars, the Roman people, who with their own blood had set up the Empire, appealed for help to Charles the Great in France, a native German; and he came to their assistance and with the consent of the pope was crowned as Roman emperor. During the period of one hundred and ten years, from Emperor Charlemagne to Louts, the son of Arnulf, the empire increased in Gaul to no mean extent, and afterwards passed to Lombardy. Finally it devolved upon Duke Henry, King Otto's son, and from him to the present by orderly elections, upon Emperor Frederick III and King Maximilian his son, who were invested from heaven with the highest authority in temporal matters, so that they might be fortunate in war, favor peace, and uphold the common welfare; for the fulfillment of which all peoples, all nations, and all kings and princes should willingly submit themselves to this empire. [The Holy Roman Empire comprised the western part of the old Roman Empire, which was severed from the eastern part in the year 800, and was given by the pope to Charlemagne, who was crowned 'Emperor of the Romans.' When Charlemagne's empire was divided, Ludwig, a German, became Kaiser; but on the death of Charles the Fat the title fell into abeyance for seventy years. In 962 Pope John XII gave the title to Otto I the Great, and changed it into 'The Holy Roman Empire.' Otto took Charlemagne for his model, and the 'Holy Roman Empire of the German Nation', the greatest political institution of the Middle Ages, was now established. In theory it was the union of the world-state and the world-church – an undivided community under Emperor and Pope, its heaven-appointed secular and spiritual heads. As an actual political fact, it was the political union of Germany and Italy, in one sovereignty, which was in the hands of the German king. The union of the two peoples was not without its advantages to both; but it was also productive of evils. The strength of the German nation was spent in endless struggles abroad, and this stood in the way of the building of a compact kingdom at home. For Italy it was the rule of foreigners, of which she might feel the needs, but to which she was never reconciled. Maximilian I was the Emperor when the first German edition of the was published; while his father, Frederick III, who died in August 1493, was on the throne when the first Latin edition appeared six months earlier].

Folio CLXXVIII verso

Year of the World 6153 | Year of Christ 954

Pope John (Ioannes) the Twelfth, a Roman, was first named Octavian. His father, Alberic, was a mighty Roman, who secured the pontificate for this Octavian by force and cunning proposals. During his pontificate he was so devoted to the chase and to women, that his conduct was not only despicable and reprehensible on the part of a pope, but would have been so considered in any other individual. At this time were chosen annually from the honored and noble classes two consuls charged with the general government of the city; also a governor, out of the honored residents, to dispense justice to the people, and to assist them in securing it; and from among the common people twelve men were chosen. And although the city of Rome was protected by appropriate laws serviceable and conducive to freedom, Octavian dared to employ force in this free city, and to exalt the high papal office of which he was not worthy. On this account two cardinals became indignant, and they made a plea to Otto to take the clergy and the people out of the hands of Berengar and this pope so that the Christian faith and the imperial Roman sovereignty would not be debased by them. Other Italians also wrote to Otto to the same effect. In the meantime these matters came to the knowledge of the pope; and he was angered by them, and caused the nose of one of the cardinals and a hand of the other to be cut off. And now Otto came to Rome and received the imperial crown and imperial title of Germany and Pannonia from this John (although some say from Leo); and at first he admonished the pope with kind words, and later with threats, to desist from his misconduct. Fearing the emperor, John hid in the forest like a wild animal; and shortly after his return, in the ninth year, third month and fifth day of his pontificate, he died. And by his death the seat was vacant for 12 days. [John XII, pope from 955 to 964, was the son of Alberic, whom he succeeded as patrician of Rome in 954, being then only sixteen. His original name was Octavian, but when he assumed the papal tiara as successor to Agapetus II he adopted the apostolic name of John. In order to protect himself against the intrigues in Rome and the power of Berengar II of Italy, he called to his aid Otto the Great of Germany, to whom he granted the imperial crown in 962. Even before Otto left Rome, the pope had begun to conspire against the new emperor. His intrigues were discovered by Otto, who after he had defeated and taken prisoner Berengar, returned to Rome and summoned a council which deposed John, who was in hiding in the mountains of Campania, and elected Leo VIII in his stead. On Otto's departure John returned and Leo fled. Otto prepared to support Leo, but before he reached the city John had died (May 14, 964), and Benedict V had mounted the papal chair].

Pope Benedict (Benedictus) the Fifth, a Roman, was elected pope, chiefly by the relatives of the aforesaid John (Ioanni). Although Otto had confirmed Leo, the wicked placed this Benedict in the chair of the Apostle Peter. When news of this reached Emperor Otto, he concluded that nothing further was to be accomplished by words and threats. He diligently came to the seat of tyranny to ravage and devastate it; and he so severely besieged the city of Rome that a peck of bran was worth thirty gold coins at this time. And the Romans were so frightened that they gave Benedict to Otto, and accepted Leo. Having tamed the obstinacy of the Romans, Otto returned to Germany. He lived as pope for six months and five days. The seat was then vacant for twenty days. [Benedict V was pope from 964 to 965. He was elected by the Romans on the death of John XII. The emperor Otto did not approve of the choice, and carried off the pope to Hamburg, where he died].

Pope Leo the Eighth was elected pope before Benedict, and confirmed in the pontificate by Emperor Otto; but he was driven out by the Romans. However, Emperor Otto by force and arms compelled them to reinstate Leo, who as a punishment of the fickleness of the Romans, transferred from the Roman people and clergy to the emperor all power to invest a pope. He died in the first year and fourth month after his reinstatement. [Leo VIII, pope from 963 to 965, a Roman by birth, held the lay office of Protoscrinius when he was elected to the papal chair at the instance of Otto the Great by the Roman synod which deposed John XII in December 963. In February 964, the emperor having withdrawn from the city, Leo fled, and was deposed by a synod presided over by John XII. On the sudden death of John the people chose Benedict V as his successor; but Otto laid siege to the city and compelled their acceptance of Leo. It is usually stated that at the synod which deposed Benedict, Leo conceded to the emperor, and his successors as sovereigns of Italy, full rights of investiture, but the genuineness of the documents is more than doubtful. Leo VIII was succeeded by John XIII].

Pope John (Ioannes) XIII, a Roman, elected pope after Leo, was persecuted with arch animosity by Peter, the governor of the city, at whose instance he was taken prisoner in the Lateran by Jofredo the count of Campania, and taken to the Castle Angelo where he was held in confinement for several days. He was then sent to Campania. But when Jofredo and his only son were slain by the Capuan princes, John returned to Rome. When Emperor Otto noted this pope's distress, he came to Rome and took the governor and regent prisoner. John died in the sixth year, 11th month and fifth day of his pontificate. [John XIII, pope from 965 to 972 succeeded Leo VIII. His election was confirmed by the emperor Otto, and his submissive attitude towards the imperial power caused the Romans to expel him from the city. Otto secured his return, upon which he took savage vengeance on his enemies. Shortly after holding a council with the emperor at Ravenna in 967, he gave the imperial crown to Otto II at Rome in assurance of his succession to his father; and in 972 he also crowned Theophano as empress immediately before her marriage. He died in 972 and was succeeded by Benedict VI].

Pope Benedict (Benedictus) the Sixth, also a Roman, succeeded John in the pontificate and in grief; for he was forced into the Castle Angelo by a mighty Roman citizen, and there strangled by him, or (as others say) starved to death, in the first year and sixth month of his pontificate. [Benedict VI, pope from 972 to 974, was installed under the protection of Otto the Great. On the death of the emperor the unruly citizens of Rome renewed their outrages, and the pope himself was strangled by order of Crescentius, son of the notorious Theodora, who replaced him by a deacon called Franco, who took the name of Boniface VII].

Otto the First, an emperor of the Germans, heir to King Henry (Heinrici) and successor to his kingdom, was declared emperor by the pope in the Year of Salvation 962, after he had reigned in Germany for eighteen years. He had been crowned previously at Aix by Hildebert, the archbishop of Mainz; and he ruled the empire for 12 years. This was a very Christian man, and a lover and earnest defender of the Roman Church. He subdued Boleslas, the Bohemian duke, and after the deliverance of King Louis (Ludovicum) of France, gave peace to the kingdom. During the same time Hugh (Ugo) the Great, a Parisian count, who had Otto's sister to wife, carried a grudge against King Louis of France. In consequence Emperor Otto once again marched into France and compelled Hugh to obey Louis. [Louis IV (921-954), king of France, surnamed "d'Outremer" (Transmarinus, 'Across the Sea'), was the son of Charles the Simple. On his father's imprisonment in 922 his mother fled with him to England—a circumstance to which he owes his surname. But after the death of the usurper Rudolph (Raoul), Ralph of Burgundy, Hugh the Great, count of Paris, and other French nobles chose Louis for their king, and the young man was consecrated in 936. His reign was marked by rebellions of the French nobles, who refused to recognize his authority, and by an irruption of the Hungarians into Burgundy and Aquitaine in 937. Backed by the Pope, Louis showed great zeal in quelling these revolts, and by an alliance with Otto the Great, formerly one of his most determined enemies, he gained a temporary success. The powerful vassal, Hugh the Great, was in 949 forced to make submission and to restore Laon to his sovereign; but the last years of the reign were troubled with fresh difficulties with Hugh the Great and by an irruption of the Hungarians in the south of France. Louis died September 10, 954, and was succeeded by his son, Lothair]. Duke Gisibert (Gisilbertus), who had espoused King Otto's sister, opened hostilities against the French, proceeding as far as Andernach, where he was defeated, and while in flight was drowned in the Rhine. And so the king acquired the entire region of the Netherlands by surrender. Afterwards King Louis took the widow of Gisibert in marriage. Now at this time the Hungarians overran Germany; and they settled down at the city of Augsburg on the river Loch. And although Emperor Otto, pursuant to an appeal from the very holy Ulrich (Udalrici), the bishop there, armed against the Hungarians and attacked them with his forces and defeated them, he suffered great bloodshed and loss among his own men. For in the battle, which lasted a number of days, letting up only at night, there fell Conrad, the son-in-law of the emperor, and also the Duke of Worms. And so all the Hungarians were slain and exterminated, and they were so reduced and exhausted in possessions and strength that they were compelled to remain at home for a long time. Three Hungarian petty kings were taken prisoner in the same battle, and having been brought before King Otto, were hanged by the Germans to the dismay of the Hungarians. When the praise and renown of these mighty and victorious battles of Emperor Otto against the enemies of Rome reached the Romans and the Italians, they appealed to him to relieve them of the tyranny of Berengar and his son Adelbert, and that of other tyrants. So after having crowned at Aix his seven year old son, born to him by Adelaide (Alunda) and also called Otto, as king of Germany, Otto proceeded to Rome with great honor and there he received the imperial crown from Pope John the Twelfth (although some say from Leo the Eighth); and he admonished Pope John to lead a better life. Pursuant to a request by the people that Otto designate a worthy pope, he ordered the election of Pope Leo, whom he confirmed. After silencing matters at Rome, he proceeded to Spoleto; and he defeated the Greeks at Apuleia and Calabria; and thus he acquired for Germany the imperial sovereignty of Rome. At Gazlar (Goslaria) in Saxony, he discovered a silver mine. He endowed the city of Magdeburg with many treasures and made it an archiepiscopal see. He also minted coins, which in Italy were called Ottolini. Being a good and particularly kind man, he performed many praiseworthy deeds, and made his son co-ruler of the empire. He died of old age, and his body was taken to Magdeburg and buried in the Church of Saint Maurice, which he had built at very great expense.

Otto I, the Great (912-973), Roman emperor, eldest son of King Henry I, the Fowler, was chosen German king in 936, and was crowned by Hildebert, archbishop of Mainz. He was not content with nominal supremacy. In 937 he punished Eberhard, duke of Franconia, for an alleged infringement of royal authority, and in 938 deposed Eberhard, duke of Bavaria. Trouble soon arose in Saxony, probably through Otto's refusal to give certain lands to his half-brother, Thankmar, who, although the king's senior, had been passed over in the succession as illegitimate; but Thankmar was defeated by the king and was killed while taking sanctuary. In 939 a fresh revolt broke out under Otto's brother Henry, and Gisibert, duke of Lorraine. Otto gained a victory near Xanten, which was followed by a surrender of the fortresses held by his brother's adherents in Saxony; but the rebels, joined by Eberhard of Franconia, and archbishop Frederick of Mainz, continued to struggle, and Gisibert of Lorraine transferred his allegiance to Louis IV, king of France. Otto's precarious position was saved by a victory near Andernach, when Eberhard was slain, and Gisibert was drowned in the subsequent flight. Henry took refuge with Louis of France, but was soon restored to favor and entrusted with the duchy of Lorraine, where, however, he was unable to restore order. Otto therefore crossed the Rhine and deprived his brother of authority.

The deaths of Gisibert of Lorraine and of Everhard of Franconia quickly followed by those of two other dukes, enabled Otto to unite the stem-duchies more closely with the royal house. During these years the tribes living between the Elbe and the Oder were made tributary, bishoprics were founded in this district, and in 950 Otto marched against the Bohemians and reduced them to dependence. Strife between Otto and Louis IV had arisen when the French king sought authority over Lorraine, and aided the German rebels in 939; but after the German king had undertaken an expedition into France, peace was made in 942. Later, when Louis became a prisoner in the hands of Hugh the Great, duke of France, Otto attacked the duke, who, like the king, was his brother-in-law, captured Rheims and negotiated a peace between the two princes. In subsequent struggles between them, his authority was several times invoked.

In 945 Berengar, margrave of Ivrea, left the court of Otto and returned to Italy, mastering that country. When Lothair, king of Italy, died in 950, Berengar sought the hand of his widow Adelaide for his son Adelbert. Adelaide appealed to Otto, who crossed the Alps in 951, assumed the title of king of the Lombards, and married Adelaide. He returned to Germany in 952, followed by Berengar, who did homage for Italy at Augsburg.

In 955, at Lechfeld, Otto defeated the Magyars, who had invaded his dominions, and in the same year defeated the Slavs who had ravaged the Saxon frontier.

About this time Otto perceived the necessity of ruling in close union with the church. Lands and privileges were granted to prelates. Additional bishoprics were founded, and some years later Magdeburg was made an arch-Episcopal seat. In 960 Otto was invited to Italy by Pope John XII, who had been pressed by Berengar, and he began preparations for the journey. His son Ludolf having died in 957, and Otto, his only son by Adelaide, having been chosen king at Worms, the government was entrusted to Bruno of Cologne and archbishop William of Mainz, a natural son of the king. Reaching Pavia at Christmas, 961, the king promised to defend and respect the church. He then proceeded to Rome where he was crowned in 962. The Romans promised obedience, and Pope John took an oath of fidelity to the emperor. But as he did not long observe his oath, he was deposed by a synod held in St. Peter's after Otto had compelled the Romans to swear they would elect no pope without the imperial consent; and a nominee of the emperor, who took the name of Leo VIII, was chosen in his stead. In 965 a pestilence drove Otto to Germany, and finding the Romans again in revolt in 966, he allowed Rome to be sacked and the leaders of the rebellion severely punished. He next moved against the Greeks and Saracens of southern Italy. By 972 peace had been restored in Italy, and Otto returned to Germany where he received the homage of the rulers of Poland, Bohemia and Denmark. Otto I died suddenly at Memleben on May 7, 973.

They report that great omens appeared in Italy in these times. For a huge stone fell from the heavens during a great wind and rain; and bloody signs of the cross appeared on the clothing of many people.

The tenth and eleventh schisms occurred in the time of Emperor Otto, between John (Ioanne), Leo, and Benedict, and were of the nature and based upon the causes heretofore stated.

The sun suffered a dreadful eclipse in the third hour on Friday in Spain when Adamarus (Addamaram), the king of the Saracens, was defeated in war by Radamirus, the most Christian king of Galicia.

A miraculously large comet, presaging a famine, appeared in Italy. So king Otto brought the remains of Saint Innocent to Magdeburg. In Otto's 32nd year one of his counts became possessed of the Devil, who caused him to tear himself with his teeth. He was brought to Pope John XIII to have the chains of Saint Peter placed about his neck. But as the wrong chain was at first placed upon him, and he was not relieved, the true chain with which Saint Peter had been bound was then placed about his neck. Immediately, then, he was relieved of the Devil who burst forth and fled with a shriek. Then Theodoric, the bishop of Mainz, seized the chains, saying he would rather lose a hand than the chains. So the emperor decided that the pope should give the bishop a link of the said chains.

Magdeburg (Magdeburga), a capital city of Saxony, lies on the river Elbe. This river has its source in the Bohemian mountains. It divides Bohemia and Moravia, and runs directly through the provinces. It first flows westward, then to the north, and proceeds through narrow mountains, running swiftly downward into Saxony, passing the city of Magdeburg, and flowing from there down into the sea. Since the Romans never went beyond the Elbe (as Strabo writes), some have fixed upon this river as the boundary between Germany and Sarmatia [Sarmatia = Poland]. This city, honored as the seat of emperors and bishops, is divided into three districts, and is fortified and protected by battlements, bow-windows, towers, and moats; and is adorned with magnificent stately edifices, beautiful streets, and large and beautiful churches. A noble bishopric was founded there by the emperor Charles. After he had ended the war against the Lombards and taken their mighty king prisoner, he returned to Gaul; for the Saxon war necessitated his return homeward. The Saxons were a mighty people, and of all the Germans the most warlike. They worshipped false gods, and neither had in view the divine nor the human law. They despised the equality and fairness of our divine worship and faith, as well as the servants of God. They were neighbors of the French, with whom they were continually at war. The task of combating and overcoming them would appear to have been assigned to Charlemagne by divine Providence. He never conducted a greater, more severe or extensive war during a period of thirty-three years than this one against the Saxons; but finally they were so completely defeated that they gave themselves into his power, with all their possessions, submitted to just laws, abandoned their native customs and false gods, acknowledged the Christian faith; and for all these things they gave hostages. In all his wars Emperor Charles had in view the object and purpose of augmenting the Christian faith as far as lay within his power. And so when he had purged Saxony, he founded ten bishoprics there: He established the first Episcopal see at Osnabruck on the river Haase, in honor of Peter; [Osnabrück was the capital of the bishopric founded by Charlemagne in 783, but suppressed in 1803; it was governed alternately by a Roman Catholic and a Protestant prince after the Peace of Westphalia in 1648. In 1858 it again became the seat of the Roman Catholic bishop. Osnabrück is located on the river Haase]. the second, in honor of Saint Stephen, at Halberstadt; [Halberstadt is an old town on the Holzemme. The Episcopal see was founded in the 9th century, but was suppressed by the Peace of Westphalia. St. Stephen's Cathedral, the most important edifice, was destroyed by fire in 1179, but gradually rebuilt in the following centuries]. the third, in the castle of Wesekinus, at Minden, on the river Weser; [Minden, on the Weser, was the seat of a bishop from the time of Charlemagne to 1648 when it fell to Brandenburg as a secular principality. After 1526 the bishops were Protestant]. the fourth, in honor of Saint Peter, at Bremen, on the Weser; [Bremen, on the Weser, is one of the chief commercial cities of Germany. The bishopric of Bremen was founded by Charlemagne in 788. During the 13th and 14th centuries the citizens contrived gradually to shake off the archiepiscopal yoke, and in 1522 embraced the Reformation]. the fifth, in honor of the most blessed Virgin Mary, at Paderborn; [Paderborn, a very ancient city, which became an Episcopal see in 795. Here Charlemagne held a diet in 777. It became a town in the year 1000]. the sixth, at Werden, on the river Aller; [Werden, on the Aller, was formerly the seat of a Benedictine abbey]. the seventh, in the monastic church at Münster; [Münster, capital of the Prussian province of Westphalia, has been an Episcopal see since the 9th century. The bishopric was secularized in 1803, and annexed to Prussia]. the eighth, at Hildesheim; [Hildesheim, an ancient town, became an Episcopal see in 815. After the inhabitants succeeded in shaking off the supremacy of the bishops, Hildesheim joined the Hanseatic League. It was a free town of the empire until 1803]. the ninth, at Hamburg. [Hamburg, on the river Elbe. As early as 811 Charlemagne founded a castle here, to which he soon added a church, presided over by a bishop, whose mission it was to propagate Christianity in the northern provinces]. The tenth Episcopal church is the highly celebrated see of Magdeburg, on the Elbe, rounded in honor of Saint Maurice. [Magdeburg, which lies mainly on the left bank of the Elbe, is the capital of the Prussian province of Saxony. The archbishopric of Magdeburg was carved out of the bishopric of Halberstadt when it was founded in 968]. This see was, however, first established by Charlemagne at Styde, [Stade, a town of Germany, situated on the navigable Schwinger about 3½ miles above its confluence with the Elbe, and 20 miles west of Hamburg by rail]. on the domain of the grays [Gray Friars. Gray was the original color of the Franciscan habit. The reformed Franciscan monks introduced the dark-brown tunic]. of Swalenworch, and now of Lippia. Later this see was transferred to Walerszlewa (Valersleve); [Breslau (Latin Vratislavia; today it is best known by its Polish name, Wroclaw) is first mentioned by the Chronicler Theitmar, bishop of Merseburg, in 1000, and was made the seat of a bishop in the eleventh century. It formed part of Poland until 1163, became the capital of an independent duchy at that time, and passed to Prussia in 1741 before passing back to Poland after World War II. (See Breslau, Folios CCXXXIII verso and CCXXXIII recto, below)]. then to Urese, and finally, in the Year of Salvation nine hundred thirty, Emperor Otto changed it to Magdeburg. Through his help and request it was elevated to the primacy [Primacy, the chief dignity in a national church or ecclesiastical province. The ecclesiastical province of a primate]. in Alemannia. There Saint Adelbert, a man possessed of all the virtues, was the first bishop. In this city of Magdeburg is a beautiful church built of quarter stone in honor of Saint Maurice, the very noble work of Emperor Otto; and there rest the remains of Saint Florencius. It is believed that in that place is one of the six water jars in which, according to the stories of the evangelists, the Lord Christ our Savior made wine out of water. It is shown to the people there. It is light, made of marble, and holds as much wine as a horse can carry. And they also say that another and smaller jar is at Hildesheim. Saint Maurice's banner is exhibited here every year. The citizens possess and observe a book of the laws confirmed to them by the emperor Charles the Great. [The , or 'Mirror of the Saxons', is the oldest German law book of the Middle Ages. According to most recent investigations it appeared between 1221 and 1224, and was edited by a knight named Eike of Repgow, who was not a jurist. It was originally published in Latin, and was translated into the German by the editor himself at the request of Count Hoyer von Falkenstein. The sources are customary laws, statutes and judgments of the courts. It is the first prose work in the Low German language]. To this place the people of the vicinity resort for justice. There is also a statue of Roland, the friendly kin of Emperor Charles—an overly strong man, who after a great battle and the defeat of the enemy, was slain in action by the Vasconians, while he was leading his army from Spain back to Gaul. And this is the Roland who (as they say) excelled all other men in strength of body and greatness of mind, so that his great deeds and practices are praised and celebrated throughout the world. [Magdeburg (in early times Magadoburg) in the year 805 was designated as a marketplace by Charles the Great. In 923 and 924 the city was almost completely destroyed by the Wends and Slavs, who had allied themselves with the Hungarians; but Editha, wife of Otto the Great, rebuilt it and surrounded it with walls. In 936 Otto here founded the monastery of St. Maurice, which two years later was converted into an archbishopric. In 1188 the city suffered severely through fire; but it soon recovered and joined the Hanseatic League. Toward the end of the fifteenth century the city appears to have achieved its independence of the archbishops, most of whom resided outside the city, chiefly at Halle. Yet it never completely freed itself of them, and never became a free city of the empire. The Schoppenstube (court of Sheriffs), established here at an early date, was held in high esteem during the Middle Ages. The city attained its greatest prosperity in the beginning of the 16th century, when the population numbered 40,000 inhabitants. The Reformation took hold of Magdeburg in 1524].

ILLUSTRATION

CITY OF MAGDEBURG (MAGDEBURGA)

A large woodcut extending over Folios CLXXIX verso and CLXXX recto, consisting of two blocks. The blocks on the left has already been used to represent the City of Paris (Folio XXXIX recto). We are at a loss to know whether any part of this illustration is intended to be authentic. We may assume the river in the foreground to be the Elbe or the Seine. The walls may be those surrounding the City of Paris, the City of Magdeburg, or any other municipality. It is futile to attempt to identify any of the structures within the walls.

Year of the World 6173 | Year of Christ 974

Donus the Second, a Roman, succeeded Pope Benedict. He was a pope of much modesty and integrity; but during his pontificate he accomplished nothing worthy of great praise; for he died in the first year of his pontificate and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat was then vacant only two days.

Pope Boniface (Bonifacius) the Seventh, whose origin and surname are not mentioned because of his ignoble birth, acquired the pontificate by evil cunning; and he lost it in like manner; for through persecution on the part of pious citizens he was compelled to avoid the city of Rome. Therefore he left Rome, carrying with him the costly treasures of the Basilica of Peter and fled to Constantinople. There he stayed long enough to realize a large sum of money by the sale of these treasures. With this money he hoped, through bribes and gifts, to influence certain persons, and thus to recover the papal office. But he was opposed by certain pious people, particularly by a certain cardinal, whom he caused to be seized and deprived of his sight. Boniface died, ending his life in disgrace and discord. He sat only seven months and five days. The seat was then vacant twenty days. [Boniface VII was pope from 984 to 985. His family name was Franco. In 974 he was substituted by Crescentius and the Romans for Benedict VI was assassinated. He was ejected by Count Sicco, the representative of the emperor Otto II, and fled to Constantinople. On the death of Otto (983) he returned, seized Pope John XIV, threw him into prison, and installed himself in his place].

Ulrich (Udalricus), bishop of Augsburg, born of the noble family of the counts of Dilligen, was reared in the monastery of Saint Gall; and he received instruction in the Scriptures and in divine service, with the purpose of entering the clergy. But a woman hermit warned him not to do this, prophesying that he would become a bishop. Afterwards his friends placed him with bishop Adalbert. Finally, by God's will, he was elected to bishop; and he zealously devoted himself to divine contemplation and to the restoration of the church, and by virtuous practices and constant prayer he accomplished miraculous things, particularly in the Hungarian wars in which Emperor Otto was victorious. In this same war Saint Ulrich lost his brother Theobald (Diopoldum) and Regnibold, his sister's son. Finally, after many trials of patience he died, in the Year of the Lord nine hundred seventy-three, at the age of eighty-three. He was buried by Saint Wolfgang, bishop of Regensburg, in the church of Saint Afra, at Augsburg. He was highly renowned for his piety and miracles.

Ulrich (or Udalric), bishop of Augsburg, was the son of Hupald, count of Dilligen, and Dietpirc (also called Theoberga), daughter of Burchard, duke of Bavaria. He was born in 893 and educated at the monastery of St. Gall. He returned home at the age of fourteen, and was confided by his parents to the care of Adalbert, bishop of Augsburg. In 909, at the age of sixteen, he went to Rome, and was well received by the pope. On the death of Adalbert, in 923, Ulrich, then thirty years of age, was appointed his successor as bishop of Augsburg. His biographers say much of his charity, frugality, and piety.

Henry I died in 936 and was succeeded by his son Otto I. His son Ludolf rebelled against the emperor in 951, and was joined by Arnulf, son of the late duke of Bavaria. Ulrich remained firm in his allegiance to the emperor, and Arnulf entered Augsburg, demolished the fortifications and pillaged the churches. He besieged the bishop in the castle of Mechinen, but was routed by the troops of the emperor. The bishop issued from his confinement, and passing between the camps endeavored, not successfully, to reconcile the emperor with his son; and peace was again established. Arnulf had fallen under the walls of Ratisbon (Regensburg); but a powerful party in Bavaria, headed by his brother Werner, was induced by hatred of Henry, duke of Bavaria, the close ally of the emperor, to have recourse to the Hungarians, whom they invited into the country. These barbarians boasted of their numerical strength, saying that their horses would drain every river in Germany. They besieged Augsburg, whose treasures attracted them. The bishop had rebuilt the walls, and had called to his aid his brother Theobald, his nephew Reginbold, and Burchard, of Swabia, who had married Liutgard, his sister. The barbarians were encamped on the river Lech outside the city walls. Their chiefs drove them into the trenches with long whips. At the first onslaught the Hungarian chief was killed, and his followers fell back in confusion. The weavers of Augsburg made a sally, and gained possession of the shield of the Hungarian king, which has ever since been borne by their guild. Otto assembled the carrier-ban of the empire, the Bohemians joined their forces with his, and fell on the Hungarian horde under the walls of Augsburg in August 955. The bishop sent forth by night all his retainers to join the emperor, and retired into the cathedral with the women to pray for success.

The Hungarians rapidly crossed the river, fell into the rear of the German army, and were pressing hard upon the Swabians, when the fortune of the day was turned by Conrad of Franconia and Lothringia, the husband Liutgard, daughter of the emperor. A large number of the enemy were drowned in attempting to escape across the river. Conrad was mortally wounded, and the brother of the bishop, and his nephew, were slain. It is said that 100,000 Hungarians fell in this great battle. Two of their princes were hanged on the gates of Augsburg. Few of the Hungarians escaped to their country.

St. Ulrich now set to work repairing the damage done by the war. He restored the church of Saint Afra. In 967, being now well along in years, he prevailed upon the emperor to give the see of Augsburg after his death to his nephew Adalbert; but this step caused general dissatisfaction among the Bavarian clergy. Ulrich was called upon to defend himself before a synod and pleaded his advanced years and a desire to retire from his labors into a Benedictine monastery. This was no answer to the charge of having violated the canons by this appointment. But the bishop was 82, and esteemed by all for his sanctity. No censure was voted, but it was decided that Adalbert swear that he accepted the office without knowledge that his appointment was in violation of the canons; and this he did. Adalbert died the following year, and St. Ulrich regarded this as a judgment on what had been attempted. He died a month or two later.

Pope Benedict (Benedictus) the Seventh, a Roman, immediately at the beginning of his pontificate condemned in council one Gilbert, a seditious necromancer, and restored to office Arnulf, the bishop, who had been driven out by Gilbert. Afterwards, with the consent of Emperor Otto the Elder, he crowned the latter's son and his wife Theophano (Theophania) in the Lateran Church. This pope admonished all that in the election of a Roman emperor they should concern themselves with the status and general welfare of Christianity. He died in the eighth year and sixth month of his pontificate. And the seat was vacant for five days. [Benedict VII was pope from 974 to 983. He was elected through the intervention of a representative of the emperor, who drove out the intruder Franco (Boniface VII). Benedict governed Rome quietly for nearly nine years, something very rare in those days].

Pope John (Ioannes) the Fourteenth, a Roman, or (as some will have it) from Pavia, was seized by the Romans in the third month of his pontificate, and imprisoned in the Castle Angelo. There he was so closely confined, that in the face of filth, hunger and distress, he died. For what reasons this was done is really not known. [John XIV (Pietro Canepanova), pope from 983 to 984, successor to Benedict VII, was born at Pavia. He was bishop of Pavia, and imperial chancellor of Otto II. Otto died shortly after his election, when Boniface VII, on the strength of the popular feeling against the new pope, returned from Constantinople and placed John in prison, where he died either by starvation or poison].

Pope John (Ioannes) the Fifteenth, a Roman whose father was Leo, a priest from the region of Gallina Alba, having attained to the pontificate, became bitterly enkindled with hatred against the clergy; for this reason he was deservedly hated in turn by them. He favored his kin and near relatives in ecclesiastical and civil matters, in disregard of divine honor and the dignity of the Roman church. This mistake he passed on to his successors in such measure that it has come down to our own times. He died in the eighth month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. [John XV, pope from 985 to 996, generally recognized as the successor of Boniface VII, the pope John who was said to have ruled for four months after John XIV, being now usually omitted and classified as an antipope. John XV was the son of Leo, a Roman presbyter. His authority was hampered by Crescentius, patrician of Rome, but the presence of the empress Theophano in Rome from 989 to 991 restrained the ambition of Crescentius. He was succeeded by Gregory V].

Conrad (Conradus), bishop of Constance, was highly renowned in this period for his sanctity, piety, learning, and other virtues. He was born of noble parents in Germany, and was first taught the Scriptures by Nothing (Nothingo), the bishop of Constance, a judge in ecclesiastical matters. Later he was elected provost. After the death of Nothing he was elected bishop by Saint Ulrich and the clergy. One Easter Day, while performing the office of the mass, trusting to God, he swallowed a spider that had fallen into the chalice; but it crept out of his mouth and on to the table; so he remained unharmed. He died on the 6th day of the Kalends of December in the 62nd year of his being a bishop. [Conrad, bishop of Constance, was the son of Henry, Count of Altdorf, of the Guelf family, and he had a brother named Rudolph. Conrad was brought up for the Church, and on being ordained priest, was at once invested with the office of provost of the cathedral of Constance. His rank and piety pointed him out to the electors in 934 as a suitable person to fill the vacant see on the death of Bishop Nothing. He was a friend of St. Ulrich of Augsburg. Conrad exchanged lands with his brother, so as to obtain estates near Constance, and with these he endowed the see. He made three pilgrimages to Jerusalem. One Easter Day a spider fell into the consecrated chalice. In those times spiders were considered poisonous. Conrad deemed it most reverent to swallow the spider, after which he sat in agony of mind, expecting death. An hour or two later he threw up the spider. He died in 976; he has misstated how long he was bishop by writing the Roman numeral lxii (62) in place of xlii (42)].

Folio CLXXXI recto

Otto II, an emperor, whom Otto the Great, his father, made co-ruler of the empire, and who, together with his spouse Theophano (Theophania), was crowned by the pope in the Lateran Church, began his reign alone in the Year of the Lord 975. He was a good man and a defender of the Roman Church. Before he became emperor he gave peace to the Greeks, and took in marriage Theophano, the sister of John, the Constantinopolitan emperor. Now after he had received the imperial crown, and returned from Italy to Germany, after the death of his father, he experienced hostility on the part of Duke Henry (Heinricum) of Bavaria, whom he soon reduced to submission. While Emperor Otto was at war with Henry, Lothair (Lotharius), king of the Franks, with a large army invaded Lorraine, which then belonged to the Roman empire; and he proceeded to Aix and devastated the countryside. In response Emperor Otto raised an army in Bavaria, and proceeded into France as far as Paris, setting fire to the suburbs. On his return he sustained some losses. Later, with a large army, he marched into Italy against the Greek emperors Basil and Constantine, who had captured Calabria and other parts of Italy. But Otto was defeated, and during his flight a pirate ship carried him to Sicily without his being recognized. In Sicily, however, he was known, and he promised the Sicilians a large sum of money if they would return him to Rome; and this they did. Upon his return to Rome he diligently assembled his scattered forces; but lack of support on the part of his troops prevented him from proceeding against the Romans whom he regarded as responsible for his defeat; so he turned his wrath upon the Beneventans, capturing their city and setting it on fire. He translated the remains of Saint Bartholomew from Beneventum to Rome. He died and was buried with great honors. He left surviving his son Otto III, named as his successor in the sovereignty, and Adalisia, his daughter, wife of the margrave Alaranus of Montiferrati.

Otto II (955-983), Holy Roman emperor, was the son of Otto the Great by his second wife, Adelaide. He was chosen German king at Worms in 961, and crowned joint emperor by Pope John XIII at Rome in 967. In 972 he married Theophano, daughter of the eastern emperor Romanus II, and after sharing in various campaigns in Italy, returned to Germany and became sole emperor on the death of his father in 973. After suppressing a rising in Lorraine, difficulties arose in southern Germany, probably due to Otto's refusal to grant the duchy of Swabia to Henry II, the Quarrelsome, Duke of Bavaria. The first conspiracy was easily suppressed, and in 974, the attempt of the Danes to throw off the German yoke was also successfully resisted; but an expedition against the Bohemians, led by the king in person in 975, was a partial failure owing to the outbreak of further trouble in Bavaria. In 976 Otto deposed Duke Henry, restored order for a second time in Lorraine, and made another expedition into Bohemia in 977, when King Boleslas II promised to return to his former allegiance. Having crushed an attempt by Henry to regain Bavaria, Otto was suddenly attacked by Lothair, king of France, who held Aix in his possession for several days. But when the emperor retaliated by invading France, he met with little resistance. He was, however, compelled by sickness among his troops, to raise the siege of Paris, and on the return journey the rearguard of his army was destroyed and the baggage seized by the French. An expedition against the Poles was followed by peace with France, when Lothair renounced Lorraine.

The emperor then prepared for a journey to Italy. In Rome, where he restored Pope Benedict VII, he held a splendid court. He was next required to punish the Saracens for their inroads into the Italian mainland, and in 981 he marched into Apuleia, where he at first met with considerable success; but an alliance between the Arabs and Eastern Europe, whose hostility had been provoked by the invasion of Apuleia, resulted in a severe defeat of Otto's troops near Stilo in 982. Without revealing his identity the emperor escaped on a Greek vessel to Rosano. At a diet held at Verona, largely attended by German and Italian princes, a fresh campaign was arranged against the Saracens. Proceeding to Rome, Otto secured the election of Peter of Pavia as Pope John XIV. Just as the news reached him of a general rising of the tribes on the eastern frontier of Germany, he died in his palace at Rome in 983.

Bruno, bishop of Cologne, brother of Otto I, was held in great esteem for the piety of his life. At great expense he founded the monastery of the Blessed Panthelon at Cologne. Through the efforts of this bishop the remains of Elisius (Elysii) and Patroclus, together with the staff of Saint Peter, were brought from Rome to Cologne. [Bruno, archbishop of Cologne and duke of Lorraine, third son of King Henry I, and brother of Emperor Otto I, was born in 925 at Reims. He was reared at Utrecht for the clergy, and as early as 940 was appointed imperial chancellor by Otto I. He brought order to the chancery and to a higher plain. While engaged in improving his own knowledge he instructed young clerics in person. In 951 he accompanied his brother to Italy, and faithfully remained at his side in battle. In 953 he was appointed archbishop of Cologne, and the following year was made duke of Lorraine to supplant the deposed Conrad who had revolted against his father-in-law, the emperor. Bruno's struggle to overcome the unruly nobles of Lorraine was a very long one. He supported Otto in his imperial rule, and was very influential in Episcopal appointments. He died at Rheims in 965. Bruno was a well-informed statesman, and exercised an important influence upon the education of the clergy].

Odilo (Odiolo), who succeeded Majolo, the pious abbot of Cluny, flourished at this time and was illustrious for his virtues. For sixteen years he governed the monastery. He was the first to found, in Burgundy, a day in commemoration of all the dead, following the day of All Saints; and which was afterward confirmed by Pope John XVI, and ordered to be observed by all the churches. He returned his blessed spirit to God in the Year of Incarnation 1048 on the night of circumcision.

Odilo, was born at Clermont in 962, and was abbot of Cluny in 994. He spread the reforms and rules of the order over almost all the monasteries in France, Italy, and Spain, and founded the feast of All Souls that is celebrated on November 2nd, the day after the feast of All Saints by which the saints and martyrs are commemorated. On the day of All Souls special concession is made for the souls of all the faithful departed.

The "night of circumcision" is also known as The Feast of the Circumcision, a Christian celebration on the eighth day after the birth of Jesus (January 1) of the circumcision of Jesus.

Edward (Eduardus), the king of the English, reigned at this time, and was illustrious for his piety. He was slain through the cunning and envy of his stepmother. As a martyr he was illustrious for his miracles. [Edward, "The Martyr" (c. 963-978), king of England, was the son of Edgar by his first wife Aethelflaed. Edgar's second wife Aelfryth desired to obtain the crown for her son Athelred, but Dunstan upheld Edward's claim, and he was crowned at Kingston in 975. Edwards's brief reign was marked by an anti-monastic reaction. There seems also to have been an attempt to bring the Danes into more direct dependence on the crown by the banishment of Oslac, Earl of Northumbria. In ecclesiastical matters there were two parties in the kingdom, the monastic and anti-monastic, but nothing definite seems to have been decided as to the merit of either. In 978 Edward was assassinated, the crime probably being inspired by his stepmother, who was anxious to secure the succession to Wareham, but later transferred to Shaftsbury. Very shortly after his death Edward was popularly esteemed to be both saint and martyr].

Alpharabius (Alpharahium), a native of Arabia, and a distinguished philosopher, wrote many good works in these times.

Alpharabius (Alfarabi, or Farabi), Abu Nasr Muhammad ibn Tarkhan ul-Farabi, (c. 870-950), one of the great Arabian philosophers, was born of Turkish stock at Farab, Turkistan. He learned Arabic and studied mathematics, medicine, and philosophy at Baghdad. Later he went to the court of Hamdanid Saif Addaula, where he lived a quiet life. He died at Damascus.

Alfarabi's philosophy, which greatly influenced Avicenna and Averroes, is colored with Neoplatonism. God, the unmoved mover possessing necessary existence and absolute perfection, produces the world by the intermediary of the active intellect. As far as man is concerned, this active intellect is the final form and the only immortal part. Alfarabi's epistemology is a naïve realism. By his commentaries he introduced Aristotle to the Arabs. He was also a great musician and wrote a work upon that subject. In all he wrote over one hundred manuscripts, of which only a small number have come down to us.

Louis (Ludovicus) the Fourth, a king of the Franks, and the last of the line of Charles the Great, reigned over the Franks after Lothair (Lotharium). Then followed Hugh (Hugoni), a very strong, knightly man; and Blanca, his spouse, by whom he had no male heir, took over the sovereignty upon Hugh's death. This line still reigns in France to this day. [Louis IV; see note to Otto I, Folio CLXXIX recto].

Theobald, Count of Canusius, of the city of Reggio, a man renowned for his intelligence and celebrated for his writings, was given the city of Ferraria in recognition of his services by Pope John.

Folio CLXXXI verso

Pope John (Ioannes) the Sixteenth, a Roman, began his pontificate in the time of Otto, but after he received the imperial crown. He was a highly learned man, and was compelled to go into exile in Etruria by Crescentius, the Roman senator, who aspired to the rule of the city of Rome. But when the pope asked Emperor Otto to proceed against Crescentius in Italy, Crescentius sent his friend to the pope with the request that he not ask Otto to come, but return to Rome himself, and that he (i.e. Crescentius) would obey him in all things. Accordingly, the pope was moved by the request of his friends to return to Rome, where Crescentius with all the members of the senate and the entire community came forth to meet him, asking pardon and kissing the feet of the pope; and thus he secured forgiveness. He died in the tenth year, sixth month and tenth day of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for six days. [John XVI (Philagathus of Rossano) pope or anti-pope from 997-998, was a Calabrian Greek by birth, and a favorite of the empress Theophano, from whom he received the bishopric of Placentia. In 995 he was sent by Otto III on an embassy to Constantinople to negotiate a marriage with a Greek princess. On his way back he either accidentally or at the special request of Crescentius visited Rome. A little before this, Gregory V, at the end of 996, had been compelled to flee from the city; and Philagathus took the papal tiara from the hands of Crescentius. On Otto's arrival in Rome in the spring of 998, John fled. He was discovered and brought back to Rome, where he was blinded in prison].

Gregory (Gregorius), the fifth of this name, a native of Saxony, formerly called Bruno, was elected pope on account of his blood relationship by the authority of Otto the Third. But while Otto was in Germany he was so persecuted by the Romans, and particularly by Crescentius, the senator, that he fled to Etruria, and soon afterwards to the emperor in Germany. In his absence the Romans elevated Crescentius to a mighty patrician, and Crescentius instituted John (Ioannem), a Greek, as pope. But when Crescentius learned that Emperor Otto was marching upon Rome with a mighty army, he industriously fortified the battlements and gates. Now when the emperor arrived and prepared to storm the city, the Romans, realizing that they would not be able to withstand the power of the emperor, opened the gates to the Germans. Crescentius and John, now finding themselves helpless, fled to the Castle Angelo, and there they cunningly saved themselves from the enemy for some time. And finally, when in the hope of securing pardon, they came out of the castle to go to the emperor, Crescentius received many wounds at the hands of the people; and John was firstly deprived of his sight, then of his pontificate, and finally of his life; and this Gregory, eleven months after he had been driven out, was reinstated. He died in the second year and fifth month of his pontificate. Then the seat was empty for fifteen days. [Gregory V, pope from 996 to 999, a great-grandson of the emperor Otto the Great. Until the council of Pavia (997) his rival was the anti-pope John XVI, whom the people of Rome, in revolt against the will of the youthful emperor Otto III had chosen after having expelled Gregory. The most memorable acts of his pontificate were those arising out of the contumacy of the French king Robert, who submitted after a sentence of excommunication. Gregory died suddenly, and not without suspicion of foul play, on February 18th, 999.]

John (Ioannes) the Seventeenth, as above stated, encumbered the pontificate in the time of Gregory V, through the power and promotion of Crescentius, the Roman senator, whom he influenced with money. This same money he brought with him from Constantinople. And so occurred the twelfth schism between these popes. But it did not last long, for John died in disgrace in the tenth month of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for twenty days. [John XVII, whose original name was Sicco, succeeded Sylvester II as pope on June 13th, 1003, and died December 7th of the same year].

Pope Silvester the Second, a native of Gaul, formerly called Gerbert (Gilbertus), secured the pontificate by evil cunning. While still young he entered a monastery situated in the Aurillac bishopric. But he left said monastery and gave himself over completely to the Devil; and he went to Seville, a city in Spain, to improve his fortune. There he was educated to such an extent that in short time he was regarded as the best instructor; and Emperor Otto and Robert, the king of France, and other highly renowned men became his students. For this reason, through pride and devilish zeal, he secured firstly the archbishopric of Rheims, then that of Ravenna, and finally, with the help of the Devil, the papacy; but upon the condition that upon his death he should belong completely to the Devil. And now he asked the Devil how long he would live. And the Devil answered, If you will not touch Jerusalem you will live for a long time. But when in the fifth year of his pontificate he performed the office of the holy mass on the altar, called Jerusalem, in the Church of the Holy Cross, at Rome, he realized that he must soon die. And he became penitent and acknowledged his mistake before the people, admonishing them to avoid pride and the treachery of the Devil, and to lead good praiseworthy lives. And it was his wish that upon his death his corpse be torn limb from limb, and laid upon a cart, and to bury the remains wherever the unguided horses might draw it. But by the will of God, the horses drew the remains to the Lateran Basilica; and there the corpse was buried, so that evil persons might learn that if they became penitent during life, they would find a haven of forgiveness with God.

Silvester II (Gerbert), pope from 999 to 1003, famous under his original name of Gerbert, first as a teacher and afterwards as an archbishop of Reims and Ravenna, was an Aquitanian by birth, and was educated in the abbey of St. Gerold in Aurillac. When brought before Otto I, Gerbert admitted his skill in all branches of the quadrivium, but lamented his comparative ignorance of logic. He went to continue his studies under Adalbert at Reims, where he seems to have studied and lectured for many years, having among his pupils Robert, afterwards king of France, and Richer. Gerbert's fame spread over Gaul, Germany and Italy. The archbishop of Reims died in 989, designating Gerbert his successor. But the influence of the empress Theophano, mother of Otto III, secured the appointment of Arnulf, a base son of Lothair. The new prelate took the oath of fealty to Hugh Capet, and persuaded Gerbert to remain with him. In 991, Arnulf was convicted of treason and degraded from his office, and Gerbert was elected his successor.

The episcopate of the new metropolitan was marked by a vigor and activity that were felt as far as Tours, Orleans, and Paris. Meanwhile, the friends of Arnulf were active in accession of Gregory V. In any event, Gerbert seems to have left France toward the end of 995, as he was present at Otto's coronation at Rome on May 21, 996. Early in the next year he was elected pope and took the title of Silvester II. Gerbert is generally credited with having fostered the splendid vision of a restored empire that now began to fill Otto's imagination. His dreams for the advancement of the Church and Empire were cut short by the death of Otto III, on February 4th, 1002, followed a year later by the death of the pope himself. He was buried in the Church of St. John Lateran.

Besides being the most distinguished statesman, Gerbert was also the most accomplished scholar of his age. His pupil Richer has left us a detailed account of his system of teaching at Reims. To assist in his lectures on astronomy he constructed elaborate globes of the terrestrial and celestial spheres, on which the course of the planets was marked; for facilitating arithmetical and geometrical processes he constructed an abacus with 27 divisions, and 1000 counters of horn. He is also said to have made a wonderful clock or sundial at Magdeburg. More extraordinary still was his knowledge of music—an accomplishment that seems to have been his earliest recommendation to Otto I. Gerbert's letters contain more than one allusion to organs which he seems to have constructed. We are told that he borrowed from the Arabs the abacus with ciphers. Perhaps Gerbert's greatest claim to the remembrance of posterity is to be found in the care and expense with which he gathered up manuscripts of the classical writers. His love for literature was a passion. Everywhere, at Rome, at Treves, at Gerona in Spain, at Barcelona, he had friends or agents to procure for him copies of the great Latin writers. To the abbot of Tours he writes that he is “laboring assiduously to form a library,” and “throughout Italy, Germany, and Lorraine, is spending vast sums of money in the acquisition of manuscripts.” It is noteworthy, however, that Gerbert never writes for a copy of one of the Christian fathers, his aim being, seemingly, to preserve the fragments of a fast-perishing secular Latin literature. So remarkable a character was that of Gerbert that it left its mark on the age, and fables soon began to cluster around his name, similar to those which in the literature and legend of the 16th century were woven about the name of Faust or Faustus. They involved the belief in the essentially evil character of purely human learning, a principle which has existed every since the triumph of Christianity set divine revelation above human science. Gerbert’s vast erudition, far in advance of his age, cast upon him the suspicion of traffic with the infernal powers; and in due course the tale arose of a compact with the Devil, by which the scholar had obtained the summit of earthly ambition at the cost of his immortal soul. Toward the end of the 11th century Cardinal Benno, the opponent of Hildebrand, is said to have made him the first of a long line of magician popes. William Malmsbury adds a love adventure at Cordova, a compact with Gerbert’s death at Jerusalem—a prophecy fulfilled somewhat as is the case of Henry IV of England, by his dying in the Jerusalem church of Rome—and that imaginative story of the statue with the legend “Strike here,” finds its way into the Gesta Romanorum.

Year of the World 6203 | Year of Christ 1004

John (Ioannes), the eighteenth pope of this name, whose surname and nativity are not known because of his ignoble birth, died in the fourth month and twentieth day of his pontificate. Because of the short period of his pontificate, nothing memorable is written of him, except that during his time many miraculous things appeared presaging future evils, comets were seen, and an earthquake shook many cities. [John XVII (a Roman named Phasianus), pope from 1003 to 1009, was the mere creature of the patrician John Crescentius. He abdicated and retired into a monastery, where he died shortly afterwards. His successor was Sergius IV].

Folio CLXXXII recto

Otto the Third, son of the emperor Otto the Second, and who in the year nine hundred eighty-four succeeded his father in the sovereignty while yet a child, reigned for 18 years. He was not unlike his ancestors in virtue and as a defender of the Roman church. He fought many wars with great praise and renown. But when upon the death of his father, the emperor, daily sessions were held for the election of another emperor, some favored this Otto the Third, while others preferred Henry (Heinricum), duke of Bavaria, nephew of the emperor Otto the First. And the electors were of the opinion that the matters touching Crescentius Numentano should receive attention; and so the Germans who had frequently been at Rome, elected Otto the Third. In order that no uprising might occur, the pope confirmed the choice of the Germans. After Otto had been elected, he consumed 11 years in furthering peace and unity at home, before proceeding to Rome. Afterwards he was consecrated and crowned as emperor by his friendly kinsman, pope Gregory, and went to the Archangel Michael’s on Mount Gorganum, where he took his oath. He then returned to Rome, and from there went to Germany. But the Romans felt great resentment against Pope Gregory because he had crowned Otto as emperor. Through threats Gregory was compelled to follow after Emperor Otto in order to secure his assistance. Thus the emperor proceeded to Rome with a powerful army, as has already been stated under Gregory. Although historians have said little about these last two emperors, yet they were earnest and wonderful men; so that one earned the surname of the Red, or Pale Death of the Saracens, and the other, the surname, Wonder of the World. Now when this emperor Otto the Third had restored peace and tranquility in Italy, and was about to return to Germany, he was poisoned at Rome, and died. His remains were brought to Germany and were buried with his ancestors.

Otto III, surnamed “the Wonder of the World” (mirabilia mundi), was the only son of Otto II by Theophano, daughter of the eastern emperor, Romanus II. He was born 980, and was only three years of age when he succeeded his deceased father. Early in 984 he was seized by Henry II, the Quarrelsome, the deposed duke of Bavaria, who claimed the regency as a member of the reigning house, and probably entertained kingly aspirations for himself. However, due to strong opposition, Henry was compelled to hand over the young king to his mother. Otto’s abilities were carefully cultivated, and Gerbert of Aurillac, archbishop of Reims, was one of his instructors. The regency was in the hands of Theophano until her death, when control passed to a council.

In 995 Otto was declared of age, and in the following year he crossed the Alps and was recognized as king of the Lombards at Pavia. Before he reached Rome, Pope John XV, who had invited him to Italy, died; because of this he raised his own cousin Bruno to the papal chair as Gregory V. By this pontiff Otto was crowned emperor in 996. On his return to Germany Otto learned that Gregory had been driven from Rome, which was again in the power of John Crescentius, patrician of the Romans, and that a new pope, John XVI, had been elected. In 998, Otto led Gregory back to Rome, took the Castle Angelo by storm, and killed Crescentius. Soon afterwards John XVI died, and Otto appointed his former tutor Gerbert, who took the name of Silvester II.

Leaving Italy in the summer preceding the year 1,000, when it was popularly believed the end of the world would come, Otto made a pilgrimage to the tomb of his old friend Adalbert, bishop of Prague, at Gnesen, and raised the city to the dignity of an archbishopric. On his return to Rome, trouble arose between Otto and the citizens, and for three days the emperor was besieged in his palace. After a temporary peace he fled to a monastery near Ravenna. Troops were collected, but while conducting a campaign against the Romans, Otto died in 1002.

Adalbert

Adalbert of Prague was born in 956, of one of the most illustrious families of Bohemia. He was entrusted to his namesake, Adalbert, bishop of Magdeburg. On the death of the bishop in 981 Adalbert returned to Bohemia, and lived in youthful amusements, exercising the profession of arms. When the bishop of Prague died, Otto II appointed him to the vacant see. He was ordained in 982, and he never after smiled, so impressed was he with the responsibility left upon him.

Pope John XIV had been assassinated by order of Crescentius, who had also made away with Benedict VII; and John XV was expelled from Rome. An extraordinary council was convoked by the pope at Reims (995). Hugh Capet, the new French monarch, who planned the foundation of a Gallican church, independent of Rome, had deposed Arnulf, bishop of Reims. The German bishops and the pope condemned Hugh for this, and he was compelled to yield. The pope died the following year, and the emperor marched into Italy for the purpose of regulating the affairs of the church. Crescentius was speedily overcome and Otto placed the papal tiara on the head of Bruno, who assumed the name of Gregory V. Adalbert came from Prague to witness the ceremony, and Gerbert, one of the most profound reasoners of the age, was also present.

Adalbert was sadly disappointed in his efforts to reform the barbarous people of Bohemia, resigned his see, and retired into the peace of a cloister at Rome. But Gregory would not suffer him to shrink from his charge, and Adalbert again started for Prague. The Bohemians hearing of his intended return, massacred his family and burnt their castles. Finding it impossible to re-enter Prague, he went north to preach to the pagans in Prussia; and there he was slain by a party of Wends, near Danzig. His relics are venerated in the cathedral of Gnesen.

, born of noble Bohemian ancestry, was at this time in consideration of his extraordinary and distinguished piety and teaching, made bishop as successor to Dietmar (Ditimarum), and as bishop of Prague, was held in great veneration and esteem. But as he was not able to govern a people accustomed to rapine and adultery, he went to Rome and remained with his brother Gaudentius in the monastery of Saint Alexius until the pope ordered him to return to his flock. As this, however, was not acceptable to him, he went to Hungary and induced King Stephen and almost all the people in Hungary to submit to holy Christian baptism. He then went to Poland, and requested his brother Gaudentius to preach and make known the Gospel at the church in Gnesen. Finally he traveled to the people of Prussia, and while he was diligently expounding the Christian Gospel there, he was slain by the sword. In his honor Saint Stephen, the king, founded the archiepiscopal church at Gran (Strigoniensem). [Gran, a city on the Danube in Hungary; and archiepiscopate].

Malatesta, the ancient royal family, at this time came to Italy from Germany, and was very helpful to the Roman Empire against the tyrants. For this service emperor Otto the Third gave this family the city of Arriminum as a fief, and endowed it with great liberties and privileges. From this house afterwards came many illustrious highly renowned princes and distinguished men of valor.

Wolfgang, the 11th bishop of Regensburg, was a Swabian, born of noble ancestors. He was learned in rhetoric and oratory. He was very intimate with the archbishop Henry (Heinrico) of Trier. He was a schoolmaster there, and was later consecrated and elected deacon. After the death of the archbishop at Rome, he was for some time attached to Bruno, the archbishop of Cologne. Afterwards he left the world and entered upon a monastic life. Saint Ulrich, bishop of Augsburg, consecrated him as a priest. Later, with the consent and permission of his abbot, he went forth to preach in Noricum, toward the east, in Pannonia, and to Austria and Hungary. There he lived the life of a hermit in all piety. Afterwards Pilgrim (Pilgrini), bishop of Passau, and Emperor Otto the Second appointed him bishop of Regensburg. For 26 years he governed this church in all virtue, and performed many miracles. He died in blessedness in the year 994. Duke Saint Henry of Bavaria once came to the grave of Saint Wolfgang to perform his devotions; and there he found written two words: After Sixes. He thought that this meant that he would die in six years, six months, six days. But after the expiration of that period he was crowned as Roman king. Therefore he thanked God and Saint Wolfgang. And he was famous for innumerable other miracles.

Wolfgang, a native of Swabia, was educated in Reichenau, in the Lake of Constance, where he contracted a warm friendship with Henry, afterwards bishop of Treves. He accompanied Henry to Würzburg to finish his studies. He received priest's orders from Ulrich of Augsburg, and at once went to Pilgrim, bishop of Passau, and offered himself for work in Pannonia. He was recalled from there in 972 to fill the vacant see of Regensburg, which Otto conferred on him. He at once set to work to remedy abuses in the religious houses and to institute necessary reforms. He allowed Bohemia to be cut off from his diocese and constituted into another see, and Dietmar, abbot of Magdeburg, was appointed first bishop of Prague (973).

Wolfgang, after a life spent in good works, fell ill on his way to Pechlava in Lower Austria, and died in 994. His body was brought back to Regensburg and placed in the church of St. Emeran. According to a popular tradition, when Wolfgang entered Regensburg, he asked the people whether they would rather have his body or his miracles, after his death. They elected to have his body, as, without that, they thought they could not have miracles. They have his body, but no miracles are wrought by it, whereas, in other churches dedicated to him, miracles are believed to be wrought by his intercessions.

The last two sentences in this paragraph are not in the German edition of the chronicle.

ILLUSTRATION

Wolfgang, Bishop of Regensburg, is represented by a special portrait. He appears in Episcopal vestments, a crozier in his right hand, a model of a church (probably the church at Regensburg, which he governed from 26 years) resting on his left arm.

Ratherius (Racherius), a bishop of Verona, and formerly a monk, and a highly learned man, wrote on many subjects, and uprooted the so-called Anthropomorphic heresies. Through boorish ignorance those heretics held that God has human attributes, being ignorant of the words of the Lord that the Holy Spirit is an incorporeal God.

Dunstan, bishop of Canterbury, was illustrious at this time for his piety and great miracles, and founded many monasteries. In the days of his approaching death he learned from the angels the antiphon, King of Nations and Ruler of Them. [Dunstan (909-988), English archbishop and son of a noble, was born near Glastonbury. He entered the household of King Aethelstan, but his love of books and of song, and his mechanical skill soon excited the dislike of his kinsfolk at the court. Accused of practicing the black arts, he took refuge with his kinsman, Alphege, bishop of Winchester, whose persuasion, seconded by a serious illness, induced him to become a monk. Dunstan then lived as a hermit near the old church of St. Mary until Aethelstan's successor, Edmund, recalled him as one of his counselors. His enemies again procured his expulsion; but about 943 Edmund revoked the sentence and made Dunstan abbot of Glastonbury. Under him the abbey became a famous school, monastic life was revived, and St. Peter's re-erected, and the administration of the realm was largely in the control of Dunstan, who sought to establish royal authority, to conciliate the secular clergy and the laity. In 960, after having been the bishop of London, he became archbishop of Canterbury. In the same year Edgar became sole king of England. When Edgar died in 975, Dunstan secured the crown for Edgar's elder son Edward, who was murdered three years later. On the accession of Aethelred, Dunstan's public career ended. He died at Canterbury in 988].

Edgar (Etgarius), an English king and a very Christian man, ruled over the English for 9 years after his father Aethelstan (Echelstanum). Of him we read that among other works he built a monastery nearly every year. [Edgar, English king (944-975), was the younger son of Edmund the Magnificent. When he became king he immediately recalled Dunstan from exile and made him first bishop of Worcester, and then of London. In 960, Dunstan was translated to Canterbury, and throughout Edgar's reign he was his adviser, and to him must be attributed much of the peace and prosperity of this time. Edgar and Dunstan were alike determined to reform the great monastic houses, to restore them to their true owners and to remove them from the lax discipline of the secular priests. The coronation of Edgar was delayed for 7 years because he had violated a nun, and he was not crowned until 973. He died in 975, after a vigorous rule and the pursuit of a statesmanlike policy].

Adeobald (Adeobaldus), bishop of Utrecht, was also renowned in these times for his skill and his pious life. He wrote much in praise of the Virgin Mary and the Holy Cross.

Theodoric, seventh bishop of Metz, was a holy man, and ordered many relics to be brought to him from Italy. After concluding a holy life, he finally went to his rest.

Hatto, archbishop of Mainz, and formerly an abbot at Fulda, is said to have been consumed by mice on the Rhine, because in a time of famine he assembled a great number of the poor in a stable or barn, as though he were about to give them alms, but ordered them to be burned. The mice also gnawed his name from the walls and the tapestries. [Hatto. For Hatto I, see Folio CLXXIV recto. The text here, however, probably refers to Archbishop Hatto II of Mainz (968-970). However, the old legend of the Mouse-tower on the Rhine is told of both bishops. The most common version, found in Wikipedia (as of August 2008), is as follows:]

Odo, bishop of Canterbury, was also celebrated at this time for his holy life. Likewise Anfridus (Aufridus) of Utrecht, and Gerhard (Gerhardus), bishop of Camera.

The following abbots all flourished in virtue and piety at this time: William (Guilhelmus), Richard, Popo, Ostertus and Berno.

In Vasconia appeared a miraculous creature, with two heads, the body divided from the navel up. It also had two chests; and when one head ate, the other slept. [Vasconia. See note on Folio CLXVIII recto].

Hugh (Hugo) the Great, surnamed Capet, upon the death of King Louis (Ludovico) of France, received the kingdom through the same lineage. He and his spouse reigned together for four years. Some say he was a count or duke of Paris, and that his father was a butcher. But in his time France was not in the ascendancy, as when Pepin and the other kings reigned; for formerly all of Gaul beyond the mountains, Austrasia, and a large part of Germany belonged to France. But when the sovereignty devolved upon the Saxons, not only Germany and Switzerland, but also a large part of the Netherlands, and Burgundy also, became part of the empire.

Hugh Capet (c. 938-996), king of France and founder of the Capetian dynasty, was the oldest son of Hugh the Great. When his father died in 956, he succeeded to his numerous fiefs around Paris and Orleans, and his cousin, the Frankish king Lothair, recognized him somewhat reluctantly as duke of the Franks. Many of the counts of northern France did homage to him as overlord, and Richard I, duke of Normandy, was both his vassal and his brother-in-law. Hugh supported his royal suzerain when Lothair and the emperor Otto II fought for the possession of Lorraine; but chagrined at the king's conduct in making peace in 980, he went to Rome to conclude an alliance with Otto. Laying more stress upon independence than upon loyalty, Hugh appears to have acted in a haughty manner towards Lothair, and also toward his son and successor, Louis V; but neither king was strong enough to punish this powerful vassal. When Louis V died childless in 987, Hugh and the late king's uncle Charles, duke of Lower Lorraine, were candidates for the vacant throne, and in this contest Hugh was victorious. He was crowned in the same year.

The authority of the new king was quickly recognized in his kingdom, but he was compelled to purchase the allegiance of some of the great nobles by grants of royal lands, and he was hardly more powerful as king than he had been as duke. Moreover, Charles of Lorraine was not prepared to bow before his successful rival, and before Hugh had secured the coronation of his son Robert as his colleague and successor, he had found allies and attacked the king. But through treachery Charles was seized and handed over to the king. This virtually ended the war; but one of the side issues was a quarrel between Hugh and Pope John XV, who was supported by the empire, then under the rule of the empress Adelaide and Theophano as regents for the young emperor Otto III. In 987 the king appointed to the vacant archbishopric of Reims a certain Arnulf, who at once proved himself a traitor to Hugh and a friend of Charles of Lorraine. In 991, at the instance of the king, the French bishops deposed Arnulf and elected Gerbert in his stead, a proceeding which was displeasing to the pope, who excommunicated the new bishop and his partisans. Hugh and his bishops remained firm, and the dispute was still in progress when the king died at Paris in 996.

Hugh was a devoted son of the Church to which he owed his throne. The origin of Hugh's surname of Capet, which was also applied to his father, is undoubtedly derived from the Latin capa, cappa, or caps, but whether Hugh received it from the cape which he wore as abbot of St. Martin's of Tours, or from his youthful and playful habit of seizing caps, or some other cause, is uncertain.

Imperial power and royal might were not introduced for the common good through the power of nature alone, but also through the Savior, our Lord Jesus Christ, Son of God, in whose hands all kingdoms of the world were confirmed by word and deed; and by the time that all countries had been defined, he desired to be born. And he endured the taxes of Augustus, and paid tribute for himself and for Peter. When he was asked whether it was becoming to pay tribute to the emperor, and was shown the coin, he said, Give unto Caesar what is Caesar's, and unto God what is God's. And so the holy Ambrosius says, If the emperor desires tribute, we are not opposed to him, the property of the church, and all farms and fields shall pay it. And so emperor Justinian says that his power was given him by heavenly majesty. Likewise, among the clergy, all patriarchs, primates, and other bishops and prelates are subject to the Roman pope, although at times the Greeks gainsaid this; and the unfaithful sect of the Hussites also gainsaid it. And so it is clear that all laymen are subject to the Roman emperor. The following illustration shows how the election of the emperor was secured upon strong foundations after considering the weakness of empire and the uncertainties of the future. In consequence the highest imperial power was maintained longer among the Germans than elsewhere; and so it appears that he who excelled all others in virtue and worthiness, should also be placed above them. So Pope Gregory the Fifth, with the consent of Emperor Otto, established and ordained the election of an emperor, which has been observed from that time to our own. And so it is proper for the Germans alone to elect an emperor, who is called Caesar and king of the Romans, and is considered an emperor and an Augustus, if the pope should confirm him. As all the people and princes from time to time receive benefits from the emperor, as from a lord of the world, they are justly obligated to him as obedient subjects. And although some refused to obey the Roman Empire, yet after the monarchy of Augustus Octavian, no one was so foolhardy or obstinate as to dare to call himself ruler of the world and prince of all the earth, except under the title of Roman king. Now to demonstrate the wickedness of those who say they are under no obligation to the Roman Empire, but are free of it: Although their opposition may be overcome by arms rather than law, so that they may be compelled to acknowledge themselves subservient under the law, of which they regard themselves as free, it is to be noted that all those who deny being under the yoke of the emperor, say they attained such liberty either through choice or by worthy deeds or singular virtues. But since the Roman Empire was established by God over all the people in this world, it is to be recognized as a clear matter of right, and no one should hold reservations in the matter nor endanger the same. It must be admitted that such liberties as take away the highest authority, are unseemly and impotent; for out of those arise discord, robbery, murder, and wars, where there is no supreme power, which according to the order of justice, may regulate such wars. But when we live under a single head, all obedient to the same ruler, acknowledging a single prince in worldly affairs, peace will flourish over all the earth, and we adapt ourselves to better and sweeter harmony. This is shown by the fact that from the beginning of the world to the present there never has been universal peace, except when as one celestial empire the world flourished under the sole rule of the emperor Augustus; which happened to the honor of Christ our Savior, who assumed our human attributes. And so it should suffice that the divine Architect of the world, showed us the means of securing peace with all the world under a single ruler. And although we do not deny that the might and authority of the kings and princes are great, yet we also say that they are all subject to the Roman Empire, and should therefore be subservient to it, rendering the same obedience to the Roman emperor that they require of their subjects.

When Roman imperial sovereignty devolved upon the Germans (Alemannos), it became founded upon a stronger foundation, consisting of four pillars, namely four dukes, four margraves, four landgraves, four burgraves, four counts, four barons, four freemen, four knights, four cities, four villages and country estates, as the following design illustrates.

OF THE INSTITUTION OF THE ELECTORS OF THE EMPIRE.

The Foundation of the Holy Roman Empire, according to the Latin and German editions of the Chronicle, and this English translation of it, consisted of the following:

quatuor duces	vier herzogen	four dukes
quatuor marchiones	vier marggrafen	four margraves
quatuor landgravii	vier lantgrafen	four landgraves
quatuor burgravii	vier burggrafen	four burgraves
quatuor comites	vier grafen	four counts
quatuor barones	vier panzerherren	four barons quatuor liberi	vier freien (Freiherrn)	four freemen
quatuor milites	vier ritter	four knights quatuor civitates	vier stett (stätte)	four cities
quatuor villae	vier dorffer	four villages
quatuor rustici	vier pawrn (bauern?)	four country estates

The double-page woodcut that follows illustrates all of these except the four barons (quatuor barones), which were probably omitted for want of space.

ILLUSTRATION

THE ELECTORS OF THE HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE

This full double-page illustration is among the finest woodcuts in the Nuremburg Chronicle. It represents the German Kaiser as head of the Holy Roman Empire, together with his seven electors (Kurfuersten), three spiritual and four secular. The absence of the emperors from Germany, and the long struggle with the popes, resulted in a serious loss of their power as kings of Germany. By neglecting their duties as German kings, and exerting their main efforts for the empire, the emperors allowed the German princes to seize gradually all the privileges of the German crown and to make themselves practically independent. The German princes had always refused to permit the German crown to be made hereditary and, in the thirteenth century, a change was made in the mode of electing the sovereign. The privilege was vested in the seven electors—three spiritual and four secular princes. The three spiritual electors were the archbishops of Mainz, Cologne, and Treves (Trier)—all in the west of Germany. The four secular princes were the Duke of Saxony, the Margrave of Brandenburg, the Palsgrave of the Rhine, and the King of Bohemia. These seven ranked above all the other German princes, and constituted a separate college in the German Diet. The popes claimed the right to revise the action of the electors and to reject any candidate they considered unsuitable; and this right was usually acknowledged. The king of Germany had the right to the imperial crown, which could be conferred on him by the pope alone. The plan had its origin in a number of conditions. For some time the German kings had again and again left a minor as successor to the throne, or no heir at all. And thus the principle of heredity had begun to fail. Again, the monarchy, which must not be the appanage of any single tribe, but must circulate, as it were, from Franconian to Saxon, Saxon to Bavarian, etc. Finally the fact that German kings were also Roman emperors consolidated the growing tendency toward the elective principle. The principle of heredity had never held any great sway under the Roman Empire; and the medieval empire, instituted as it was by the papacy, came definitely under the influences of the church, favoring election. Heredity might be tolerated in a mere matter of kingship but the precious trust of imperial power could not be allowed to descend according to the accidents of family succession.

The right of the election of the German king rested with these electors until the beginning of the nineteenth century, and as early as the fourteenth century their position, both individually and as a corporate body, had become definite and precise. Individually they were distinguished from all other princes by the indivisibility of their territories and by the custom of primogeniture, which secured that indivisibility; and they were still further distinguished by the fact that their person, like that of the emperor himself, was protected by the law against treason, while their territories were subject only to the jurisdiction of their own courts.

Another important feature of this period was the growth of the German towns; for as the great duchies fell into decay, the towns that had been dependent upon them became independent, although they acknowledged the emperor's supremacy; and they were therefore called 'free imperial cities.' The deputies of these cities at length constituted a third college in the imperial diet, and voted on an equality with the lectors and princes. The free cities usually supported the king's authority, but were almost constantly at war with the German nobles and bishops. For mutual protection against their enemies, the free cities organized leagues or confederations, the most celebrated being the League of the Rhine in Western Germany, and the Hanseatic League in Northern Germany. Worms, Spire, Mainz, Strasbourg, Basle, and others belong to the former; Hamburg, Bremen, Riga, and eighty other commercial cities, to the latter; and they maintained fleets and armies.

According to Schedel, when the Roman imperial sovereignty devolved upon the Germans, it became founded on a strong foundation, consisting of four pillars, namely four dukes, four margraves, four landgraves, four burgraves, etc, according to this illustration. The German burggraf is the chief of the castle or fortified town, the term corresponding in the general sense to the chatelain. Landgrave (Landgraf) is a German title of nobility, surviving from the times of the Holy Roman Empire. The term originally signified a count (graf) of unusual power or dignity. In later times it was born by the sovereign of Hesse-Homburg, the heads of the various branches of the house of Hesse, and by a branch of the family of Fürstenberg. Margrave (Markgraf) is a German title meaning "count of the March." The margraves had their origin in the counts established by Charlemagne and his successors to guard the frontier districts of the empire, and for centuries the title was associated with this function. But it lost its original significance, and was born by princes whose territories were in no sense frontier districts.

The illustration may be analyzed as follows:

(A) First Row

Center: The 'glorious' emperor (Latin Imperator gloriosus) in imperial robes with orb and scepter is seated on his throne. At his feet is a shield emblazoned with the black imperial double eagle in a field of gold. The throne rests on a dais supported by "Four Pillars" representing the Four Dukedoms (Latin Duces) of Swabia, Braunschweig, Palatine, and Lorraine. Each pillar is faced with a coat of arms: That of Swabia is emblazoned with three black crowned lions in a field of gold; that of Braunschweig with two golden leopards in a red field; that of Palatine with a golden lion in a black field; while Lorraine has three maimed silver eagles on a red diagonal bar crossing a field of gold.

On the left: The three spiritual (Latin Spirituales) princes, each in a voluminous robe, sable cape, and sable cap:

1. Archbishop of Treves (Trier). In his left hand he holds a document with pendant seals, probably his authority or commission as an elector. A shield with red cross rests at his feet; field silver.
2. Archbishop of Cologne. He is looking down upon a document held in both hands. A shield with a lack cross stands at his feet; field silver.
3. Archbishop of Mainz, holding a scroll in his left hand, also probably emblematical of his commission. A shield emblazoned with a wheel rests on his feet; wheel silver; field, red.

NOTE: Although the composition of the electoral body was uncertain in the beginning, the Golden Bull of 1356 settled the disputed questions. After 1356 the seven electors are regularly the three Rhenish archbishops, Mainz, Cologne, and Trier, and the four lay magnets mentioned afterwards in these notes; the three former being vested with the three arch-chancellorships, and the latter with the four offices of the royal household.

On the right are the four secular (Latin Seculares) princes:

1. King of Bohemia in royal robes, crowned, scepter in hand. With his right hand he is extending to the emperor a huge cup or goblet, emblematic of his theoretical office of Schenk (or cup-bearer) in the imperial household. At his feet, a shield emblazoned with a crowned lion with a forked tail, rampant, lion, silver (crown, tongue and paws in gold); field red.
2. Rhenish Phalzgraf or Count Palatine, in robe, sable cape and cap. He carries a table service, covered with a napkin, symbolic of his theoretical office of Truchsesz (or steward). At his feet is a shield with a crowned lion rampant; which faces left; lion in gold (red crown) in black field.
3. Duke of Saxony, also in embroidered robe, sable cape and cap. He carries a long sword, symbolic of his theoretical office of Marshall in the emperor's household. Coat of arms: ten horizontal bars, alternately gold and black, beginning with gold; Rautenkranz, in green, diagonally superimposed.
4. Margrave of Brandenburg, likewise clad. He holds a large key, emblematical of his theoretical office of Kämmerer, or chamberlain, in the imperial household. At his feet, a shield emblazoned with an eagle, wings outspread; eagle red, field silver.

(B) Second Row

On the left: The four Margraves (Latin, Quatuor marchides), represented by four long-haired, beardless youths in short jackets, tight hose, and pointed shoes. Their limbs are in various positions of activity, as though about to "dance attendance" upon the emperor. Each holds a shield. The margraviates represented are:

1. Meissen (Misne), one of the most ancient towns of Saxony, and the seat of the margraves of that town down to 1090. Meissen is situated at the influx of the Triebisch and the Meise into the Elbe. Arms: Black lion (should face right) in field of gold.
2. Moravia (Moravie), also called 'The March of Morava,' frontier of Austria and Hungary. The earliest recorded inhabitants of Moravia were the Boii, who are remembered today in the name of Bohemia. These were succeeded about 15 BCE by the Germanic Quadi, a Suabian tribe. The Germanic races were pushed back from the Middle Danube with the coming of the Avars in 567 CE. The exact date of the arrival of the Slavs in Moravia, as in Bohemia, is uncertain, but by the end of the 8th century Moravia was filled with Slavonic settlers who took the name of Moravians (German Mähren) from the river Morava. When Charlemagne destroyed the Avar empire, about 796, Moravia became tributary to the German empire. After being long disputed between Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia, Moravia was incorporated in Bohemia in 1029, thus becoming part of the German empire. In 1182, it was made a separate margravate. In 1918, Moravia became part of the Czech Republic in 1993. Arms: Crowned eagle (should face left), checkered red and gold; blue field.

3. Baden (Padue), a republic lying in southwestern Germany, bounded by Bavaria and Hesse on the north, the Rhine on the west, Switzerland on the south, and by Württemberg and part of Bavaria on the east. The history of Baden as a State began in 1112, when Hermann, grandson of Bertold, duke of Carinthia and count of Zähringen assumed the title of Margrave of Baden. At the time the Chronicle was written Baden was still ruled by a margrave. The city of Baden (also called Baden-Baden) was known for the efficacy of its waters even in the early Roman days. The name Aurelia Aquensis was given it in honor of Aurelius Severus. For six centuries it was the seat of the margraves, of whom Henry IV, who died at the Crusades in 1190, first resided in the old castle. The new castle, above the town, was created by the Margrave Christopher, who died in 1527. Both town and castle suffered severely in the Thirty Years' War, and the War of the Palatinate in 1689, and the margraves soon thereafter transferred their residence to Rastatt. Arms: Diagonal red bar in field of gold.
4. Brandenburg, on the Havel, occupies the site of Brennaber, a stronghold of the Slavonic Helvelli, which was taken by the emperor Henry I in 927. It afterwards fell into the hands of the Wends, it was taken in 1153 by Albert the Bear, Count of Ascania, who from that point on styled himself Margrave of Brandenburg. The town was the seat of an Episcopal see (949-1544), and was long the chief place in the Mark. Arms: Red eagle in silver field.

In the center are the four burgraves (Latin, Quatuor Burgravii)—bust portraits, each with a shield.

1. Magdeburg (Meidburg, or Maidburg), a capital of the Prussian province of Saxony. It was a small trading settlement in the ninth century and owed its prosperity to Otto the Great. (See Folios CLXXIX verso and CLXXX recto, and notes.) Shield: Divided vertically: left, 8 horizontal bars alternately red and silver; right, red eagle in silver field.
2. Nuremberg (see Folios C verso and CI recto). The first authentic mention of Nuremberg occurs in a document dated 1050, at which time it received permission of the emperor to establish a mint and market. In 1127 the emperor Lothair took it from the duke of Swabia and assigned it to the duke of Bavaria. An imperial officer, styled the burgrave of Nuremberg received the rights of a free imperial city. In 1806 it was annexed to Bavaria. Arms of the burgrave: Black lion in field of gold.
3. Rieneck (Renech). On the boundary of East and Rhenish Franconia arose a house—the counts of Rieneck. The first of the line was Gerhard, who probably took over or purchased the barony of Rieneck, which Otto III had given to the bishopric of Würzburg. Through marriage of his daughter (who had the right of inheritance) with Count Arnold of Los it passed to the Lorraine family. The counts of Rieneck were hereditary stewards of the high bishopric of Würzburg. Arms: Nine horizontal bars alternately red and gold. The Bavarian city of Rieneck, on the Sinn, Lower Franconia, was formerly the Earldom of Rieneck, which became extinct in 1559.
4. Stromberg (Strumburg). The name of a city in Prussia, near Bingen. The ruined castle of Goldenfels rises on a height. Beyond the village are the extensive ruins of the Fustenburg. Arms: Divided horizontally: upper half, three crows or black birds in a silver field; lower half, red.

On the right, the four landgraves (Latin, Quatuor Landgravii), long-haired beardless youths in short jackets, tight hose, and pointed shoes, “dancing attendance” on the emperor:

1. Thuringia (Dürgen), at one time ruled by landgraves. Arms: Same as Hesse, which follows:
2. Hesse (Hassie). The heads of the various branches of this house once bore the title of landgrave. Arms: Double-tailed crowned lion striped alternately in cross-bars of red and silver, in a blue field.
3. Leuchtenberg, formerly a landgraviate in Operphalz, in Nordgau, on the river Rab. It has its name from the landgraves whose ancestral seat was in the mountain castle of Leuchtenberg. Arms: Three horizontal bars of blue, silver, and blue.
4. Alsace, which in the 5th and 6th centuries had become a purely German country in consequence of the invasions and penetrations of the Alemanni. As a portion of the duchy of Swabia or Alemanni, it formed a part of the Germanic world from 870 or 887 to 1648, or seven and one-half centuries. Arms: Diagonal golden bar (embroidered edges) in red field.

(C) Third Row

On the left are the Four Freemen (Latin, Quatuor Liberi), represented by bust portraits, each with a shield.

1. Limburg (Limperg), a town in the Prussian province of Hesse-Nassau, on the Lahn, here crossed by a bridge dating from 1315, and on the main railway line from Coblenz to Lollar and Cassel; seat of a Roman Catholic bishop. The cathedral was founded in the 10th century and consecrated in 1235. It flourished during the Middle Ages and had its own line of counts until 1414 when it was purchased by the elector of Trier. It passed to Nassau in 1803. Arms quartered: upper left and lower right serrated (four points), upper red, lower silver (Franken). Upper right and lower left fields blue, with 5 silver battle-clubs (Limburg).
2. Tüsis—may have some relation to Thusis (Roman Tuseun), a marketplace in the Swiss canton of Graubünden; principal town of the district of Heizenberg, at the mouth of the Nolla; near it is the ruin of Burg Hohen Raetien. Arms: Single eagle, facing right, in plain field.
3. Westerburg. An old noble family of counts, whose house later became known as that of Leiningen-Westerburg. Arms quartered by a cross; 5 crosslets in each quarter.
4. Aldenwalden, -- not identified. Arms: Crowned and collared lion rampant in plain field.

In the center are the four knights (Latin, Quatuor milites) represented by another group of four young men in short jackets, tight hose and pointed shoes, performing steps resembling a dance. Each holds a shield:

1. Andlau (Andelau). Small town about ten miles north of Schlettstadt, on the river Andlau, in the Rhine country. It has Romanesque Abbey Church of the 12th century, with Gothic additions. The crypt (11th century) is borne by pillars. Arms: Red cross in field of gold.
2. Meldingen. Arms: Red diagonal bar (with two golden eagles) in field of gold.
3. Strück. Arms: Red lion rampant, in silver field.
4. Frauenberg, the name of a city in Prussia, which received the rights of a town in 1310. The celebrated astronomer, Copernicus, died here as a canon in 1543. Arms divided vertically into three bars, red, silver, and red.

On the right are four counts (Latin, Quatuor comites), represented by bust portraits, each holding a shield:

1. Schwartzburg, a town in Thuringia; seat of an old house of the same name. Arms: Golden lion rampant (should face left) in blue field.
2. Cleve, or Cleves (here called Klefen), a town of Germany, in the Prussian Rhine provinces, formerly a capital of the duchy of the same name, 46 miles northwest of Düsseldorf. It was the seat of the counts of Cleve as early as the 11th century, but did not receive municipal rights until 1242. The duchy, which lay on both sides of the Rhine, passed in 1368 to the counts of LaMarck, and was made a duchy in 1417. By the treaty of Xanten, in 1614, Cleve passed to the elector of Brandenburg, being afterward incorporated with the electorate by the elector Frederick William. The part of the duchy on the left bank of the Rhine was ceded to France in 1795, the remaining portion in 1805. In 1815, it was restored to Prussia, except a small portion given to Holland. The old castle of Schwanenburg is associated with the "Knights of the Swan," immortalized in Wagner's opera Lohengrin. Arms: small blue shield surmounted with a golden lily-reel in red field.
3. Cilli (Zilie) is situated in Styria (Steiermark). It lies picturesquely with remains of walls and towers on the river Saan, on the Austrian frontier. Probably a Celtic settlement, the Romans took it in 15 BCE, and Claudius made it a Roman municipium in 50 CE, naming it Claudia (Slovene, Celeja). It prospered greatly, and its temple of Mars was widely famed. Its museum contains many Roman remains and the Roman sewage system was rediscovered in the second half of the 19th century and is now in use. It was incorporated with Aquileia under Constantine, and was destroyed by Slavs at the end of the 6th century. The counts of Cilli, at one time in authority in Croatia, at another in Bosnia, had their castle, Ober Cilli on the Schlossberg (1320 feet) southeast of the town. Its ruins, the Cilli throne, and the family tomb remain. Under the Cilli (1350-1455) the town prospered; on their extinction it became subject to Austria. The standing of the house of Cilli was enhanced through the espousal of Barbara of Cilli by the emperor Sigismund. The house died out in 1456 with Ulrich III; whereupon the city, burg and surroundings passed to the house of Austria.

Ulrich III was born in 1406, the son of Frederick II, count of Cilli, and Elizabeth Frangepan. About 1432 he married Catherine, daughter of George Brankovich, despot of Serbia. His influence in the troubled affairs of Hungary and the Empire, of which he was made a prince by the Emperor Sigismund in 1436, led to feuds with the Hapsburgs, the overlords of Cilli. Finally he made an alliance with the Hapsburg king Albert II, and after his death in 1439 Ulrich took up the cause of his widow, Elizabeth, and presided at the coronation of her infant son Ladislaus V, Posthumus (1440). A feud with Hunyadi followed, embittered by Janos Hunyadi's attack on George Brankovich of Serbia (1444) on his refusal to recognize Ulrich's claim to Bosnia on the death of Stephen Tvrtko (1443). In 1446 Hunyadi, then governor of Hungary, harried the Cilli territories in Croatia-Slavonia; but his power was broken at Kosovo (1448), and Count Ulrich was able to lead a successful crusade, nominally in the Hapsburg interest, into Hungary in 1450. In 1452, he forced the emperor Frederick III to hand over the boy king Ladislaus V to his keeping, and thus became virtual ruler of Hungary, of which he was named lieutenant by Ladislaus in 1456. The Hunyadis now conspired to destroy him. On November 8th, in spite of warnings, he entered Belgrade with the king; the next day he was attacked by Laszlo Hunyadi and his friends, and put to death; and so ended the male line of the counts of Cilli.

Arms: Quartered shield; left upper and right lower quarters, 3 golden stars in blue field. Right upper and left lower quarters, 4 horizontal bars, alternately red and silver.

4. Savoy (here called Sopheii); a house which ruled over Savoy and Piedmont for nine centuries, and now reigns over the kingdom of Italy. The name Savoy (Sabaudia) was known to the Romans. In the fifth century the territory was conquered by the Burgundians, forming part of their kingdom. Nearly a century later it was occupied by the Franks. It was included in Charlemagne's empire, and was divided by him into countries, which evolved into hereditary fiefs. On the dissolution of the Carolingian monarchy, the Burgundian kingdom revived, and Savoy was again absorbed in it as a part of Lower Burgundy, which in 933 was united with Upper Burgundy. After the collapse of that monarchy, its territories passed to the German kings (1032).

The name Sabaudia is preserved in Saboia or Savoy. Sabaudia extended northward into the country of the Helvetii and southward into the territory of the Allobroges, a Gallic people whose lands lay on the east side of the Rhone.

Arms: Silver cross in red field.

The Heraldry of the German Electoral College

(A) The First Woodcut

First Row

Center: The Emperors Shield is emblazoned with a double eagle, representative of his dual office as King of Germany and of Roman emperor. Since 1335 the double eagle appeared sporadically as a symbol of the Roman-German Empire, and under Emperor Sigmund, who died in 1447, it was made the permanent emblem of the Roman Empire, while the king, before he was crowned emperor, employed a single eagle.

Color: A double eagle in black, on a field of gold.

The Dukes' Shields:

1. Swabia (Suevie). Three lions above one another. Color: Three black lions in a field of gold.
2. Braunschweig (Pruusueig). Two leopards above one another. Color: Two golden leopards in a red field.
3. Palatinate (?). A lion rampant. Color: A golden lion with red crown, in a black field.
4. Lorraine (Lothiring?). On a diagonal bar three maimed eagles. Maimed birds are a specialty in European heraldry. Eagles without feet, and often without bills, are called "alerions;" maimed ducks, cannets; and the maimed black thrush is called a "martlet," – a name given to any imaginary bird without legs. Color: In a field of gold a diagonal red bar with three maimed silver eagles.

1. Trier (Spiritualis Treverensis). Red cross in a silver field.
2. Cologne (Spiritualis Coloniensis). Black cross in a silver field.
3. Mainz (Spiritualis Maguntinus). Silver wagon-wheel in red field.

Right: The Shields of the Secular Princes, with colors:

1. King of Bohemia (Rex Bohemie). Red field emblazoned with a crowned lion rampant, forked tail, the lion in silver, but the crown, tongue, and paws in gold. Lion should face right.
2. Rhenish Palgrave (Palatinus Remi). A black field emblazoned with a golden double-tailed lion with red crown. Same as Palatinate (below).
3. Duke of Saxony (Dux Saxonie). Over a field of nine horizontal stripes, alternately black and gold, is imposed an oblique foliated green bar (its upper edge, only), ornamented on the upper edge only, with crown-like leaves. In heraldry this bar is called the "Rautenkranz." The Raute or Ruta is a shrub indigenous to the Eastern Hemisphere. The best known variety is found in Southern Europe and North Africa—small abundant and cultivated shrub with many thorny branches and yellowish green flowers, rich in oil (Oleum Ruta) of a balsamic, somewhat offensive odor, and bitter aromatic taste. The fresh leaves are much used, being cut fine and strewn on buttered bread as a stomach-invigorating specific.
4. Margrave of Brandenburg (Marchio Branden). A silver field, emblazoned with a red eagle, crowned with the cap of the elector; scepter and sword in its talons. Clover branches superimposed on the wings.

Second Row

Center: The Shields of The Burgraves, with colors:

2. Nuremberg. Arms of the burgrave, a black lion rampant, in a field of gold; the lion should face left, and not right.
3. Rieneck (Renech). Nine horizontal bars, alternately gold and red, beginning with gold.

3. Leuchtenberg. Shield is divided into three horizontal bars, -- blue, silver, and blue.
4. Alsace. In a red field, a diagonal golden bar with embroidered edges (Upper Alsace).

1. Limburg (Limperg). A quartered shield; upper left and lower right quarters serrated (4 points), upper red, lower silver (Franken). Upper right and lower left fields in blue, each emblazoned with 5 silver battle clubs.
2. Tuis, probably Thusis (Roman Tuseun); a single eagle in a plain field.

Right: The Shields of the Counts—with colors:

1. Schwartzburg. In a blue field, a golden lion rampant, which should face left instead of right.
2. Cleves (Klefen). In a red field, a small central shield in blue, surmounted with a golden glevenrod of light radial branches tipped with gloves. The term 'gleve' is applied to the three terminal petals or leaves of the lily. It is surmised that this star-shaped or radial pattern is derived from the battle-shield. These were often made of wood, covered with leather, and reinforced with metal bands converging to a center. In the center was a ring (called the navel) in which, in case of an actual shield, a gem (carbuncle) was placed by way of ornamentation. The lily as an ornament had its origin in the Orient. In France, it was used in coats of arms as early as 1179, and even much earlier as a terminal figure on crown and scepter. It is also the emblem of the city of Florence.
3. Cilli, or Celeja (Zilie). Quartered shield. Left upper and right lower quarters show three golden stars in blue field. Right upper and left lower quarters each contain four horizontal bars, alternately red and silver.
4. Savory (Sopheii). A silver cross in a red field.

THE INSTITUTION OF THE ELECTORS OF THE EMPIRE

Gregory (Gregorius) the Fifth was the first to order and establish the choice and election of a Roman emperor. For after Otto the Third, through inheritance, and yet, not without some effort, was elected emperor, and the said pope, born of the same lineage as Otto, recognized the weakness of the imperial sovereignty and the changes of fortune, therefore, in order that the highest authority of the empire might continue to abide with the Germans, he held a council and ordained a statute that it was proper for the Germans alone to elect a Roman Emperor. And from this point on the electors received the name. This same election has taken place for four hundred years since then; so that from this point onwards the imperial sovereignty did not descend by inheritable blood, but ever after solely through this election of an emperor by high-born Germans and the king of Bohemia. After receiving the imperial crown at Rome, the sovereign was to be crowned emperor and called Augustus. These (as the illustrations make clear) are the electors of the empire, namely, the three archbishops of Mainz, Treves and Cologne. Margrave of Brandenburg, Palsgrave, Duke of Saxony, and King of Bohemia. Each has a particular office; and so the three arch-chancellors are: the first, of Germany; the second, of Gaul; the third, of Italy. The Margrave of Brandenburg is the arch-chamberlain; the Palsgrave, arch-steward; the Duke of Saxony, arch-marshal. The King of Bohemia is an arch-cupbearer and casts the deciding vote in case the other electors do not agree in the election. This order and statute for imperial election was made around the Year of Christian Salvation one thousand.

In what manner and form the election of a new Roman emperor was to be undertaken, held, and accomplished by the seven electors at Frankfurt on Main, is clearly made known by the Golden Bull

Golden Bull, the general designation of any charter decorated with a golden seal or bulla. The name, however, has become practically restricted to a few documents of unusual political importance, the golden bull of the empire, the golden bull of Brabant, the golden bull of Hungary, and the golden bull of Milan—and of these the first is undoubtedly the golden bull par excellence. The main object of the golden bull was to provide a set of rules for the election of the German kings, or kings of the Romans, as they are called in this document. Since the informal establishment of the electoral college about a century before, various disputes had taken place about the right of certain princes to vote at the elections, these and other difficulties having arisen owing to the absence of any authoritative ruling. Under these circumstances the emperor Charles IV determined by an authoritative pronouncement to make such uncertainty impossible in the future, and at the same time to add to his own power and prestige, especially in his capacity as king of Bohemia. In its first form the bull was promulgated at the diet of Nuremberg on January 10th, 1356, but it was not accepted by the princes until some modifications had been introduced, and in its final form it was issued at the diet of Metz on December 25th following.

The text of the golden bull consists of a prologue and of 31 chapters. The early chapters are mainly concerned with details of the elaborate ceremonies that are to be observed on the occasion of an election. The number of electors is fixed at seven, the duke of Saxe-Wittenberg, not the duke of Saxe-Lauenberg, receiving the Saxon vote, and the count palatine, not the duke of Bavaria, obtaining the vote of the Wittelsbachs. The electors were arranged in order of the precedence thus: the archbishops of Mainz, of Trier and of Cologne, the king of Bohemia, the count palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony and the margrave of Brandenburg. The work of summoning the electors and of presiding over their deliberations fell to the archbishop of Mainz, but if he failed to discharge this duty the electors were to assemble without summons within three months of the death of a king. Elections were to be held at Frankfurt; they were to be decided by a majority of votes, and thus subsequent coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle was to be performed by the archbishop of Cologne. During a vacancy in the empire the work of administering the greater part of Germany was entrusted to the count palatine of the Rhine, the duke of Saxony being responsible, however, for the government of Saxony, or rather for the districts ubi Saxonica jura servantur ('where Saxon laws were kept').

The chief result of the bull was to add greatly to the power of the electors. To these princes were given sovereign rights in their dominions, which were declared indivisible and were to pass according to the rule of primogeniture. Except in extreme cases, there was to be no appeal from sentences of their tribunals, and they were confirmed in the right of coining money, of taking tolls, and in other privileges, while conspirators against their lives were to suffer the penalties of treason. One clause gave special rights and immunities to the king of Bohemia, who, it must be remembered, at this time was Charles himself, and others enjoined the observance of the public peace. Provision was made for an annual meeting of the electors, to be held at Metz four weeks after Easter. This arrangement, however, was not carried out, although the electors met occasionally. Another clause forbade the cities to receive Pfahlbürger, i.e., forbade them to take men dwelling outside their walls under their protection. It may be noted that there is no admission whatever that the election of a king needs confirmation from the pope.

issued by Charles (Carolus) the Fourth in the imperial diet at Nuremberg in the year 1356. Before being anointed and crowned, our emperors are called Roman kings, to show that the imperial name is to be more respected than the royal one. The ancient Romans, after driving out their haughty king, Tarquinius, through hatred of that king completely abolished the royal title, and made a statute that henceforth it should not be proper for anyone to assume the title of king of Rome; but that those who conducted wars against the enemy should be called imperators—whom we call emperors. For among the Romans there were three stages of the greater dignities—king, dictator, and emperor. The kingship was the highest; the dictatorship was second; emperor was third. And although Julius Caesar, because of his frequent victories over the enemy, was called imperator; yet the name of king was so despised at Rome that Julius achieved the name of dictator, and not that of emperor or king. But when he later coveted the royal title, and the unwillingness and hostility of the people in this matter gave him some concern, he collected an army against the Parthians; and he pretended that in the Sibyllian books it was written that the Parthians could not be overcome by anyone other than a king; and so he provided that he was to be called king. This was the cause of his sudden death. In order that we may realize what the imperial sovereignty or name previously was among the Romans, we note that he was called an imperator or emperor, who was vested with the command of the army for the protection, advancement, and enhancement of the common welfare and status. But now the imperial name has enlarged its scope.

First Row

1. Augsburg (Augusta). A vertically divided field – red and silver (arms of the bishopric of Augsburg). Superimposed over both fields, a golden capital, upon which rests a green pine cone (Pinienzapfen) or nut (Zirbelnuss); although some express this in the form of a cluster of grapes. The pine is classed as belonging to the Pinus Cembra, or stone pine of Siberia and Central Europe. It abounds in the Alps, the Carpathians, and the Siberian ranges, and is found in Switzerland at an altitude of 4,000 to 6,000 feet. The seeds are oily and are eaten both in the Tyrol and Siberia. A fine oil is expressed from them, which is used both for food in lamps. The wood is of slow growth and has a remarkably even grain, and is employed by the Swiss woodcarvers in preference to any other.
2. Metz (Metis). A vertically parted shield; left, silver; right, black.
3. Aix-la-Chapelle (Aquisgranum). Displays black eagle, crowned; crown, claws and bill in gold, field silver.
4. Lübeck. Horizontally divided shield; upper half silver, lower half red.

2. Schlettstadt (Sletetstat). A black eagle in a field of silver.
3. Hagenau (Hagenau). This shield is blue, inscribed with a five-petalled rose, barbs or leaves between the petals.

Year of the World 6203 | Year of Christ 1004

Pope John (Ioannes) the Nineteenth, a Roman, came to the pontificate through neglectfulness; and he did nothing memorable. He died in the fourth year and fourth month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat was then vacant for nineteen days. The injection of John XIX at this point is an error; for at Folio CLXXI verso the Lineage of the Popes was brought down to and including John XVIII. Here the chronicler resumes with John XIX, although John XVIII was succeeded by Sergius IV. The correct succession is as follows:

1004-1009	John XVIII
1009-1012	Sergius IV
1012-1024	Benedict VIII
1024-1033	John XIX
1033-1044	Benedict IX

Sergius, the fourth pope of this name, a Roman, was elected pope after the aforesaid John (Ioannem), led a holy life, and was amiable in his dealings before as well as during his pontificate. He was kind to the poor and gracious to his friends and servants; clement to the guilty, and considerate of the disobedient. He was so wise and employed so much prudence that nothing occurred during his pontificate for which he could be held culpable or charged with neglect. He turned his whole mind to God, as all bishops properly should. He duly considered all things in advance, and transacted his affairs according to his inherent ability and good sense. Pursuant to the counsel and admonition of this pope the Italians at this time formed an alliance among themselves; and by their united strength they soon drove the Saracens out of Sicily. While these things transpired in Italy and Apuleia, and a famine occurred in Italy and over almost the entire world, this holy Sergius died in the second year and fifteenth day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. The seat was then vacant for eight days. [Sergius IV, son of a priest, was a Roman by birth. Plautinus and Ciaconius represent him as a man of great piety and exemplary morals; charitable to the poor, clement to the guilty, of perfect goodness, and extreme prudence. He turned all his thoughts toward heaven, and governed the church with integrity and wisdom. According to some he was the only priest of his time worthy of the papal chair, while according to others he was the mere tool of the nobility. He conceived a plan for driving the Arabs out of Sicily, but the short duration of his pontificate did not permit him to carry it out. He died in 1012].

Year of the World 6213 | Year of Christ 1014

Pope Benedict the Eighth, of Tusculum, when entering upon the pontificate, conferred the imperial crown on Henry the Second according to the statutes of Gregory the Fifth; and afterwards availed himself of the protection of the emperor in all things. But when his protector died, he was deposed, and another was ordered to replace him. Nevertheless he was friendly with his opponents, and when their pope was driven out, Benedict was reinstated. Not long thereafter he died in the eleventh year, first month, and 13th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter. Some say (and particularly Damian, the teacher) that one day a bishop saw Benedict in a hermitage, seated on a black horse; and the bishop asked him why he was riding a black horse. And Benedict told the bishop how he came to be so severely punished. And he showed the bishop a place where he had hidden some money, and requested him to give the money to the poor in his name; for the money that he had previously given to the poor as alms, having been procured by theft, could not be of credit to him. This advice the bishop followed, and soon after this he left his bishopric and retired into a monastery. [Benedict VIII, pope from 1012 to 1024, was originally called Theophylactus. He was a layman and a member of the family of the Count of Tusculum, and was opposed by an anti-pope named Gregory, but whom he defeated with the aid of King Henry II of Saxony, whom he crowned emperor in 1014. In his pontificate the Saracens began to attack the southern coasts of Europe and to effect a settlement in Sardinia. The Normans also then began to settle in Italy, but their relations with Benedict were friendly. In Italy Benedict supported the policy of Henry II, and at the Council of Pavia he exerted himself in favor of ecclesiastical discipline. A number of authors gravely relate the numerous apparitions of Benedict VIII. Platinus assures us that a prelate saw his ghost, robed in his pontifical vestments, and mounted on a black horse. The bishop having asked the phantom which way he was going, the pontiff seized him forcibly by the arm, and lifting him from the earth, bore him to a place in which were concealed treasures, which he ordered him to distribute to the poor, to allay the sufferings he was enduring in another life as a punishment for his rapine].

John (Ioannes), the twentieth pope of this name, a Roman whose father was Gregory, was pope when Conrad was elected to succeed the deceased emperor Henry (Heinrici); and from John he later received the imperial crown. Afterwards John was attacked by the Romans through revolt and open war, but was relieved through the might and power of the emperor Conrad, who threatened the Romans with death and extermination should they persist in distressing the pope. John died in the eleventh year and ninth day of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for eight days. [John XIX, here called XX (Romanus, Count of Tusculum) although a layman, was elected to the papacy to succeed his brother Benedict VIII. He took orders to enable him to ascend the papal chair, and held the pontificate from 1024 to 1033. On payment of a large bribe, he agreed to grant the patriarch of Constantinople the title of ecumenical bishop, but the general indignation compelled him to withdraw from this agreement. On the death of the emperor, Henry II, in 1024, he supported Conrad II whom he crowned at St. Peter's in Easter of 1027. His debauchery, extractions, and tyranny rendered him odious to the Romans, who conspired against his life and resolved to take up arms. But John escaped them and took refuge in Germany with Conrad II, who in the end re-established him as pope by force of arms, and punished the seditious].

Year of the World 6223 | Year of Christ 1024

Benedict, the ninth pope of this name (and, as some will have it, a nephew of Benedict the Eighth), of Tusculum whose father was Alberic, being an incompetent, unworthy, and witless man, was thrown out of the papal chair by the Romans, and John (Joannem), a bishop of Sabine, was put in his place as Sylvester the Third. But after the expiration of 49 days Sylvester was deposed and Benedict reinstated. However, a few days later, Benedict still mindful of the dangers of the former occasion, voluntarily surrendered the pontificate to an archdeacon named John; or, as some say, sold it to him. For this reason this Benedict was justly condemned by all men and by the judgment of God. After his death he appeared to a number of persons in gruesome and frightful form, lamenting his evil deeds. And in this manner also occurred the 14th schism, fraught with shame and anger engendered between this Benedict and others. [Benedict IX, pope from 1033 to 1056, son of Alberic, count of Tusculum, and nephew of Benedict VIII, was, like the latter, also called Theophylactus. Intrigues, bribes, and threats procured his election when he was but 12 years of age. His misconduct and debaucheries, although tolerated by the emperors Conrad II and Henry III, disgusted the Romans, and Cardinal Benno accuses him of witchcraft, enchantments, and the use of love-philters and of sacrificing to demons and participating in magical rites. In 1044, the Romans drove him out and appointed Sylvester III as his successor; but the latter remained in office but a few days, for the people of Tusculum soon recovered their influence and reinstated their pope. Benedict, however, sold his rights to his godfather, the priest John Gradianus, who in 1045 was installed as Gregory VI. The following year, at the Council of Sutri, Henry III obtained the deposition of the three competing popes, replacing them by Suidger, bishop of Bamberg, who took the name of Clement II. But before the close of 1047, Clement died, and Benedict was reinstated a third time. At last, after a pontificate of 12 years, the marquis of Tuscany drove Benedict from Rome and he was never seen there again].

Folio CLXXXVI recto

Henry (Heinricus), the second emperor of this name, a duke of Bavaria, was elected Caesar upon the death of Otto, in the Year of the Lord one thousand and one, or, as others will have it, around the year one thousand and three, by the German electors, who on this occasion for the first time exercised the electoral rights which had been conferred upon them. He reigned 22 years. Although some historians reckon him as Henry the First, in some of his writings and letters seen at Bamberg, he describes himself as Henry the Second. In addition, several historians call him Henry the Second, and to this we will adhere in the following narrative. Because of the numerous wars he fought with the Gauls and those of Metz, his sojourn in Italy extended itself over a period of 12 years. Afterwards he was anointed emperor by Willigis the bishop of Mainz. He made the Wends tributary to himself, later received the imperial crown from Benedict the Eighth, and conducted his first expedition to Capua, where he drove out the Saracens. He captured the city of Troy in the vicinity of Apuleia from its citizens, received hostages for it, and returned to Rome. This one was a very Christian prince and a very holy man. He lived in a state of virginity or heavenly chastity with his wife Kunigunde (Kunegunda). Pursuant to the advice and encouragement of both, King Stephen of Hungary and his subjects were converted to the Christian faith. He espoused his sister to the same king. Henry lived with his wife in such a state of chastity and holiness that both were illustrious in miracles after death; for during their lives they neglected nothing that appertained to the honor of God; and they founded the Bamberg bishopric, and endowed with many estates and treasures. He also restored the episcopal foundations of Hildesheim (where he was reared and educated from childhood), Magdeburg, Strasbourg, Meissen, and Merseburg, which had been ruined by the Wends during their occupation. Finally, after many wars in Bohemia, Germany, and Italy, he died, illustrious for many miracles that occurred after his death.

Henry II, surnamed the Saint, Roman emperor, was the son of Henry II, the Quarrelsome, duke of Bavaria, and Gisela, daughter of Conrad, king of Burgundy, or Arles, (who died in 993), and great grandson of the German king Henry I. Henry II, the emperor, was born May 6th, 973, and educated at Hildesheim and at Regensburg. He became duke of Bavaria on the death of his father in 995, and about 1001 married one Kunigunde (or Cunigunda), daughter of Siegfried, count of Luxemburg. When Otto died childless in 1002, Henry was chosen king by the Franks and Bavarians, and was crowned by Willigis, archbishop of Mainz. He purchased the allegiance of the Thuringians and Saxons; and when shortly afterwards the nobles of Lorraine did homage and Hermann of Swabia, his rival, submitted, he was generally recognized as king. Henry conducted an expedition into Italy, where Arduin, margrave of Ivrea, had been elected king. Meeting no resistance from the latter, Henry was crowned king of the Lombards at Pavia in 1004. He then freed Bohemia from the Poles, and in 1005 compelled the Polish king to sue for peace. In 1013, Henry went to Rome, recognized Benedict VIII as the rightful pope, and was crowned emperor by him in 1014. In 1021 he crossed the Alps for a third time at the request of Pope Benedict, who was calling for assistance against the Greeks of southern Italy. With the aid of the Normans, Henry crippled the Greeks, but a pestilence compelled him to return to Germany in 1022.

Henry was enthusiastic for church reform, held numerous diets, and issued frequent proclamations for peace; but feuds among the nobles were common, and the frontiers of the empire were insecure. Henry was the first to use the title King of the Romans.

In 1006 Henry resolved to found a new bishopric in Germany. He selected Bamberg for the purpose, perhaps because as some expiation for the wrongs done by his ancestors to Adelbert of Babenburg, who had by them been despoiled of his life and lands. And although the plan did not materialize at the time, the cathedral church of Bamberg was dedicated in 1012. Henry also richly endowed the Episcopal sees of Hildesheim Magdeburg, Strasbourg, Meissen, and Merseburg.

Having nominated as his successor Conrad, duke of Franconia and Swabia, Henry died in 1024, and was buried at Bamberg. It is said that on his deathbed, calling together the surrounding abbots and bishops and the kinsmen of Kunigunde, he said to them, "Receive back again your virgin whom you gave to me." On the authority of this remark, and the fact of their having had no children, it is said that the loss of Henry to Kunigunde was rather that of a brother to a sister, than that of a man to his wife; an opinion stated with certainty in the bull of the canonization by Pope Eugenius III, and in that of Kunigunde by Pope Innocent III two hundred years later. It is, however, probable that Henry only meant that he was childless, for, as has been observed, the word virgo, had that significance as well as the one usually attributed to it.

Conrad the Second, of Swabian origin, or (as others will have it) a Frenchman by birth, and through his mother descended from the first French kings, who came from Troy, was chosen by the electors in Germany after the death of the emperor Henry (Heinrico). He had been a chief among emperor Henry's knights. King Conrad spent three years in Italy. In the meantime the Italian princes and the people entered into an alliance to drive Conrad out of Italy by force of arms; but when news of this reached him he led a large army into Italy. Encountering resistance at Milan, he devastated the countryside and besieged the city, threatening not to withdraw until he had burned and leveled it to the ground. But when on holy Whitsuntide the archbishop of Cologne was performing the office of the holy mass in a church near the city, he appeared to Conrad as a spirit, and told him that Saint Ambrose, the patron there, had threatened the Germans with death or extermination if they would not withdraw. In consequence of this Conrad and his army struck camp and went to Rome where he was endowed by John (Ioanne) the Twentieth with the gold crown and the titles of the Empire while standing between Eudone, the English king, and Rudolph, king of Burgundy. Leaving Italy at peace, he marched against the Wends and Hungarians and defeated them. He finally died in Lower Utrecht in the 17th year of his reign. [Conrad II. Upon the death of Henry II in 1024, Duke Conrad of Franconia was chosen king of Germany as Conrad II. He was the first of the four Frankish kings who in succession occupied the throne of Germany from 1024 to 1125. He was descended from Conrad, who had married the daughter of Otto the Great, being thus related to the Saxon line that ended with his predecessor. His reign was marked by firmness and wisdom. He was a friend of the citizen class, and by favoring the cities he won the support of the citizens against the nobles. He was crowned King of Italy in 1026, and emperor in the following year. In 1026, Conrad became king of Burgundy, the crown having been bequeathed to him by Rudolph III, whose niece, Gisela, was Conrad's wife. Conrad's reign was marked by many wars. He crushed several rebellions in Bohemia, repulsed a Polish invasion, and conquered the Slavonic tribes on the Oder and lower Elbe. He founded the cathedral of Spire, where he and his successor were buried. He died in 1039 and was succeeded by his son Henry III].

A dreadful comet, flaming back and forth and scattering about, appeared in the third year of Henry's (reign), dispersing flames here and there. Likewise, in the seventh year of the (same) year of this (emperor) there was an eclipse of the sun, the moon appeared bloody, and a great earthquake occurred. A burning torch or shaft resembling a tower descended from the sky with a great roar. So also in Lorraine, a spring turned to blood, foretelling famine and death. And such a famine and pestilence occurred throughout the world that in Italy more people succumbed to death than remained alive.

Genealogy of Saint Henry The Emperor

An entire page is devoted to this subject, and the text in explanation of the woodcut follows on Folios CLXXXVII recto and verso. The scheme is that of a family tree, with the first ancestor at the root.

By a series of campaigns Charlemagne reduced the Saxons to such an extent that before his death Saxony had permanently passed under Frankish supremacy, and within a century it had come to form an outpost of German and Christian influence against the Slavs of the provinces south of the Baltic. The conversion of the Saxons to Christianity continued in the reign of Louis I, third son of Charlemagne, and bishoprics were established in various places. In 843, Saxony fell to Louis the German, third son of the emperor Louis I. Louis the German paid little attention to the northern part of his kingdom, which was harassed by the Normans and Slavs. About 850, however, he appointed a Saxon noble named Liudolf as margrave to defend the Limes Saxoniae, a narrow strip of land on the eastern frontier. Liudolf, who is sometimes called duke of the East Saxons, carried out a vigorous war against the Slavs and extended his influence over other parts of Saxony. It is with him that this genealogy begins at its root.

1. Liudolf (Leutolfus primus dux et rex Saxonie), is portrayed as king, crowned, and holding a large sword. Beside him is his queen. He died in 866, and was succeeded by his son Bruno, and later by his second son, Otto the Illustrious.
2. Bruno (Bruno dux perijt in aquis Danue), eldest son of Liudolf, succeeded his father as duke of Saxony in 866, but was killed fighting the Normans in 880. He is portrayed as a young man, sword in hand, and without issue.
3. Otto the Illustrious (Otto dux Saxonie), Liudolf's second son, was recognized as duke of Saxony after the death of his brother Bruno, and is represented in the woodcut (lower right), in ducal cap and with sword in hand. He is accompanied by his spouse.

Note: The shield shown in connection with Liudolf and his sons Bruno and Otto is that of Saxony. Over a field of 9 horizontal bars, alternately black and gold, is imposed an oblique foliated green bar, its upper edge, only, ornamented with crown-like leaves; which green bar is called the Rautenkrantz.

Of this marriage two children were born, Henry the Fowler (here called the Humble) and a daughter named Baba.

4. Baba (Baba comitissa Babenberge), daughter of Otto the Illustrious, is shown just above him, with her spouse. It is to her that the chronicler attributes the origin of the name Babenberg. She was the mother of Count Albrecht and, according to the illustration, of Count Reinoldus.
5. Albrecht of Babenberg (Albertus comes Babebergensis), appears on the right just above his mother Baba. According to the Chronicle (Folio CLXXIV recto), this Albrecht, grandson of Otto the Illustrious, slew Conrad, the son of Louis III, for which offense Louis, then emperor, besieged Albrecht in the castle of Babenberg and finally caused him to be beheaded; and since Louis then died without issue, Conrad, the son of the slain Conrad, was placed in the sovereignty; but when he also died without issue, Henry the Fowler was crowned, as appears later on in this genealogy.
6. Reinhold (Reinoldus Comes), who appears besides Albrecht as another son of Baba, remains unaccounted for in the text, and apparently died without issue.

Note: The shield shown in connection with Baba, Albrecht, and Reinhold is that of the house of Babenberg—a black lion in a field of gold; the whole crossed by a bar of silver.

7. Henry the Fowler (Henricus primus rex Germanie). Henry I, called the “Fowler,” who appears in the lower center of the woodcut, crowned and with lance in hand, was the son of Otto the Illustrious (No. 3 above), and upon the latter's death in 912 became the duke of Saxony. In 918, the German king, Conrad I, advised the nobles to make the Saxon duke his successor, and in 919 the Franks and Saxons chose Henry as German king. His authority, save in Saxony, was merely nominal; but he secured a recognition of his sovereignty from the Bavarians and Swabians. He was married twice, the first time to Hatburg, a daughter of Irwin, count of Merseburg. She took the veil on the death of a former husband and the church declared her union with Henry illegal. Of this issue was born Thankmar, who was excluded from the succession as illegitimate. Henry's second marriage was to Matilda, daughter of the Saxon count Thiedrich; and of this marriage three children were born: Otto, afterwards called the Great; Henry, duke of Bavaria, and Bruno, bishop of Cologne.

8. Thankmar (Danckmerus dux Saxonie) appears to the left of his father, Henry the Fowler. He was not recognized in the succession for the reasons already stated (See No. 7 above.). Below him is the shield of Saxony.
9. Bruno (Bruno episcopus Coloniensis), the youngest son of Henry the Fowler by his second wife Matilda, appears on the same branch as Thankmar, Henry's son by his first wife. Bruno is portrayed in Episcopal vestments, crozier in one hand, and sword in the other. Below him is the coat of arms of his bishopric—a black cross in a silver field.
10. Henry I, Duke of Bavaria (Heinricus dux Bavarie), born about 920 (died November 1st, 955), was the second son of Henry the Fowler by his wife Matilda (Otto, mentioned later, being the first). He headed an insurrection against his brother Otto I, claiming a superior right to the throne, but was defeated in 939 and compelled to leave Germany. Later he attempted to assassinate Otto I, but the plot was discovered, and Henry finally pardoned. He is here portrayed with his spouse. The shield is that of Bavaria, wafered or checkered in silver and blue. The portrait is inscribed Henricus dux Bavarie.
11. Otto I, the Great (Otto primus imperator), born November 23rd, 912 (died 973), Roman emperor, was the eldest son of King Henry I, the Fowler, by his second wife Matilda. He was chosen German king in 936, and was crowned Roman emperor in 962. He is portrayed with his queen, Adelaide, the mother of Otto II, who succeeded his father to the throne. The shield is that of the German emperor, the double eagle in black on a field of gold.
12. Otto II (Otto secundus imperator), surnamed the Red, son of the emperor Otto the Great, was chosen German king in 961, and crowned joint emperor at Rome in 967. He is here portrayed with his queen Theophano, and is apparently passing the scepter to her. Theophano was the daughter of the eastern emperor Romanus II. Of this marriage Otto III was born. Below the emperor is the imperial shield—a double eagle in black on a field of gold.
13. Otto III (Otto trius imperator), son of Otto II, was born in July 980, and at the age of three was chosen successor to his father.

During his minority the government of Germany was in the hands of his mother, Theophano, and after her death in 991, passed to a council in which the chief influence was exercised by Adelaide, the widow of Otto the Great, and Willigis, archbishop of Mainz. Otto died in 1002 while conducting a campaign against the Romans. The shield is that of the German emperor, a double eagle in black on a field of gold. He was succeeded by Henry II, son of Henry II the Quarrelsome, Duke of Bavaria, who was a son of Henry I, Duke of Bavaria (No. 10 above).

14. Henry II, the Quarrelsome, Duke of Bavaria (Henricus dux Bavarie) is portrayed with his spouse (left center) and below him is the wafered or checkered shield of Bavaria. Of this marriage was born Henry II, Roman emperor, Bruno, who became bishop of Augsburg, and Gisela, who married Stephen, king of Hungary.
15. Henry II, Roman Emperor (Sanctus Heinricus imperator), son of Henry the Quarrelsome, and the subject of this genealogy, appears in the upper left-hand corner in crown and regal robes, sainted. He holds a model of the cathedral church of Bamberg which he founded, while at his left is his coat of arms as Roman emperor, the double eagle in black, on a field of gold. On the breast of the eagle is the checkered or wafered shield of Bavaria. Henry II was a great grandson of the German king, Henry I. He became duke of Bavaria on his father's death in 995, and in 1001 married Kunigunde, daughter of Siegfried, count of Luxemburg. When Otto III (No. 13 above) died childless in 1002, Henry was chosen German king. He was crowned emperor in 1014.
17. Bruno, bishop of Augsburg (Bruno episcopus Augustensis), son of Henry the Quarrelsome, and brother of St. Henry the Emperor, and Gisela, the queen of Hungary, is portrayed in Episcopal vestments and holds a crozier. Before him is a quartered shield. Upper left and lower right quarters, the checkered or wafered arms of Bavaria in silver and blue; upper right and lower left quarters, a mounted cluster of grapes, superimposed on a vertically divided field of red and silver, the coat of arms of the city of Augsburg.
18. Emeric, or Imer (S. Emericus dux Ongarie), duke of Hungary, was born to St. Stephen and Gisela in 1004. His education was entrusted to monks. When his father had restored peace and had resolved to lay aside the chief cares of government, Emeric was twenty-four years of age. Plans were made for his coronation, but he died six days before the appointed time. He appears in the upper right hand corner of the illustration, accompanied by the same shield as that of his mother.

Folio CLXXXVII recto

This genealogical tree indicates the lineage of the most illustrious and most holy emperor Henry and his holy spouse and virgin Kunigunde, who outshone all other German kings and queens in piety and virtue, and were illustrious in many miracles occurring after their death. At the root of this tree is placed Liudolf (Luitolfus), the duke of Saxony, as father of the line, while its branches represent his sons and grandsons as far as Saint Henry the emperor. And beside it is indicated the descent of his spouse from Charles the Great.

In the time of the invincible emperor Charles the Great, who without cessation for many years warred against the idolatry of the Saxons, defeated them, and compelled them to accept the Christian faith, Liudolf (Luitolfus), the duke of Saxony, assumed the government of the country. He went to Rome and secured the remains of Saint Innocent from the pope. Bruno, his eldest son, conducted a war against the Danes and was drowned at sea; at which event the duchy of Saxony descended to the son of Duke Otto the Second. He had a son named Henry (Heinricus) the Humble, and a daughter named Baba, the mother of Count Albrecht of Babenberg; and from her Babenberg derived its name. Count Albrecht was beheaded by Emperor Louis (Ludovicus) because he had slain his brother Conrad, as previously stated. This same emperor Louis died without male issue, Conrad, the son of the slain Conrad, was placed in the sovereignty; but when he also died, without issue, Henry the Humble was crowned. Henry married Matilda, who bore to him Otto the Great and Henry, duke of Bavaria. To Otto the Great was born Otto the Red. To this same Otto the Second was born Otto the Third. To Henry, the Duke of Bavaria, was born Henry the Pious, and the former died (in the year) from the Incarnation of the Lord 995, and was buried in Saint Haimrand's (Hemerammi) Monastery at Regensburg. This same Duke Henry had two sons and a daughter. One son was Henry the Good, who afterwards became emperor; the second was Bruno, who became bishop of Augsburg. The daughter, named Gisela (Geysila), was espoused to King Stephen of Hungary, and through her that kingdom was converted to Christianity. But as Saint Henry, the emperor, loved his spouse as a sister, and never knew her, and consequently no issue was born by her, he converted earthly things to heavenly ones, founding a bishopric in honor of Saint Peter and Saint George, and performing many other good works. As this emperor Henry approached death, a great number of devils with much rustle and tumult appeared before the cell of a holy hermit. The hermit asked one of the devils where he was bound. And he answered, To the emperor's death, to see whether we can find anything against him. The hermit adjured the devil to return and report what happened. And the devil returned, saying they had accomplished nothing; for when the good and the evil were placed into the scales and we thought that the balance was in our favor, there came the burned Lawrence, who placed a golden pot on the side of the good, so that that side weighed more. At this action, in a rage, I broke an ear off the pot. Now this was a cup that the devil called a pot, and it was so large that it had two ears. The cup is shown at Merseburg to this day, for the emperor, to the honor of Saint Lawrence, brought it there. Afterwards it was discovered that Emperor Henry died at the same time, and that the ear was missing from the cup.

Folio CLXXXVII verso

Charles (Carolus) the Great begot Louis (Ludovicum), and this Emperor Louis, surnamed the Pious, begot three sons: Charles, King of Gaul; Louis, King of France; and Siegfried, Count Palatine on the Rhine. Siegfried (Sigifridus), by his wife Matilda (Machtildis), begot: Theodoric, bishop of Metz; Adelbert, a canon there; Henry (Heinricum), Count Palatine on the Rhine and Duke of Bavaria; and this holy Kunigunde (Kunegundis). She was espoused to Emperor Henry. Although she lived with him in chastity and piety, yet through prompting of the devil, Henry suspected her with a knight, and to remove any scruples as to her innocence, she was compelled to walk on glowing ploughshares. And she said, O God, as you know me to be untouched by Emperor Henry and all others, so help me. And she walked on the glowing shares unharmed. After having lived for fifteen years in a cloister that she had founded in Hesse, she died, and was buried beside Emperor Henry at Bamberg. Because of her many miracles she was enlisted among the saints. [Kunigunde was the daughter of Siegfried, Count of Luxemburg, and spouse of Emperor Henry II, whom she bore no children. She was active in the founding of the bishopric of Bamberg in 1007. The story of Henry's suspicions of infidelity, and the consequent ordeal of the ploughshares, are probably fictions. The story is recorded a century later in unauthentic sources. After Henry's death in 1024 she took the veil in a cloister, which she founded at Kaufungen, near Cassel, and died there on March 3rd, 1031. She was buried in the cathedral at Bamberg beside her husband. She was sainted in the year 1200, and her day is March 3rd].

In the time of Emperor Henry, while a priest was conducting mass on holy Christmas in the church of Saint Magnus, in a village of the bishopric of Magdeburg, eighteen men and 15 women began to dance and sing in the churchyard there; and they confused the priest in his office, but would not desist. The priest cursed and condemned them to dance and sing for an entire year without cessation. During this time neither rain nor dew fell upon them; nor did they get hungry or tired; nor did their clothing or shoes wear out. After the expiration of a year the archbishop released them. Some of them soon died; some slept for three successive nights; while others trembled the rest of their lives. [See note on Illustration of Dance of Death, Folio CCLXI recto, below].

Willigis (Villegisus), archbishop of Mainz, was the son of a cartwright. In order that he might not forget his origin, his father wrote the following in his chamber in large letters: Willigis, think from where you have come. He also hung wheels on the wall. For this reason the church of Mainz has a wheel in its coat of arms. He consecrated Henry. [Willigis, archbishop of Mainz, was born at Schoeningen of free parents of humble origin, and educated for the clergy. In 975, Emperor Otto II elevated him to archbishop and to chancellor of Germany. Owing to his prudence and circumspection, the crown of Otto II devolved upon his minor son Otto III as against the pretender, Henry the Quarrelsome. He also supported the regency of Theophano, the mother of Otto III, during his minority. Willigis began the building of the Cathedral of Mainz, restored several monasteries, built a bridge, and supported the schools. He died in 1011. He is said to have adopted the wagon-wheel as his emblem, in virtue of the fact that his father was a cartwright].

Gisela (Geisia), a very noble virgin, was espoused to Stephen, King of Hungary. Through her zeal the king and the Hungarian people completely accepted the Christian faith.

1. The Dancers in the Graveyard. Four couples are promenading arm in arm in a graveyard, to bear out the text that once upon a time 18 men and 15 women were dancing and singing in a graveyard to the annoyance of a priest, who was saying mass, as told in the accompanying text. A fifer and a drummer, standing on a flat tombstone, furnish the music for the occasion.

ILLUSTRATION

Genealogy of Kunigunde

The genealogy of Saint Kunigunde occupies almost an entire page, and is traced back to Charles the Great, who appears at the root of her family tree.

1. Charles the Great (Carolus Magnus Imperator), according to the Chronicle (Folio CLXVIII recto) had many beautiful children by many wives, particularly by his wife Hildegard, probably the spouse with whom he appears in dual portrait here. He is portrayed as crowned and sainted, and carries orb and sword. The scepter is in the hands of his spouse. His shield is quartered: Upper left and lower right quarters show the black imperial double eagle in a field of gold—his coat of arms as emperor. Upper right and lower left quarters show the three golden fleur-de-lis of France, in a field of blue. Charles the Great was succeeded by his son Louis I.
2. Louis I (Ludovicus imperator), surnamed the Pious or the Good (called by the French LeDebonnaire, and by the Germans Der Sanftmütige), succeeded his father Charlemagne as emperor. Louis married Irmengard, who bore him three sons: Charles, King of Gaul; Louis, King of France; and Siegfried, Count Palatine of the Rhine. By his second wife, Judith, he begot Charles the Bald. The shield is the same as that of Charlemagne.
3. Charles (Carolus Rex Gallie), one of the sons of Louis I, is shown in the left center of the woodcut. His shield is emblazoned with a cock. The origin of this symbol lies in the fact that Gallus, which in Latin means 'cock,' is also the root of Gallia or Gaul.

4. Siegfried (Siegfriedus Palatinus Rheni), another son of Louis I, is portrayed in the center of the woodcut in his electoral robes and cap, accompanied by his spouse. To Siegfried and his wife Matilda four children were born, Theodoric, Adelbert, Henry, and Kunigunde. Beside Siegfried appears his coat of arms—a golden crowned lion in a field of black.
5. Louis, King of France (Ludovicus Rex Francie), another son of Louis I, appears in right center, crowned, scepter and sword in hand. Below him are the arms of France,— three golden fleur-de-lis in a blue field.
6. Theodoric (Episcopus Metensis), archbishop of Metz, appears immediately above his father Siegfried. His shield is quartered. Upper left and lower right quarters show the golden lion of the Rhenish Palatinate in a black field. Upper right and lower left quarters are diagonally divided, probably silver and black, the arms of the bishopric of Metz.
7. Adelbert (Adelbertus Canonus Metensis), another son of Siegfried, appears to the right of his brother Theodoric, book in one hand, and in the other the shield of the Rhenish Palatinate (a golden lion in a black field.)
8. Henry, Rhenish Count Palatine and Duke of Bavaria (Heinricus Palatinus Rheni Dux Bavarie), appears in the upper right-hand corner of the woodcut. He wears the hat of the pilgrim, and carries a sword. His shield is quartered, the golden lion in a black field (Rhenish Palatinate) in the upper left and lower right quarters. In the upper right and lower left quarters, the wafered or checkered (blue and silver) arms of Bavaria.

Folio CLXXXVIII recto

Stephen (Stephanus), king of Hungary, was a son of Geisa (Geyche) by his wife Sarolta (Sarolth), who was a daughter of Gyula. During his youth he conducted a just war against the mighty and powerful Duke Cupan, and was victorious. After receiving the royal crown he made war against Gyula, his mother's brother; and him he defeated and sent to Hungary with his wife and children, assigning him a place in the forest. After Stephen had married Gisela (Geisila), sister of the aforementioned Henry (Heinrici), he was converted to the Christian faith with the assistance of Albertus, the bishop of Prague; and all of Stephen's people were also converted. Afterwards King Stephen conducted a war against the exceedingly wealthy duke of Bulgaria; and with the estates, possessions and treasures that he took, he caused a monastery to be built at Old Buda in Saint Peter's honor. Having subjugated all neighboring peoples, and having decided to give over the kingdom to Emeric, and to await his own end in contemplation and service of God, he became seriously ill, and he died in the 37th year of his reign, in the 1038th year from the Incarnation of the Lord. He was buried in the Albensis Basilica, which he had built in honor of the Mother of God. And there, together with his spouse, he was famous for their many miracles. [Stephen I (977-1038), a king of Hungary, was the son of Geza, duke of Hungary, and of Sarolta, one of the few Magyar Christian ladies. His tutors included the German priest Bruno, the Czech priest Radla, and an Italian knight Theodate of San Severino, who taught him arms and letters. In 996 he married Gisela, daughter of Duke Henry II of Bavaria. In the following year his father died and the young prince was confronted by a formidable pagan reaction. Stephen moved against the rebels, bearing before him the banner of St. Martin of Tours, whom he now chose to be his patron saint. He routed them in 998, and assumed the royal title immediately afterwards. The rest of Stephen's life was spent largely in a struggle against the pagan nobles, which engrossed his energies, and compelled him to adopt a pacific policy toward the emperors of the east and west. He died in 1038 and was canonized in 1083].

Emeric, a king of Hungary, was the son of the aforesaid Stephen (Stephani) and Gisela (Geisila). Stephen had other sons, but this one more so than his brothers was fortified by divine endowment against the inclinations of men, with righteousness, wisdom, mildness, mercy, kindness, humility and patience. He was loved by his God, and was acceptable to the people. His father had charged him with the care and rule of the kingdom. He was taken by death while still in a state of virginity and before he had known his wife, in order that his mind might not be corrupted. Because of his many miracles he was venerated by the people. [The young prince Emeric was dearly loved by his father and the people, and the clergy expected great things from his piety. Preparations were made for his coronation, which was to take place at Stuhlweissenburg in the stately church erected by his father, when messengers brought news of his death. He died six days before that appointed for his coronation].

Ladislaus, king of the Hungarians, having a heavenly crown, never placed the royal one on his head. Having received the sovereignty, he comforted the unhappy, lifted up the oppressed, and was a good father to the orphans. The inhabitants of the kingdom called him a good king. He took Dalmatia and Croatia, and secured remarkable victories over the Cumans. He conquered Poland and Bohemia, and after making peace, returned homeward. Finally he died full of piety and virtue in the 19th year of his reign, in the Year of the Lord 1045 on the third day of the Kalends of August. [Saint Ladislaus I (1040-1095), king of Hungary, son of Bela I, was born in Poland where his father had taken refuge. Returning to Hungary, Ladislaus and his brother Geza refused to contest the throne against their cousin Salamon, whom they served in his campaigns against the Cumans and Pechenegs. But later the brothers quarreled with Salomon, expelling him, and Geza taking his throne. In 1077, Ladislaus succeeded Geza. He defeated an alliance between Salomon and the Cumans, and after crushing a second Cuman invasion by alleged divine aid, extended Hungary's frontier in Transylvania. He supported the pope against Emperor Henry IV; married the daughter of Welf, duke of Bavaria, and is said to have refused the German crown for himself. By supporting the widow of Prince Stephen II of Croatia against his enemies, he secured Croatia for Hungary, introducing Catholicism into that country, and founding the bishopric of Agram (Zagreb). He extirpated non-Christian religious traditions in his dominions with great severity, and also introduced an elaborate legal code. He died suddenly in 1095 when about to take part in the First Crusade. The whole nation mourned for him for three years, and regarded him as a saint long before his canonization. A whole cycle of legends is associated with his name. His daughter Piriska married the Byzantine emperor John Comnenus].

Robert, king of France, led a good and stately life at this time, exceeding all Christian kings in piety, scriptural learning and wisdom. He was so devoted to the service of God, that while not occupied with matters of war, he made it his regular business to sing daily with the priests. And it was said of him that while besieging a city of the enemy, and engaged in daily prayers, the towers and walls fell, and he took the city. [Robert II, the Pious, son of Hugh Capet, was born in 971 and died in 1031. He succeeded his father on the throne in 996. In 1004 he was compelled to divorce his first wife on account of his kin relationship to her, for Bertha of Burgundy, whom he had married, was his cousin. Because of this marriage, the kingdom of France was placed under an interdict by the pope. His second wife, Constance of Arles, embittered his life by his life by her greed for power and rank].

Fulbert, a bishop, is said to have written many hymns of praise at this time, particularly to the Virgin Mary. For this reason during an illness he is said to have been cured by her milk.

Heribert, archbishop of Cologne, was illustrious in these times for his virtue and piety. [Heribert was born at Worms. His father was a gentleman of rank. His mother had been carried off into captivity by the Huns, and has been sold to an honest and good man, who restored her to her parents. She was granddaughter of Reginbald, count of Swabia. Heribert was educated in the abbey of Gorze, in Lorraine, in the diocese of Metz. His father having recalled him to Worms, the archbishop made him dean of his cathedral. Some years later, Otto III, who had not as yet received the imperial crown, made him his chancellor and obtained his ordination. His rule was a true blessing to the diocese because of his wise regulations for discipline among the clergy and the relief of the poor. He built and endowed the abbey of Deutz, on the opposite bank of the Rhine to Cologne. He also rebuilt the church of the Apostles at Cologne and the chapel of St. Stephen].

Gebhard a bishop of Pannonia, was during those times, tied upon a cart by the enemies of the Christian faith, and carried up a high mountain, from which he was thrown off; and thus he became a martyr.

Udo, archbishop of Magdeburg, at first an intractable and obscure-minded student, appealed to the queen of Heaven for guidance; and she promised him wisdom and the office of bishop. And he became learned and a bishop as well. However, he remained unconcerned about his own salvation, inclined to carnal pleasures, neglectful of church affairs, and stained by his illicit love of an abbess; for these reasons he was scorned by all. During the night Udo heard a voice to this effect: Udo, desist from this game you have played entirely too much. Yet he persisted in his wantonness. Finally Frederick, canon of the same church, saw a host of saints in Saint Maurice's choir, by whom Udo was condemned to death and beheaded, removed from the side of the abbess, and accused before the Virgin Mary. And to this attests the blood-stained marble—a warning and dread to other bishops. [Udo is apparently a purely fictitious character perhaps based partly on the real-life Udo, Bishop of Hildesheim (1079-1114). The story of Udo as related in the comes from the poem "Udo von Magdeburg," an anonymous Middle High German verse legend of some 800 lines written in the 14th century].

Heriger, abbot of Lobbes [Heriger was abbot of Lobbes between 990-1007, and is remembered for his writings as theologian and historian], and Abbo (Albo), abbot of the monastery at Fleury [Abbo of Fleury (c. 945-13th November, 1004) was a monk, and later abbot, of the Benedictine monastery of Fleury sur Loire (the modern Saint-Benoit-sur-Loire) near Orléans, France], were famous at this time. Also Saint Medericus, abbot of Edovensius [The only Saint Medericus known to me died in 700. Born in Autun, France, he entered St. Martin's monastery at thirteen and later was its abbot. I have been unable to discover the name of the modern town that is the equivalent of 'Edovensius.'], and Emotus, bishop of Liéges [Emotus is unknown], famous for his wisdom and holiness. Likewise, Roger (Rogerius), bishop of Beauvais [Roger of Blois (bishop of Beauvais from 1002-1022), and first Count of Beauvais], very famous for every virtue. [This paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

Folio CLXXXVIII verso

Silvester (Sylvester), the third pope of this name, a Roman whose father was Lawrence (Laurentio), was installed as pope in the place of the deposed Pope Benedict. But like the other popes just mentioned, he did not remain in the pontificate very long; for at this time the papacy had come to this, that those who attained to the pontifical office were not the pious, virtuous and highly learned, but the mighty, powerful, and such as had bribes and gifts to offer for it. Would to God that such a custom had not endured to our own time. [Silvester III. When Benedict IX was driven from Rome in 1044, John, bishop of Sabina, was elected in his stead, taking the name Silvester III. Within three months Benedict returned and expelled his rival. Nearly three months later the council of Sutri deprived him of his bishopric and priesthood. He was sent to a monastery where he is said to have died].

Year of the World 6233 | Year of Christ 1034

Pope Gregory (Gregorius) the Sixth received the pontificate from Benedict, as previously stated. When this became known to Henry (Heinricus) the Third he was displeased, and justly so. He went to Rome with a large army to quiet these spiritual controversies and to establish peace. A council was held, consisting of many fathers summoned there for the purpose. In this council Benedict the Ninth, Silvester the Third and Gregory were condemned; and so these three monsters were relieved of their authority while Suidger (Syndegerum), bishop of Bamberg, later called Clement the Second, was elected pope. However, Gilbert, the historian, states that Gregory had demeaned himself worthily toward the church of God, reviving the dignity of the papal office by his great intelligence, and by doing away with the robbers and murderers who preyed on those wishing to come to Rome for devotional purposes. For this reason evilly disposed persons called him a bloody slayer; and thus he was also spoken of by the cardinals. While suffering from an illness, of which he later died, he summoned the cardinals and reprimanded them because they had blamed him for what he had justly done. And he said, When I am dead, lay my corpse before the church door, and securely lock the door. When this had been done as he desired, the door was suddenly opened by a strong wind, and the corpse was carried in as evidence of his great piety, to the astonishment of all the people. [Gregory VI, pope from 1045 to 1046, as John Gratianus, had earned a reputation for learning and probity. In 1045 he bought the pontificate from his godson Benedict IX. At the council of Sutri held by Henry III in 1046, he was accused of simony, and was deposed and banished to Germany].

Clement, the second of this name, who had been a bishop of Bamberg and had been called Suidger (Syndegerus), was elected pope in council through the instigation or management of Henry (Heinrico) the Third; while the same Henry was crowned emperor in the presence of the council. A great number write that Clement, to prevent such errors in the future, under obligation of an oath forbade the Romans to elect a pope, except when, at the command of the emperor himself they were authorized to do so. He died in the 9th year of his pontificate, as some say, by poison. [Clement II (Suidger) became pope in 1046. He belonged to a noble Saxon family, was bishop of Bamberg, and chancellor to Henry III, who elevated him to the papacy. He was the first pope placed on the throne through the power of the German emperors. His short pontificate was noted only by the convocation of a council that enacted decrees against simony. He died in 1047].

Damasus the Second, a native of Bavaria, previously called Stephen (Stephanus), succeeded to the pontificate after Clement. Some say Clement was poisoned at his instigation; and this they believe because soon after Clement's death Damasus undertook to secure the pontificate by force. But Damasus lived only 23 days after this event. Those practices had so gained the upper hand that every vainglorious person undertook to attack and seize Peter's chair. But God, the Avenger, opposed this Damasus and cut short his life as a fearful example and warning to others. [Damasus II, pope from July 17th to August 9th, 1048, succeeded Clement II. His original name was Poppo, and he was bishop of Brixen, when Henry III raised him to the papacy].

Leo the Ninth, a German (Alemannus), in the Year of the Lord 1049, came into the pontificate in this manner: While the chair rested the Romans went to Emperor Henry (Heinricum), in Saxony, asking him to provide them a pope. Henry recommended Bruno, a bishop, and an evil, simple-minded man. Now when this Bruno was proceeding to Rome in his papal vestments, and passing through Vesuncium, [Vesuncium, probably Vesunna, an ancient capital of Aquitania. Its position is Perigueux, where many old Roman ruins are still to be found], two monks prevailed upon him to take off his papal attire; and he proceeded to Rome in the dress of a pilgrim. And there, on the last day of the sixth month from the time the chair became vacant, he was regularly accepted, and called Leo the Ninth. He was a good, kind man, and so diligently devoted to the giving of alms that his house was always open to the poor. Once he found a leper before his door and invited him to lie down in his bed. When they searched for the man in the morning and he could not be found anywhere, it was believed that this had been Christ instead of a poor man. Leo died in the fifth year, 2nd month, and 6th day of his pontificate. [Leo IX, pope from 1049 to 1054, a native of Upper Alsace, was originally named Bruno. Through his father he was related to Emperor Conrad II. He was educated at Toul where he successively became canon and bishop. With concurrence of the emperor and the Roman delegation assembled at Worms, he was elected pope on the death of Damasus II in 1048. He stipulated, however, that he should first proceed to Rome for canonical election by the voice of the clergy and the people. On his way to Rome he met Abbot Hugo Cluny at Besancon, where he was joined by the young monk Hildebrand, afterwards Gregory VIII. He arrived in pilgrim's garb, and at his consecration assumed the name of Leo IX. He held a number of councils at various places. In 1053, he set out against the Normans in the south, with an army of Italian and German volunteers, but was defeated. He died in 1054 and was succeeded by Victor II].

Henry (Heinricus), the third of this name, son of the aforesaid emperor Conrad, was elected successor to his father by the electors in the Year of the Lord 1040; and he reigned seventeen years. He resembled his father not only in virtue, but was also more distinguished. While his father still lived he took in marriage a beautiful daughter of the king of England. She was falsely accused of adultery. However, through a child which she brought with her from England she was protected against the accuser, who was a large strong man; and through this child she obtained a victory over this same man. Afterwards she was voluntarily divorced from her husband, and concluded her life in a cloister. After this Henry married Agnes (Agetem), sister of Duke William (Guilhelmi), of Poitiers, and he celebrated the marriage in royal manner at Inglesheim. He ordered all dangerous, frivolous and deceiving men driven out, and all he was accustomed to receive as a prince, by way of dress, horses, and money, he handed over to the poor. He was cheerful by nature, a joy to the people and unassuming; but he was feared by the enemy. He was good and kind to the poor. In the first year of his reign he proceeded against Ualrich (Oldericum), the Bohemian king, with a powerful force. But this time he returned to Germany without results. The following year he went to Bohemia with a stronger and better-equipped army, and defeated King Ualrich to such an extent that the Bohemians were obliged to pay tribute to a Roman prince for a number of years. During the same period the Hungarians were in civil revolt, some adhering to Peter, their king, the rest supporting another. Peter was driven out by force of arms, and another, called Alboin, was elevated to the kingship. Yet the discord between the nobles and the people did not abate. So at once Peter fled to Henry, appealing to him for help and support. Henry marched into Hungary with a strong force, drove out Alboin, reinstated Peter, and silenced the revolt. In the meantime dissensions, previously unheard of, occurred with regard to the papal chair. So Henry marched to Rome with a large army. Three popes were deposed, and a bishop of Bamberg (as aforesaid) was made pope. From him King Henry received the imperial crown. Finally Henry died and was buried at Spire. [Henry III (1017-1056), surnamed the 'Black,' Roman emperor, only son of the emperor Conrad II and Gisela, widow of Ernest I, duke of Swabia, was born October 28th, 1017, designated as his father's successor in 1026, and crowned German king in 1028. In 1032 he took part in a campaign in Burgundy; in 1033 he led an expedition against Ualrich, a prince of the Bohemians. In 1036 he married Gunhilda, afterwards called Kunigunde, daughter of Canute, king of Denmark and England. On his father's death Henry became sole ruler of the empire. In 1042 his attention was directed to the Hungarians, who had driven out their king Peter, and set up one Aba Samuel, or Ovo, who attacked eastern Bavaria. Henry restored Peter to the throne, and brought Hungary completely under the German king. In 1038, Kunigunde died, and in 1043 Hungry married Agnes, daughter of William V, duke of Guienne. Then followed the deposition of the rival popes; and the king secured the election of Suidger, bishop of Bamberg, who crowned Henry as emperor in 1046. He was immediately recognized by the Romans as Patricius, an office which at this time carried with it the right to appoint the pope. Returning to Germany in 1047, Henry appointed two popes, Damasus II and Leo IX, in quick succession. On Leo's death Henry nominated Gebhard, bishop of Eichstädt, to the vacant chair. The emperor died at Bodfeld in 1056. He was a peace-loving prince, favored church reforms, and sought to suppress private warfare. He was a patron of learning, a founder of schools, and completed cathedrals at Spire, Worms and Mainz].

Several historians write of the miraculous origin of this Henry (Heinrici). Like emperor Conrad the Second, he spared no disturber of the peace. Count Leopold, having violated the peace, stood in danger of the emperor, and fled to a distant forest, called the Schwarzwald. There he lived with his wife in a small hut. Now it so happened that the emperor in the course of a chase, put up there for the night. In the same night the countess bore a boy. And the emperor heard a voice from heaven, thrice repeating, Emperor, this child will be your son-in-law and heir. In the morning the emperor commanded his attendants to slay the child; but they laid it on a tree, and brought forth to the emperor the heart of a rabbit in place of that of the child. Then the duke went forth and found the child and adopted it as his heir. Long afterwards the emperor saw the lad in the duke's house, suspecting him to be the one whom he had ordered slain. And he took him up as a horseman, requesting him to take a letter to the queen. In the letter he commanded the queen to slay him as soon as she had seen the letter. But on the way the lad rested at the house of a priest, and fell asleep. The priest opened the letter, and wrote another to the effect that as soon as the queen had read the letter, she should give the youth to her daughter, if she prized her life. As soon as the youth arrived there he was given the queen's daughter.

A large flaming beam or timber was seen in the heavens between east and south, above the sun, flying toward the west and falling to the earth.

While this noble Emperor Henry (Heinricus) commendably celebrated Pentecost at Mainz, in Germany, and the imperial vessels were being prepared shortly before the office of the holy mass, a tumult arose through devilish instigation between the arch-bishop and the servants of the abbot of Fulda as to which should sit next to the emperor. Various words led to blows, and the vestibule of the church flowed with blood. With the arrival of bishops and others, quiet was restored, the church cleansed, and the mass completed with much devotion. But when, among others, the verse, This day you have made celebrated, was sung in regular order, a devilish voice spoke from the air, This day I have made warlike. And immediately all the people succumbed to fear; and the emperor, noting the devil's hilarity, said: You, the inventor of all evil, have filled this day with sorrow. So, by the grace of God we will make it a gracious one for the poor and the needy. After completion of the office, he caused the poor and needy to be brought forth, and with his own hands gave them rich foods.

A wicked sorceress, who lived in England, died; and while the priests were singing the Psalm, she was terribly pulled about by the Devil, who set her on a horrible horse and rode through the air with her; and for fully four miles a fearful and terrifying cry was heard.

In the time of Henry (Heinrici) the Third the Church of the Glorious Resurrection at Jerusalem, which had been destroyed by the Arabs, was rebuilt. For after the power of the Egyptians began to prevail over the Persians, the Egyptians, before the advent of the Turks, possessed all the territory from Egypt to Antioch, including the holy city of Jerusalem and the adjacent country. Afterwards Caliphas, the governor, a bad man hated by God and men, undertook among others of his misdeeds to level the said Church of the Resurrection to the ground. This occurred in the year 1018 after the Incarnation of the Lord, while Herestus, a good man, and brother of the said tyrant's mother, presided over the said church. From this point Christian customs, through bitter pains and according to many signs, turned to evil. After the death of this tyrant, his son, at the solicitation of the Constantinopolitans, began to show himself a good man, and he gave the faithful authority to rebuild the church. When the funds of the Christians at Jerusalem proved insufficient to rebuild the church, they appealed to the emperor at Constantinople for assistance. He personally advanced the money; and so the Christians with fiery zeal rebuilt the Church of the Holy Resurrection in the year 1098 after the Incarnation of the Lord. [The Church of the Holy (or Glorious) Resurrection is today best known as The Church of the Holy Sepulchre. It is a Christian church within the Old City of Jerusalem. The church is venerated by Christians as being built over Golgotha (the Hill of Calvary), where Jesus was crucified, and is said to also contain the place where Jesus was buried (the sepulchre)].

Campanus, a very distinguished teacher and a very great astronomer, who was held in high esteem at this time, wrote about various things with great courage, and particularly the things established by Ptolemy, the astronomer, interpreting them and adding his own observations and his reasons for that purpose. [Johannes Campanus (1220-1296) was an Italian astrologer, astronomer, and mathematician who served under both Pope Urban IV and Pope Boniface VIII. His travels to Arabia and Spain allowed him access to lost ancient Greek works in Arabic translation. In 1260 he published a Latin edition of Euclid's, in fifteen books based on an Arabic translation of the original Greek text, though he probably also had access to the Latin translation of Euclid's work executed around 1120 by Adelard of Bath.]

Guido, a very highly renowned master of song, and a native of the city of Arezzo, enjoyed high praise at this time; and, as the learned know, made beautiful and masterly observations and established rules in the art of music.

Guido of Arezzo (c. 990-1050), a musician who lived in the 11th century is also known as Guido Aretinus, Fra Guittone, and Guy of Arezzo. He has been called the father of modern music, the musicians of his time applying to him the somewhat comprehensive phrase Beatus Guido inventor musicae ('Blessed Guido, inventor of music'). At his first appearance in history, Guido was a monk in the Benedictine monastery of Pomposa, where he taught singing and invented his educational method, by means of which, according to his own statement, a pupil might learn in five months what formerly would have taken him ten years to acquire. Envy and jealousy, however, drove him from the monastery, and he went to live at Arezzo, where about 1030, he received an invitation to Rome from Pope John XIV. The pope himself became his first and apparently one of his most proficient pupils. There is no question about the importance of his musical reforms and innovations. He for the first time systematically used the lines of the staff, and the intervals or 'spatia' between them. There is also little doubt that the first six notes of the scale, ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, still in use in France and Italy, were introduced by him. They were derived from the first syllables of six lines of a hymn addressed to John the Baptist, the initial notes of each line of which happened to form the scale, C, D, E, F, G, A.

In addition, Guido is generally credited with the introduction of the F clef and with writings on music which are amply sufficient to account for the high esteem in which he was held by his contemporaries. The term 'si' was not used till the 17th century, when LeMaire introduced it as a name for the 7th note of the scale.

Hugo, abbot of Cluny, renowned for his learning, noble birth, goodness, and piety, at this time wrote various praiseworthy and valiant things.

Lanfranc, native of Pavia, and a distinguished teacher, and master of Anselm, the distinguished teacher, was at this time highly renowned in Gaul and Paris. Through the influence of the Holy Spirit he left school, returned to his home, gave all his possessions to the poor, and served God with great humility throughout his life. Afterwards he became archbishop of Canterbury, and accomplished much good in the English churches. [Lanfranc (d. 1089), archbishop of Canterbury, was born in the 11th century at Paris, where his father Hanbold was a magistrate. Lanfranc studied law, and tradition linked him with Irnerius of Bologna as a pioneer in the renaissance of Roman law. After his father's death he crossed the Alps to found a school in France. About 1039 he became master of the cathedral school at Avranches, where he taught for three years. In 1042 he entered the newly founded house of Bec, and lived there in absolute seclusion until 1045, when he was persuaded to open his school in the monastery. His pupils were drawn from many parts of Europe and attained to high positions in the church. One of these, Anselm, of Badagio, became pope as Alexander II. Lanfranc's favorite subjects were logic and dogmatic theology. Against Berengar of Tours, he defended the doctrine of transubstantiation, although Berengar had been his personal friend. He also became a political force. He was nominated to the English primacy in 1070, and in the domestic affairs of England he sought to extricate the church from the fetters of the State and of secular interests. His influence shaped the famous ordinance separating the ecclesiastical from the clerical courts. On the death of William the Conqueror he secured the succession of William Rufus in spite of the discontent of the Anglo-Norman baronage. He died in 1089].

Theobald, also a noble Frenchman and spiritual man, was held in great veneration at this time on account of his learning and piety. He also wrote and compiled various things. [This may refer to Theobald (d. 1161), an archbishop of Canterbury, of Norman parentage, the date of whose birth is unknown. Early in life he entered the abbey of Bec, of which he became prior in 1127, and an abbot ten years later. In 1138 he became archbishop of Canterbury. Theobald died April 18th, 1161. In history Theobald lives chiefly as the patron of three eminent men: Becket, who began life as a clerk in his household; Master Vacarius, the Italian jurist, who was the first to teach Roman law in England; and John of Salisbury, the learned scholar. Theobald's household was a little university, and in it were trained many leading prelates of the next generation].

Hermann, the Lame, also a cleric, was a native of Germany (Alemannus), and a man of extraordinary intelligence and highly experienced in divine matters. He wrote many valiant songs of praise, and particularly the Salve Regina, in honor of the Virgin Mary. He also wrote many other excellent and artistic things. [Hermann of Reichenau, commonly distinguished as Hermannus Contractus, i.e., the Lame (1013-1054), German scholar and chronicler, became a monk of the famous abbey of Reichenau, exercising a great personal and intellectual influence on the scholars that gathered about him. Besides the ordinary monastic studies he devoted himself to mathematics, astronomy and music, and constructed watches and various instruments. He is sometimes credited with the composition of the Latin hymns , , and].

The body of the giant Pallas, the son of Evander, was found at this time, and with it a burning candle. In the center of the body was a wound, open to the extent of two and one-half feet. The candle could not be extinguished by water nor by blowing. However, a man of subtle intelligence made a hole below the flame with a stylus, and when the air entered from below, the flame was extinguished. The body was so huge that when it leaned against a wall, it over-topped the parapet. A number of days later the body disintegrated like any other human corpse. [Evander is represented in a late legend as an Arcadian who settled very early on the Palatine at Rome, where he founded a town named Pallantion, after his native place. He had a son, Pallas, who was an ally of Aeneas, who was slain by the Rutulian Turnus].

Berengarius, a doctor, after flourishing for some time for his piety, scriptural wisdom and learning, fell into error through the prolixity of his art with regard to the holy sacrament; and he poisoned the minds of many people with his errors. Afterwards, however, he was so enlightened by divine grace that at the Council of Vercelli he publicly renounced his errors, and discontinued his subtle and adroit teaching. All he possessed he spent for the glory of God, sustaining himself the rest of his days by manual labor, and consuming his time in piety. [For Berengarius, see the following paragraph and note].

In later years Pope Leo called a council at Vercelli against the errors of the said Berengarius, and by said council said Berengarius was condemned as one who had erred. However, having become enlightened (as above stated), he well ended his days.

Berengarius, medieval theologian, born at Tours, was educated in the famous school of Fulbert of Chartres. Later as director of the cathedral school of his native city, he taught with such success as to attract pupils from all parts of France, and powerfully contributed to diffuse an interest in the study of logic and metaphysics, and to introduce the dialectic development of theology. The earliest of his writings of which we have any record is an Exhortatory Discourse to the hermits of his district, written at their own request for their spiritual edification. It shows a clear discernment of the dangers of the ascetic life. Sometime before 1040, Berengarius was made archdeacon of Angers. It was shortly after this that rumors began to spread of his heretical views regarding the sacrament of the Eucharist. Transubstantiation, he held, was contrary to reason, unwarranted by Scripture, and inconsistent with the teaching of men like Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine. He did not conceal this conviction from his scholars and friends, and through them the report spread widely that he denied the common doctrine respecting the Eucharist. Berengarius was not affected by the exhortations of his friends nor by those of other officers of the Church; and hearing that Lanfranc, the most celebrated theologian of his day, strongly approved the doctrine of Paschasius and condemned that of Scotus Eriugena (really Ratramnus), he wrote him expressing his surprise and urging him to reconsider. Lanfranc, who was then in Rome (1050), brought the letter to the notice of Leo IX with the result that the Berengarius was excommunicated and ordered to appear before the Council of Vercelli which was to be held later in the year. Before it assembled, he was cast into prison, and only when it was too late were the bishop of Angers and other powerful friends able to procure his release. At the council of Tours (1054), he found a protector in the papal legate, the famous Hildebrand, who satisfied with the fact that Berengarius did not deny the real presence of Christ in the sacramental elements, succeeded in persuading the assembly to be content with a general confession that the bread and wine, after consecration, were truly the body and blood of the Lord, without requiring him to define how. At the council of Rome (1059), Berengarius signed a formula of faith defining the real presence in a very realistic manner; but on returning to France he continued to attack the doctrine of transubstantiation, apparently without objection from civil or ecclesiastical superiors. Finally, Hildebrand (now Pope Gregory VII) summoned him to Rome, and, in the council of 1078, tried once more to obtain a declaration of his orthodoxy in general terms; but in the council of the following year Berengarius was forced to acknowledge a change of the bread into the body of Christ, not merely by sign and virtue of the sacrament, but in the very nature and truth of substance. He was kindly dismissed by the pope, with a letter recommending him to the protection of the bishops of Tours and Angers, and another pronouncing anathema on all who should do him any injury or call him a heretic. Berengarius again recalled his confession, but at the council of Bordeaux (1080), made a final retraction. He passed the rest of his life in retirement and prayer on the island of St. Come, near Tours, where he died in 1088. He left behind him a number of followers.

The objections of Berengarius to transubstantiation were chiefly metaphysical. Accidents, he argued, cannot exist without their substance, and if the accidents of bread are present on the altar, their substance, and not that of the body of Christ, will be there. Besides, if Christ is present, and bread alone is seen, there is deception, for Christ, who is God, represents himself other than he actually is. Again, if Christ is in heaven, he cannot be on earth or on many altars, since nobody can be in different places at the same time. Moreover, the body of Christ after resurrection became incorruptible; therefore, it cannot be broken with the teeth or daily re-created. This reasoning Berengarius supports by the Bible and the Fathers. He seems, however, to have admitted the real presence in the Eucharist, for he allowed that, after the consecration the elements undergo a conversion, not losing the being that they have, but in a sense acquiring something else, that something being the real and invisible body of Christ which constitutes the res sacramenti. The position of Berengarius was not entirely new, for in the ninth century, Ratramnus, a monk of Corbie, had rejected the substantial change in the elements and Eriugena had regarded the Eucharist as merely a memorial. As far as the church was concerned, the debates with Berengarius led to a clearer exposition of the nature of the change in the sacrament, and an enrichment of the terminology applicable to Eucharistic dogma.

In these times, in the Year of the Lord 1040, flourished the Blessed John (Iohannes), originator and founder of the Order of Vallombrosa under the rule of the Blessed Benedict, with the addition of various other regulations and a prescribed gray habit. Of these there are many in Tuscany and Upper Lombardy. This holy man, a native of Florence (whose father Gualbert was a knight), according to legend and history came to enter upon a spiritual life in this manner: He was at enmity with his neighbor because the latter had slain his brother. Once upon a time John went from the country to Florence, having with him certain men at arms. And the murderer of his brother came toward him unexpectedly in the mountains not far from the monastery of San Miniato. John attacked him; but when the murderer saw that he was captured and had no hope of escape, he fell to the feet of this John, in the name of the crucified Christ begging him for mercy and forgiveness. And at this John was so moved that he forgot his rage for his brother's sake against the murderer, and forgave him all guilt. Then John arrived at the church of San Miniato (which was on the way) and stood before the crucifix, the head of the image nodded to him in evidence of divine pleasure because of his absolution and forgiveness of the punishment merited by the murderer. Even today the same crucifix is shown and greatly venerated in the same church at Florence upon a mount, as a memorial to this miracle. By the admonition involved in this miracle, this holy man was so affected that he soon adjusted himself to a spiritual life, and as a hermit secluded himself in the region called Vallombrosa, in the Apennines, and by the piety of his life he attained to greater grace with God, and as a pious monk residing in the same region, he established the monastery of the Order, from which many other places originated and from which they derived their names. This Order was afterwards illustrious for its holy and highly learned men. And as this John was of a spiritual nature, he was accustomed to tame the flesh by fasting, by abstinence in food and drink, and by wakefulness. He avoided idleness and devoted himself to prayer and good works. Later he performed works of piety in the healing of the sick. Finally, in the Year of the Incarnation 1073, he died in blessedness; and because of his many miracles, Pope Gregory, the seventh pope of this name, before long enrolled him on the list of the saints. He was buried on the third day after his death in the church of the monastery of Pasignano. After his passing omnipotent God performed many miracles through him.

John Gualbert (985 or 995 - July 12, 1073) was born at Florence. His father, who was of high military rank, gave him a good education according to the ideas of the time: He excelled in all manly exercises and entered on the active career of a young Florentine noble. When he was still a young man, his only brother, Hugo, was murdered by a man with whom he had a quarrel. Gualbert, whose grief and fury were stimulated by the rage of his father, and the tears of his mother, set forth in pursuit of the assassin, vowing vengeance. It happened, that when returning from Florence to the country house of his father on the evening of Good Friday, he took his way over a narrow winding road that leads from the city gate to the church of San Miniato-del-Monte. About halfway up the hill, where the road turns to the right, he suddenly came upon his enemy, alone and unarmed. Gualbert drew his sword, and the other seeing no means of escape, fell upon his knees, entreating for mercy. He extended his arms in the form of a cross, and adjured Gualbert by the remembrance of Christ, who had suffered on that day, to spare his life. Gualbert, struck with sudden compunction, remembering that Christ when on the cross had prayed for his murderers, stayed his uplifted sword, and after a moment of terrible conflict in his own heart, he held out his hand, raised the suppliant, and embraced him in token of forgiveness. Thus they parted; and Gualbert proceeded on his weary way, thinking of the crime he had been on the point of committing, when he arrived at the church of San Miniato, entered, and kneeled before the crucifix over the altar. His rage had given way to tears and as he wept before the image of the Savior, and supplicated mercy because he had shown mercy, the figure bowed its head. This crucifix is preserved in the Church of the Trinity at Florence, which belongs to the Vallombrosan Order. From that moment, the world and all its vanities became hateful to Gualbert; he felt like one who had been saved upon the edge of a precipice. He entered the Benedictine Order, taking up his residence in the monastery of San Miniato. Here he dwelt for some time as a humble penitent. He left the convent and retired to a isolated place amid the Apennines about twenty miles from Florence, the Vallombrosa, renowned for its poetical and religious associations. Here he built a little hut in company with two other hermits. But others, attracted by his sanctity, collected around him, and he finally found it necessary to introduce some order into this community. He gave his disciples the rule of Benedict, renewing those strict observances which for three centuries had been almost discarded; adding also some new obligations – for example, that of silence.

The new institution received the confirmation of the pope, and the founder lived to see twelve houses of his Order spring up around him. Gualbert died in 1073. The Benedictine abbey and motherhouse of Vallombrosa, founded by Gualbert in 1038 near Florence is no longer in existence.

Ulm (Ulma) is an ornament to Swabia, and an imperial city. Although some say that its origin and beginning are not known, yet its age and veneration are indicated by its name, which was derived from the natural condition of its moist, clayish soil, which is conducive to the growth of elms. After abandoning its rude state the city was given the Latin name of Ulma from these same elms. [Ulmus (Latin), 'the elm'; Ulme (German), 'the elm tree']. This is a free city subject to no one except the Roman king. Together with Bamberg, Schlettstadt, and Magenau, it makes up the four villages dedicated to the Holy Roman Empire. [See illustration, Folio CLXXV recto]. Not that Ulm is a village now, but it may have been destroyed through the ravages of war, and thus left without walls for some time. However, it was rebuilt later and became a strong fortified place. The navigable Danube, rich in good edible fish, flows along a portion of the wall. Through the upper part of the city runs also a notable river, the Iller. By means of these rivers large quantities of wood for building and for fuel are brought to this city and to places above and below the same. The river Blau also runs through the city. Ulm is protected by deep moats and high towers and is filled with picturesque houses—among others, the beautiful parish church of Mary the Mother of God—a large structure, begun in the Year of the Lord 1377, and in course of completion as this book is being finished; and the church should and may be completed, with its tower, as here visualized, and embellished at such enormous, remarkable and incalculable expenditure of labor, skill and funds (now and in the future to be expended) that the like of it is scarcely to be found in all the world. The church is very tall, has many vaults, and is so large that many people, numbering thousands, may congregate therein on festival days. And there is hardly a single church that has so many clergymen. In it are 52 altars and 52 memorial chapels; also a carved shrine for the sacrament, and a choir carved in wood. In this church there is held, at considerable cost, in honor and praise of God the Almighty and his Mother, and for the edification of the people, a great, beautiful and remarkable uninterrupted and endowed divine service, performed early and late in a praiseworthy manner. Ulm also has learned counsellors who administer the public welfare with prudence; because of the latter in a short time it grew from poverty to riches, and from a condition of servitude to one of mastery; so that Ulm now excels wealthier cities in revenue and funds. It has three counties purchased with its own money, and has enjoyed such a variety of trade that many have sustained themselves by it, some growing wealthy, and others poor. Many other things could be said in love and praise of this imperial city, but abbreviation of the material does not permit that.

Ulm, a city of Germany in the Republic of Württemberg, situated on the left bank of the Danube, at the foot of the Swabian Alps, 58 miles southeast of Stuttgart by rail, is mentioned as early as 854. It became a town in 1027 and was soon the principal place in the duchy of Swabia. Although burned down by Henry the Lion, it soon recovered from this disaster and became a free imperial town in 1155. Its trade and commerce prospered, and in the 15th century it attained the summit of its prosperity, ruling over a district of 300 square miles, and having a population of about 60,000. In 1803 it lost its freedom and passed to Bavaria. It was ceded to Württemberg in 1809. Ulm is remarkable in the history of German literature as the spot where the Meistersingers lingered longest, preserving without text and without notes the traditional lore of their craft.

Ulm still preserves the appearance of a free imperial town, and contains many medieval buildings of historic and of artistic interest. The magnificent early Gothic cathedral, begun in 1377, and carried on at intervals till the 16th century, was long left unfinished; but in 1844 the work of restoration and completion was begun, being completed in 1890. It has double aisles and a pentagonal apsidal choir, but no transepts. Its length (outside measurement) is 464 feet, its breadth 159 feet; and the aisles are covered with rich net-vaulting. The tower in the center of the west façade was completed in 1890, and is the tallest ecclesiastical erection in the world (528 feet). The cathedral contains some fine stained glass, and a number of interesting old paintings and carvings. It belongs to the Protestant Church.

The Danube, joined by the Iller just above the town, and by the Blau just below, here becomes navigable, so that Ulm occupies the important commercial position of a terminal river-port. Ulm has been famous as a fortress, and is a garrison town. It is encircled by walls, moats, and towers, the circuit of which can hardly be completed in a five-hour walk. The nucleus of the defenses is the citadel, the Wilhelmsburg.

The German edition of the Chronicle contains a prose adaptation (translated here) of a poem about Ulm by an anonymous author in the Latin edition.

City of Ulm (Ulma)

A special double-page woodcut is devoted to the city of Ulm. It is depicted as the typical fortified medieval city, the Danube flowing along its walls. In the background is rugged and elevated country, for the city lies at the foot of the Swabian Alps. Behind the walls the great cathedral of Ulm is seen in process of construction. Hoisting apparatus, indicating that the tower is not yet completed, may be noted at the top of the structure. The church was begun in 1377, one hundred and sixteen years before the Chronicle was written, and was not finally completed until the year 1890. Although the city was already a flourishing one in 1493, due to the navigability of the Danube as far as Ulm, very little shipping is indicated. At one point a swan is swimming down the river; at another place we see two rafts; to this we add a gondola and two rowboats, and we have the extent of Ulm's shipping as seen by the woodcutter. A few houses and other structures are indicated behind the walls, but there is little evidence of human activity. Here and there shrubbery and trees may be noted—possibly elms—introduced to bear out the derivation of the city's name from the elm. A single bridge crosses the river connecting the city with its counterpart, New Ulm, on the opposite side of the river. The bridge enters the old city through a tall tower elaborately decorated with murals. The Blau and the Iller, branches of the Danube, which flow through the city, are not indicated.

Pope Victor the Second, formerly called Gebhard, a Bavarian by birth, and seventeenth bishop of Eichstadt, secured the papal office after Leo; but rather by the grace of Henry (Heinrici) than a free election; for the Roman clergy and people feared the might of Henry. Now after this Victor was confirmed in the papal see by common consent of the people, he held a great council at Florence, and there he deposed many bishops from their bishoprics for simony and wantonness, admonishing the clergy what was becoming to them, and reminding them of the pains and penalties prescribed by ecclesiastical law for such violations. This Victor died in the second year, third month, and fourteenth day of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for 11 days. [Victor II, successor to Leo IX, was the son of a Swabian baron, and his baptismal name was Gebhard. While still a young man, he was appointed to the see of Eichstädt, and he soon became the chief advisor of Emperor Henry III. Henry nominated him to the papacy at the instance of a Roman deputation headed by Hildebrand. In 1035, Victor met the emperor at Florence, and held a council, which condemned once again clerical marriages, simony, and the alienation of the estates of the church. In 1056, Emperor Henry died, and Victor, having become guardian of his infant son, and adviser of the empress Agnes, now wielded enormous power which he used for the maintenance of peace, the strengthening of the papacy, and the checking the aggressions of the barons. He died in 1057 and was succeeded by Stephen IX].

Pope Stephen (Stephanus) the Ninth, formerly called Frederick, a native of Lorraine, was regularly elected pope after the death of Victor. As soon as he had entered upon his pontificate he diligently directed his attention to securing recognition of the supremacy of the Roman church on the part of the church of Milan, which for nearly two hundred years had remained severed from it. When this pope learned that practically all Italy and Burgundy were tainted with simony, he sent Hildebrand, the arch-deacon, there to cleanse them of that evil. He planned to hold a council at Florence, but died in the eighth month and eighth day (of his pontificate), and was buried in the cathedral church at Florence. [Stephen IX, pope from August 1057 to March 1058, succeeded Victor II. His baptismal name was Frederick, and he was a younger brother of Godfrey, duke of Upper Lorraine. Frederick, who had been raised to cardinal by Leo IX, acted for some time as papal legate at Constantinople, and was with Leo in his unlucky expedition against the Normans. He shared his brother's fortunes, and at one time had to take refuge from Henry III in Monte Cassino. Five days after the death of Victor II he was chosen to succeed him. He died in 1058].

Benedict the Tenth, a native of Campania who was first called Mincius (Nuncius), was named pope by the powerful Roman nobles contrary to the wishes of the cardinals and entire clergy of Rome. Now when this Nuncius, a bishop of Velletri, had been forced into the pontificate as Benedict the Tenth, and no orderly election could be held at Rome, Hildebrand, the cardinals, bishops, and other members of the clergy proceeded to Siena and elected Gerard, while Benedict was driven out in the ninth month and tenth day of his pontificate. [Benedict X (Johannes 'Mincius,' that is, the 'lout' or 'dolt,' bishop of Velletri) was pope from 1058 to 1059, having been elected to succeed Stephen IX through the influence of the Roman barons, who, however, had pledged themselves to take no action without Hildebrand, who was then absent from Rome. Hildebrand put forward an opposition pope in the person of Gerard, bishop of Florence (pope as Nicholas II) whom he supported against the Roman aristocracy, with the help of the Normans Hildebrand seized the castle of Galeria, where Benedict had taken refuge, and degraded him to the rank of a simple priest].

Pope Nicholas the Second, a native of Burgundy (Allobrogus), formerly a bishop of Florence, and called Gerard, was elected pope at Siena because of his virtue and extraordinary intelligence, after the deposition of the irregularly elected Benedict. This highly wise and prudent pope, in the same council, prescribed the form and manner in which the popes should be elected by the cardinals, which ordinance was then incorporated into the ecclesiastical laws. A council was held at Sutrium in the Year of the Lord one thousand fifty-nine, at which the bishops and nobility were present. Some write that in this council Berengarius was recalled from his errors. Some say that Henry (Heinricum) the Fourth received his imperial crown from this Nicholas the Second. Nicholas died in the third year, 6th month and 26th day of his pontificate. The seat then was vacant for 12 days. [Nicholas II, pope from 1058 to 1061, was a Burgundian named Gerard, who at the time of his election was bishop of Florence. He was opposed in the candidacy by Benedict X, the nominee of the Roman nobles, and was crowned after the latter's expulsion in 1059. He entered into relation with the Normans, now firmly established in southern Italy. He continued the reforms of Hildebrand, sharpening the discipline of the clergy and regulating future elections to the Holy See. The emperor's traditional rights in the matter of papal elections were completely ignored. Stephen, cardinal priest of St. Chrysogonus, was sent to the German court to attempt to allay the consequent ill feeling, but was not received. Pope Nicholas, moreover, had offended the German bishops by what they regarded as arbitrary interference with their rights; and they retaliated in a synod held in 1061, by declaring the new electoral law annulled, and the pope himself deposed. But party strife in Germany enabled the pope to ignore these proceedings. He died in July 1061].

Alexander the Second, previously called Anselm (Anshelmus), a native of Milan, and a bishop of Lucca, was in his absence, and because of his graciousness, goodness, mildness and learning, elected pope after the death of Nicholas; and as such he came to Rome in pontifical vestments. However, the bishops on this side of the mountains, considered it fitting that one of their own country, and among their own number should be elected. Through Gibertus of Parma, they secured from Emperor Henry (Heinrico), contrary to the wishes of his mother Agnes (Agnete), authority to elect another as pope. For this reason the devilish bishops proceeded to Lombardy, and elected Cadalus of Parma as antipope. Cadalus proceeded to Rome, became involved in a battle in the field of Nero, and was driven from Rome. He was subservient to those beyond the mountains. Afterwards, through the son of Cincius, the governor at Rome, he was taken to the Castle Angelo. But when Emperor Henry realized his mistake, he reinstated Alexander, who died in the 11th year and 6th month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Lateran Basilica. [Alexander II (Anselmo Baggio), pope from 1061 to 1073, was a native of Milan. As bishop of Lucca, he seconded the efforts of Hildebrand (afterwards Gregory VII) for the suppression of simony and enforcement of the celibacy of the clergy. By Hildebrand's influence he was elected pope, but the German court nominated Cadalus, bishop of Parma, who was proclaimed at the council of Basel as Honorius II, and marched to Rome. Alexander's ultimate victory over his rival was due to Hildebrand].

Henry (Heinricus) the Fourth, son of the aforesaid Henry the Third, while still a boy, was elected future king and emperor by the electors upon the death of his father in the Year of the Lord 1057; and he reigned for 48 years or, as others have it, fifty (years). After his father's death he was under the guardianship of his mother, Empress Agnes (Agnētis), who for some time ruled the empire wisely and in peace. Later, through the misguidance of his people, Henry ignored his mother and became estranged from her, and this was the reason and the seed of great dissensions. The queen, a woman devoted to the service of God, did not want to become involved in secular affairs, and she chose a spiritual life in a cloister. For devotional reasons she later went to Rome, and there performed many good and virtuous works until her holy end. She was buried in the Church of the Blessed Peter beside the altar of Blessed Petronella. This victorious Emperor Henry, who was crowned at Rome, returned homeward with his army, passing through Apuleia. For a long time he was worthy of renown, just, sharp-witted, generous in the giving of alms, and a very fortunate prince in military affairs. Toward the end of his sovereignty, however, he suffered opposition in his dealings on the part of the princes and at the hands of his own son. To enjoy the freedom of his youth he went to Saxony to live; but after he decided to oppress nobility, and became more addicted to the chase and sports than to the cares of government, the Saxons began to disrespect him; and they reported many things against him to the pope. Then Henry left Saxony, undertaking to rule other regions of the empire. He also considered how he might reduce the power of the pontiff; for this reason he made Cadalus, bishop of Parma, pope. Out of this arose much mischief and bloodshed. While these matters arose in Italy, Henry made war on the Saxons, defeating them; but not without suffering on his side; for he lost five thousand of his men at arms. Because of this victory he became so proud that he undertook many unseemly things against the pope. First, he attempted to withdraw from obedience to the pope; and he ordered Siegfried, archbishop of Mainz, to convene a council at Worms. At this council the bishops and abbots of the empire were admonished not to regard Gregory as pope. For this reason Gregory deposed these bishops from their churches, forbade Henry the exercise of his sovereignty, title and office, and, by virtue of his papal authority, absolved all princes and the people from the allegiance which they were accustomed to extend to the said Henry. Then many prelates, princes, and people, and a large part of the Germans, became estranged from said Henry. The Saxons were the first to make war against him, and thus Henry was compelled humbly to ask pardon of the pope. And the pope restored him to the peace of Mother Church. After vowing to keep the peace, Henry went to Pavia. But he soon violated it, making fresh attempts to depose Gregory. He called a council, made Gibertus, archbishop of Ravenna, pope, under the name of Clement. In a spirit of enmity he took Clement to Rome, and besieged Gregory in the Castle Angelo. Then Guiscard, duke of Apuleia, came to the aid of Gregory; and Henry, with his pope Clement, returned to Germany, and besieged the city of Augsburg. Later, in the year 1099 at Aix-la-Chapelle he made his young son king as Henry the Fifth. In the sixth year this son quarreled with his father, and defeated him at Liege. It is said that prior to this Henry no emperor was excommunicated by the pope. After his death Henry the Fourth was buried, first at Liege, but was later taken to Spire. There he remained unburied for five years, but was finally given honorable interment.

Henry IV (1050-1106), Roman emperor, son of the emperor Henry III, and Agnes, daughter of William V, duke of Guienne, was born in 1050, chosen German king in 1053, crowned in 1054, appointed duke of Bavaria on his father's death in 1055, and in 1056 inherited the kingdoms of Germany, Italy, and Burgundy. They were governed in his name by his mother, who in 1062 was compelled to hand over control to the bishops of Cologne and Bremen. In March 1065 Henry was declared of age, and in the following year married Bertha, daughter of Otto, count of Savoy.

Henry led expeditions into Saxony and quarreled with the dukes of Swabia and Carinthia. He aroused the hostility of the Thuringians by supporting Siegfried, archbishop of Mainz in his efforts to exact tithes from them. In 1073 they joined the Saxons, and the struggle for fifteen years which followed, exercised an important influence on Henry's misfortune elsewhere. He was compelled by the Saxon rebellion to come to amicable terms with the pope, with whom he was also at enmity, and who had excommunicated him and absolved his subjects from allegiance. The excommunication produced a profound impression both in Germany and in Italy, and there was a general revulsion of sentiment in favor of Gregory. The princes of the empire met at Tribur, and Henry was saved from the loss of his scepter only by their failure to agree on a successor. They settled that, if, on the anniversary of his excommunication, Henry still lay under the ban, the throne should be considered vacant. Henry wisely went to Italy in person and did penance before Gregory at Canossa; and although reconciliation was effected after prolonged negotiations, the great questions, notably that of investiture, still remained unsettled.

Henry left Italy to find that in his absence Rudolph, duke of Swabia, had been chosen German king; and although Hildebrand (Gregory VII) had taken no part in this election, Henry sought to prevent the pope's journey to Germany, and tried to recover his former position. Though supported by most of the German bishops and by the Lombards, and recognized in Burgundy, Bavaria, and Franconia, Henry suffered defeat in 1078 and again in 1080. Gregory's attitude remained neutral, in spite of appeals from both sides, until March 1080, when he again excommunicated Henry. At Henry's initiative, Gregory was deposed on three occasions, and an anti-pope was elected in the person of Wibert, archbishop of Ravenna, who took the name of Clement III.

The duke Rudolf, rival German king, died in October 1080, and this left Henry at liberty to go to Italy early in 1081. Attempts at reconciliation with the pope failed, and, in March 1084, Gregory was declared deposed and Clement was recognized by the Romans. In the same month Henry was crowned by Clement, and received the patrician authority. His next step was to attack the fortresses still in the hands of the pope, but the advance of Robert Guiscard, duke of Apuleia, compelled him to return to Germany.

Meanwhile, the German rebels had chosen a fresh anti-king, Hermann, count of Luxemburg. In 1086 Henry was defeated near Würzburg, but Hermann abandoned the struggle, and the emperor was generally recognized in Saxony. Although Henry's power was in the ascendant, a few powerful nobles adhered to the cause of the new pope, Urban II. Among them was Welf, son of the deposed duke of Bavaria, whose marriage with Matilda of Tuscany rendered him formidable. The emperor therefore returned to Italy in 1090, where Mantua and Milan were taken, and Pope Clement was restored to Rome.

Henry's first wife died in 1087 and he remarried in 1089. The conduct of his second wife aroused suspicion, which was also directed against his eldest son Conrad, who had been crowned German king in 1087. The papal party induced Conrad to desert his father, and to be crowned king of Italy in 1093. After five years of inactivity Henry returned to Germany, where his position was stronger than ever. A diet assembled at Mainz in 1098 deposed Conrad and chose the emperor's second son Henry (afterwards Emperor Henry V) as German king. But the younger Henry, encouraged by the adherents of the pope, decided he owed no allegiance to an excommunicated father, and in 1105 the emperor became a prisoner in the hands of his son. A diet at Mainz compelled him to abdicate. He escaped to Cologne, and entered into negotiations with England, France and Denmark. He was engaged in collecting an army when he died at Liege on August 7th, 1106.

After a licentious youth, Henry displayed much diplomatic ability. His abasement at Canossa may be regarded as a move of policy to weaken the pope's position at the cost of a personal humiliation to himself. He was a friend of the lower orders, capable of generosity, and possessed military skill.

Rudolph, duke of Saxony, was elevated to the kingship in consequence of the aforesaid Henry's (Heinricus) breach of the peace and reverses at Pforzheim; and he was anointed as king in mid-lent by Siegfried, archbishop of Mainz. Henry desired first of all that the pope drive Rudolf from the empire by excommunication; but as he could not induce the pope to do this, both sides resorted to arms, and fought three severe battles. And although the pope sent his special messengers to Germany for the purpose of settling the controversy, Henry would not consent unless Rudolf was excommunicated by papal authority. Therefore Henry, with force of arms, proceeded into Saxony against Rudolf. Rudolf engaged him with three wagon-fortresses, and they fought one another for the fourth time. Rudolf was accidentally wounded by his own men. Henry was lost in flight, and was not found until seven days later. Rudolf, having died from his wounds, was buried at Merseburg.

The Order Of Grandmont had its origin under Father Stephen (Stephano) in the Year of the Lord 1076. This same Stephen, son of a nobleman of Auvergne, was taken to Benevento during his childhood by his father; and there for 12 years he was brought up in learning and a good virtuous life by Saint Milo, the archbishop. Afterwards he wandered forth through many wildernesses and hermitages, acquainting himself with the life and manners of many spiritual people. Finally, through divine guidance, he came to a wooded mountain in Aquitaine. There he found a spring, sharp crags, wastes, and a perilous terrain. But Stephen was happy, and promised God to serve him there for all time. At the age of thirty he began life as a hermit, constantly fasting, watching, and praying in the service of God. His food was bread and water, and at times a crumb of wheat bran. When the number of his disciples increased, he showed himself the least among them. During his last illness he addressed his brethren thus: I leave you only God the Creator of all things. If you will always remain devoted to poverty, he will, through the prudence with which he rules all things, provide you with all that you shall need. He died in blessedness in his 80th year. And the brethren elected Peter of Limoges as prior. Now, the Augustinian monks thought that the region where Stephen's brethren had resided belonged to them. Therefore the brethren decided to leave the region and prayed God to indicate to them a convenient place for their future residence, when the Agnus Dei had been sung three times, a voice was heard from heaven, thrice repeating, In Grandmont. This was heard by the prior and some of the brethren. On conclusion of the mass they came upon the location thus revealed, not far from their former residence. There they built a church and houses; and they carried the holy remains from there and buried them before the altar. This very few people knew. There a man afflicted with the gout was healed, a blind man's sight restored, and many other miracles occurred. But the prior ordered these to be kept secret, so that no commotion or concourse of the people would take place.

Stephen of Grandmont was born in 1046, in the castle of Thiers, in Auvergne, belonging to his father, the Viscount de Thiers. At the early age of 12 his father took him on a pilgrimage to Italy. On his return the lad fell ill at Benevento, and the father was obliged to leave him under the charge of Milo, archbishop of that city. This prelate reared young Stephen with great care in all holy lore, and he afterwards became deacon. When the bishop died, Stephen, now 24, went to Rome and remained there four years. He resolved to live in great holiness, like the monks of Calabria. In 1076, he retired to a mountain near Limoges, where, among the rocks and trees he built a small cabin and took a vow to serve God in this hermitage. There he passed 46 years in prayer, and the practice of such austerities as almost surpassed the strength of a human body. He lived at first on wild herbs and roots. In the second summer certain shepherds discovered him and brought him a little coarse bread; which some country people from then on continued to do as long as he lived. He also wore next to his skin a hair-cloth with iron plates and hoops studded with sharp spikes, over which his only garment, made of the coarsest stuff, was the same both in summer and winter. When overcome by sleep he took a short rest on rough boards, laid in the form of a coffin. By degrees, disciples gathered about him, and placed themselves under his rule. He would not suffer them to call him abbot or master, but only corrector. To them he was ever compassionate, urging them not to discipline their bodies by excessive fasting; but with himself he was never lenient.

When his end drew near he called his disciples about him saying, "My sons, I leave you only God, to whom all things belong, and for whom you have renounced all things, and your own selves. If you love poverty, and cling to God constantly, He will give you all things that you shall need." Five days after he was carried into the chapel, where, having heard mass and received extreme unction and the Holy Viaticum, he died on Friday, February 8th, 1124, at the age of almost 80 years.

Peter Damiani, a doctor and cardinal, highly informed in the Holy Scriptures, was, at this time, on account of these things, held in great esteem; and he wrote many excellent, praise-worthy and valiant things, particularly a book against the Jews; and also giving instances of things that occurred in his time. He was renowned for his piety, humility and wisdom. In order that he might be more free to serve God in humbleness he renounced his career as a bishop. As Dominicus(?) states, he wore iron armor against his bare body, and two iron belts about the same; also two iron bands about his arms. [Peter Damiani was born about the year 988, in Ravenna, of a good family, the Onesti, that was considerably reduced in circumstances. He was the youngest of many children, losing father and mother at an early age. He was left in the hands of a married brother, in whose house he was treated more as a slave than a relative; and when grown up, he was sent to keep swine. He had another brother called Damian, who was an arch-priest of Ravenna, and afterwards he made such progress that he was soon able to teach others. To arm himself against pleasure and the artifices of the devil, he began to wear a rough hair-shirt under his clothes, and to inure himself to fasting, watching, and prayer. He was generous to the poor, taking pleasure in serving them with his own hands. At a distance from his own country he embraced the monastic life, at a hermitage of the Benedictines, belonging to Font-Avellano, a desert at the foot of the Apennines in Umbria. He gave a considerable time to the sacred studies and became well versed in the Scriptures. His abbot, with the unanimous consent of the hermitage, commanded him to take over the government of the desert after his death; and this he did in 1041. He founded five other hermitages, in which he placed priors subject to his jurisdiction. He wrote much against the practices prevailing in the church and upon the decay of primitive discipline. At Font-Avellano he lived in a cell, fasted, and allowed himself no other subsistence than coarse bread, bran, herbs, and water. He tortured his body with iron girdles and with frequent disciplines to render it more obedient to the spirit. A mat spread on the floor was his bed. He was frequently called from his refuge by the pope to settle controversies in the church, and between the church and others. He died at the age of 83 on February 22nd, 1072, and is honored as patron at Faenza and Font-Avellano on the 23rd of the same month].

John (Ioannes) the physician, surnamed Serapion, was renowned at this time for his skill and medical knowledge. He made a number of experiments, and compiled them in a book. [Serapion is the name of two Syriac-Arabian physicians of the Middle Ages (about the 10th or 11th century), whose works were published in Latin].

Isaac Benimiram, a highly renowned physician, son of Salomon, the physician, wrote many things in the field of medicine in these times. [I have not been able to find any information on Isaac Benimiram].

Seno, bishop of Trier, was taken prisoner by Theodoric, the count of Trier, thrown from a cliff three times, and finally slain with the sword.

Arnulf (Arnulphus) was illustrious for his miracles and virtues, principally in Saint Medard's monastery. He became abbot there, and was finally elevated by the pope to bishop of Lyons.

ILLUSTRATION

Monastery of Grandmont is depicted as a walled institution. There are a number of buildings in the enclosure, chiefly a small Gothic church. The background shows a hilly country, with but little vegetation.

The Order of the Regular Canons [Until the 16th century the word 'regular' (from the Latin regula, a rule) was applied exclusively to the discipline and customs of religious orders bound by a rule, and to their members, who constituted the "regular," as opposed to the "secular" clergy. Thus, as a substantive, "regular" means a monk or prior; while there were bodies of canons regular and canons secular], again began to flourish in the church of the Blessed Quentin (Quintini) at Beauvais in the Year of the Lord one thousand eighty, in the time of Pope Gregory the Seventh and Emperor Henry (Heinrici). This Order was first wisely established, with regulations, by the apostles, and later by the Blessed Augustine, bishop and distinguished teacher, under Master Yvo (Yvone), the worthy provost of the church. [The Regular Canons were under the Rule composed by Yvo (Ivo) de Chartres from the writings of Augustine]. Of this Order Hugh (Hugo) of Saint Victor, Richard of St. Victor, and Hugh of Saint Folieto were illustrious. [The church or monastery referred to had just been founded by Guy, bishop of Beauvais, in the city of that name, in honor of St. Quentin].

Yvo, the highly renowned teacher of ecclesiastical law and bishop of Chartres [Yvo is more generally called bishop of Chartres, one of the principal towns of the Carnutes. The Romans called it 'Autricum,' from the river Autura (Eure), and afterwards 'civitas Carnutum.' It was burnt by the Normans in 858, and unsuccessfully besieged by them in 911. It was in English hands from 1417 to 1432. It was taken in 1591 by Henry IV, who was crowned there three years afterwards. During the Middle Ages it gave its name to a countship held by the counts of Blois and Champaign, and afterwards by the house of Chatillon, a member of which sold it to the crown in 1286. The modern city of Chartres is the capital of the department of Eure-et-Loir, 55 miles southwest of Paris], was at this time held in great honor and esteem in Gaul. Among other works and accomplishments of skill, virtue and wisdom (according to Isidore, the Hispalian [Hispalis, Roman name for Seville]. bishop), he made various compilations and extracts from ecclesiastical law and reduced them to book form. He also collected various other worthy things and wrote poems. [Ivo (Yvo, Yves) of Chartres (c. 1040-1116), bishop of Chartres, was born of a noble family near Beauvais, and was educated in Paris and at Bec under Lanfranc. About 1080, he became prior of the canons of St. Quentin in Beauvais, and ten years later bishop of Chartres in the place of Geoffrey who had been deposed for simony. His importance as a canonist is apparent from his and his , both composed before 1096. His 288 letters throw much light on the political, religious, and liturgical questions of his day. He wrote a commentary on the Psalms and a collection of canons,].

Rasi (Rasis), a very distinguished physician, and a Phoenician or African, flourished and was renowned at this time. Some say that his real name was Bachilo. But Avicenna calls him Meantheus. He was reared in the city of Almonsonia, and was there instructed in the Arabic tongue. He edited various celebrated books in Arabia, embracing all the medical learning that existed before his time. He also wrote two books on alchemy and astrology, and many other things. [Rasi, Razi, Latin Rases, Rasis; also Abubater, Albubeter, Bubikir (full name Abu Bekr Mohammed er-Rasi), was the most learned and celebrated of Muslim physicians. He was born in 850 in the Persian city of Rai (from whence his name), and died between 911 and 932. After becoming 30 years of age he went to Baghdad. Until this time he had been known only as a singer and zither-player; but now he turned to medicine. He not only concerned himself with the views of the Greek and Syrian physicians, which he collected, but also enlarged his knowledge through experience with the sick, particularly where new diseases appeared. One of his principal works, , has been esteemed by modern physicians. His reputation during the Middle Ages is due chiefly to his , published in incomplete condition by his students after his death. It is a giant compendium on practical medicine and is rich in material concerning the history of the science. Later writers, like Avicenna, have freely drawn on this work, and have received credit which justly belonged to Rasi].

Matilda (Mathildis), a very noble countess, and an honorable and illustrious woman, conducted herself well toward the church in these times; and because of her virtue and distinguished conduct she was esteemed and became renowned. Boniface, a very noble and magnanimous man, and Beatrice, Henry's (Heinrici) daughter, were her parents; and being their only daughter, upon their death she inherited the cities of Lucca, Parma, Reggio, Ferrara, Mantua, etc. For this reason she was of high renown throughout Italy. She married a mighty prince, called Godfried (Gotifredum); and being a brilliant woman, she not only resisted the forces of the dukes of Apuleia and Calabria, but also those of Henry, which were employed against the Roman pope. She compelled them to return to the Church what they had wrested from it. But when Henry, son of Emperor Henry, was sent into Italy by his father, and defeated Matilda and her husband in the city of Parma, and killed Godfried, she married Azzo d'Este, her husband's friend, who, unbeknown to her, was related to him in the fourth degree. After having lived with him for some months she learned of this relationship, and sought the advice of Pope Gregory as to what might be done about it. The pope commanded her to entirely withhold and withdraw herself from communion with her husband, and afterwards they were divorced. She remained zealously attached to the church by prayers and watchfulness, and died at the age of sixty-nine years, full of good works. Before her death she made a will by which she freed all her servants and maids, and then sent all her golden vessels, silverware, and costly raiment to the church. She also endowed many churches and cloisters with innumerable estates, and gave her entire inheritance to St. Peter's. With devotion and honor she finally received the Sacrament of Christ, commending her soul to God. Her body was honorably buried in a casket that may still be seen. [Matilda (1046-1115), countess or margravine of Tuscany, popularly known as the Great Countess, descended from a noble Lombard family. Her great-grandfather, Athone of Canossa, had been made count of Modena and Reggio by the emperor Otto I, and her grandfather had, in addition, acquired Mantua, Ferrara, and Brescia. Her own father, Boniface II, the Pious, secured Tuscany, the duchy of Spoleto, the county of Parma, and probably that of Cremona; and was loyal to the emperor until Henry plotted against him. Through the murder of Count Boniface in 1052, and the death of her older brother and sister three years later, Matilda was left, at the age of nine, sole heiress to the richest estate in Italy. She received an excellent education under the care of her mother Beatrice, daughter of Frederick of Lorraine, and aunt of Henry II, who, after a brief detention in Germany by the emperor, married Godfrey IV of Lorraine, brother of Stephen IX, he pope. Matilda cast her lot against the emperor in the great struggle over investiture, maintaining the cause of successive popes for over thirty years. She attended the synod at which Guibert was condemned and deprived of the archbishopric of Ravenna. Her hereditary fief of Canossa, on January 28th, 1077, was the scene of the celebrated penance of Henry IV before Gregory VII. The donation of her estates to the Holy See, originally made in 1077 and renewed in 1102, though never fully consummated on account of temporal dominion of the papacy. Matilda was twice married, first to Godfrey V of Lorraine, surnamed the Hunchback, and secondly to the 17-year old Welf V of Bavaria, from whom she separated in 1095. Matilda was an eager student, spoke Italian, French and German, wrote Latin, collected a considerable library, and supervised an edition of the of Justinian. She died in 1115, was buried in the Benedictine church at Polirone, from where her remains were taken to St. Peter's at Rome in 1635].

Guibert (Gibertus), who was elected pope against Gregory by Emperor Henry (Heinrico), and as previously stated, was called Clement, proceeded to Rome with Emperor Henry and his son and their army, and soon captured the Leonine City. Finally, after many deeds, he died a sudden death, a fitting penalty for his misdeeds. [Guibert (also Wibert; in Latin Gibertus), anti-pope as Clement III; see text and note on Henry IV, Folio CXCII recto, above].

Gregory (Gregorius), the seventh pope of this name, a Tuscan (Hetruscus) from Soana whose father was Bonicio(?), was formerly called Hildebrand (Yldebrandus) the monk. He was acclaimed pope by the multitude while the clergy and the people were attending the funeral of the deceased pope. He said he was chosen to the office by the Blessed Peter. Pursuant to popular clamor the cardinals met in council and regularly elected said Hildebrand, and named him Gregory the Seventh. This was the eighteenth year of the reign of Emperor Henry (Heinrici) the Fourth, at which time this same emperor was heavily encumbered by war with the Saxons. This pope was acceptable to God and man, intelligent, prudent, righteous, kind, a father to widows and orphans, and an earnest and strong warder and protector of the Roman church. He was opposed to heresy and impiety, and resisted the power of the evil princes who attacked the estates of the church. This pope warned Emperor Henry that in the future he should not confer a bishopric or benefice upon anyone through simony, avarice, gift or bribe. This pope later deprived bishop Hermann of Bamberg and the bishop of Constance of their offices on account of simony. The following Lent Gregory held a council at Rome, at which were present Guibert (Guibercus) the bishop of Ravenna and a great number of the Lombardian bishops. Influenced by Guibert, Henry would not obey the warning of Gregory; and Guibert, being a combative man, incited the son of the governor of Rome against Gregory; and when Gregory was holding mass on Christmas Eve, the son of the governor took him prisoner; but the Romans released him and destroyed the house of the governor's son. He fled to Henry, and the pope placed him and all his accomplices under the ban; then the council made Guibert pope, as has already been stated in the history of Henry. Afterwards Gregory died, holy and piously, in the twelfth year, first month, and third day of his pontificate.

Gregory VII (Hildebrand), pope from 1073 to 1085, was born of humble parents in Tuscany, educated in a convent, and became a Benedictine. As chaplain to the exiled Gregory VI, he lived for a year at Cologne, acquiring an intimate knowledge of political and ecclesiastical conditions in Germany. He returned to Rome with Bishop Bruno of Toul, who became Pope Leo IX. Under him Hildebrand became a cardinal and held other church offices. On the death of Leo IX he acted as envoy of the Romans to the German court, to conduct the negotiations with regard to a successor. The emperor pronounced in favor of Bishop Gebhard of Eichstädt, who as Victor II employed Hildebrand as his legate to France. Stephen IX succeeded Victor II and was followed by Nicholas II, both through the influence of Hildebrand. It was during the latter's pontificate that the papal election was transferred to the College of Cardinals. At the same time Hildebrand became the soul of the Curial policy, and sagaciously utilized the general political conditions, especially in Germany, during the succeeding pontificate of Alexander II.

On Alexander's death, Hildebrand became Pope Gregory VII. Although the circumstances of his election invited assault, no attempt was made to set up a rival pontiff at first. When, however, the opposition against him developed a pretender his long and undisputed possession tended to prove the original legality of his papacy. He finally received sacerdotal ordination and Episcopal consecration. The story of his conflict with Emperor Henry IV has already been told (see Henry IV, Folio CXCII recto, and note).

The pontificate of Gregory VII came to a melancholy close, for he died an exile in Salerno on May 25th, 1085. Too much the politician, too rough in his methods, too exclusively the representative of the Roman see, he had made more enemies than friends. He took the first step towards the codification of the ecclesiastical law, and educated the clergy and the lay world to obey Rome. It was due to his efforts that the celibacy of the clergy became customary in Catholic Christianity.

Pope Victor the Third, previously called Desiderius, and formerly abbot of Monte Cassino, as soon as he secured the pontificate, undertook to protect those who had favored Gregory, his predecessor; and for this reason he made an enemy of Emperor Henry (Heinricum). In the first year and fourth month of his pontificate, through Henry's cunning (as Martinus the historian states) this pope, while holding mass, was assassinated by means of poison placed into the chalice.

Victor II, pope from 1086 to 1087, succeeded Gregory VII. After studying in various monasteries he became provost of St. Benedict at Capua. In 1055 he entered the cloister of Monte Cassino. In 1057 he became abbot, and his rule marks the golden age of the celebrated monastery. He promoted literary activity and established an important school of music. As papal vicar in southern Italy he conducted frequent negotiations between the Normans and the pope. On the death of Gregory VII he declined the papal tiara, and the year 1085 passed without an election. In 1086 the cardinals proclaimed him pope against his will, but he was driven from Rome by the imperialists before his consecration was complete. Laying aside the papal insignia at Terracina, he retired to his monastery. As vicar of the Holy See he convened a synod at Capua in 1087, resumed the papal insignia two weeks later, and received tardy consecration at Rome on May 9th, 1087.

Owing to the presence of the anti-pope, Clement III, who had powerful partisans, his stay at Rome was brief. He sent an army to Tunis, which defeated the Saracens and compelled the Sultan to pay tribute to the Papal See. In 1087 he held a synod at Benevento which renewed the ex-communication of the anti-pope; banned archbishop Hugh of Lyons, and abbot Richard of Marseilles, as schismatics; and confirmed the prohibition of lay investiture. Falling ill at the synod, Victor returned to Monte Cassino, where he died on September 16th, 1087. He was succeeded by Urban II.

Victors' original name was Dauferius Epifani. He was the son of Landolfo V, prince of Benevento. When he entered Monte Cassino he changed his name to Desiderius.

Urban, the second of this name, previously called Otto or Oddo, first a monk, and later a cardinal, was elected pope five months after the death of Victor. He was worthy of the papal dignity in view of his Scriptural learning and pious life. He wrote many excellent letters to the Countess Matilda (Mathildim). Having but small faith in Roman dealings, as a measure of precaution he decided to hold a council at Melphi. But when he observed that he could not hold a council in peace in any city of Italy, he called one at Placentia [Now Piacenza, about 42 miles southeast of Milan, and formerly in Cisalpine Gaul].; and there he marvelously silenced the undertakings of some of the clergy. Afterwards he proceeded into Gaul and there held a council in which he admonished the Gallic princes to rescue the city of Jerusalem which was being withheld by the Saracens. One reads that in the Year of Christian Salvation one thousand ninety-four he made an elegant and daring speech before the same council, at which were present those summoned from all Christendom, and that he incited three hundred thousand people to rescue Jerusalem and the Promised Land. After this he returned to Rome to arouse the Italians to join the crusade as soon as matters were settled in Italy. But he was pursued with such enmity by one John (Ioanne), an evil pagan, that for two years he remained in seclusion in the house of a mighty citizen. But when this tyrant died Urban undertook to settle the affairs of the church. Finally, after suffering many persecutions, and burdened with care and labor, he died in the twelfth year, fourth month, and nineteenth day of his pontificate. [Urban II (also called Oddo or Otho), pope from 1088 to 1099, was born near Reims, became archdeacon of Auxerre, and later joined the congregation of Cluny, when he became sub-prior. He was created cardinal-bishop of Ostia in 1078 by Gregory VII, to whom he was so loyal, especially as a papal legate in Germany, that he was imprisoned for a time by Henry IV. He was elected pope by an assembly of cardinals and others at Terracina in 1088, and throughout the major part of his pontificate he had to reckon with the presence of the powerful antipope, Clement III. He maintained an alliance with the Norman Duke Roger, Robert Guiscard's son and successor, and united the German with the Italian opposition to the emperor by promoting the marriage of the Countess Matilda with young Welf of Bavaria. He aided Prince Conrad in his rebellion against his father and crowned him king of the Romans at Milan in 1093. Invited to Tuscany by the Countess Matilda, he convoked a council at Piacenza in March 1095, attended by so vast a number of prelates and laymen that its sessions were held in open air, and addressed by ambassadors of Alexius, the Byzantine emperor, who sought aid against the Muslims. Urban crossed the Alps in the summer, and remained over a year in France and Burgundy. He held a largely attended council at Clermont in 1095, where he preached the First Crusade. Crusaders on their way through Italy in the year 1097 finally drove the antipope from Rome, and firmly established Urban in the papal see. With a view to facilitating the crusade, a council was held at Bari, in 1098, at which religious differences were debated. Urban died suddenly at Rome in 1099, fourteen days after the capture of Jerusalem, but before tidings of that event had reached Italy. His successor was Paschal II].

The Order of the Carthusians had its origin in the Year of the Lord 1086, in Gaul, in the bishopric of Grenoble, through Bruno, the most holy teacher of the divine Scriptures. After it was founded, and established by the help of Christ, it prospered in the number of its cloisters and members. It was preserved and confirmed and granted various privileges by Alexander the Third and the Fourth, and other popes. By reason of the strictness of its Rule it has always had precedence over other spiritual orders, and has been regarded as a well established pillar of the church. The order had its origin through the following terrifying incident: Although the university at Paris greatly flourished, and many excellent and very wise teachers and students from various places attended there, and were found proficient in all the arts, yet there was among them one who excelled the rest in his knowledge of the arts, in the piety of his life, and in high reputation. He died; and while the vigil was being sung in the presence of a great number of doctors, magistrates, and others, the corpse rose on the bier, and with a loud voice cried out, I am condemned by the just judgment of God. And immediately all those present became frightened, and decided to leave the corpse unburied. In the morning the dead body cried out as before. On the third day the whole city came to hear the miracle. And the deceased arose and cried, I am condemned by the just judgment of God. There was present a master, named Bruno, who said to his disciples, See how miserable and pitiful is the departed, who by many has been esteemed as holy. And so they left the world and went into a hermitage in the wilderness. [See succeeding note on Bruno].

Bruno, the holy man, a highly renowned philosopher and theologian, and a native Germany (Theutonicus) from the city of Cologne, and a canon of the church of Reims, and a teacher at Paris, at this time forsook the world and its pomp, and with seven highly learned men retired to the hermitage of the Carthusians. There he built a monastery, and set up a strict rule for a solitary life, which rule has been highly observed by his successors for the past four hundred years through long fasts, partaking only of bread and water on Fridays, and totally abstaining from meat, no matter how ill they might be. They wear hair-cloth next to their skin. With the exception of the prior, they never go out, but remain in their cells, in strict silence, being awake for long periods. This Rule was initiated by Hugo, bishop of Grenoble, who received the habit of the order from said Bruno. Some say that among other disciples of Bruno was Pope Urban.

Bruno was a native of Cologne, born of noble parents, and of extraordinary gravity and religious earnestness from childhood. He studied at Laon or Bec, and was later sent to Paris to complete his education in the university. He rose to distinction, taught philosophy, and applied himself to theology. He became a canon of Reims, where he taught philosophy and was advanced to the chancellorship of the archdiocese. Unable to endure the irreligious conduct of his bishop, Bruno left Reims in 1076 and went to Paris; and there, it is said, a very striking incident occurred in his life, leading to his conversion: There was a certain canon of great renown for his learning and blameless life. When he died, all the members of the university attended his funeral. While the body lay on the bier, between flaming candles, the clergy chanted, and the officiating priest recited the proper lesson from Job: Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration with your ears. Behold now, I have ordered my cause; I know that I shall be justified. Who is he that will plead with me? For now, if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost. Only do not do two things to me: then I will not hide myself from You. Withdraw your hand far from me: and let not your dread make me afraid. Then call and I will answer: or let me speak, and answer me. At that moment the corpse opened its eyes, rose slowly on the bier, and said in a low voice, I am accused at the just judgment-seat of God. A horror fell on all present, they fled from the church, and the corpse, which had sunk back on the bier, was left alone. The next day the funeral ceremony was recommenced, and when the same passage of Job had been repeated, the corpse rose again, saying, I am judged at the just tribunal of God. Then it fell back motionless as before. The same panic occurred and the service was not completed that day. On the third day a wondering crowd of people assembled, and at the same stage of the religious rites the corpse rose for a third time, shrieking, I am condemned by the just judgment of God. Bruno, who was present, was so overcome by the scene that he resolved forever to quit the world and its vanities, and live with the just judgment of God ever before his eyes. Although he had returned to Cologne, worldly affairs sickened him, as did also the irreligious character of some of the prelates. He resigned his benefices, and in company with six friends, searched for a place where they might live in peace. On a midsummer day in 1086, Hugh, bishop of Grenoble, was approached by seven men who sought his guidance to such a place. There was a desolate spot in Hugh's diocese that he had visited some time before. It had struck his fancy, and he dreamed of it, imagining that he saw a convent rise there, illuminated from above by seven stars. The dream came back to him and he conducted the seven men up the rocky path to the valley of Chartreuse; and there Bruno founded his Order. He built an oratory and small cells, planned for a society of hermits united under a common rule, which was singularly austere. Each man was obliged to work at some handicraft. They had no refectory, but ate in solitude in their cells. Their dress was of the meanest, and they wore hair-shirts next to their skin. They fasted almost perpetually, ate only bran bread, never touched meat, even when ill; never ate fish except when given them as alms; ate eggs and cheese on Sundays and Thursdays; boiled pulse and herbs on Tuesdays and Saturdays; bread and water on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. They had only one meal a day except during holidays. Their constant occupation was praying, reading, and transcribing books. They met together at vespers and matins, and said mass only on Sundays and festivals. Once a week the gates were opened and all the monks went forth in pairs for a walk among the mountains, through the forests, and over the meadows.

These monks regarded Bruno as their superior, and Hugh of Grenoble, who had guided them to this retreat, chose Bruno as his spiritual adviser. After six years Urban II, formerly one of Bruno's pupils, called him to Rome, offering him the archbishopric of Reggio; but he refused and withdrew to a desert in Calabria, where he established two other monasteries. He died in 1101.

During the French Revolution the Carthusian monks were driven from the Grande Chartreuse, their property was confiscated, and on their restoration they recovered only the barren desert in which the monastery stood, and for it they had to pay rent. They lived in great poverty for some years; then the famous liquor, Chartreuse, was invented as a means of revenue. It produced a large annual income and enabled the institution to continue its work. The monks who were driven from the Grande Chartreuse during the Revolution returned in 1816, but were again ejected under the Association Laws of 1901, and the community of the Grande Chartreuse is now settled in an old Certosa, or abandoned monastery, near Lucca.

Hugo, bishop of Grenoble, had a testimonial from his mother to the effect that while she was pregnant with him, she received a beautiful child in a dream, and the saints and Saint Peter took the child to heaven into the presence of God. So after he was born, and was still a child, he was assigned to the study of the Scriptures in order to be of special service to God and to benefit by his grace; and by the grace of God he developed many virtues. While in a Carthusian hermitage this Hugo, in a dream, saw God build for him an acceptable dwelling place, and seven stars which lighted his way. Through his renown for piety, there came to him seven men, fired by devotion, who were seeking a place in which to lead a secluded life. First among them was Master Bruno (as above stated); also four scholars and two laymen. On the advice of Hugo they built a Carthusian hermitage. This Hugo wished to lay aside the burdens of his bishopric, and to await the repose of his soul in peace; but he could not secure the consent of the popes, for Hugo was a pious man, and endowed with many virtues, and by his very life an example of piety to those who lived about him—a mirror of virtue to the people, to whom none other could be more useful or salutary as an example. After his death he was enrolled among the catalogue of saints.

An Expedition for the Relief of Jerusalem Made in the time of Pope Urban the Second in the Year 1094.

In the time of Pope Urban, after the Council of Clermont was held, the Christian princes in Gaul were so impressed by the eloquent sermon of said pope, admonishing them to recover the city of Jerusalem which had been held by the Saracens for a long time, that all cried out, as with a single voice, God wills it! God wills it! While the pope with his bishops and prelates was considering the choice of a leader for the army, thousands of persons caused themselves to be marked with the cross, and took up arms. In a few months three hundred thousand persons had joined the crusade, and were on their way to Constantinople. The first leader of the host was Peter, called the Hermit.

Peter the Hermit, a priest of Amiens, is said to have been present at Urban's famous sermon at Clermont in 1095. He was one of the preachers of the crusade in France after that sermon, and his own experience may have helped to fire his eloquence. He was an emotional revivalist preacher, and thousands of peasants took up the cross at his bidding. The crusade of the paupers, which forms the first act of the First Crusade, was his work; and he himself led one of the five sections of the paupers to Constantinople, starting from Cologne in April and arriving at Constantinople by the end of July 1096. Here he joined the only other section which had succeeded in reaching Constantinople – that of Walter the Penniless; and he crossed the Asiatic shore in the beginning of August. In spite of his warnings, the paupers began hostilities against the church; and Peter returned to Constantinople.

In Peter's absence, the army was cut to pieces by the Turks, and he was left in Constantinople without any followers during the winter of 1096-1097, waiting for the coming of the princes. He joined their ranks in May 1097, and marched with them through Asia Minor to Jerusalem. But he played a very subordinate part in the history of the First Crusade. He appears, in the beginning of 1098, as attempting to escape from the privations of the siege of Antioch – showing himself a "fallen star." In the middle of the year he was sent by the princes to invite Kerbogha to settle all differences by a duel. In 1099 he appears as treasurer of the Alms at the siege of Acra, and as leader of the supplicatory processions in Jerusalem which preceded the battle of Ascalon. At the end of the year he went to Laodicea, and sailed west. It is said that he died in 1151, as prior of a church of the Holy Sepulchre that he founded in France.

With many people he proceeded through Germany and Hungary. He was joined by three mighty counts, namely, Godfrey (Gothefridus)

Godfrey of Bouillon (c. 1060-1100) was a leader in the First Crusade. He was the second son of Eustace II, count of Lower Lorraine. Lorraine had been penetrated by Cluniac influences, and Godfrey would seem to have been a man of noble piety. Accordingly, though he had himself served as an imperialist, and though the Germans in general had little sympathy with the crusaders, Godfrey, nevertheless, when the call came to follow Christ, almost literally sold all that he had and followed it.

Along with his brothers Eustace and Baldwin (the future Baldwin of Jerusalem), Godfrey led a German contingent some 40,000 strong through Hungary to Constantinople, arriving there in November 1095, the first of the crusading princes to get there. On him, therefore, fell the duty of deciding what the relations of the princes to the eastern emperor Alexius were to be. Eventually he did homage to Alexius in January 1097, and his example was followed by the other princes. From this time until the beginning of 1099, Godfrey appears as one of the minor princes, while men like Bohemund, Raymond, Baldwin and Tancred were determining the course of events.

In 1099 Godfrey came to the front once more. The majority of the crusaders were weary of the political factions which divided some of their leaders, and Godfrey became the natural representative of this feeling. He was thus able to force the reluctant Raymond to march southward to Jerusalem; and he took a prominent part in the siege, his division being the first to enter when the city was captured. It was natural that Godfrey should be elected ruler of Jerusalem (July 22nd, 1099); but the new dignity proved more onerous than honorable, and during his short reign of a year he had to combat the Arabs of Egypt, and the opposition of Raymond, and the patriarch Dagobert. He repelled the Egyptian attack at Ascalon but failed to acquire the town after the battle. Godfrey died in July 1100. Because he had been the first ruler in Jerusalem he was idolized in later saga. He was depicted as the leader of the crusades, the king of Jerusalem, the legislator who laid down the assizes of Jerusalem; but he was none of these things. Bohemund was the most energetic leader of the crusades; Baldwin was the first king; the assizes developed gradually. In reality he would seem to have been a quiet, pious, hard-fighting knight who was chosen to rule in Jerusalem because he had no dangerous qualities and no obvious defects.

, Eustace (Eustachius) [Eustace was the name of four counts of Boulogne, France. The one here referred to was probably Eustace III, who went on crusade in 1096, and died about 1125], and Baldwin (Baldvinus)

Baldwin I (1058-1118), first king of Jerusalem (1100-18), was the brother of Godfrey of Bouillon. He was originally a clerk in the orders and held several prebends; but in 1096 he joined the First Crusade, accompanying his brother Godfrey as far as Heraclea in Asia Minor. When Tancred, nephew of Bohemund, who had also taken up the Cross in 1096, left the main body of the crusaders at Heraclea, and marched into Cilicia, Baldwin followed, partly in jealousy, partly from the same political motives which animated Tancred. Incidentally it must be noted that Tancred had refused to take an oath to Alexius, the emperor at Constantinople, and had escaped across the Bosphorus in the disguise of a peasant; but after the capture of Nicaea, he followed the example of the other princes, and became the man of Alexius; and so at Heraclea in the center of Asia Minor, he left the main body of the crusaders, and struck into Cilicia, closely followed by Baldwin of Lorraine, as stated. Tancred had made himself master of Tarsus, but Baldwin wrested it from his grip in 1097. After rejoining the main army at Marash, Baldwin received an invitation from an Armenian named Pakrad, and moved eastward toward the Euphrates, where he occupied Tell-bashir. He proceeded to Edessa, succeeded its ruler, who had been assassinated, and governed it for two years (1098-1100). He married an Armenian wife and became the intermediary between the crusaders and the Armenians. At the end of 1099, he visited Jerusalem to succeed his brother and became the first king of Jerusalem, being crowned by the patriarch himself on Christmas Day 1100.

As Baldwin had secured the supremacy in Jerusalem, so he extended into a compact kingdom the straggling territories to which he had succeeded. Arsuf and Caesarea were captured in 1101; Acre in 1104; Beirut and Sidon in 1110, while in the meantime Baldwin repelled in successive years the attacks of the Egyptians, and in the latter years of his reign, pushed southward at the expense of Egypt, penetrating as far as the Red Sea. In the north he had to compose the dissensions of the Christian princes in Tripoli, Antioch, and Edessa, and to help them maintain their ground against the Muslim princes of northwest Syria. In this way Baldwin was able to make himself the practical suzerain of the three Christian principalities of the north, though the suzerainty was always somewhat nominal. Baldwin died in 1118, after an expedition to Egypt, during which he captured Farama, and, as old Fuller says, caught many fish, and his death in eating them.

Baldwin was one of the adventurers of the First Crusade, and as such he stands alongside Bohemund, Tancred, and Raymond. On the whole he was the most successful of his class. By his defense of the lay power against a nascent theocracy, and by his alliance with the Italian towns, he was the real founder of the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem.

, and they marched with the same host. But the mighty princes and the nobility, the bishop of Padua as chief of the crusade; also Hugh (Hugo) the Great, the brother of the French King Philip, and counts Raymond (Raymundus), Robert and Stephen (Stephanus), together with many other distinguished counts and nobles, marched through Italy in three divisions. And there was also on the way an army of twelve thousand select young Italian warriors under Bohemund (Boemundus) [Bohemund is the name of a series of princes of Antioch, afterwards counts of Tripoli. Bohemund I (c. 1058-1111) prince of Otranto, and afterwards of Antioch, was the eldest son of Robert Guiscard, and served under his father in the great attack on the Eastern Roman empire (1080-85), and commanded the Normans during Guiscard's absence, penetrating into Thessaly, but being repulsed by Alexius Comnenus. This early hostility to Alexius had a great influence upon his future career, and helped to determine the history of the First Crusade. When in 1096 the crusaders began to pass through Italy to Constantinople, Bohemund joined them. He gathered a Norman army and penetrated to Constantinople, where he did homage to the emperor. From Constantinople to Antioch he was the real leader of the First Crusade. He took a great part in the siege of Antioch (1097-98), beating off the Muslim attempts at relief from the east, and connecting the besiegers on the west with the port of St. Simeon and the Italian ships which lay there. The capture of Antioch was due to his connection with Firuz, one of the commanders in the city; but he would not bring matters to an issue until the possession of the city was assured him, under the terror of the approach of Kerbogha with a great army of relief, and with a reservation in favor of Alexius, if Alexius should fulfill his promise to aid the Crusaders. But Bohemund was not secure in his possession of Antioch, even after its surrender and the defeat of Kerbogha; he had to make good his claims against Raymond of Toulouse, whom he had alienated, and who was now the ally of Alexius. He obtained full possession in 1099. It might seem in 1100 that Bohemund was destined to found a great principality in Antioch, for he had a fine territory, a good strategic position and a strong Roman empire, which claimed his territories and was supported in its claim by Raymond of Toulouse, and the strong Muslim principalities in Syria; and between these two forces he failed. In 1100 he was captured by Danishmend of Sivas, and he languished in prison till 1103. His nephew Tancred took his place; meanwhile Raymond established himself with the aid of Alexius in Tripoli, and was able to check the expansion of Antioch to the south. Bohemund was ransomed in 1103 by the generosity of an Armenian prince, but again suffered defeat. Despairing of his own resources he returned to Europe for reinforcement. He married Constance, daughter of Philip I of France, and collected a large army; but instead of defending Antioch, he attacked Alexius, who, aided by the Venetians, defeated him and compelled him to submit to a humiliating peace by which he became the vassal of Alexius. He was buried at Canossa in Apulia, in 1111]. When said Peter arrived at Constantinople with his people, and had encamped in the environs, he was unable to restrain his men from attacking Constantinople, or from stealing sacred objects. On that account Alexius, the emperor of Constantinople, was moved to compel Peter and his people to promptly retire from there. So Peter proceeded first to Nicomedia, and there besieged the well protected city of Nicaea

Nicaea, or Nicea (modern Isnik), one of the most celebrated cities of Asia Minor, in Bithynia, on Lake Ascania, was built by Antigonos about 316 BCE on an old deserted site. Soon afterward Lysimachus changed its name from Antigonias to Nicaea, calling it after his wife. Under the Roman Empire Nicaea and Nicomedia disputed the title of Metropolis of Bithynia. Strabo describes the ancient Nicaea as regularly built, in the form of a square, with a gate in the middle of each side. From the monument in the center of the city all the four gates were visible at the extremities of great cross streets. After Constantinople became the capital of the empire, Nicaea grew in importance, and after the conquest of Constantinople by the crusaders, it became the temporary seat of the Byzantine emperor; the double line of walls with the Roman gates is still well preserved. The possession of the city was long disputed between the Greeks and the Turks. It remained an important city for some time after its final incorporation into the Ottoman Empire; but subsequently became an insignificant village.

Nicaea is very famous in ecclesiastical history as the seat of the great Ecumenical Council, which Constantine convoked in 325 CE, chiefly for the decision of the Arian controversy, and which drew up the Nicene Creed; that is to say, the first part of the well known creed, so called, the latter part of which was added by the Council of Constantinople, in the year 381. The Council of Nicaea also settled the time of keeping Easter, and a second Council held here in 787 decided in favor of the worship of images. In the very year of the great Council, Nicaea was severely damaged by an earthquake; but it was restored by the emperor Valens in 368. Under the later emperors of the East, Nicaea long served as the bulwark of Constantinople against the Arabs and the Turks. It was taken by the Seljuks in 1078, and became the capital of the Sultan Suleiman. It was retaken by the First Crusaders in 1097. After the taking of Constantinople by the Venetians and the Franks, and the foundation of the Latin empire there in 1204, the Greeks made Nicaea the capital of a separate kingdom. In 1330 the city was finally taken by Orchan, son of the founder of the Ottoman empire, Othman.

, which the Turks, in anticipation of the Christians, had fortified and provided with a large number of men and with every necessity to withstand a siege. But since the besiegers failed to secure accretions to their forces, and the knights fell away one by one, and the Christians were disappointed in their expectations, they were compelled to give up the siege; and in their retreat they suffered such a defeat that Reinald (Raynaldus), the German leader, denied the Christian faith, and together with his warriors, surrendered to the infidels, while Peter returned to Constantinople. But Bohemund, through threats and promises, prevailed upon Emperor Alexius to permit him to proceed through the empire; and so the Christians again came to the city of Nicaea; but it was difficult to capture, for access was constantly open to it by sea. However, when many small ships were sent from Constantinople to intercept ingress, the citizens, through illness and lack of all things, were compelled to give up everything, and to surrender themselves twelve days after the siege began. After the city was occupied it became necessary for the army to proceed from there through waste regions, and the army divided itself into two files. Now, when Bohemund arrived at a running brook and rich meadows, and was about to graze his horses and cattle, the Saracens came upon him; and he would have suffered defeat if counts Hugh and Godfrey, with forty thousand soldiers on the march, had not come to his assistance and rescue. And there both sides fought valiantly. In this same battle, in which Medes, Turks, Chaldeans, Saracens and Arabs took part, forty thousand men are said to have been slain; but Suleiman (Solimanus), the sultan, escaped in the retreat. Thus the Christians availed themselves of their timely harvest and the fruits of victory, and without further mischief reached Iconium [Iconium, capital of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor, was a flourishing city in the time of the apostle Paul, with a mixed population of Jews and Greeks. Under the later emperors it was a colony, but during the Middle Ages one of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, and important in the history of the crusades], the capital of Lycaonia; and they captured it, together with the city of Heraclea and the city of Tarsus. In consequence, Baldwin, a man of excellent mind and ingenuity, became the first ruler of Asia, with Tarsus as his seat. Afterwards the great army proceeded to Cilicia [Cilicia is a district in the southeastern part of Asia Minor bordering on Syria to the east, on Cappadocia and Lycaonia on the north, and on Pisidia and Pamphylia on the northwest and north. The first inhabitants are supposed to have been of the Syrian race. According to myth a certain Cilix, son of Agenor, set out with his brothers Cadmus and Phoenix in search of their missing sister, Europa (who had sailed away from the coast of Phoenicia on the back of Zeus in the disguise of a bull), but stopped short on the coast of Asia Minor, and peopled the plain of Cilicia with his followers], called Little Armenia; and after capturing the city of Caesaria, they came into the land of Cappadocia, [Cappadocia was a rough and generally sterile mountain region in Asia Minor to which different boundaries were assigned at various times. Under the Persian Empire it included the whole country inhabited by a people of Syrian origin called White Syrians]. which lies beyond high mountains, and encamped before Antioch at a distance of about one thousand paces from the city, along a river, which could not be forded without peril. And the captains viewed the city, and they questioned the prisoners as to how it was constituted. They answered, saying, that the king of this city was Cassianus; and, as the Hebrew scriptures indicates the city was first called Reblata, and it was later named Antioch by the ruler of the East, after himself. It is surrounded by a double wall. The inner wall was built of tiles, the outer of square stones; and it is provided with four hundred sixty towers. Within the city are four hills, on one of which, lying to the east, is located such a naturally fortified citadel, that it is invulnerable to all weapons, military engines, and storming. The inhabitants call this region Coelesyria. [In the time immediately succeeding the Macedonian conquest, Syria was considered as divided into two parts. The north, including the whole country down to the Lebanon range, was one half of the division; and the south, consisting of Coelesyria, was the other. The latter is sometimes called Cassiotis]. The region is moistened by rivers and springs, giving it a fertile soil, and rich in grassy meadows. The sea in the vicinity abounds in good fish. The city is located 12 thousand paces from the sea. The aforesaid river has a gate where it flows by Antioch. From the time the first church was built there, this city was greatly beautified. There Peter, prince of the apostles, set up and maintained the first patriarchal see. Theophilus, its seventh prelate after Peter, in order to extinguish the name of the ruthless king, Antiochus, named the city Theophilia, after himself. It so flourished under its Christian name that it had fifty-three bishops, one hundred suffragan bishops [A 'suffragan bishop' is a diocesan bishop who is subject to an archbishop as the metropolitan of the province], and three hundred sixty churches. Now when the Christians considered it necessary to besiege this well fortified city for some time, the captains debated various measures, and in the Year of Our Salvation one thousand ninety-seven the city was besieged with many contrivances. After a heavy siege it was captured by the highly renowned Bohemund, son of the Norman duke, Robert of Apulieia. He secured access to it through Firouz (Pyrrho), a mighty citizen there, who, marveling at the power of Bohemund, volunteered to betray the city to the Christians if they would permit the said Bohemund to become its ruler. When the Christians entered the city they spared all the people. Yaghi-Siyan (Cassianus) [Yaghi-Siyan (died June 2, 1098) was the Muslim governor of Antioch during the siege by the crusaders in 1098. The crusaders recorded

Yaghi-Siyan's name in various forms in Latin, including Acxianus, Gratianus, and, as in the , Cassianus], the king, fled into the mountains, and was slain by the Armenians. But now came Kerbogha (Corbane), chief of the Persian knights, together with Sensadolo, the son of Yaghi-Siyan; and when the city was suffering for lack of all the necessities of life, Bohemund decided to give battle.

And now the affairs of the Christians in Antioch were in such a bad state that they would have succumbed to apostasy and desperation if God had not evidenced his inclination toward our salvation and protection by a miracle. The spear that had pierced the side of Jesus Christ on the cross was, through revelation to a churchman, found in Saint Andrew's church. The Christian captains then became inspired with so much hope that they determined to fight with the enemy. Therefore this holy spear was carried forth as a banner; and through Bohemund the enemy was defeated and about one hundred thousand were slain. About fifteen thousand camels were captured. And thus the Christians were so enriched that from a state of utter want they came into one of highest abundance—all through the miracle of this spear.

Antioch, situated on the left bank of the Orontes, about 20 miles from the sea in a fertile plain which separates the Lebanon ranges from the spurs of the Taurus, was the capital of the Greek kingdom of Syria, and long the chief city of the region. Antigonus was the first to recognize the strategic importance of the site. He began to build a city, Antigonía, but on his defeat and death at the hands of his rival Seleucus Nicator, in 301, the latter founded Antioch and made use of Antigonía as a quarry for his building. The city was laid out in four quarters, thus giving rise to the name Tetrapolis—four cities. Antioch flourished and developed into a mighty center of trade. By the fourth century CE it had a population of nearly a quarter of a million. Four miles to the west was Daphne, a pleasure resort of shady groves in which rose a great temple to Apollo founded by Seleucus I. The precincts of Daphne were endowed with the right of asylum, and it became the haunt of society's outcasts. Under Antiochus I, the city became the capital of the western section of the Seleucid Empire, and soon after the residence also of the Seleucid emperors.

Antioch was one of the earliest strongholds of the Christian faith—the first place where the Christian name was used (Acts 11:26), and a center of missionary efforts in the Apostolic age. In a sense, its church became the mother of the Gentile churches, and after the fall of Jerusalem it became a real metropolis of Christianity. Peter visited Antioch and, basing its claim on a tradition that he remained there for a time as head of its church, Antioch was accorded by the Council of Nicaea the place of honor after Alexandria and Rome. It was destroyed by the Persian king Chosroës in 540 CE, but was later rebuilt by Justinian, who gave it the new name of Theupolis. The ancient wells which still surround the insignificant modern town are probably those built by Justinian.

The Arabs took Antioch when they overran Syria in 638. It passed into the possession of the crusaders in 1098 after a bitter siege of nine months, the end of which was hastened by an earthquake and betrayal. Assigned to Bohemund, prince of Tarentum, it remained the capital of a Latin principality for nearly two centuries.

Hilbert, a bishop, and a man of great ingenuity and skill, was renowned at this time for his wisdom and art in metrical verse. Because of his Christian faith he suffered many temptations as well as imprisonment and bondage at Rome. There he wrote many excellent, elegant and extraordinary letters and a number of courageous poems upon his exile; a very beautiful book about the tediousness of this life, and his own lament; a beautiful prayer to the Holy Trinity, and many other matters. [Hilbert of Lavardin (c. 1055-1133), archbishop of Tours was born at Lavardin near Vendôme. He was probably a pupil of Berengarius of Tours, and became master of the school at LeMans. While he was absent in Rome in 1111, Henry of Lausanne spread heretical doctrines and denounced the bishop. In 1125 he was transferred unwillingly to the archbishopric of Tours, and there came into conflict with the French king over ecclesiastical patronage and with the bishop of Dol about the authority of his see in Brittany. He presided over the synod of Nantes in 1127, and died in 1133. His writings include letters, poems, a few sermons, and lives of Hugo, abbot of Cluny, and of Radegunda].

Saint Maurillus, bishop of Rouen, renowned for virtue and piety, also lived at this time.

The Cistercian Order had its origin in the Year of the Lord one thousand ninety-eight through Robert, the cleric and worthy abbot of Molesme in the so called Cistercian hermitage in Burgundy. The order was confirmed by Pope Urban under the Rule of Saint Benedict the Abbot, with many additional regulations. Through the gift of numerous privileges the order prospered and increased throughout the world. The celebrated monastery of Molesme was founded in the bishopric of Lingones (Limonis) [The reference is really to the diocese of Langres, the ancient Andematunum, which was the capital of the Lingones. Under Roman rule it was at first to some extent autonomous, but was reduced to the rank of colony after the revolt of the chief Sabinus in 71 CE. Langres is still a town of eastern France, capital of an arrondissement in the department of Haute-Marne], and was afterwards endowed with various estates. It prospered and produced a number of illustrious men. But when this old society, with its numerous members, began to decline in virtue, twenty-one monks, together with Robert, the father—lovers of heavenly things and scorners of earthly ones—left the monastery and went to a desert region called Cîteaux (Cystercium), a place appointed for them by God; and there they founded a new community and spiritual order, called the Cistercians. Later, on the advice of Odo (Oddonis), duke of Burgundy, and Hugh (Hugonis), bishop of Lyons and papal legate, and Walter, the Cabilonian [Cabillonum, an important town of the Aedui, identified with Chalon-sur-Saône, now an industrial town of east-central France, 81 miles north of Lyons. In the sixth century it was the capital of Gontram, king of Burgundy. In feudal times Chalon was the capital of a countship. Hugh IV, duke of Burgundy, gave the citizens a communal charter in 1256. The church of St. Vincent, once the cathedral, dates mainly from the 12th to the 15th centuries, and has a choir in the 13th century Burgundian style. The old bishop's palace dates from the 15th century]. bishop, they built the hermitage into an abbey; and in a short time it prospered marvelously.

The Cistercian Order (otherwise Gray or White Monks, from the color of the habit, over which is worn a black scapular or apron), was founded by St. Robert in 1098. He was born of a noble family in Champagne, and was at first a Benedictine monk and later became abbot of certain hermits settled at Molesme near Chatillon. Dissatisfied with the manner of life and observance there, he migrated with twenty of the monks to a swampy place called Cisteaux or Citeaux, in the diocese of Chalons, not far from Dijon. Here Count Odo of Burgundy built them a monastery, and they began to live a life of strict observance according to Benedict's rule. In the following year Robert was compelled by papal authority to return to Molesme, and Alberic succeeded him as abbot of Cisteaux and held the office till his death in 1109. Then the Englishman, Stephen Harding, became abbot and remained so until 1134. In 1112, however, Bernard and thirty others offered themselves to the monastery, and a rapid development at once set in.

The most striking feature of the Cistercian rule was the return to manual labor, and especially to fieldwork, which became a characteristic of Cistercian life. The Cistercians exercised their chief influence on the progress of civilization in the later Middle Ages; they were the great farmers of the twelfth century and depended wholly on the land for income. They developed an organized system for selling their farm produce, cattle, and horses, and notably contributed to the commercial progress of Western Europe. But farming operations on so extensive a scale could not be carried out by the monks alone, whose choir and religious duties took up a considerable portion of their time; and so lay brothers were recruited from the peasantry to do the field work and ply the useful trades. They lived alongside the choir monks, but separate from them, not taking part in the canonical office, but having their own fixed round of prayer and religious exercises. A lay brother was never ordained, and never held any office of superiority. For a hundred years the Cistercians, supplanting Cluny, were the most powerful order in western Europe. The French Revolution, and the revolutions of the 19th century almost wholly destroyed the Cistercians; but some survived, and since the beginning of the last half of the 19th century, there has been a considerable recovery.

Robert, a holy man, native of Champagne, and abbot of Molesme, at first entered the monastery of the Blessed Stephen in the Parish of Trajectum (Utrecht). Afterwards he left that monastery, and with the monks Alberta, Odo (Odone), John (Iohanne), Stephen (Stephano), Letaldus and Peter, went into the wilderness of Cisteaux. There he built a monastery with the assistance of the aforesaid bishop and duke. But when he was later ordered to return to the monastery of Molesme, Alberic, a very devout man, succeeded him. Through his zeal and courage the order increased in piety and esteem, receiving privileges and elevations through Pope Paschal. [Robert of Molesme, founder of the Cistercian Order, was born in Champagne in 1018. He embraced the Benedictine rule and became prior of the abbey of Moutier-la-Celle near Troyes. He was later sent to be superior to the hermits of Colan, in the forest of Molesme, in the diocese of Langres. Dissatisfaction with relaxed discipline there brought him to Cisteaux where he founded the Cistercian Order].

Stephen (Stephanus), the Cistercian abbot, a lover of the clergy, and the poor, and of regular discipline, in the year 1107, in the time of Henry (Heinrici) the Fifth, attained the charter of esteem and affection, attested with the authority of the papal seal. He became discouraged because so few entered the order, fearing the strictness of the rule that had to be observed. At night in a dream he saw a great concourse of people going to the monastery; and on the next day Bernard, with his brethren and traveling companions, entered the order, greatly augmenting and adorning it, as will be shown below. [Stephen Harding: Little is known of the early years of this individual. He first appears as a boy brought up in the monastery of Sherborne, in Dorsetshire. From there he traveled to Scotland, and from Scotland to Paris and Rome. He then returned to France, entering the monastery of Molesme, of which Robert was then abbot and Alberic the prior. The three in concert resolved to form the Order of St. Benedict, and they built the monastery of Cisteaux. Stephen became abbot in 1109, and in 1113 Bernard, followed by thirty monks, came to Stephen, placing themselves under his rule. Stephen died in 1134].

The Recovery of Jerusalem and the Inception of that Kingdom among the Christians.

The leaders of the Christian expedition assembled at Antioch on the first day of October, and Bohemund (Boemundus) was declared ruler of the city.

The enthusiasm for the Crusade was so great throughout Christian Europe that many became impatient with the slow preparations of the princes; and accordingly, in 1096, numerous bands of thousands of the lowest classes of society, set out for the Holy Land without order or discipline. They were led by Peter the Hermit and a French knight called Walter the Penniless. They proceeded through Germany and Hungary toward Constantinople; but very few ever reached Asia. Having attempted to obtain the necessities of life by force in the countries of their passage, and having carried robbery and desolation through Bulgaria, the inhabitants rose against them and destroyed nearly the entire band; and Peter the Hermit and Walter the Penniless had few followers when they reached Constantinople, where they waited to join the great army of the First Crusade under Godfrey of Bouillon. Similar undisciplined bands followed, plundering, persecuting and murdering the Jews and others who rejected Christ; but they were totally destroyed before they reached Constantinople.

Nearly 300,000 of the Crusaders had perished when Godfrey led a powerful and disciplined army to the Holy Land. Next to Godfrey the principal leaders were Count Hugh of Vermandois, brother of King Philip I of France; Duke Robert the Devil, of Normandy, son of William the Conqueror of England; Count Stephen of Blois, father of King Stephen of England; the chivalrous Raymond of Toulouse; Earl Robert of Flanders; and Bohemund, brother of Robert Guiscard, Norman prince of Southern Italy. They set out in six divisions, taking different routes to Constantinople, where all, numbering about 600,000 men were united before passing over into Asia.

The Crusaders captured Nicaea in Asia Minor, in 1097, defeated the Turks at Dorylaeum, and then besieged Antioch. The city was finally taken by the strategy of Bohemund and the treachery of one of the Turks, who left a gate open to the besiegers. The greatest cruelties were perpetrated upon the unfortunate inhabitants by the Christians. But within a few days an army of 300,000 Turks and Persians appeared before Antioch. The finding of a "holy lance" in the church of St. Peter raised the courage of the Christians, who sallied out of the city and forced the Moslems to flight.

Hugh (Hugone) the Great died in the meantime, so the other captains—except Raymond (Raymundo) who besieged the city of Caesarea with an army—decided to proceed against Jerusalem. They met at Lycia, preparatory to storming the city of Tortosa [Tortosa, town in Syria on the east coast of the Mediterranean, about 75 miles south of Antioch].; but after three months of inaction they proceeded against the city of Tripoli; however, at the request of its petty king they left it unmolested. They then proceeded by a shorter route (probably across the craggy mountains) to Jerusalem. In three divisions they marched to three different points. After several encampments they passed a number of cities, one of which the Turks had deserted through fear. Soon they arrived within six paces of Jerusalem, and the city became visible before the dawn. Then a great miracle occurred; for there was a great shout in heaven, accompanied by joy, jubilation and exaltation; and when this ceased tears flowed down the cheeks (of the Crusaders), and they knelt down in devotion and humility. Thus the Christians greeted the Holy City of Jerusalem, and the revered Holy Sepulchre. This city is situated in the Palestinian region of Syria on a high elevation, and is surrounded by hills. It has neither a river nor a spring within or near it, except the creek of Siloah, which contains water in the rainy season, but is dry in summer. It has its source in Mount Zion, and passes through the middle of the valley of Jehosaphat. But within and without are numberless cisterns for the collection of rainwater. The region belongs to many peoples, enemies of the Christian name. To the east are the Arabs, Moabites, and Amonites; to the south the Sedumei (Edomites?), Egyptians and Philistines; to the west the maritime cities of Ptolemais [Ptolemais, also called Acco; now the port of Akka, called in the West since the Crusades, Acre or St. Jean d'Acre. Acre is a harbor town or city of Palestine. From the third century BC it was known as Ptolemais, perpetuating perhaps the name of Ptolemy II (Philadelphus). The name of St. Jean d'Acre dates from the time when it was the headquarters of the Knights Hospitallers], Tyre, and Tripoli [Tripoli, an important maritime town of Phoenicia. As its name signifies, it was the metropolis of three confederate towns, Tyre, Sidon, and Aradus].; and to the north Tiberias [Tiberias, principal town of Galilee on the sea of Tiberias or Gennesareth. The modern name is Tabarieh], Caesarea [Caesarea, a seaport in Palestine, taken in 1101 by Baldwin I, on which occasion the "Holy Grail" was discovered], Decapolis [Decapolis, originally a league of ten Greek cities for mutual defense against the Semitic tribes. The region of Decapolis is the territory in which these cities were situated—the country southeast of the Sea of Galilee], and Damascus, reaching into the confines of Jerusalem. When the Christians arrived before the walls and gates of the city, they were eager to surround it. They stormed it from four points, finally taking it by force. In the capture of this city Godfrey (Gothifredi) secured special honor, for at the point allotted to him and his brothers for assault he was the first to scale the wall, and with the help of his brother Baldwin (Balduino) he descended into the city and opened the gates to the Christians. As they crowded their way into the city, there occurred such a slaughter, particularly in the temple, that the blood of the slain ran ankle-deep. If night had not intervened they would have taken the temple. On the following day they proceeded to capture the temple, and when all preparations had been made to take its upper reaches, the citizens cried out, begging for mercy; and they were promised their lives. In this manner the city of Jerusalem was won by the Christians on the Ides of July in the Year of Salvation one thousand ninety-nine, after having been in the possession of the Saracens during the reign of the emperor Heraclius. Then the captains removed their armor, and after ordering the Saracens to cleanse the temple, they humbly went forth to the Holy Sepulchre; and so did all the rest of the Christians. [From the victory of Antioch the Crusaders proceeded to Jerusalem; and when they came in sight of the city, they fell down on their knees and offered thanks to God. It is said they wept and shouted with joy; but their joy was succeeded by rage at beholding the Holy City in the possession of the Muslims. They besieged it and finally took it by storm in July 1099 after a siege of nearly six months. Thousands of Jews and Muslims were sacrificed to the fanaticism of the Crusaders. After this atrocity, the Crusaders proceeded with hymns of praise to the Hill of Calvary, and kissed the stone that reputedly covered the body of Jesus, offering thanks to God for the success of their undertaking. Then they established the Christian Kingdom of Jerusalem which endured for nearly a century. Godfrey was made ruler, but was too pious to assume the title of "King," calling himself "Defender of the Sepulchre." It is said that he wore a crown of thorns instead of one of gold. He gained a victory over the sultan of Egypt at Ascalon in 1099, and died in the following year. He was succeeded by his brother, Baldwin].

Having thus celebrated, and performed their devotions for eight days, they gave consideration to the appointment of a king for the city; and Godfrey (Gotfredum) was acclaimed king by the leaders and all the people. The leaders carried him on their shoulders to the Holy Sepulchre of the Lord, and after performance of the office of the holy mass, he was named king of Jerusalem. Although he assumed the burdens and cares of government, he declined the title of king and the crown of the kingdom, saying that it was not fitting that an insignificant little sinner should place a crown of gold upon his head in a city in which the Savior of the World, and Eternal King, wore a crown of thorns drenched in his most holy blood [See Godfrey of Bouillon, note to Folios CXCIII verso and CXCIV recto, above]. Afterwards Arnulf the priest was elected patriarch there. But in human affairs nothing pertaining to blessedness endures for long, and one year after the capture of the city of Jerusalem this Godfrey, the ruler there, was afflicted with a fever and died. [After the recovery of Jerusalem, its future government raised the eternal problem of the relations of Church and State. The pope had made a churchman, Bishop Adehemar, the leader of the holy war, and it might seem natural that he should be appointed to govern the Holy City. But Adehemar had died in August 1098, and there were left no churchmen of sufficient dignity for such a position. When the crusaders met on July 22nd, a few voices were raised in support of a “spiritual vicar,” to be chosen in the place of the late patriarch of Jerusalem (who had just died in Cyprus), before the election of any lay ruler was taken in hand. But the princes ignored the suggestion. Raymond of Provence refused the nomination on pious grounds, though one may suspect that his first ambition was the establishment of a principality in Tripoli, on the eastern coast of the Mediterranean. His refusal meant the choice of Godfrey. A few days later Arnulf, chaplain of Robert of Normandy, and one of the skeptics in the matter of the Holy Lance, became “vicar” of the vacant patriarchate. At the end of the same year Bohemund and Godfrey together became Dagobert’s vassals, and in the spring Godfrey even seems to have entered into an agreement with the patriarch to cede Jerusalem into his hands in the event of his dying without direct heirs. When Godfrey died in 1100, it might seem as if a theocracy was, after all, to be established in Jerusalem].

Baldwin (Baldvinus) was elected king of Jerusalem upon the death of his brother Godfrey (Gotfredus), by the consent of all the Christians residing in the Holy Land, not merely as a governor, like his brother, but as a real king. This happened in that Year of Christian Salvation one thousand and one, the year in which Urban the Second (who started the movement for the recovery of the Holy Sepulchre) died. Baldwin reigned 18 years. The Saracens collected a great army in order to recover the city of Jerusalem from the Christians. But Baldwin enlisted the aid of the Genoese and Venetians, captured the city of Ptolemais, defeated the Saracens, and in another battle defeated the Egyptians and slew the caliph, their king. [The theocracy contemplated by Godfrey and the patriarch Dagobert did not materialize, for the former’s brother succeeded him and became the first King of Jerusalem in fact and in name, as Baldwin I. See Baldwin I, note to Folios CXCIV verso and CXCV recto].

In this year an unusual star was seen toward the south and west at vespers on Friday of the first week of Lent. It shone for 25 days, always at the same hour; and a great beam was seen coming from the east. Afterwards, on Maundy Thursday, the day of the Lord’s Supper, two moons appeared in the morning, one in the east, the other in the west. Before long a comet with long flaming streamers appeared; and to it a monk said, Have you come as the mother of lamentations? I have seen you for some time; but now I look upon you as one who threatens the destruction of this fatherland.

Paschal (Pascalis), the second pope of this name, an Italian monk from the province of Flaminia whose father was Crescentius and whose mother was Alsacia, was called Ranieri (Raynerius), and was elected pope against his will by the Roman clergy; for he said his shoulders were not ample to carry such a burden. Nevertheless, pursuant to the prayers of the people, his election by the clergy, and to please the cardinals, he accepted the papal office; for he was proclaimed three times. Saint Peter elected Ranieri, a very good man, as pope. Then he was anointed according to custom, and crowned with the papal tiara. Afterwards he determined to help and to guide the churches out of their fallen state, and to elevate them. He sent his people against the antipope, Cibertus. And although he died suddenly, yet the church of God did not secure peace very soon, for Richard, a count of Champagne, established one Albertus as pope; but he was obliged to give up the idea and was exiled. Some others elected one Theodoric as pope; but they rued this, and ejected him from the see on the one hundred and fifth day. Finally, when the Roman Church secured peace and accord, Pope Paschal again received into his power the cities of Castellum and Beneventum, of which he had been deprived by the enemy. He consecrated 15 churches at Rome, and finally died in the 18th year, 6th month, and 7th day of his pontificate on the fifteenth day of the Kalends of February, and was buried in the Basilica of Constantine.

Paschal II (Ranieri) pope from August 16th, 1099 to January 21st 1118, a native of Beda, near Viterbo, was a Cluniac monk. He was created cardinal-priest of St. Clemente by Gregory VII about 1076, and was consecrated pope as successor to Urban II, on August 14th, 1099. In the long struggle with the emperor over investiture, he zealously adhered to the policy of Hildebrand, but with only partial success. In 1104 he instigated the emperor’s second son to rebel against his father, but soon found Henry V even more persistent in maintaining his right of investiture than Henry IV had been. The imperial Diet at Mainz invited Paschal to visit Germany and settle the trouble, but the pope in the Council of Guastalla simply renewed the prohibition of investiture. In the same year he ended the investiture struggle in England, and at the close of the same year sought in vain the mediation of King Philip and Prince Louis in the imperial struggle; but his negotiations bore no fruit.

When Henry V advanced with an army into Italy in order to be crowned, the pope agreed to a compromise, but the Romans revolted against the compact, and Henry retired, taking with him pope and curia. After 61 days of harsh imprisonment Paschal yielded and guaranteed investiture of to the emperor. Henry was then crowned in St. Peter’s and retired across the Alps. The Hildebrandine party was aroused to action, however, and a Lateran Council of March 1112 declared null and void the concessions extorted by violence from the pope. A council held at Vienne in October actually excommunicated the emperor; and Paschal sanctioned the proceeding. Toward the end of the pontificate trouble began anew in England. On the death of the Countess Matilda, who had bequeathed all her territories to the Church (1115) the emperor at once laid claim to them as the imperial fiefs and forced the pope to flee from Rome. Paschal returned after the emperor’s withdrawal in 1118, but died within a few days. His successor was Gelasius II.

Gelasius II, of Gaeta, previously called John (Ioannes), was born of a noble family. He was nobly reared, and was educated from youth, firstly at Mount Cassino, under Abbot Odrisius, a holy man, devoted to spiritual matters. He was summoned to Rome by Pope Urban the Second, for he was a pious man, worthy of every praise. He lived so piously and with such steadfastness in a time of great turmoil, human temptation, uproar, and distress, that he was elected pope by unanimous consent of all the people. But after Cencius Frangipani (Cincius Fregepanis) had proposed to the Roman clergy one of his cardinals, who, however, failed of election, he became so enraged that he attacked by force of arms the monastery of Palladius, breaking open the door, slaying every man in his course, throwing the pope to the ground, treading upon him, and binding and imprisoning him. He tore the cardinals from their mules and horses, neglecting no mode of humiliation. But the pope was soon released by the Roman people, taken to the Lateran, and crowned according to custom. Being afterwards persecuted by Emperor Henry (Heinrico), he fled to Gaul. There he was honorably and graciously received by the abbot of Cluny. But when, at this monastery he undertook to consider with the kings and princes many things for the good and protection of the church, he was seized with illness in his side, and died in the first year and fifth day of his pontificate. His body was buried within the walls of the monastery of Cluny. [Gelasius II (Giovanni Coniulo), pope from January 24th, 1118 to January 29th, 1119, was born at Gaeta of an illustrious family. He became a monk at Monte Cassino, was taken to Rome by Urban II, and made chancellor and cardinal-deacon of Sta. Maria in Cosmedin. Shortly after his unanimous election to succeed Paschal II, he was seized by Cencius Frangipane, a partisan of the emperor Henry V, but freed by a general uprising of the Romans in his behalf. The emperor drove Gelasius from Rome in March, pronounced his election null and void, and set up Burdinus, archbishop of Braga, as antipope under the name of Gregory VIII. Gelasius fled to Gaeta where he was ordained priest on March 9th, and on the following day received Episcopal consecration. He at once excommunicated Henry and the antipope and, under Norman protection, was able to return to Rome in July; but the disturbances of the imperialist party, especially of Frangipane, who attacked the pope while celebrating mass, compelled Gelasius to go into exile again. He set out for France, consecrating the cathedral of Pisa on the way, and arrived at Marseilles in October. He was received with great enthusiasm at Avignon, Montpellier, and other cities, held a synod at Vienne in January 1119, and was planning to hold a general council to settle the investiture contest when he died at Cluny. He was succeeded by Calixtus II].

Calixtus (Calistus) the Second, formerly called Guido, a Burgundian, and bishop of Vienne, was of royal French, English, and German ancestry. As others state, he was a brother of a Burgundian count. He was elected pope by the cardinals who were then at Cluny, but would not accept the office before he was confirmed by the other cardinals who were at Rome and in Italy. When this occurred he proceeded to Rome, where the people came forth with joy to meet him. And as Roman affairs were now at peace, he went to Beneventum, where the princes came to him, promising, under oath, to submit to the authority of the pope at all times. He then returned to Rome and sent his legates to Emperor Henry (Heinricum). They settled all matters of controversy, and brought back to Rome the treaty of peace that was posted in the Lateran Basilica, to the great joy of the people. This Calixtus held a council of nine hundred fathers at Rome, and in that council he settled many controversies, restoring peace and unity. He admonished Duke Michael of Venice to go to the aid of the Christians at Jerusalem. Finally, well respected by God and by men, he died in the Lord in the fifth year, tenth month, and sixth day of his pontificate. [Calixtus II (d. 1124), pope from 1119 to 1124, was formerly named Guido, a member of a noble Burgundian family, who became archbishop of Vienne about 1088, and belonged to the party which favored reform in the Church. In February 1119, he was chosen pope at Cluny, succeeding Gelasius II, and in opposition to the antipope Gregory VIII, who was in Rome. Soon after his consecration he opened negotiations with the emperor with a view to settling the dispute over investiture. Terms of peace were arranged, but at the last moment difficulties arose and the treaty was abandoned; and in October 1119 both emperor and antipope were excommunicated at a synod held at Reims. The journey of Calixtus to Rome early in 1120 was a triumphal march. He was received with great enthusiasm in the city, while Gregory, having fled to Sutri, was delivered into his hands and treated with great ignominy. Through the efforts of some German princes, negotiations between pope and emperor were renewed, and the important Concordat of Worms made in September 1122 was the result. He died in Rome on December 13th or 14th, 1124].

Henry (Heinricus), the fifth of this name, son of the aforementioned Henry the Fourth, was elected by the Electors in the Year after the Incarnation of the Lord 1107, while his father still lived; and he reigned 20 years. He pursued his father with war, chiefly at Liege and Cologne. The son proceeded from Aix-la-Chapelle to Liege with an army against his father. And when his men, as a precaution, had taken possession of the bridges over the Mosa, his father's men came and drove them from the bridges before the son himself arrived there. Then the son turned against those of Cologne, who remained true and obedient to his father. After he had besieged that city for a short time, he captured it with the aid and good will of the archbishop there. Afterwards he installed Bishop Rothardus at Wurzburg, took sureties from the citizens there, and allowed the Saxons to return home. With the Bavarians he appeared before Nuremberg, and after taking the city, he proceeded to Regensburg with his army. His father soon pursued him, and reinstated Bishop Rubertus at Wurzburg, and with the assistance of those at Regensburg he drove his son from there. Then the son once again proceeded to Liege, determined to besiege it until he had captured it. He remained there for four months. In the meantime his father died because of the constraints of mind from which he suffered, and the empire fell into the hands of his son. During the first five years after his father's death he zealously devoted himself to securing confirmation from the papal see; but Paschal, the pope, was antagonistic toward him because he had undertaken to invest and appoint bishops and other clerical persons in the name of the pope. For when the pope had denied him this authority, he decided to manage these matters with craftiness; and in the sixth year of his reign he proceeded to Etruria with his army, sending his emissaries to the pope in advance to inform him that if the king was admitted to coronation he would take an oath to forego all investitures and clerical appointments, so that all the churches in his realm should exercise their own rights and avail themselves of the immunities of the Blessed Peter, as they had done during the reigns of a number of his predecessors who had been Roman emperors. And so the pope then sent his legates to the king. They received his oath in the form prescribed at Rome. Then King Henry went to Rome; and the Roman people went forth with banners and olive branches to honorably receive him. When the king came to the pope he knelt down to kiss his feet. The pope caused him to be raised up to kiss his mouth. And before he was installed Henry took the imperial oath and obligation, as is the custom, and was named emperor by the pope. Afterwards the pope asked the emperor to give up his claim to investiture; but Henry rose up and made prisoners of Pope Paschal and all the prelates of the church, and distributed all their estates. On the following day the Roman people took to arms and drove the Germans out of Rome. But the emperor burned all the suburbs of Rome, and demanded that the Romans admit him. However, they refused unless he liberate the pope and the clergy. At last matters were peacefully settled, the emperor was confirmed and crowned, and he returned in peace to Germany. He married Matilda (Mathildem), the daughter of the King of England, at Mainz. In the tenth year of his reign he returned to Italy, and received the crown from Maurice (Mauricius), the archbishop; for until then he had not been properly crowned. Finally he surrendered the rights of the churches to Pope Calixtus and the ban was lifted. Later, while roving about the lowlands along the Rhine he contracted an illness and died at Utrecht, in Friesland. He was carried through Cologne to Spire and buried with his ancestors.

Henry V (1081-1125), Roman emperor, son of the emperor Henry IV, was born on January 8th, 1081, and after the deposition of his elder brother, the German king Conrad (d. 1101), was chosen as his successor in 1098. In spite of his oath to take no part in the business of the empire during his father's lifetime, Henry was induced by his father's enemies to revolt in 1104, and some of the princes did homage to him at Mainz in January 1106. In August of the same year, the elder Henry died, when his son became sole ruler. In 1107, a campaign to restore Boriwoj II to the dukedom of Bohemia was partially successful, and in the year following the king led his forces into Hungary where he failed to take Pressburg. In 1109, he was unable to compel the Poles to renew their accustomed tribute, but in 1110, he succeeded in securing the dukedom of Bohemia for Ladislaus I.

The main interest of Henry's reign centers in the controversy over lay investiture which had been thrice prohibited by Paschal II. In 1110, Henry went to Italy with a large army, and at Sutri concluded an arrangement with Paschal by which he renounced the right of investiture in return for a promise of coronation, and the restoration to the empire of all lands given by kings, or emperors, to the German church since the time of Charlemagne. The king presented himself at St. Peter's on February 12th, 1111, for his coronation and the ratification of the treaty. The words commanding the clergy to restore the fiefs of the Crown to Henry were read amid a tumult of indignation, for which reason the pope refused to crown the king, who in return declined to renounce the right of investiture. Henry left the city carrying the pope with him; and Paschal's failure to obtain assistance drew from him a confirmation of the king's right of investiture and a promise to crown him emperor.

In 1112, Lothair, duke of Saxony, rose against Henry, but was easily quelled. In 1113, however, a quarrel over the succession to the counties of Weimar and Orlamünde gave occasion for a fresh outbreak on the part of Lothair, whose troops were defeated at Warnstädt. Having been married in 1114 to Matilda, or Maud, daughter of Henry I of England, the emperor was confronted with a further rising, initiated by the citizens of Cologne, who were soon joined by the Saxons and others. Henry's forces were defeated at Welfesholz in 1115, and complications in Italy compelled him to leave Germany to the care of Frederick II of Hohenstaufen, duke of Swabia, and his brother Conrad. After the departure of Henry from Rome in 1111, a council declared the privilege of lay investiture, which had been extorted from Paschal, to be invalid and Guido, archbishop of Vienne, excommunicated the emperor, but the pope refused to ratify this sentence. The quarrel entered upon a new stage in 1115, when Matilda, daughter and heiress of Boniface, margrave of Tuscany, died leaving her vast estates to the papacy. Crossing the Alps in 1116, Henry took possession of Matilda's lands. By this time Paschal had withdrawn his consent to lay investiture and the excommunication had been published. The pope was compelled to fly and the emperor was crowned a second time by Burdinas, archbishop of Braga. Paschal was succeeded by Gelasius II in January 1118, but Henry secured the election of an antipope who took the name of Gregory VIII. Finally, in the concordant of Worms (September 1122), Henry renounced the right of investiture with ring and crozier, recognized the freedom of election of the clergy, and promised to restore all church property. The new pope, Calixtus II, agreed to allow elections to take place in the presence of the imperial envoys, and the investiture with the scepter to be granted by the emperor as a symbol that the estates of the church were held under the Crown. Henry was received again into the communion of the church, after he had abandoned his nominee, Gregory, to defeat. The emperor's concluding years were occupied with a campaign in Holland, and with a quarrel over the succession to the margravate of Meissen. In 1124, he led an expedition against King Louis VI of France, and turned his arms against the citizens of Worms. He died at Utrecht on May 23rd, 1125.

Anselm (Anshelmus), a bishop of Lucca, a man distinguished for his learning and piety, flourished at this time. He zealously devoted himself to the building of the large monastery of Saint Benedict, outside of Mantua, with funds provided by Matilda (Mathildis).

Anselm (Anshelmum), another of that name, is said to have lived at this time. He was a very learned man, and so highly esteemed among the English that he soon became an abbot, and later archbishop of Canterbury. He wrote many commendable books on various subjects.

Anselm (1033-1109), was born at Aosta in Piedmont and has been called the greatest thinker that ever occupied the throne of Canterbury. At an early age he crossed the Alps, and finally settled in the famous abbey of Bec, where in 1056 he was elected prior, and in 1078, abbot. Under his rule Bec became the first seat of learning in Europe. Anselm several times visited England, where his convent had great estates, and had so won the love of the people that they expected him to succeed Lanfranc in the see of Canterbury. But when Lanfranc died in 1089, William Rufus seized possession and revenues of the see, without making a new appointment. Four years later William fell ill, and in a fit of remorse, forced Anselm to accept the vacant see. Religious controversies between king and archbishop arose, and in 1097, Anselm went to Rome to consult the pope; but the pope would not embroil himself with the king of England, and Anselm withdrew from Rome to the village of Schiavi, where he finished his treatise on the atonement, Cur Deus Homo ('Why God (Became) Man' or 'Why God-Man?'), and then retired to Lyons.

In 1100 William was killed and Henry, his successor, at once recalled Anselm. But Henry demanded that he should again receive from him in person investiture in his office of archbishop; but the papal rule forbade all homage and lay investiture. The long struggle which followed continued until 1107, when the king resigned his formal rights. The two years following were spent by Anselm in performing the duties of his bishopric. He died in 1109 and was canonized in 1494 by Alexander VI.

Sigibert, a monk, an ingenious man in all the literary arts, is said to have died at this time.

Folio CXC VII verso

The Order of the Templars had its origin under Pope Gelasius, and endured for fully two hundred years. After Godfrey (Gothifredo), the illustrious duke of Lorraine, attained supremacy over the kingdom of Jerusalem, and several pious and chivalrous men noted that the pilgrims, who through devotion and contemplation visited the holy place, were subjected to robbery and murder, they vowed to the Lord to practice knighthood. At first their number was small, and they voluntarily lived in poverty. Their master was the guardian of the Temple, from which their Order derived its name. They lived not far from the Holy Sepulchre; and no matter from where the pilgrims came to visit it, the templars zealously protected them, and guided them from one holy place to another, in order to ward off the annoyance of infidels. They led such Christian and virtuous lives that they were praised in a wondrous manner by the pilgrims, and were kindly remembered with many alms. The members of the Order wore a white cloak with a red cross. The Blessed Bernard (Bernhardus) made a rule for them; and while they lived in poverty and observed the rule, they flourished in piety and virtue; but when they attained to riches and abundance, they began to indulge in pleasures and avarice, adulterous and clandestine conduct. In consequence they fell from virtue into wantonness, resulting in their suppression.

The Knights Templars, or Poor Knights of Christ and of the Temple of Solomon (paupers commilitones Christi templique Salomonici), founded in the 12th century, formed one of the three great military orders. Unlike the Hospitallers and the Teutonic Knights, it was a military order from its very origin. Its founders were a Burgundian knight named Hugues de Payns and Godeffroi de St. Omer, a knight from northern France, who in 1119 undertook the pious task of protecting the pilgrims who, after the First Crusade, flocked to Jerusalem and to the other sacred spots in the Holy Land. They were quickly joined by six other knights and soon organized themselves as a religious community, taking an oath to the patriarch of Jerusalem to guard the public roads, to forsake worldly chivalry, and, living in chastity, obedience and poverty, according to the rule of Benedict, "to fight with a pure mind for the supreme and true King."

To this nascent order of warrior monks Baldwin I, king of Jerusalem, handed over a part of his royal palace lying next to the former mosque of al-Aksa, the so called "Temple of Solomon," from which they took their name. They had at first no distinctive habit, wearing any old clothes given them. Nor was their community exclusive. Their primitive rule seems to have enjoined them especially to seek out excommunicated knights, and to admit them, after absolution by the bishop, to their order, and they thus served a useful purpose in at once disciplining and converting the unruly rabble which streamed to the Holy Land in hope of plunder and salvation. It was this rule that led later to the most important privilege of the order, the immunity from the sentences of excommunication pronounced by the bishops and the parish priests. The rule of the order was sanctioned in 1128 by the Council of Troyes. The Rule of the Temple, in its final form as we now possess it, contains the rules for the constitution and administration of the order; the duties and privileges of the various classes of its personnel; the monastic rules, regulations as to costume and religious services; for the holding of chapters, and a summary of offences and their punishment; the procedure for the election of a grand master; a definition of the relations of the order to the pope, and to other religious orders.

At the head of the order was the master of the Temple at Jerusalem (in Cyprus after the fall of the Latin Kingdom), known as the grand master. His authority was very great, but he was not absolute; for in matters of special importance he had to consult the chapter, and was bound by the vote of the majority.

Of peculiar importance were the chaplains (fratres capellani). They did not originally form part of the order, which was served by priests from outside. The bull Omne datum optimum of 1163 imposed on clerics attaching themselves to the order an oath of life-long obedience to the grand master. By the middle of the 13th century the chaplains took the same oath as the other brothers and were distinguished from them only by their orders and the privileges these implied, namely, they were spared more humiliating punishments, shaved the face, and had a separate cup out of which to drink. The order thus had its own clergy, exempt from the jurisdiction of diocesan bishops and parish priests, owing obedience to the grand master and the pope alone.

The brethren were admitted either for life or for a term of years. Married men were also received, but on condition of bequeathing one half of their property to the order.

Long before Bernard's death (1153), the new order was established in almost every kingdom of Latin Christendom, and every establishment was the recipient of rich endowments. Spiritual privileges were granted them by the pope as lavishly as temporal possessions by the princes and the people. They had their own churches and churchyards, and as defenders of the Church were exempted from tithes. So long as the attention of the papacy and of Christendom was fixed on the problem of recovering and safeguarding the Holy Land, the position of the Templars was unassailable, and all efforts to curb the growth of their power were in vain. The Paris Temple was at the center of the world's money market, and in it popes and kings deposited their revenues, which were not hoarded but issued as loans on adequate security. The Templars were the bankers of the age.

Never had the order of the Temple been more powerful than immediately before its ruin. Difficulties had arisen between the Order on the one hand and the French crown on the other, and with the pope; but these had been disposed of. Yet for several years the French king continued to plot a treacherous attack on the order. His motives are clear: He had used every expedient to raise money, had robbed and expelled the Jews and the Lombard bankers, and had debased the coinage. The suppression of the Templars would at once rescue him from their unwelcome tutelage and replenish his coffers. He also sought the amalgamation of all of them under the control of the French crown. He contemplated one order, of which the grand master should always be a prince of the royal house of France. The excuse was found in the denunciation of the Order for heresy and unspeakable immoralities by a venal informer; the opportunity was the election of a pope, Clement V, wholly devoted to the interest of the king of France. Strange stories circulated as to the secret midnight rites of the Order, which probably had their origin in the extreme precautions taken by the Templars for military reasons, which excited popular curiosity and suspicion. Philip of France introduced twelve spies into the order, and also sought to win over the pope to his views against it. The pope hesitated, but Philip determined to force his hand. All France was at that time under the jurisdiction of the Inquisition, and the grand inquisitor was the king's confessor and creature, and on October 13th, 1307, the Inquisition caused the arrest of Jacques de Molay, the grand master, and 60 of his brethren in Paris. The Templars were caught in the toils. To force them to confess, they were first tortured by the royal officials, and then handed over to the inquisitors to be tortured again, if need be. At Paris 36 died under the process. Of 138 examined in Paris between October 19th and November 24th, some of them old men, 123 confessed to spitting on the crucifix at their reception. Many of the prisoners confessed to all the charges, however grotesque. Even the grand master was forced to a similar confession. On November 22nd, the pope issued a bull for the arrest of the Templars everywhere, and the fate of the order was sealed by its condemnation by the pope at the council of Vienne in October 1311. The order was abolished, not at a general council, however, but in a private consistory on March 22nd, 1312. By a bull published on May 2nd, 1312, the goods of the society were transferred to the Knights of St. John.

The final act of the tragedy came in 1314. Molay, the grand master, had not yet risen to the height of his great position. Fear of torture made him confess, and this confession had been used to extract avowals from his brethren, subject as they were to unspeakable sufferings and accustomed to yield to the military chief. Before the papal commission Molay flamed into anger, protested, equivocated, only to repeat his confession in the end. But Molay recovered his courage at last. When he appeared on the scaffold in front of Notre Dame on March 14th 1314, in the presence of the papal legates and of the people, to repeat his confession and to receive his sentence of perpetual imprisonment, he seized the opportunity to withdraw his confession and to protest to the assembled thousands the innocence of the Order. King Philip the Fair did not wait to consult the church as to what he should do. Molay was burned at the stake.

The destruction of the Templars had three consequences fateful for Christian civilization: (1) It facilitated the conquest of the Turks by preventing the Templars from playing in Cyprus the part which the Knights of St. John played in Malta; (2) it partly set a precedent for, partly confirmed, the cruel criminal procedure of France, which lasted to the Revolution; and (3) it set the seal of the highest authority on the popular belief in witchcraft and personal intercourse with the devil, sanctioned the expedient of wringing confessions from the accused by unspeakable tortures, and so made possible the hideous witch-persecutions which darkened the later middle ages.

The Order Of The Knights Templars, called the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem, had (as Vincent writes) its beginning in the Year of the Lord 1020 after the Incarnation. They lived under the Rule of the Blessed Augustine, and wore black lay garments, and a white cross on their breasts, and were under obligation to render corporeal service against the infidels. Their principal place of abode was the island of Rhodes, where they, together with all their churches and houses, were under the jurisdiction of a grand master. Of these churches and houses there are many of wealth throughout the empire and the world. Although few of them are clerics, or consecrated, they enjoy the personal privileges of the consecrated, and occupy their days in saying the Paternoster [The Christian prayer, "Our Father..." in Latin begins with the words Pater ('Father') noster ('our')]. Of this, mention is made later.

Knights of the Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, known also as the Knights of Rhodes, and the Knights of Malta, were briefly called "Hospitallers" because they built at Jerusalem a hospital or hospice for the entertainment of pilgrims. Ever since Jerusalem became a center of Christian pilgrimage, a hospital or hospice for pilgrims had existed there; and early in the 11th century one of these was restored, and was later dedicated to John the Baptist. When, in 1087, the Crusaders surrounded the city, the head of the hospital was a certain Gerard, who earned their gratitude by assisting them in some way during the siege. After the capture of the city, he used his popularity to enlarge the hospital, and adopted for his order the Augustinian Rule. Donations and privileges were afterwards showered on the new establishment. In 1113, the pope took the Order and its possessions under his immediate protection. Gerard was officially looked upon as the institutor, if not the founder, of the order. During his lifetime it was purely eleemosynary. The armed defense of pilgrims may have been part of its functions, but its organization was an aggressive military force as a result of the renewed activity of the Saracens. This organization was the work of Raymond du Puy, who succeeded Gerard as grand master in 1120. From 1137, the Order took a regular part in the wars of the Cross. During the Second Crusade, Raymond was present at the council of the leaders held at Acre in 1148, which resulted in the ill-fated expedition against Damascus. This was repaired five years later by the capture of Ascalon in which the grand master and his knights had a conspicuous share.

The Hospitallers grew in wealth and power as did the companion order of the Temple. The rule of the Hospital, as formulated by Raymond, was based upon that of the Augustinian Canons. Their dress is black with a white cross of eight points. The statutes of the order were analogous to those of the Templars, but the two orders differed in that the Templars were a purely military organization, while the Hospitallers were primarily a nursing brotherhood. The Hospitallers, Templars and like military orders, who alone offered organized resistance to the victorious advance of Saladin, sultan of Egypt, who in 1186 began the systematic conquest of the kingdom. The Hospitallers and Templars who fell into the sultan's hands were massacred in cold blood. In October 1187, Jerusalem fell. This aroused the crusading spirit in Europe. Acre was recovered, and in this the Hospitallers played a prominent part, resulting in a steady restoration in the property and privileges of the order. But in 1291, the Moslems recaptured Acre, the last hope of the Christians in the Holy Land. The headquarters of the Hospital were moved to Cyprus, the order reorganized, and enhanced by immense additions of property and privileges in Europe from the pope and many queens and princes.

Certain changes took place in the order, probably through fear of the designs of Philip IV of France and his successors to which point had been given by the fate of the Templars, and the consequent desire to destroy the preponderance of the French element. Hitherto the order had been a federation of national societies, united only for the purpose of war and commerce, with headquarters in the strategic island of Rhodes. Rhodes became the chief distributing point in the lively commerce which in spite of papal thunders, Christian traders maintained with the Mohammedan states. Thus the Hospitallers became divided in their duty as sovereign, which was to watch over the interests of their subjects, and their duty as Christian warriors, which was to combat the infidel. But the crusading spirit was everywhere declining, although their galleys policed the narrow seas, their consuls in Egypt and Jerusalem watched over the pilgrims, and their hospitals were still maintained. The attitude of the knights toward the infidels was necessarily influenced by the fact that their supplies were mainly drawn from the Muslim mainland, and, by the 15th century, the crusading spirit became so weak that a commercial treaty was attempted by the Ottoman sultan.

The history of the Hospitallers at Rhodes is one of intermittent naval encounters with the infidels. In 1453, the Turks captured Constantinople. In 1522, Suleiman the Magnificent besieged Rhodes, and the following year the knights capitulated, withdrawing to Candia (Crete). They received no assistance from Emperor Charles V, although a number of years later he handed over to the Hospitallers the island of Malta. Their settlement of Malta was contemporaneous with the Reformation, and the knights later restored their prestige by victories over the Turks.

The French Revolution was fatal to the order. Emanuel, Prince de Rohan, who became grand master in 1775, made no secret of his sympathy with the losing cause in France, and Malta became a refuge for émigrés. In 1792, the vast possessions of the order in France were confiscated, and six years later the Directory resolved on forcible seizure of Malta itself. With this the history of the order of St. John practically ends.

In India the patriarch is called Prester John. These patriarchs were first appointed by the Apostle Matthew, and afterwards by the eunuch of Candix, the queen of Ethiopia. The Blessed Apostle Thomas converted India to the Christian faith. Now this Prester John is regarded not only as a bishop, but also as an emperor. It is said that seventy-two kings are subject to him, and obligated to him for annual tribute. In the same kingdom are one 127 archbishoprics, the archiepiscopal and imperial seat being in the great and mighty city called Bibrith. In the Year of the Lord 1120 John, the patriarch, one of the greatest men in India who came to Rome, openly told Pope Calixtus, the cardinals, and other prelates, that Saint Thomas the Apostle there gives to the people the Holy Sacrament every year, in the city of Hulna, in India, with his own hand conferring it on the worthy, and withholding it from the undeserving.

Prester John is a fabulous medieval Christian monarch of Asia. Before he appears upon the scene, we find the way prepared for his appearance by a kindred fable, which entwined itself with the legends about him. This is the story of the appearance at Rome (1122), in the pontificate of Calixtus II, of a certain Oriental ecclesiastic, styled "John, the patriarch of the Indians," or "an archbishop of India." This ecclesiastic related wonderful stories of the shrine of St. Thomas in India, and of the miracles wrought there by the body of the apostle, including the distribution of the sacramental wafer by his own hand.

Nearly a quarter of a century later Prester John appears upon the scene in the character of a Christian conqueror and potentate who combined the characters of priest and king, and ruled over vast dominions in the Far East. This idea was universal in Europe from about the middle of the 12th to the end of the 13th, or from the beginning of the 14th century. The Asiatic story then died away, but the name remained, and the royal presbyter was now assigned a place in Ethiopia. It is not improbable that from an early date the title was assigned to the Abyssinian king. Confusion of Ethiopia with India is as old as Virgil.

The first mention of Prester John occurs in the chronicle of Otto, bishop of Freisingen. This writer states that when at the papal court in 1145 he met with the bishop of Gabala (Jibal in Syria), who related how, "not many years before one John, king and priest, who dwelt in the extreme Orient beyond Persia and Armenia, and was, with his people, a Christian, but a Nestorian, had made war against the brother kings of the Persians and Medes, who were called Samiards (or Sanjards), and captured Ecbatana their capital. After this victory, Presbyter John – for so he was wont to be styled – advanced to fight for the church at Jerusalem; but when he arrived at the Tigris and found no means of transport, he turned northward where the river might be frozen over in wintertime. After halting on its banks for some years in expectation of a frost, he was obliged to return home."

About 1165, a letter was circulated purporting to be addressed by Prester John to the emperor Manuel, in which the writer claimed to be the greatest monarch under heaven, as well as a devout Christian. The letter dealt at length with the wonders of his empire. It was his desire to visit the Holy Sepulchre with a great host, and to subdue the enemies of the cross. Seventy-two kings, reigning over as many kingdoms, were his tributaries. His empire extended over the three Indies, including that farther India, where the body of St. Thomas lay. In war thirteen great crosses made of gold and jewels were carried in wagons before him as his standards, and each was followed by 10,000 knights and 100,000 footmen. There were no poor in his dominions, no thief or robber, no flatterer or miser, no dissensions, no lies, and no vices. Before his palace was a marvelous mirror on a high pedestal; and in this he could discern everything that went on throughout his dominion. He was waited on by 7 kings at a time, by 60 dukes and 365 counts; 12 archbishops sat on his right hand and 20 bishops on his left, besides the patriarch, protopope and archprotopope.

European travelers in Asia looked for a prince to whom the legend of Prester John could be attached. Carpini (1248) makes him the king of the Christians of India the Greater; Rubruquis (1253) gives the title of “King John” to Kushluk, king of the Naimans, and makes him a brother of Ung Khan, ally of Genghis. In Marco Polo’s narrative “Unc Kahn,” alias Prester John is the lord of the Tartars up to the advent of Genghis Khan. This story is repeated by other writers. But Marco Polo and Friar John of Montecorvino speak of the descendants of Prester John as holding territory about 300 miles northwest of Peking. Friar Odoric gave a circumstantial account of this kingdom, and with this Prester John disappeared from Asia to figure in African legend.

From the 14th century onward, Prester John had found his seat in Abyssinia. It is there that Fra Mauro’s great map (1459) presents a fine city with the Rubic “Qui il Preste Janni fa residential principal.” When, toward the end of the century King John II of Portugal was prosecuting inquiries regarding access to India, he opened communication with “Prester John of the Indies,” who was understood to be a Christian potentate in Africa. Vasco da Gama heard of Prester John; and more than twenty years later, when the first book on Abyssinia was composed – that of Alvarez – the title designating the king of Abyssinia as “Prester John,” or simply “the Preste.”

Burдинus, antipope, a native of Spain, confirmed by Henry (Heinricus the Fifth), together with his adhering tyrants, created such turmoil and indulged in such murderous conduct in a number of streets, that no one was at liberty to pass through them to attend the Council which Calixtus had summoned to Rome. Afterwards Pope Calixtus besieged the city of Sutri, in which Burдинus was staying. But the citizens promptly gave him up. He was placed backwards on a camel, his face turned toward the tail; and thus he was not only ridiculed at Rome, but by all the people on the way. Yet Calixtus refrained from spilling the blood of this evil man, but forced him into a monastery. [Burдинus (Maurice Bourdon), a Spanish archbishop, was elected antipope as Gregory VIII by the Roman people, who were incited to this action by Emperor Henry V, as an attempt on their part to recover their original right of election. He was elected in opposition to John of Gaeta (Gelasius II), whom the cardinals had elected to succeed Paschal II, who died in exile. The emperor confirmed Gregory VIII, and compelled Gelasius to seek refuge in France; and there he died. The cardinals in his train immediately elected Guido, archbishop of Vienne, as Calixtus II, in opposition to Gregory VIII. Calixtus was favorably received by the Romans, while Gregory fled to Sutri, but was delivered up to Calixtus and treated with great ignominy. The controversies which ensued between Henry V and the new pope were settled by the Concordat of Worms (1122), which was ratified by a General Council in the Lateran Palace, in 1123. Calixtus died in 1124].

Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux, a Burgundian, born of noble parents, in Castellione, the citadel of the Burgundians. His father was a sturdy and devout knight of the city of Fontaine, near Dijon. His mother was of the castle called Montibari. She had five other sons and a daughter, who later went into a cloister. She reared her children on coarse and common food, that they might be freer to serve God in the cloisters. While the mother was pregnant with this son, she saw a little white dog, slightly red on its back, and barking, as a prophecy of the future crying and baying of her son against the slanderers and disparagers of the church. At the age of twenty-two Bernard entered the Cistercian monastery together with thirty of his colleagues. There he so prospered that in a short time he was elected abbot of Clairvaux because of his piety, scriptural wisdom and teaching. He governed this monastery with great renown and honor for 36 years. During his lifetime he built 160 monasteries for his order, and made the Christian churches illustrious by the piety of his life, the sweetness of his teachings, and by the glory and renown of his miracles. Beside living a holy and venerable life, he left behind as the fruits of his intelligence and skill many pious, contemplative, devotional, sweet, and honeyed writings, books and teachings. When the city of Edessa was taken from the Christians by the Orientals, he aroused the princes, prelates, and people of Gaul, and also Conrad, the Roman king, to undertake a general crusade against the infidels. After performing many miracles he fell asleep in the Lord at the age of 63.

Bernard of Clairvaux was born in 1090 in the little village of Fontaine, near Dijon. After pursuing his studies at the university of Paris he entered the reformed Benedictine monastery of Citeaux at the age of twenty. At twenty-five, when the abbey became overcrowded, the abbot sent him on a mission with a number of his brethren to found a new monastery. He led his followers to the wilderness called the Valley of Wormwood, and there, in 1114, they built the abbey of Clairvaux. In a few years Bernard’s name became famous throughout the Christian world. He was called in to arbitrate differences between feudal lords, as well as between ecclesiastics. He drew up the statutes of the Templars. Louis VI appointed him arbiter between the rival popes, Anacletus and Innocent II; and when he decided in favor of the latter, the church received his decision with perfect submission. He was commissioned by the pope to preach a second crusade, and he succeeded all too well. He declined an invitation to assume command of the multitude he had incited to take up arms, and remained at home studying theology in his cell. But few of those who went forth on this crusade ever returned, and the people raged against Bernard as a false prophet. He defended himself on the ground that the armies of the crusaders were composed of such a vile, insubordinate, irreligious crew, that they did not deserve divine protection. He told the people to go home and repent – and they did so.

Worn out by fatigues, missions, and anxieties, by long and frequent journeys, by rigorous fasts and penances, his health gave way prematurely. Retiring to his cell, he languished for a few years, and died at the age of 63. His writings are numerous, centering on the allegorical understanding of the Bible. It is said of him that when writing his famous homilies on “The Song of Songs, which is Solomon’s,” the Virgin appeared to him and moistened his lips with the milk of her bosom; so that ever after his eloquence, in speech or in writing, was persuasive and irresistible. The finest example of this incident in later art is a painting by Murillo in the Prado that depicts the great abbot of Clairvaux seated amongst his books with jars of lilies on the table (an emblem of devotion to Mary), surprised by a visit from that personage. As the white-robed saint kneels before her in profound adoration, she bears her beautiful bosom, and causes a stream of milk to fall from it upon the lips of her votary, which were for that time forth endowed with a sweet persuasive eloquence that no rival could gainsay, no audience resist.

Pedro (Petrus) Alphonso, a Jew formerly called Moses, around the Year of the Lord 1100 was famous, for he abandoned the errors of Judaism, and devoutly received the sacrament of baptism. He wrote a book containing excellent disputations against the Jews and the Saracens. He was baptized on the day of the Apostles Peter and Paul. Alphonso, king of Spain, was his godfather, and in his memory, and in honor of Peter, he was called Pedro Alphonso.

At this time, being the Year of the Lord 1128, a number of people in the West were so consumed by holy fire that their limbs became as black as coals. But when they ran into the Church of the Blessed Mary there, and prayed to God, their health returned through the intercession of the Blessed Mary.

On the Ides of June in this year it rained blood in various parts of Italy.

A sow in the parish of Ligones (Langres), according to the testimony of Vincent of Gaul, bore a little pig with a human face. And in the same year a four-footed chicken was hatched.

Fiery rays appeared in the heavens and spread throughout the sky. Stars fell to the earth, and when water was poured on them they gave a loud sound.

It was a very harsh winter, followed by a great famine; and many people and much cattle died; and the birds strangled themselves.

In Italy occurred an earthquake, which lasted forty days, and overthrew the villages all around.

The moon was darkened at night, and it appeared as red as blood.

A woman bore a monster, double-bodied, having a human face in front, and the face of a dog in back.

John (Iohannes), who lived at this time, was Charles (Caroli) the Great's chief armorer; and he lived 361 years, and died.

Year of the World 6323 | Year of Christ 1124

Honorius the Second, formerly called Lambert and born at Fagnano near rural Imola, was bishop of Ostia, and was elected pope at the time of Baldwin (Baldvinus), who had been ransomed from the enemy and brought Antioch into the kingdom of Jerusalem. Although this Honorius was of low and obscure birth, he was esteemed for his scriptural wisdom and good manners, and considered worthy of the honor. Yet his entry was not entirely satisfactory, for, to some extent, he is said to have attained to the papacy through avarice; and the people zealously desired a Saxon cardinal for pope. Leo Fragipani (Fregepanis), a Roman citizen, also indicated that he favored a cardinal for pope. But when some of the cardinals noted this, they did not favor his choice, and allowed the Saxon to rest and elected as pope another cardinal called Theobald; and they called him Celestine. Then Leo delayed no longer, and proposed the aforesaid Lambert for pope. This pleased the clergy, and by common consent he was recognized as pope. He made cardinals of a number of distinguished men, and afterwards employed the same care in great matters. Finally he died in the fifth year and second month of his pontificate mourned by all, and was buried in the Lateran Basilica with extraordinary honor. [Honorius II (Lamberto Scannabecchi), pope from 1124 to 1130, a native of Fagnano near Imola, was a man of considerable learning and great religious zeal. He held a number of important ecclesiastical offices under Urban II and Paschal II, shared the exile of Gelasius II in France, and helped Calixtus II to conclude the Concordat of Worms (1122), which settled the investiture contest. He was consecrated in 1124, and by means of a close alliance with the Frangipani, he maintained peace at Rome. He recognized the Saxon Lothair III as king of the Romans, and later as emperor, and excommunicated his rival, Conrad of Hohenstaufen. He sanctioned the Praemonstratensian order and that of the Knights Templars. He excommunicated Count William of Normandy for marriage in prohibited degree. He laid claim as feudal overlord to the Norman possessions in southern Italy (1127) and excommunicated the claimant Duke Roger of Sicily, but was unable to prevent the foundation of the Neapolitan monarchy, for Duke Roger defeated the papal army and forced recognition in August 1128. He is not to be confused with Honorius II, the name taken by Peter Cadalus as antipope].

Innocent the Second, a Roman, was so aroused against Roger, the son of the duke of Sicily, that through anger, rather than by power and skill pertaining to such undertaking, he collected an army in tumultuous haste, and speedily appeared before the city of Saint Germain. In some unforeseen manner he was repulsed, but finally captured the city. However, William, (Guilhelmus) duke of Calabria, son of said Roger, came with a military force, and a battle ensued in which the pope and the cardinals were taken prisoners. Nevertheless, Roger employed prudence, and released the pope and his party, and secured from the pope (with the exception of the title of king), all that he asked for. When Innocent returned to Rome he found that an antipope called Peter had been installed in his place. In Innocent's absence he robbed the principal Roman churches of their gold and silver ornaments, made these into coins, and with them bribed many people to his will. Then Innocent, leaving behind as governor of Rome a cardinal named Conrad, proceeded with his cardinals to the court of King Philip [The Latin edition of the is here incorrect. Philip II was king of France from 1179 – 1223. Innocent II, however, was already dead in 1143. The German edition corrects this error by replacing Philip with Louis (VI), who was king of France from 1108-1137]. in France, and there held a council in which he condemned Peter, the antipope, and his adherents. After this he returned to Italy with Emperor Lothair. He died in the 14th year, 7th month, and 8th day of his pontificate. At that time there was a great famine in Italy. [Innocent II (Gregorio Papareschi dei Guidoni), pope from 1130 to 1143, was originally a Benedictine monk, whose ability, pure life, and political connections raised him rapidly to power. He became cardinal deacon, and was employed on various diplomatic missions. He participated in the Concordat of Worms as the pope's ambassador, and became papa legate in France. When Honorius II died, a minority of the Sacred College elected him pope as Innocent II. After a hasty consecration he took refuge with a friendly noble from the supporter's of his enemy Cardinal Peter Pierleoni, who was elected pope under the name of Anacletus II by a majority of the cardinals. Innocent refused to recognize the choice, and was obliged to flee to France. Here his title was recognized by a synod called by Bernard of Clairvaux. He induced the German king Lothair to invade Italy against Anacletus, and Lothair occupied all of Rome except St. Peter's church and the castle of St. Angelo. Lothair was crowned emperor at the Lateran in 1133, and Innocent gave him the territories of the Countess Matilda as a fief, but refused to surrender the right of investiture. Left to himself, Innocent again had to flee, this time to Pisa, where he called a council which condemned Anacletus. A second expedition of Lothair expelled Roger of Sicily (whom Anacletus had given the title of king in return for his support), but a quarrel with Innocent prevented the emperor from attacking Rome. Anacletus died in 1138. A faction elected Victor IV, but he resigned after two months. The Lateran council of 1139 restored peace to the church and excommunicated Roger, whom Innocent had proceeded against without success. The remaining years of Innocent's life were taken up by a quarrel with the Roman commune that had set up an independent senate, and one with Louis VII of France. Innocent died in 1143 and was succeeded by Celestine II].

Celestine the Second, previously called Guido, a priest of Saint Mark's and a cardinal, was from Tuscany. He was unanimously elected pope after the death of Innocent, and encountered no opposition during his pontificate, due, probably, to the famine which raged at that time, and of which he himself died in the fifth month of his pontificate. He was buried in the Lateran. [Celestine II, pope from 1143 to 1144, whose real name was Guido Castello, was born of a noble Tuscan family. He was able and learned, studied under Abelard, and became a cardinal priest. He removed the interdict that Innocent II had employed against Louis VII of France].

Otto, bishop of Bamberg, born in Swabia of noble parents, was sent to Poland to teach. Afterwards, through the assistance of the duchess of Poland, he was accepted at the court of Emperor Henry (Henrici). Through the good will of the emperor he was appointed to succeed Bishop Rupert, and after this spent four years traveling in Pomerania, converting the people from idolatry to the Christian faith by his lovely teachings and miracles. He also built various monasteries in many regions of the country; also the monastery of Heilbronn, with the assistance and endowments of the Countess of Bamberg. And so this holy man, adorned with many virtues, died in the year 1139, famous for his miracles. He was buried at Monastery Hill at Bamberg. Because of his piety and miracles the pope enrolled him among the number of the saintly confessors.

Otto, Bishop of Bamberg, was the son of noble but somewhat obscure parents, in Swabia. He was early left to provide for himself, and after some schooling, went to Poland, opened a school for boys, acquired a reputation in the duchy for his learning, and a knowledge of the Polish language. After some years spent in Poland, Judith, wife of Wladislas, duke of Poland, died, and the duke sent Otto to Emperor Henry IV to solicit the hand of his sister Sophia. The mission was successful and Otto was constituted chaplain. Under what circumstances he returned to Germany are obscure, whether sent to Henry IV by Sophia, or whether he left the Polish court on the death of the princess, is uncertain. At any rate, after a few years, he appears at the side of Henry IV as his chaplain and confidant, probably in 1092, standing by his sovereign in spite of excommunications and denunciations of the emperor as a heretic. In time he became the emperor's chancellor, filling the office with industry and goodness, and being loved by all the court.

In 1102 Henry appointed him successor to the deceased Rupert, bishop of Bamberg. By accepting the staff and ring from the emperor, Otto again involved himself in the sentence of excommunication, proclaimed by several popes against those who should acknowledge the imperial jurisdiction; for this reason Otto sent messengers to Rome soliciting sanction of his appointment. Otto was invited to Rome, surrendered the staff and ring, but was reinvested with them by the pope.

Otto set to work in his diocese, building monasteries and restoring his cathedral that was burnt down in the days of his predecessor. He also rebuilt from its foundations the church of St. Michael on the Michaelisberg, which has been thrown down by an earthquake. After the death of Henry IV, he also rendered valuable services in the controversy between his successor, Henry V, and the pope. In 1123 at the request of Boleslaw III, duke of Poland, he undertook the conversion of the Pomeranians who had been subjugated to Poland and were not Christians, and this mission continued until 1127.

Otto died on June 30th, 1139, and was buried in the church of St. Michael, where his tomb is still shown. His relics are preserved in various churches, and a few scanty remains still repose in his tomb on the Michaelisberg at Bamberg.

Baldwin (Baldvinus), the third king of Jerusalem with this name, defeated Gazim, Turkish ruler of Asia Minor, in the second year of his reign. In the following year Baldwin defeated the king of Damascus, who unexpectedly appeared at Jerusalem with hostile intentions. He added the city of Antioch to the kingdom of Jerusalem, and in a battle drove off the king of Ascalon. He finally died, leaving a daughter, but no son. [Baldwin II, count of Edessa, was the second king of Jerusalem, succeeding Baldwin I. The chronicler considers him the third, as he begins his reckoning with Godfrey of Bouillon as the first king. Baldwin II reigned from 1118 to 1131 and was originally known as Baldwin de Burg. He was a son of Count Hugh of Rethel, and a nephew of Godfrey and Baldwin I. He appears in the First Crusade at Constantinople as one of Godfrey's men. When Baldwin of Edessa became king of Jerusalem, he summoned Baldwin de Burg, and left him as count in Edessa. He conducted forays against the Muslims, and in one of these he was captured, remaining a prisoner for four years. He regained his principality in 1108. In 1110 he was besieged in Edessa, but relieved by Baldwin I. In 1114 he repelled an attack by Aksunkur of Mosul, and in 1115 helped defeat the latter at Danith. He carried his arms against the Armenians, and plundered every Armenian of wealth and position. In 1118, upon the death of Baldwin I, he became king of Jerusalem, and in a reign of thirteen years, extended the kingdom to its widest limits. He defeated the emirs of Mardin and Damascus at Danith in 1119, and in subsequent years extended his sway to the very gates of Aleppo and Damascus, and exacting tribute from both. He married his eldest daughter Melisinda to Fulk, of Anjou, who became the successor to Baldwin II on the latter's death in 1131].

Lothair (Lotharius), Duke of Saxony, son of Duke Gebhard, was regularly elected Roman king by the princes at Mainz, in the Year of the Lord 1127, together with the Roman legates, and succeeded Henry (Heinrico) the Fifth, who died without issue. Lothair himself had opposed the choice, considering himself unworthy of the honor. In the first year he proceeded against the Bohemians, who were antagonistic to him, but his army was defeated. Afterwards he punished the family of Emperor Henry, on which account Frederick and Conrad, nephews of the emperor, were antagonistic toward him. To the emperor's dislike and distress, some declared Conrad king, and the situation was pacified to the extent that Conrad took no action while Lothair lived. After he received the sovereignty, Lothair went to Liege to confer with Pope Innocent, who had been driven out of Rome by Peter, the antipope; and there Lothair assembled a large army, and, with Innocent, proceeded into Italy. He took the pope to the Lateran at Rome, and marvelously brought all things to a satisfactory status. He received the imperial crown from the pope and returned to Germany, where he defeated and quieted the Bohemians. But while the pope held a council at Pisa, a number of persons at Rome and in the principality of Roger rose up against the pope, trusting that Roger would give them the assistance he had promised them. At the request of the pope Lothair came to Rome with a military force; and, together with the pope, he proceeded against Roger, who in fear fled to Sicily, losing all his possessions in Italy. Then the pope installed Rainonis, an imperial count, as protector of the country, giving him the title to the duchy of Apuleia. This emperor was an intelligent and mild prince; and when he withdrew his army from Italy and was proceeding homeward, he died at Berne without issue. [Lothair II or III (c. 1070-1137), surnamed the "Saxon," Roman emperor, son of Gebhard, count of Supplinburg, was chosen German king at Mainz on August 30th, 1125 to succeed Henry V. His election was largely due to the efforts of the papal party. In 1131 the king's attention was called to Italy, where two popes, Innocent II and Anacletus II, were clamoring for support. Pledging his support to the former, he crossed the Alps with a small army, accompanied by Innocent. As St. Peter's was held by Anacletus, Lothair's coronation as emperor took place in the church of the Lateran, in 1133. He then received as papal fiefs the vast estates of Matilda, marchioness of Tuscany, thus securing for his daughter and her Welf husband lands that might otherwise have passed to the Hohenstaufen. After some internal difficulties, the emperor's authority was now generally recognized, and the annalists speak highly of the peace and order of his later years. In 1136, Lothair led a second expedition into Italy and drove Roger II from Apuleia. A mutiny among the soldiers and a breach with Innocent compelled the emperor to retrace his steps. An arrangement was made with regard to Apuleia, after which Lothair returned to Germany and there died in 1137. His reign was regarded, especially by Saxons and churchmen, as a golden age for Germany].

Fulk (Fulco), count of Anjou, husband of the daughter of the aforesaid Baldwin (Baldvini), was appointed fourth king of Jerusalem; and he reigned 11 years. He was a very Christian man, a sturdy and earnest warrior. Due to this fact, and having three sons, practiced in knighthood and military affairs, the pagans seldom attempted attacks. When news reached the king that the Turks planned sending many thousands of men against the Christians at Jerusalem, he took up arms against them, slew three thousand, and took as many prisoners back with him to Jerusalem in bonds. This so enraged Alaph, the Turkish leader, that with a great and mighty army of his own, enhanced by Arabians, Chaldeans and Babylonians, he besieged the city of Edessa, in Mesopotamia, which Baldwin (Baldvinus), second king of Jerusalem, had captured. And they took Edessa, and destroyed it with cruelty unheard of. The irrational, raging Turkish dogs spared neither young nor old in the slaughter, and particularly the archbishop and all the clergy, who refused to deny Christ, were put to death by the sword; and, what exceeds all madness, the most beautiful and noble women and maidens were seduced and violated by these ravagers, on the altar of Saint John (Johannis), which the Christians (as the pagans knew) held in great veneration. Edessa is a noble city of the Medes, to which, (according to the Scriptures) Tobias sent his son to visit Gabellus. Thaddeus, the Apostle, by the power of the Word of God, and by his miracles, converted this city to the Christian faith. Of this city (adorned by the relics of Blessed Thomas the Apostle), Abagarus was king. He wrote a letter to the Lord Jesus, and received a reply in the divine hand. After this city had been inhabited by the Christians for 44 years, contrary to the usages of humanity, it suffered such evils and cruelty at the hands of these savage people as surpasses all human understanding. But after King Fulk had countenanced this calamity with less concern than it deserved, he fell from his horse while hunting a rabbit, and died. [Fulk, king of Jerusalem, son of Fulk IV, count of Anjou, was born in 1092, and as early as 1120 visited the Holy Land and became a close friend of the Templars. On his return he assigned to that order an annual subsidy, while he also maintained two knights in the Holy Land for a year. In 1128, while preparing to return to the East, he received an embassy from Baldwin II, king of Jerusalem, who had no male heir to succeed him, offering his daughter Melisinda in marriage, with the right of eventual succession to the kingdom. Fulk married Melisinda, and in 1131, became king of Jerusalem. His reign was quiet and prosperous. He strengthened his kingdom, increasing the fortifications and improving his position by an alliance with the vizier of Damascus. In 1143 he died, leaving two sons, who both became kings as Baldwin III and Amalaric I. Fulk continued the tradition of good statesmanship of his predecessors, but unfortunately neglected to envisage the needs of the northern principalities, and to head a combined resistance to the rising power of Zengi of Mosul].

Hugh (Hugo), an abbot of Cluny, a man of good skill, better conscience, and still better moderation, was of angelic stature, retired in his ways, and sweet of speech. When burdened with years, he ordered Pontius, his successor, to preserve the treasures of humility and innocence. And so he rested in God. [Hugh, sixth abbot of Cluny, was born in 1024, and was descended from the ancient dukes of Burgundy. He placed himself under the guidance of Odilo, abbot of Cluny, who, perceiving his merit, made him prior of the community. The wisdom of his government caused him to be selected, in 1047, to reform the abbey of Paternac, in the diocese of Lausanne. In the year 1049 he succeeded Odilo. He multiplied abbeys of the order, and according to Ordericus Vitalis, had ten thousand monks under his rule. By his advice and counsel, a reconciliation was effected between Gregory VII and the emperor Henry IV. The sovereigns of Europe showed him the greatest respect, and Leo IX sent him to Hungary, with the title of legate, to reconcile king Andrew to the emperor Henry].

Helinandus (Helinadus), bishop at Landunensis (Lyons?) a man illustrious in all piety, flourished at this time. So also Maurillus (Maurilius), bishop of Rouen, was celebrated for his miracles.

Passau (Patavia) is a celebrated and once wealthy city, lying between the river Danube and the river Inn. The Danube comes from the mountains of Swabia, and the Inn from the mountains which separate Germany from Italy. In this region the Inn flows into the Danube and loses its identity. The city is elongated, and would take on the form of an island if a canal were run from the Inn to the Danube. The distance between these rivers does not exceed five hundred paces. A wooden bridge with sixteen arches spans the Inn, and extends from the part of the city that lies beyond the river to the greater city. There is also a bridge over the Danube, and the road that leads across it runs to the mountains that overlook Bohemia. On the other side of these mountains is another river, once called the Niger, and now the Ilz. It flows out of Bohemia, and divides the Jewish quarter from the third part of the city of Passau that lies below the bishop's castle, and flows into the Danube directly opposite the Inn; and so there is a confluence of three rivers here. In the Italian tongue this city is called Passum, which according to our own language signifies passage; for through this city Italian merchandise was transported into Bohemia. The upper Germans also passed through there to Austria and Hungary; and this is true today. In the heart of the city is church of Saint Stephen the first Martyr, patron of this bishopric, begun at great cost, but not yet completed. The choir is being built handsomely. Beside the church and against the river Inn are the large and attractive courts of the bishops, and beyond the Danube are two bishop's castles. One of these is on the heights; the other at the foot of the hill, where the waters of the Danube and the Ilz (which also contains pearl-bearing mollusks) flow into one another. A difficult and perilous way leads to the upper castle, which is vulnerable to attack at only one point; but even there it is protected by walls and moats to such an extent that it cannot be stormed or taken by human strength. In this castle are many beautiful and ornate halls and chambers. But the lower castle is more ornate, with its vaulted chambers and numerous halls; for the Germans are wonderful craftsmen, excelling all other people in works of art and in building. This praiseworthy city is adorned with the remains of Saint Valentine, which Taxillo, duke of Bavaria, brought there; and of Saint Maximilian, the archbishop of Laureata [Laureata was a place on the coast of Dalmatia, which was taken by the traitor Ilaufus, for Totila and the Goths, in 548 CE. But the place here referred to is undoubtedly Lauriacum or Laureacum, a town in the north of Noricum, at the point where the river Anisius, or Anisis (now the Enns) empties itself into the Danube. Laureacum was the largest town of Noricum Ripense, and was connected with high roads with Sirmium and Taurunum in Pannonia. It was one of the earliest seats of Christianity in those parts, a bishop of Laureacum being mentioned as early as the middle of the third century. In the fifth century the place was still so well fortified that the people of the surrounding country took refuge in it, and protected themselves against the attacks of the Alemanni and Thuringi; but in the sixth century it was destroyed by the Avari, and although restored as frontier fortress, it afterward fell into decay. Its name is still preserved in the modern village of Lorch, and the celebrated convent of the same name, around which numerous remains of the Roman town may be seen extended as far as the city of Enns, which is about a mile distant. Enns is located on one of the old salt routes across the Danube to Bohemia, and is therefore one of the oldest towns in Austria, having grown up around a castle built in 900 by the Bavarians as an outpost against Magyar attacks. The settlement of Enns soon gained prosperity as a market and obtained a charter as a free town in 1212]. brought from the city of Laureata to Passau by Saint Rupert. Laureata was once upon a time a celebrated and renowned city situated in a plain on the river Anisis, after which the city was once named. It had an archiepiscopal church, where the saintly Maximilian officiated as archbishop, and was afterward martyred. But after Attila (Athila), king of the Huns, destroyed that part of the city where the castle was located, the city was named after the river; but the archiepiscopal seat was transferred to Salzburg.

Passau, here also given the Latin name Patavia (more correctly Batava), is a town and Episcopal see of Germany, in the republic of Bavaria situated at the confluence of the Danube, the Inn, and the Ilz, 89 miles northeast of Munich, and 74 miles southeast of Regensburg. On the site of the present Innstadt there was a pre-Roman settlement, Boiudurum. Afterward, the Romans established a colony of Batavian veterans, the castra batava here. It received civic rights in 1225. The bishopric was founded by Boniface in 738 and included until 1468 not only much of Bavaria, but practically the whole of the archduchy of Austria. In about 1260, the bishop became a prince of the empire. In 1803, the bishopric was secularized, and in 1805 its lands came into possession of Bavaria. A new bishopric of Passau, with ecclesiastical jurisdiction only, was established in 1817.

Passau consists of the town proper, lying on the rocky tongue of land between the Inn on the south, and the Danube on the north, and of suburbs lying along the other rivers. Of the eleven churches the most interesting is the cathedral of St. Stephen. The two linked fortresses, the Oberhaus and the Niederhaus, are the remains of the fortifications. The former was built early in the thirteenth century by the bishop in consequence of a revolt on the part of the citizens; the latter is mentioned as early as 737.

Hugh (Hugo) of Saint Victor, was a Gaul of the castle of Saint Victor, a regular canon, and a highly celebrated teacher. About the Year of the Lord eleven hundred he was illustrious in piety and wisdom, and so experienced in all the liberal arts that he was without equal in his time; for this reason he was held in great esteem. Over and above his piety (of which one reads wonderful accounts), he was serviceable to many people through his writings and teachings, and left many excellent literary works. When he was ill with an ailment of the stomach and near death, the Holy Sacrament was brought to him; and so as not to show disrespect to said Sacrament, he said, The Son ascends to his Father, and the servant to the Master who created him. Then the Holy Sacrament disappeared, and this holy man gave up his spirit to his God.

Another Hugh (Hugo), this one from Folieto, a canon of Saint Peter's at Corbie [Corbie, a town in France, about fifteen miles east of Amiens, once celebrated for its Benedictine abbey (founded in the seventh century), the church of which (16th-18th centuries) is still to be seen, though now ruined. Compare with Corbeny, a small place in France, about twenty miles northwest of Reims, in the Middle Ages called Corbiniacum, where the French kings had a castle. In 900, the place was given to the monks of St. Remy, who erected a church to which the French kings made pilgrimages after being anointed], and a well-spoken man, at one time wrote a celebrated book upon the cloister of the soul. In it are many beautiful and praiseworthy passages concerning the security of the monastic life and the perils of the world. [Hugo de Folieto, that is, of Fouilloy (Somme), was a regular canon. He was elected abbot of St. Denis, Reims, in 1149. He died in 1174].

ILLUSTRATION

The city of Passau, inscribed "Patavia" instead of Batava, its old Roman name, is here depicted by a double page panorama. The woodcut is specially designed for Passau, and some of the important features of the city are readily identified. This is true of the Oberburg, or upper castle, and the Niederburg, or the lower castle, which appear on the right—one of the hill, the other at the water's edge immediately below. The cathedral of St. Stephens appears in the heart of the city. The river in the foreground is probably the Inn, which is joined by the Danube from the left and the Ilz on the right. The city appears to be well fortified with walls and towers. We also note a wooden bridge on the right.

Lucius was elected pope after the death of Celestine. He was a native of Bologna, and at first a cardinal. After accepting the papal office he neglected nothing that was necessary to the Crusades against the infidels at Jerusalem. As soon as the news of the disastrous defeat of the Christians at Edessa and the inhuman cruelty of the infidels (as previously stated) became public, Bernard, the pious and highly learned man, undertook the protection of the Christian faith, and orally and in writing admonished all Christian princes to take up the banner of the Holy Cross against the infidels. But while the pope was concerned with this matter, he was taken away by the plague in the eleventh month and fourth day of his pontificate, and he was buried in the Lateran Basilica. [Lucius II (Gherardo Caccianemici dal Orso), pope from March 12th, 1144 to February 15th, 1145, a Bolognese, successively canon of his native city, cardinal priest of Santa Croce in Gerusalemme, treasurer of the Roman Church, papal legate in Germany for Honorius II, chancellor and librarian under Innocent II, was the successor of Celestine II. His stormy pontificate was marked by the erection of a revolutionary republic at Rome that sought to deprive the pope of his temporal power, and by the recognition of papal suzerainty over Portugal. He was succeeded by Eugenius III.]

Year of the World 6343 | Year of Christ 1144

Eugenius the Third, a native of Pisa, consecrated a monk by Bernard, the holy man, and afterward abbot of the monastery of Saint Anastasius, was elected pope after the death of Lucius, by the fathers in the Church of Saint Caesarea, because of his piety rather than his worldly career; but he afterwards distinguished himself by worldly wisdom no less than by good morals. When he learned that the Romans were unfriendly to him, he left Rome by night and went to the monastery of Farfa, and from there he summoned the cardinals and court officials at Rome, and was consecrated and confirmed. And as he now ignored the threats of the Romans, as well as their acts and deeds, they made peace with the pope. But having learned that the Romans made peace with him with wicked intent, he fled across the Tiber, and they followed him with force and arms; and he fled to France. There he found the Blessed Bernard, and from him learned how poorly the Christians had fared in Asia. Then both blessed men pleaded with Louis (Ludovicum), the king of France, to take up the Cross and to proceed to Jerusalem with an army. Finally, in the Year of Salvation eleven hundred fifty-two Eugenius returned to Rome, and brought back into his power a number of cities which the tyrant had taken over in the meantime. He died in the eighth year, fourth month, and twentieth day of his pontificate. [Eugene III (Bernardo Paganelli), pope from February 15th, 1145 to July 8th, 1153, native of Pisa, was abbot of the Cistercian monastery of St. Anastasius at Rome when he succeeded Lucius II. Immediately after his election, the Roman senators demanded his renunciation of temporal power. He refused and fled to Farfa where he was consecrated. By treaty of December 1145, he recognized the republic under his suzerainty, substituted a papal prefect for the "patrician", and returned to Rome. The celebrated schismatic, Arnold of Brescia, however, again headed the party opposed to the temporal power of the papacy, re-established the patricianate, and forced the pope to leave Rome. In 1147, Eugenius journeyed to France to further preparations for the Second Crusade and to seek aid in the constant feuds at Rome. After holding synods at Paris, Rheims and Trier, he returned to Italy in 1148, excommunicated Arnold of Brescia in a synod at Cremona, and then endeavored to recover his see. Negotiations between Frederick Barbarossa and the Romans enabled Eugenius to return to Rome in 1152, where he died several months later. Eugenius exhibited the stoic virtues of monasticism and was revered for his personal character. His tomb in St. Peter's acquired fame for miraculous cures, and he was pronounced blessed by Pius IX, in 1872].

Anastasius the Fourth, a Roman, first an abbot and then a cardinal, upon receiving the pontificate, gave a very beautiful, costly chalice to the Lateran Basilica; and in a short time he built beautiful houses in the vicinity of the Pantheon, which they call the Saint Mary Rotunda. He had planned to do many things for the dignity and honor of the churches and for the adornment of the Roman state, had he lived. At this time a famine occurred throughout Europe, and this pope Anastasius secretly and publicly assisted the poor deserving people with alms. He finally died in the first year, fourth month and twenty-fourth day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Lateran Basilica. [Anastasius IV, pope from 1153 to 1154, was a Roman named Conrad, son of Benedictus, and at the time of his election was cardinal bishop of Sabina. He had taken part in the double election of 1130, had been one of the most determined opponents of Anacletus II, and when Innocent II fled to France, had been left behind as his vicar in Italy. In his short pontificate he played the part of a peacemaker. He died in 1154 and was succeeded by Cardinal Nicholas of Albano (Nicholas Breakspear) as Adrian IV].

Richard of Saint Victor a distinguished and highly esteemed teacher and regular canon of Saint Victor in Paris, as well as a sharp and convincing disputant, was highly renowned at Paris at this time. In addition to being a pious man, in virtue of his intelligence and skillful wisdom he wrote many valiant and praiseworthy manuscripts and books, well known to the learned. [Richard of St. Victor, theologian and mystic of the 12th century, was born in Scotland or England, and later went to Paris where he entered the abbey of St. Victor, and became a pupil of the great mystic Hugh of St. Victor. He became prior of this house in 1162. He wrote a number of religious works. According to him, six steps lead the soul to contemplation: (1) contemplation of visible and tangible objects; (2) study of the productions of nature and art; (3) study of character; (4) study of souls and of spirits; (5) entrance to the mystical region, which ends in (6) ecstasy. In his , Dante has placed Richard among the greatest teachers of the church. His writings came into favor again in the 16th and 17th centuries, six editions of his works having been printed between 1506 and 1650].

Malachi (Malachias), born of noble and mighty parents, and reared and educated in Ireland (Hibernia), was instructed in righteousness in the city of Armagh by a man called Malachi, who served God in a cell. At the age of twenty-five years he was consecrated priest, and appointed to govern a bishopric. At the age of thirty he was consecrated bishop of Connor, and was set to work among a bestial people. He trained them to good manners. He was elevated to an archbishopric and became the chief bishop of all Ireland. Through his learning and miracles he not only enlightened Ireland, but Scotland as well. Crossing over to see Eugenius at Clairvaux, he caught a fever. Afterwards he rested in the Lord. He was buried in the oratory of the Blessed Mary in the year 1148 on the fourth day of the Nones of November. [Malachi (c. 1094-1148), archbishop of Armagh and papal legate in Ireland, was born at Armagh. His father, an Irish clergyman, is said to have been of noble family. When his boyhood days were over, Malachi placed himself as a disciple when an ascetic named Imar O'Hagan, who lived in a cell near a church in Armagh, and through him inured himself to a life of austerity. Celsus, then bishop of Armagh, ordained him a deacon at the age of twenty-three, and later made him vicar. He spent four years with Malchus, bishop of Lismore (in Munster), and on his return undertook the government of the decayed monastery of Bangor. He was at Connor, a small village, when his archbishop died and was elected his successor. After the sack of that place by the king of Ulster, he withdrew into Munster where he built the monastery of Ibrach. In 1139, Malachi set out for Rome, was received by Innocent II with great honor, and made papal legate in Ireland, though the pope refused to grant the pallium until it had been unanimously applied for "by a general council of the bishops, clergy and nobles." Nine years later Malachi was commissioned to return to Rome and make fresh application for the pallium; but he did not get beyond Clairvaux, where he died in 1148. He was canonized by Clerment II in 1190. Malachi reformed and reorganized the Irish church and brought it into subjection to Rome. Several works are attributed to him, but are all probably spurious].

Conrad, the third of this name, grandson of Henry (Heinrici) the Fifth, and a native of Swabia, was elected Roman king at Coblenz after the death of Lothair (Lothario) the emperor, by the electors in the presence of Theodoric, a papal legate. He was afterwards crowned with the royal crown by the same legate at Aix-la-Chapelle; and he reigned 15 years. But the Saxons and Duke Henry the Proud of Bavaria were antagonistic to him. Afterwards a session of the princes was held at Bamberg; and there the king was moved to peace and mercy toward the Saxons and the widow of the emperor Lothair. But Duke Henry coveted the Roman kingship, and withheld the imperial jewels and sacred objects in the castle at Nuremberg; but he was later forced to give up the holy cross and spear. Pursuant to a decision of the princes he was exiled to Saxony by the king, and accompanied by four knights; and there he died. Now when King Conrad had made peace throughout Germany, he, together with kings Louis (Ludovico) of France, Alphonso of Spain, and Henry of England, and many other princes, undertook a crusade against the Saracens at the behest of Saint Bernard; and with a mighty army he proceeded to Constantinople. There he was received in a deceiving manner by Emmanuel (Hemanuel), the Greek emperor, and was soon prevailed upon to move against the city of Iconium under promise that he would be provided with everything that was necessary for his army. After this well fortified city had been besieged for some time, great sickness and death came upon his army, because the bread that was furnished him by the Greeks had been mixed with lime. And so King Conrad was obliged to retreat to Thrace. King Conrad and King Louis (Lodovicus) wrote to Baldwin (Baldvino), the king of Jerusalem for assistance, and decided to move the army to Damascus. And they came to Jerusalem. A papal legate had followed King Louis there. Then those three Christian kings were about to encamp before Damascus. They took with them in their train the papal legate and the patriarch of Jerusalem and many bishops, and they began a mighty siege of the city that the servants of Abraham had built. The city lies in a naturally dry plain, but by artificial means and industry it is rendered fertile; for in this region is a small river from which many ditches are run into the fields; and for that reason the soil is moistened and rendered very fertile. There the army encamped, so that it was an easy matter for it to withhold water from the inhabitants of the city. Upon the advice of an Assyrian (whom Baldwin greatly trusted), the Christians, together with their wagon-forts and camp, moved to another region, where the people of Damascus were able to prevent water from reaching the army. And famine and thirst followed, the army was obliged to break up, and Kings Conrad and Louis led their armies homeward to Europe. In the meantime Roger was elevated to king by the pope. He incited Welf (Guelfonem), the aforesaid Henry's brother, to make war upon Conrad; but Welf was defeated at the castle of Winszberg. Finally King Conrad died at Bamberg in the Year of the Lord 1153 [The chronicler (or his source) is here incorrect, for Conrad III died in 1152, not 1153]. without having received the imperial crown.

Conrad III (1093-1152), German king, second son of Frederick I, duke of Swabia, and Agnes, daughter of the emperor Henry IV, was the first king of the Hohenstaufen family. His father died in 1105, and in 1115, his uncle, the emperor Henry V, appointed him duke of Franconia. In 1116, together with his elder brother, Frederick II, duke of Swabia, he was left by Henry as regent of Germany, and when the emperor died in 1125, he became titular king of Burgundy, or Arles. In 1126, he took part in the war between his brother Frederick and the new king, Lothair the Saxon, and was chosen king in opposition to Lothair in 1127. Hastening across the Alps, he was crowned king of Italy at Monza in 1128, and, in spite of the papal ban, was generally acknowledged in northern Italy. The rival popes both declared against him, and the Romans repudiated him. After failing to seize the extensive possessions left by Matilda, marchioness of Tuscany, he returned to Germany in 1132. He continued to struggle against Lothair, but finally submitted. Lothair died in 1137, and some of the princes met at Coblenz and chose Conrad for a second time as German king, in the presence of the papal legate. He was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle; but his position was jeopardized by Henry the Proud, the powerful duke of Bavaria and Saxony, who refused him allegiance. A war followed, in which Conrad was unable to make much headway in spite of the death of Duke Henry. Peace was made in 1142, when Henry the Lion, son of Henry the Proud, was confirmed in the duchy of Saxony, while Bavaria was given to Conrad's step brother, Henry Jasomirgott, who married Gertrude, the widow of Henry the Proud.

Roger I, king of Sicily, having won considerable authority on the mainland, refused to recognize the German king, whose help Pope Lucius II implored against the rebellious Romans. But disorder was rampant in Saxony, Bavaria, and Burgundy; and, in 1146, war broke out between the Bavarians and the Hungarians; but the preaching of Bernard of Clairvaux caused many of the turbulent nobles to depart in the Crusades. In December 1146 the king himself took the cross, and with a large army marched through Hungary and reached Asia Minor, where his forces were decimated by disease and by the sword. Having shared in the fruitless attack on Damascus, he left Palestine in 1148 and passed the ensuing winter at Constantinople, where he made fresh plans for an attack on Roger of Sicily. The news that Roger had allied himself with Louis VII, king of France and his old opponent Welf of Bavaria, compelled him to return hastily to Germany. Conrad died on February 15th, 1152, at Bamberg, where he was buried.

Many believe that from this Welf (Guelfone), duke of Bavaria, the Guelfs derived their name. As a disturber of the peace in Italy, he secured control. But why some are called Guelfs and others Ghibellines, will be told later. [Guelphs and Ghibellines are names originally applied to two German parties formed in the 12th century around the families to which respectively belonged the dukes of Saxony and Bavaria and the lords of Hohenstaufen. The rivalry between these two families determined much of the history of Germany in the 12th century, and the names were employed at an early date in Italy where the Ghibellines formed the party of the emperor Frederick I, and the Guelphs formed the party opposed to him. In the next century, the terms acquired a wider sense; the Ghibellines still formed the Imperialist party, but the term Guelph lost all trace of its original association with dynastic rivalries in Germany and became applied to the supporters of the papacy in its struggle against the empire. Long after this struggle had become a matter of history, these ancient names survived in Italian civic politics, often noting factions whose origin had no real connection with the rivalry of empire and papacy in an earlier age. Of the terms themselves, Guelph represents the Old German personal name Hwelp, originally perhaps a nickname (for it corresponds to the English word "whelp"), but borne by many persons of rank, notably Welf, duke of Bavaria, in the 11th century. Ghibelline is a form of the place-name Waiblingen, an ancient possession of the lords Hohenstaufen, and not far from the castle of that name].

Louis (Ludovicus), King of France, son of King Louis, reigned 48 years. He was a magnanimous and virtuous man; and in the fourteenth year of his reign, together with a great body of men and with the Roman king Conrad, proceeded against the Turks. When he approached Jerusalem, the Roman king there sent the patriarch to meet him. Louis was escorted through the city and shown all the venerated places; and he and his spouse remained in Jerusalem an entire year. Finally he and the princes returned to France.

From this time forth, and from day to day, the Oriental countries belonging to the Latins declined and fell upon evil ways, although up to this point the Latins had thrown fear into all the enemies of the Christian faith; but now they fell into such disrepute that the enemy no longer feared them; and thus the power and strength of the Christians were extinguished. In consequence, Noradinus began to trouble the region of Antioch.

Louis VII (c. 1121-1180), king of France, son of Louis VI, the Fat, was associated with his father and anointed by Innocent II in 1131. In 1137 he succeeded his father, and in the same year married Eleanor, heiress of William II, duke of Aquitaine. In the first part of his reign he was vigorous and jealous of his prerogatives, but after his crusade his religiosity developed to such an extent as to make him utterly inefficient. His accession was marked by no serious disturbances, save the risings of the burgesses of Orleans and of Poitiers, but he came into violent conflict with Pope Innocent II. The archbishopric of Bourges became vacant, and the king supported as candidate the chancellor Cadurc, against the pope's nominee Pierre de la Chatre, swearing upon relics the pope's nominee Pierre should never enter Bourges. This brought the interdict upon the king's lands. He became involved in a war with Theobald, count of Champagne, which lasted two years (1142-44). The royal army occupied Champagne, and captured Vitry, where many persons perished in the burning of the church. Geoffrey the Handsome, count of Anjou, by his conquest of Normandy threatened the royal domains, and Louis VII by a clever maneuver threw his army on the Norman frontier and gained Cisors, one of the keys of Normandy.

At his court, which met in Bourges, Louis declared on Christmas Day, 1145, his intention of going on a crusade. Bernard preached the crusade at Vezelay (Easter 1146), and Louis set out from Metz in June 1147, on the overland route to Syria. The expedition was disastrous, and he regained France in 1149, overcome by humiliation. He caused a council at Beaugency (on March 21st, 1152) to annul his marriage with Eleanor of Aquitaine, under pretext of kinship. Eleanor married Henry II of England in the following May, and brought him the duchy of Aquitaine. Louis VII led a half-hearted war against Henry, but in August 1154, gave up his rights over Aquitaine and contented himself with an indemnity. In 1154, Louis married Constance, daughter of the king of Castile, and their daughter Marguerite he affianced imprudently by the treaty of Gisors (1158), to Henry, eldest son of the king of England, promising as dowry the Vexin and Gisors. After the death of Constance (1160), Louis VII married Adele of Champagne. Louis VII gave little sign of understanding the danger of the growing Angevin power, though in 1159 he aided Raymond V, count of Toulouse, against Henry II. At the same time the emperor Frederick I in the east was making good the imperial claims on Arles. When the schism broke out, Louis took the part of the pope Alexander III. He supported Henry's rebellious sons, but acted slowly and feebly, and so contributed to the break-up of the coalition (1173-74).

Finally, in 1177, the pope intervened to bring the two kings to terms at Vitry. By his third wife, Adele, Louis had an heir, the future Philip Augustus, born on the 21st of August 1165. He had him crowned at Reims in 1179, and died on the 18th of September 1180.

Hildegard (Hildegardis), a virgin of mature years, flourished in the Rhineland through her miraculous life. Although a laywoman, and uneducated, through divine power she miraculously received grace in her sleep and was thrown into ecstasies. And so she not only learned to speak Latin, but also to read it and to compose verse in it. She wrote books of Christian learning, and it is said that she also prophesied. Even the Blessed Bernard wrote her a number of letters. She wrote letters to those at Cologne concerning the future fate of the clergy because the clergy sought renown without having earned it, and claimed credit without works. [Hildegard of Bingen (1098-1179), German abbess and mystic, was born of noble parents, and from her eighth year was educated at a Benedictine cloister at Disibodenberg by Jutta, sister of the count of Sponheim, whom she succeeded as abbess in 1136. From childhood she experienced visions, which in her 43rd year she divulged to her friend, the monk Godefridus, who committed them to writing, entitling them ("Know the Ways [of the Lord]"). She corresponded with Anastasius IV and Adrian IV, and the emperors Conrad III and Frederick I. After she migrated with eighteen of her nuns to a new convent on the Rupertsberg near Bingen, she continued to exercise the gift of prophecy and to record her visions in writing. She died in 1179. She has never been canonized, but her name is in the Roman martyrology. In addition to being a mystic, she also wrote many songs, a musical play entitled ('The Play of Virtues'), and works on the medicinal properties of herbs, gems, stones, etc].

Gratian (Gracianus), a monk of Saint Proculus who was Tuscan, was born in the city of Ginsa [The city of Ginsa is unknown. Perhaps the chronicler or his source meant Chiusi]. in Tuscany. In the Year of the Lord 1149 he was held in great veneration and esteem at Bologna for his intelligence, wisdom, and scriptural teachings. Among other works he very masterfully compiled a book of canon law, called the Decretum, which was confirmed by Pope Eugenius and ordered read in the schools of higher learning. It is so arranged that the points, articles and meanings can be noted and distinguished. Gratian divided the work into three parts, and with it those learned in the law are familiar. Certain teachers have written commentaries and interpretations upon it. [Gratian, compiler of or , and founder of the science of canon law, was born about the end of the eleventh century, and at an early age is said to have entered the Camaldulian monastery of Classe near Ravenna, whence he afterwards moved to that of San Felice in Bologna, where he prepared the which seems to have been completed before 1150. The work commonly known as the exercised great influence on the formation of the canon law, and was the chief authority in the universities. So much so that no other work of the same kind has been compiled].

Peter Lombard, bishop of Paris and a Lombard was (as Vincent the Gaul states) highly renowned at this time among the learned of Paris for the goodness of his life and his keen intelligence. He wrote an excellent work on higher thought, a laborious achievement consisting of a useful collection of sayings by many holy fathers. He also wrote the large glossaries on the Psalms and the Epistles of Paul, containing many references, as well as numerous excellent spiritual, good and spirited works; and before the people he delivered very beautiful and worthy sermons, productive of good.

Peter Lombard (c. 1100 - c. 1160), bishop of Paris, son of obscure parents, was born at the beginning of the 12th century, at Novara, then considered as belonging to Lombardy. He was educated at Bologna, and removed to France, carrying a recommendation to Bernard of Clairvaux, who first placed him under Lotolf at Reims, and later sent him to Paris with letters to Gilduin, abbot of St. Victor. He obtained a theological chair in the school. His famous textbook, the Sententiae, was written between 1145 and 1450. He became bishop of Paris in 1159, and according to one account died the following year.

His famous theological handbook, Sententiarum libri quatuor ('Four Books of Opinions') as the title implies, is primarily a collection of opinions of the fathers. These are arranged in four books, treating respectively of God, virtues, the seven sacraments and eschatology. The most important thing in the book was its crystallization of the doctrine concerning the sacramental system by the definite assertion of the doctrine of the seven sacraments, and the acceptance of a definition of sacrament not merely as "a sign of a sacred thing," but as itself "capable of conveying the grace of which it is the sign." The sentences soon attained immense popularity, ultimately becoming the textbook in almost every theological school, and giving rise to endless commentaries, over 180 of these being written in England. In 1300 the theological professors of Paris agreed in the rejection of 16 propositions taken from Lombard, but their decision did not obtain universal currency. Lombard also wrote numerous commentaries on the Psalms, Canticles, Job, and the Pauline Epistles. The Glossae seu commentarius in psalmos Davidis ('The Glosses or Commentary on the Psalms of David') were first published at Paris in 1533.

Petrus Comestor a brother of the two aforesaid, not in the flesh, but in virtue, lived at this time; and (as Vincent the Gaul notes) he wrote a scholastic history in which he gave elegant expression to the narratives of both testaments, and at appropriate places introduced matters of profane history. He also wrote several very beautiful poems in praise of the Virgin Mary. And so, at this time, the church was much enlightened with learning. Some say that the three teachers, aforesaid, were brothers in the flesh, but born out of wedlock; and as their mother felt no remorse on that account, she was ordered to do penance for that which she should have rued. [Peter Comestor ('the Eater' or 'Devourer') was a famous theologian of the 12th century.]

William (Guilhelmus), a child in England was, at this time, crucified by the Jews on Good Friday, in the city of Norwich. Later one reads a miraculous story of this child.

At this time the Genoese were so esteemed for wealth and renown that King Conrad granted them the privilege of minting gold and silver coins with his portrait on them; and these they use to this day.

ILLUSTRATION

Crucifixion of William, an English child, by the Jews. A cross lies on the hillside in the open country. Upon it lies a young man whom three men have bound, hand and foot. One, who is bearded, is fastening the last bond; a second man is driving a nail through William's right hand; while the third is drilling a hole into the cross just below the child's feet. A basket of tools and cord stands on the left. The crucifiers are marked by the usual circular badge (generally of yellow cloth) on breast or shoulder.

The chronicler does not give the time of the occurrence except to say that it occurred "in these times," but there is no dating of the folio or page, or other earmark by which the time can be determined. The following is a list of children said to have been murdered by Jews: Wojciech Petrena of Poland, in 1598; Andreas at Innsbruck; Simon of Trent, 1475, cited by Schedel; William of Norwich, the present instance; Henry of Regensburg, Hugo of Lincoln, Staenchen of Cologne, Kenelm of Winchcombe, Lorenzo of Morostica, Ludwig of Ravensburg, Novello of Bergamo, Mancos of Portugal, Rudolph of Bern, Werner of Wesel, Esther Solymossy of Tisza-Eszlar (1882), and Staenchen Hegemann of Xanten (1891).

Israel Abrahamson, in his Jewish Life in the Middle Ages, devotes a chapter to "The Jewish Badge," (Chapter XVI, pp. 291-306), from which we quote as follows:

But at the beginning of the thirteenth century there dawned on the Jews of Europe a new era, dark with degradation and misery. The Church resolved in 1215 that thenceforward Jews and Mohammedans must be marked off from their fellows by a badge prominently fastened to their outermost garment. The exact motive for inflicting this distressful stigma cannot be discovered, but, as the ostensible reason, Innocent III advanced the argument that the measure was imperative if intermarriage or concubinage was to be prevented between Christians and non-believers. This desire to inhibit concubinage and perhaps intermarriage is repeated in many subsequent bills, and may be regarded as the official justification of the badge which Jews were doomed to wear for several pitiful centuries. An attempt was indeed made to show that Moses had already commanded the Jews to wear a distinctive mark on their garments, but this application of the law of the fringes (Numbers 15:38) to the law of the badge was an insult added to injury.

Clear and emphatic in its demand that the Jews must wear badges, the Lateran Council nevertheless avoided details. It left the definition of the size, color, and character of the degrading mark to the taste of local governors and states. Rarely, the Jews themselves were left to their own devices, and were allowed to choose their own badges. The shape was by no means uniform, but the circular mark was undoubtedly the most usual. It is unnecessary to seek any deep significance in the choice of the circular form of the badge. Some have seen in it a representation of a coin, in allusion to the financial pursuits of the Jews or to the thirty pieces received by Judas Iscariot as the price of his betrayal. Others have discerned in it the form of the Host, an emblem of Christianity which the Jews refused to accept, but which they were now forced to wear over their hearts. Yet a third explanation is worthy of mention. The badge was itself perhaps derived by Innocent III from the Mohammedans. If so, the circle or full moon would be an antithesis to the Crescent of Islam.

Be this as it may, the circular form of badge, though the most common, was not the only one in use. Changes were effected in one and the same country, and it does not seem that the English design, imitative of the two tables of stone, was introduced into this country earlier than 1275. These tablets were apparently worn on the hem of the outer garment. On the other hand a badge, two inches wide and four inches long, was imposed on English Jews in 1222. Similarly, a modification was made in England with regard to the color. Originally the badge was white, but Edward I altered this to yellow and fixed seven as the age at which the badge became compulsory. It does not appear that the English Jews were forced to wear distinctive garments as well as the badge, but in Austria in the thirteenth, and in Germany in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries, the Jews were compelled to use a special hat, known as the 'Judenhut.' It was pointed at the top, and the brim was often twisted into the shape of a pair of horns. Red was the favorite color. It is not clear whether the Jews of Germany wore this hideous hat as the substitute for the circular wheel or in addition to it. Other kings preferred other colors, thus in 1713, Frederick William imposed a green hat on the Jews of his realm. It is certain that the wheel-badge was usual in Germany in the fifteenth century, the predominant color being yellow or saffron. Jews fixed it on their breast, while Jewesses were obliged to bear two blue stripes on their veils or cloaks. The size of the wheel varies, sometimes it was fixed at an inch in diameter, sometimes it was as big as a florin, sometimes it resembled a crown, sometimes it was as much as 100 millimeters across. Occasionally the letter S (= signum) appeared in the yellow circle. In Switzerland, in 1435, the badge took the form of a piece of red cloth, shaped like a pointed hat; in 1508 it had become a wheel fixed on the back. In Crete, the obnoxious circular sign was also inscribed on the doors of houses occupied by Jews.

France may claim the honor of inventing the circular badge, which was already known in Paris in 1208. In Marseilles, indeed, the Jews were permitted an alternative; they might wear either a yellow calotte or a head-dress, or if they preferred they might adopt the wheel. Here, too, the age at which the badge must be borne was fixed at seven years. In general, the rule in France was that Jew and Jewess alike wore the circular mark, though, in the case of the women, it was often replaced by a veil. Some variation occurs in the age at which Jews began to wear the badge. In Marseilles, the age was seven, in Arles (1234), thirteen for boys and twelve for girls, in Avignon, the age was raised (in 1326) for boys to fourteen. In France the wheel was worn mostly on the breast, or at least above the waist; but sometimes a second circle was added, to be placed on the back 'retro in dorso.' Sometimes it was placed on the hat, or on the girdle; it might be pinned or sewn on to the garment which it disfigured. In other instances, the badge was worn on the left shoulder. As to the material used, no prescription existed, but the bull of Gregory IX (1233) probably represents the usual custom. If this be so, the badge must have been made of felt or cloth, and more rarely of cord, leather, or silk. In France, as elsewhere, the common color of the badge was yellow; but, occasionally, the wheel was parti-colored, white and red. More rarely still the circular mark was green. The same variations in size were indicated above in the case of Germany and Austria occur in the French badges, but on the whole, the French badges were rather smaller than the German. It must be stated, to the honor of the Church, that though the clergy were responsible for the infliction of the badge, the secular authorities acted on their own initiatives when they enforced the canonical regulation by heavy fines and penalties. Any informer received as a reward the garment from which the Jew had dared to omit the distinguishing mark. In Nice, the town council and the informer divided the spoils between them. The threat of corporal punishment and the menaces of death seem, however, to have usually resolved themselves into monetary fines. Probably the Jews had to buy the badges from the public authorities, and Philippe le Bel devised the sale of badges a fresh source of income for the royal exchequer.

It is unnecessary to enter into details with regard to the Jews of Italy and Spain. Here the same general facts present themselves; the motive and the manner in which the object was attained were identical with the motive and its execution in the rest of Europe. The chief difference lay in this – that in Spain, Italy, and southern France the Jews were able to resist the infliction of the badge with more or less success for a considerable period. Moreover, many Jews in these more favored lands were able to buy personal exemptions. The same remark applies to other countries, but the exemptions were most numerous in Spain and Italy. In Spain, moreover, Jews enjoyed in general a privilege only exceptionally granted elsewhere. They were permitted to discard the badge on their journeys. It is interesting to notice that when Bonami, son of Joce, settled in France after his expulsion from England in 1290, Philippe le Bel exempted him from the duty of wearing the badge, and temporarily allowed Bonami's son a similar license.

Avicenna, of all doctors of medicine the most celebrated, and a man of enlightenment, was at this time universally known. He was a nobleman of the city of Cordova, in Spain, a prince there, and assiduously devoted to medicine. As I have learned from the ancients, he caused a hospital to be built in his city, and in it he accommodated many patients and personally attended them. He was a happy and wonderful man, and wrote a book of songs. It is said that he died young, not having attained the age of fifty years. He not only wrote on medicine, but on all the arts, as the learned well know. By nobility he was a prince; by profession, a physician. He was versed in all forms of learning and literature, although many authors fail to state when he lived. It is certain that he was not a contemporary of the Blessed Augustine, as some erroneously state; for the Blessed Augustine lived fully 1010 years before this. It is impossible that they lived in the same times, although some say that letters have been discovered which they wrote one another. This, however, is incredible, in view of the difference in time, as already noted. Being a highly learned and experienced man, Avicenna wrote an extraordinary book. He also compiled a work in five volumes on medicine, comprehending the observations of all physicians. He wrote about the strength of the heart, as well as many other things.

Avicenna (979-1037), the greatest of Arabian philosophers in the east, and a physician in whom Arabian medicine reached its culmination, was born in the Province of Bukhara, and at the age of ten was acquainted with the Koran and Arabic classics. During the next six years he acquired knowledge of philosophy, mathematics, astronomy and medicine. At 17 his medical knowledge enabled him to cure the Samani ruler, Nuh ibn Mansur, from a dangerous illness. His chief reward was access to the royal library.

With the ending of the Samanid dynasty in 1044, Avicenna appears to have spent a short time in the service of the ruler of Khwarazm or Khiva, and then to have wandered about until he began his lecturing on logic and astronomy at Jurjan, near the Caspian. From there he passed on to Hamadan, where he occupied the office of dizzier to Shams Addaula. When the ruler of Ispahan captured Hamadan in 1024, Avicenna passed in to his service as physician and general literary and scientific adviser. In this capacity he spent the remaining thirteen years of his life, combining hard work with frequent bouts of excessive pleasure. While marching with the army against Hamadan, he was seized with severe colic, and died in 1037 at the age of fifty-eight.

About 100 treatises are ascribed to Avicenna, and of these, the most influential was his Canon of Medicine. Although this work, like all other Arabic medical treatises, presents the doctrines of Galen and Hippocrates, modified by those of Aristotle, it was able to eclipse the Summary of Rhazes, who, on account of his clinical observations, was one of the most original Muslim physicians, because of its greater method and its treatment of medical science as well as practical medicine. The Canon is in five books: The first and second treat of physiology, pathology and hygiene; the third and fourth deal with the methods of treating disease, and fifth describes the composition and preparation of remedies, and includes Avicenna's personal observations. It was badly translated into Latin by Jerard of Cremona, but the translation remained the standard textbook of medicine even until about 1650, when it was still used in the universities of Louvain and Montpellier.

The second most influential work of Avicenna was his al-Shifa (the book of recovery), which includes long treatises on Logic, Physics, Mathematics, and Metaphysics. He also wrote a Book of Theorems, and his famous poem on the soul has been translated into English.

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Averroes (Averrois), a physician and a lover of wisdom, flourished at Cordova, in Spain, at this time, as appears by one of his own books. He made a collection of manuscripts in the Year After the Nativity of Christ 1150 (as he states). Egidius, a teacher at Rome, states that he saw the sons of Averroes at the court of the emperor Frederick. He wrote much, particularly on the works of Aristotle, earning for himself the surname of commentator. He also wrote a good book on medicine, and left behind many other worthy and able manuscripts.

Averroes (Abdul-Walid Mohammed ibn-Ahmad Ibn-Mohammed ibn-Rushd) (1126 - 1198), the greatest Arabian philosopher in the west, and the famous commentator on Aristotle, was born at Cordova. His early life was occupied in mastering theology, jurisprudence, mathematics, medicine and philosophy. Through Ibn-Tofail he became acquainted with Yusuf, a prince famous for his patronage of learning. Yusuf helped to secure for him so many important posts, such as that of judge of Seville (1169) and later of Cordova, that Averroes complained of having no time left for study. Yusuf's successor, al-Mansur, at first equally well disposed toward Averroes, was incited in 1195 by the growing popular distrust in speculative studies to confine the suspected philosopher as a prisoner at Elisana, near Cordova. Later, Averroes was summoned to Morocco, where he died before al-Mansur with whom (in 1199) the political power of the Muslims in the West came to an end as did the Arabian culture of liberal science with Averroes.

The works of Averroes include treatises on jurisprudence, grammar, astronomy, medicine and philosophy, many of which still exist in manuscript. Some have been published in Arabic or in German translations. By the end of the 12th century, the most important works were translated into Latin, and are found frequently in early printed editions of the works of Aristotle; they include the Colliget, a summary of medicine, the Destructio Destructionis (against Algazel), the De Substantia Orbis, two treatises on the union of the active intellect with man, and the commentaries on Aristotle, for whom Averroes had a profound admiration. The best edition of the Latin translations of Averroes' works is that by Juntas (Venice, 1552).

Soar, also a physician, and surnamed the Wise, who was called Avenzoar, lived at this time (as is evidenced by his own books), and was held in great esteem. Having become highly learned and experienced in medicine, he wrote a book, called Teisir, which he dedicated and sent to a king. He also formulated and gave various advice, and included the whole subject of medicine in a large book. [Avenzoar, or Abumeron (Abu Merwan Abdal-Malik ibn Zuhr), was an Arabian physician. He was born at Seville where he exercised his profession with great reputation. He was a contemporary of Averroes, who heard his lectures and learned medicine from him. He belonged, in many respects, to the Dogmatists or Rational School, rather than to the Empirics. He was a great admirer of Galen; and, in his writings, he protests against quackery and the superstitious remedies of the astrologers. His was translated into Hebrew in 1280 and from there into Latin by Paravicinus (Venice, 1490)].

Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, was agreeable to all persons in his youth. He left the royal court in England and was received by archbishop Theobald as his archdeacon. Henry (Heinrici), the king of England, appointed him chancellor, so that by means of his wisdom he might mitigate the follies of evil-disposed persons. But when later elected archbishop, he opposed the king, who sought to deprive the churches and the bishopric of their legal rights. Therefore he fell into disfavor with the king, fled from him and absented himself for several years. After he returned home, and had suffered much persecution, he was martyred. Because of his miracles he was enrolled in the number of the saints. His assassins suffered lamentable punishment and death.

Thomas Becket, archbishop of Canterbury, was born in 1118 of Norman parentage, his father having been a wealthy merchant. Educated at Merton Priory, and in London, he was trained in knightly exercises, and then studied theology at Paris. On his father's failure, he took a clerkship for three years in a lawyer's office. About 1142 he entered the household of Theobald, archbishop of Canterbury, who sent him to study canonical jurisprudence at Bologna and Auxerre, heaped preferments on him, including the archdeaconry of Canterbury, and employed him in several important missions. At the papal court, in 1152, he promoted the cause of Henry of Anjou against that of Stephen's son Eustace. In 1155, the year after Henry's accession, Henry made him chancellor. So magnificent was his hospitality that Henry himself did not live in a manner more sumptuous. He fought like any knight, and would seem to have regarded himself as a mere layman in all things, though he held deacon's orders. But a sudden change came upon him in 1162, when he was created archbishop of Canterbury. He resigned the chancellorship and became a rigid ascetic, and as zealous a servitor of the church as ever before of king or archbishop. He soon figured as a champion of her rights against all aggressions of the king and his court, and several nobles and other laymen were excommunicated for their alienation of church property. The relations between the king and his archbishop became strained. The disputes involved questions of principle that had long occupied Henry's attention, and Becket's defiant attitude was answered by the famous Constitutions of Clarendon in which the king defined the relations of church and state according to ancient use and custom. To these, curtailing clerical immunities, the primate at first declared he would never consent, but he later reluctantly agreed to them. Henry's antagonism towards Becket increased, and the archbishop fled to France, where he spent two years at the Cistercian abbey of Pontigny in Burgundy. Then he went to Rome, pleading his own cause, and was reinstated in the see of Canterbury by the pope. From Rome he returned to France, and from there he wrote angry letters to the English bishops threatening excommunication. Efforts to reconcile him with Henry failed; but at length in 1170 they became reconciled. It was a hollow truce, and when Thomas returned to England he did so with the determination of riding roughshod over the king's supporters. He entered Canterbury among the rejoicings of the people, who regarded him as a shield from the oppressions of nobility. He caused some of the bishops to be excommunicated, and spoke of the constitutions as null and void. Exasperated by these fresh quarrels, Henry, in the presence of some of his knights, exclaimed: "Of the cowards that eat my bread, is there none will rid me of this turbulent priest?" Four knights – Fitzurse, Tracy, Brito, and Morville – overheard these hasty words, and leaving Normandy by separate ways, on the evening of December 29th, 1170 entered Canterbury cathedral and slew the archbishop before the altar of St. Benedict.

Becket was canonized in 1172. Within a short time his shrine at Canterbury became the resort of innumerable pilgrims. Plenary indulgences were given for a visit to the shrine, and an official register was kept to record the miracles wrought by the relics of the saint. The shrine was magnificently adorned with the gold and silver and jewels offered by the pious. It was plundered by Henry VIII, to whom the memory of Becket was specially obnoxious; but the reformers were powerless to expunge the name of the saint from the Roman calendar on which it still remains.

The country of Norway, through the excellent teachings and sermons of the bishop of Albano, again accepted the Christian faith at this time. After the death of Anastasius this bishop was elected pope, and called Adrian (Hadrianus) the Fourth.

Adrian (Hadrianus) the Fourth was a native of England. While he was bishop of Albans, he was sent to Norway as a cardinal by Eugenius the Third; and he converted the people there to the Christian faith. Upon the death of Anastasius he was elected pope, and soon after the Romans by petition and threats urged him to leave the care and government of the city in the hands of a Roman senator, he himself to retire to the Lateran to perform consecrations. But as he was opposed to this, a governor named Arnold, whom Eugenius had excommunicated and driven from the city, was appointed. A cardinal was beaten on his way to the pope; for this reason the pope stopped singing and reading for a time (probably the last weeks of Lent), so that the people might be impressed with the circumstances. Afterwards several senators were deposed and the said governor driven out; the office of Easter was performed by the pope in the Lateran; and William (Guilhelmum), the king of Sicily, was severely cursed because he had appropriated many church estates. Frederick the First received the imperial crown from this pope. This pope was the first to establish his residence in the Old City, because it was more residential and livable. But when, pursuant to the solicitation of the Romans, he returned to the city, he was attacked by the Roman senators who had demanded that he free the city. Then the pope went to Anagnia (Arggnanum), where he soon died, in the fourth year and fifth month of his pontificate. His body was carried to Rome and buried in the Basilica of Peter not far from the sepulcher of Pope Eugenius.

Adrian IV was an Englishman by birth, named Nicholas Breakspear, the son of a village clerk, who was so poor that, having no means of living after the death of his wife, he had been obliged to serve as a domestic in the kitchen of the convent of St. Albans. The young Nicholas who was born before 1100 at Langley, near St. Albans, in Hertfordshire, was abandoned by his father, and lived by alms until he had attained the age of manhood. He then crossed the sea and went to France to seek a change in his life. Coming to Paris, he became a monk of the cloister of St. Rufus, near Arles, a chapter of regular canons. He rose to prior, and in 1137 was unanimously elected abbot. Eugenius III created him cardinal bishop of Albano. From 1152 to 1154 Nicholas was in Scandinavia as legate, organizing the affairs of the new Norwegian bishopric of Trondhjem, and arranging for the recognition of Uppsala as a metropolitan see in 1164. He had returned to Italy and been there but eight days when Anastasius IV died. On the day following the funeral the cardinals assembled in the palace of the Lateran and proclaimed Nicholas pope as Adrian IV.

The partisans of religious reforms, who had concurred in the election of Adrian, hoped that out of gratitude he would restore to the Roman people the rights of which they had been despoiled during the pontificate of Eugenius. But their hopes were dashed by Adrian, who refused their demands and drove away the Roman senators; after which he retired to the Vatican beyond the reach of the rage of the people. He at once compassed the overthrow of Arnold of Brescia, the leader of anti-papal sentiment in Rome, who sought to free the city of priestly domination. Rome was seething with revolt, but no excesses were committed by the insurgents, except against Gerard, a cardinal priest, who was discovered to be a spy of the pope. He was met in the streets by a party of rebels, who beat him and left him for dead; but he survived.

Alarmed by this tumult, Adrian, shortly before Palm Sunday, 1155, put Rome under an interdict, causing divine service and sacrament to be intermitted everywhere. Then superstitious fear of the consequences conquered the patriotism of the people, and the Romans sought the pope's pardon, pledging themselves to drive Arnold out of the city with his followers. The pontiff received this oath, promising to raise the interdict as soon as the promise was fulfilled. Arnold was compelled to quit the city at the very moment when the pope sallied forth in triumph from the city Leonine, to go to the palace of the Lateran, where he solemnly celebrated divine service.

In the meantime, Frederick Barbarossa had invaded Italy and was laying siege to some of the cities that had refused to recognize his authority. Fearing that the emperor's journey would have a hostile conclusion, the pope sent three cardinals to the emperor to confer with him regarding his coronation and his intentions toward the holy see. The emperor received them with due honor, promised entire submission to the holy see, and even had the meanness to surrender Arnold of Brescia, the champion of liberty in Rome. He was at once loaded with chains and sent to Rome, where the cardinals ordered him burnt alive. The sentence was executed on the same day.

In 1155, Adrian crowned Frederick I Barbarossa as emperor; but this so incensed the Romans that the pope was compelled to flee from the city and to absent himself for several months. Then the emperor and the pope became involved in another controversy, and Adrian was about to excommunicate the emperor, when he, Adrian, died at Anagnia, the present Anagni, September 1st, 1159.

Conrad of Ursperg relates that on the day Adrian wrote the bull of excommunication against the emperor, he drank a cup of water from a fountain, in which, unbeknown to him, was an insect that fastened on his throat and ate the esophagus, notwithstanding all the aid of skilled physicians. Others attribute his death to quinsy.

Year of the World 6359 | Year of Christ 1160

Pope Alexander the Third, a native of Siena, was elected pope after the death of Adrian by the vote of twenty-two cardinals. Although regularly elected, he suffered many and various attacks. The opposition began with Octavian, a Roman cardinal, who was also elected, but by only three votes; and he was named Victor. This Victor attached himself to the Roman emperor, while Alexander took refuge with King Philip of France. Alexander held a council at Claremont in which he excommunicated the emperor as well as Octavian. Afterwards Frederick appointed three successive popes in opposition to Alexander. However, the Roman senators were favorable to Alexander, and requested him to return to Rome. In the meantime some of the Italian people, cherishing the hope and confidence of acquiring their freedom, took up arms against Emperor Frederick; at this the emperor assembled an army and proceeded into Italy as far as Rome. There the gates and doors were opened to the grim and angry emperor, and he was admitted. The pope so feared him that he and his household fled by night from Rome to Beneventum; and from there the pope, in the garments of his cook, secretly fled to Venice. But when his presence became known there he was received with due solemnity, and the duke and the people were blessed by him. But when the emperor learned that the pope was in Venice, he sent his son Otto there by sea with an army to demand his surrender. But Sebastian, duke of Venice, opposed and defeated him, took Otto prisoner, and brought him to Venice. In consequence peace was made between the pope and the emperor. On the following day the emperor accepted the terms, agreeing not to molest in the future what belonged to the church. And the pope ordered the emperor to prostrate himself publicly at the entrance of the Church of Saint Mark, and there to ask pardon. And the pope placed his foot on the emperor's neck, and said: It is written, 'upon the snake and the basilisk you shall walk, and tread upon the lion and the dragon.' Then the emperor said, I am not subservient to you, but to Peter, whose successor you are. And so peace was made between the pope and the emperor. The pope came to Rome a third time; and he held a council in which much was ordered for the common good of the church. Finally, after many cares and much labor, he died at Rome in the 21st year and 19th day of his pontificate.

Alexander III (Orlando Bandinelli) pope from 1159 to 1181, was a Siennese, and teacher of canon law in Bologna, and author of the Stroma, or Summa Magistri Rolandi, one of the earliest commentaries of the Decretum Gratiani, and of Sentences, based on the Introductio ad Theologiam of Abelard. In 1153 he became papal chancellor, and was the leader of the cardinals who were opposed to Frederick Barbarossa. In 1159 he was chosen to succeed Adrian IV; a minority of the cardinals, however, electing the cardinal priest Octavian as Victor IV. The antipope, and his successors, Paschal III (1164-68) and Calixtus III (1168-78) had the imperial support; but after the defeat of Legnano, Barbarossa finally (in the peace of Venice, 1177) recognized Alexander as pope. In 1178, Alexander returned to Rome, which he had been compelled to leave twice, from 1162 to 1165, and again in 1167. The first period he spent in France, the latter chiefly in Gaeta, Beneventum, Anagni, and Venice. In 1179 Alexander held the third Lateran synod, reckoned by the Roman Catholic Church as the 11th ecumenical council; its acts embody among them the present law for the election of a pope by a two-thirds vote of the cardinals. This synod marks the summit of Alexander's power. Besides checkmating Barbarossa, he had humbled Henry II of England in the matter of Thomas Becket, and, even as a fugitive, had enjoyed the favor of Louis VII of France. Nevertheless, soon after the close of the synod, the Roman Republic forced Alexander to leave the city, which he never re-entered; and on September 29th, 1179, some nobles set up Innocent III as antipope. By the judicious use of money, however, Alexander got him into his power, so that he was deposed in 1180. In 1181, Alexander excommunicated William the Lion of Scotland, and put the Kingdom under the interdict. Alexander died in 1181.

Fortunatus Ulmus relates the humiliating ceremony to which Frederick Barbarossa was obliged to submit at the hands of the pope. "When the emperor arrived in the presence of the pope, he laid aside his imperial mantle, and knelt on both knees with his breast to the earth; Alexander advanced and placed his foot on his neck, whilst the cardinals thundered forth in loud tones, 'Thou shalt tread upon the cockatrice, and crush the lion and the dragon.' Frederick explained, 'Pontiff, this prediction was made of St. Peter, and not of thee!' 'Thou liest,' replied Alexander; 'it is written of the apostle and of me;' and bearing all the weight of his body on the neck of the prince, he compelled him to silence; he then permitted him to rise, and gave him his blessing, after which the whole assembly thundered forth the Te Deum."

Frederick (Fridericus) the First, surnamed Barbarossa, a native of Swabia, son of Duke Frederick of Swabia (a brother of King Conrad), was born of the illustrious line of Charles the Great. He was elected to succeed King Conrad at Frankfurt, in the Year of the Lord 1153, at a general election held by the electors; and he reigned 33 [The Latin edition of the concerning the reign of Frederick Barbarossa is incorrect. The German edition corrects the mistake and prints 38 years]. years. After he settled all controversies and restored peace in Germany, he proceeded to Lombardy with a large army, appearing before the city of Tortona (Terdonam) [Tortona (ancient Dertona) is a town and Episcopal see of Piedmont, Italy, and on the main line from Milan to Genoa. Dertona is spoken of by Strabo as one of the most important towns of Liguria, and the local museum contains Roman antiquities found there. In the Middle Ages Tortona was zealously attached to the Guelphs, on which account it was twice laid waste by Frederick Barbarossa in 1155 and 1163. In 1176 it made a treaty with Barbarossa and the people of Pavia, and was taken back into favor by Henry VI in 1193]. Having taken that city he proceeded to Rome with such speed that the pope with his cardinals fled in fear to the Old City [This probably refers to Leonine city, the so called Civitas Leonina, a part of Rome built by Leo IV (847-855) on the right bank of the Tiber. It now includes the Borgo, the castle of St. Angelo, St. Peter's and the Vatican]. But after the exchange of many messages King Frederick came to the pope with due respect and humility, assured the pope of safety, and received of him the imperial crown. At the same time the Romans kept the gates of the city of Rome closed, and afterwards with a large force fell upon the Germans who remained outside. Many were slain on both sides. This enraged the emperor, but the pope pacified him, and the emperor returned to Germany. On the ground of consanguinity he divorced his wife, the daughter of Margrave Diepold of Voburg, and espoused Beatrice, daughter of the count of Burgundy. Simultaneously he made the duke of Bohemia a king, and made a duchy of the Austrian margraviate. But after Pope Adrian's death the emperor became antagonistic to Alexander, his successor; and he besieged the wealthy city of Crema [Crema, a town and Episcopal se of Lombardy, in the Italian province of Cremona, and 26 miles northeast of the town of Cremona. In the 12th century Cremona attacked it and Milan sided with it. Barbarossa sacked it in 1160, but it was rebuilt in 1186. It fell under the Visconti in 1338, joined the Lombard republic in 1447, and was taken by Venice in 1449], in Lombardy, and attacked the estates and territories of the Roman Church at the same time. He also plundered the city of Tortona, leveled Milan to the ground, and forced the inhabitants to take up their abode at a distance of ten miles. He also caused the city of Tortona much distress. These proceedings so touched the hearts of the rest of the Italian people that those of Verona, Padua, and Vicenza formed an alliance against the emperor. When news of this reached the emperor, he called together all of his Germans, and with the assistance of those of Pavia and Cremona, proceeded to Verona. But since the emperor feared the power of the pope, he craftily negotiated with the pope. When the emperor's son Otto was taken prisoner at Venice, and Frederick secured pardon and absolution through the diligence of the Venetians, as stated above, he made gifts to Duke Sebastian and his successors, and endowed the senate of Venice with privileges and treasures. Now when Emperor Frederick was at last reconciled to the pope in the matter of his dealings against the church, he held a session of the princes at Nuremberg; and there he confirmed the peace treaty and published it throughout Germany. Then he took up the Cross against the infidels, and with eleven wagon-forts proceeded through Hungary, Bulgaria, and Thrace to Constantinople. From there he was assisted to the Bosphorus by Isaac, the Greek emperor. He took the city of Philomenia from the Turks, and then appeared before Iconium, plundering and burning it and the adjacent country. He then proceeded to Lesser Armenia, where he subjugated everything, so much so that Saladin, the Turkish sultan, was never before nor at any time since more worried about his extinction. But an unhallowed hour undermined the hopes of the Christians; for one day when the emperor was heated and covered with sweat he accidentally or thoughtlessly went into a stream of water to bathe; and he was drowned. This emperor was a magnanimous, shrewd, mild, strong and righteous man; and, except for his persecutions of the church, so highly esteemed, that in greatness of accomplishment the like of him is hardly to be found in history after Charles the Great.

Frederick I (c. 1123-1190), Holy Roman emperor called "Barbarossa" or "Red Beard" by the Italians, was the son of Frederick II of Hohenstaufen, duke of Swabia, and Judith, daughter of the Welf Henry IX, duke of Bavaria. When his father died in 1147, Frederick became duke of Swabia, and immediately afterward accompanied his uncle, the German king Conrad III, on his disastrous crusade. In 1152 the dying king advised the princes to choose Frederick as his successor to the exclusion of his own young son. Frederick was chosen German king at Frankfort in 1152, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. He owed his election partly to his personal qualities, and partly to the fact that the united in himself the blood of the rival families of Welf and Waiblingen.

Frederick's first concern was to establish peace at home. For this purpose he issued a general order, and was prodigal in his concessions to the nobles. He divorced his wife Adelheid on the ground of consanguinity. In 1153, he concluded a treaty with the pope by which Frederick, in return for his coronation, promised to make no peace with Roger I, king of Sicily, or with the rebellious Romans, without the consent of Eugenius, and generally to help and defend the papacy. In 1154, he made the first of six expeditions into Italy, during which the subjugation of the peninsula was the central aim of his policy. He was crowned emperor at Rome in 1155. But disorders were again rampant in Germany, especially in Bavaria. Frederick restored peace by vigorous measures; Bavaria was transferred from Henry II Jasomirgott, margrave of Austria, to Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony; and the former was pacified by the erection of his margraviate into a duchy, while Frederick's stepbrother Conrad was invested with the Palatinate of the Rhine. In 1156, the king married Beatrix, daughter and heiress of the dead count of Upper Burgundy. An expedition into Poland reduced Duke Boleslaus IV to submission, after which Frederick received the homage of the Burgundian nobles.

In 1158, Frederick sent out his second Italian expedition, during which imperial officers called 'podestas' in the cities of northern Italy, captured Milan (which had revolted), and the long struggle began with Pope Alexander III, who excommunicated the emperor in 1160. During this visit, Frederick summoned the doctors of Bologna to Roncaglia in 1158, and, as a result of their inquiries into the rights belonging to the kingdom of Italy, he obtained a large amount of wealth. In 1163, his plans for the conquest of Sicily were checked by a powerful league against him, provoked by the exactions of the podestas and the enforcement of the rights declared by the doctors of Bologna. Frederick had supported an antipope, Victor IV, against Alexander, and, on Victor's death, a new antipope, Paschal III, was chosen to succeed him.

In 1166, he made his fourth journey to Italy. Having captured Ancona, he marched to Rome, stormed the Leonine city, and procured the enthronement of Paschal, and the coronation of his wife Beatrix; but the sudden outbreak of a pestilence destroyed the German army and drove the emperor to Germany. During the next six years, the imperial authority was asserted over Bohemia, Poland, and Hungary. Friendly relations were entered into with the emperor Manuel, and a better understanding was sought with Henry II, king of England, and Louis VII, king of France.

In 1174, Frederick made his fifth expedition to Italy. The campaign was a complete failure. The refusal of Henry the Lion to bring help into Italy resulted in the defeat of the emperor at Legnano in 1176, when he was wounded and believed to be dead. He concluded with Alexander the treaty of Venice (1177), and at the same time a truce with the Lombard league was arranged for six years. Set free from the papal ban, he recognized Alexander, and, in 1177, knelt before him and kissed his feet. Henry the Lion was deprived of his duchy, and sent into exile. Frederick's son was betrothed to the daughter of Roger I of Sicily. The question of Matilda's estates was left undecided, and Pope Lucius III, whom Frederick met at Verona to establish friendly relations, was reticent because the betrothal of Frederick's son Henry to the daughter of Roger I of Sicily threatened to unite Sicily with the empire. Lucius refused to crown Henry or to recognize the German clergy who had been ordained during the schism. Frederick then formed an alliance with Milan, where the emperor, who had been crowned king of Burgundy, or Arles, at Arles in 1178, had this ceremony repeated in 1186; while his son was crowned king of Italy, and married to Constance, daughter of Roger I, king of Sicily, who was crowned queen of Germany.

The quarrel with the papacy was continued with the new pope Urban III, and open warfare was begun. But Frederick was recalled to Germany by the news of a revolt raised by Philip of Heinsberg, archbishop of Cologne, and instigated by the pope. Hostilities were checked by the death of Urban and the election of a new pope as Gregory VIII. In 1188, Philip submitted, and immediately afterward Frederick joined the Third Crusade with a splendid army. Having overcome the hostility of the Eastern Roman emperor Isaac Angelus, he marched into Asia Minor. On June 10th, 1190, Frederick was either bathing or crossing the river Calcycadnus (Geuksu) near Seleucia (Selefk) in Cilicia, when he was drowned. The place of his burial is unknown, and the legend which says that he still is in a cavern in the Kyffhaeuser mountain in Thuringia waiting till the need of his country shall call him, is now thought to refer at least in its earlier form, to his grandson, the emperor Frederick II. He left by his wife Beatrix five sons, of whom the eldest became emperor as Henry VI.

The Heresy of the Waldensians or Poor of Lyons, had its inception at this time through one Waldo (Vualdo), a citizen of Lyons. He was rich and caused his estate to be distributed to the poor. Through diabolical instigation he undertook to observe in its entirety the poverty of the evangelists. But as he was an uneducated man, he caused some books to be written for himself, containing sayings of the German saints, or to be translated into his language; and prompted by an inflated spirit, he dared to preach, although he did not understand the text. He collected many disciples and sowed much injurious seed, ignoring the prelates and the clergy. When after many warnings he persisted in his ignorance, he was excommunicated as a heretic, and driven from the country. [Waldensian is a name given to the members of a Christian sect which arose in the south of France about 1170 as a protest against the system of a rich, powerful, and worldly church, with Rome for its capital, which had its inception when Pope Sylvester gained the first temporal possession for the papacy. Against this secularized church a body of witnesses silently protested; they were always persecuted, but always survived, till in the 13th century a desperate attempt was made by Innocent III to root them out from their stronghold in southern France. It was in the year 1170 that a rich merchant of Lyons, Peter Waldo, sold his goods and gave the proceeds to the poor; then he went forth as a preacher of voluntary poverty. His followers, the Waldensian, or poor men of Lyons, were moved by a religious feeling which could find no satisfaction within the actual system of the church as they saw it before them. Waldo had a translation of the made into Provençal, and his preachers explained the Scriptures. Pope Alexander III, who had approved of the poverty of the Waldensians, prohibited them from preaching without the permission of the bishops (1179). Waldo answered that he must obey God rather than man, and was excommunicated by Lucius III in 1184, and his followers persecuted from place to place. In 1487, Innocent VIII issued a bull for the extermination of the Waldensians, who had taken refuge in the retired valleys of the Alps. Little settlements of heretics dispersed throughout Italy and Provence looked to the valleys as a place of refuge, tacitly regarding them as the center of their faith. Under the bull of the pope they were attacked in Dauphine and Piedmont at the same time, and were sorely reduced by the onslaught. They finally became absorbed in the general movement of Protestantism. The Waldensians, the Wycliffites, and the Lutherans were very similar in their reforms].

Folio CCIII verso

William (Guilielmus) the holy man, once Duke of Aquitaine and Count of Poitiers, was illustrious in the Year of the Lord 1157, in Gaul, for his virtue and miracles. From youth he had been taught by the Blessed Bernard. Realizing the presence of death, and scorning the pomp of the world, he went into a vast wilderness; and there he lived as a full-fledged servant of Christ, under the rule of Saint Augustine. Having entered upon a spiritual life, he now lived in the depths of humility, as once upon a time he had lived in the heights of honor. And as he had fought against the enemy, clad in armor, so now, in penance, he confined his naked body in the armor of God by constant prayer, watching, and fasting. For this reason not only laymen, but also a number of brothers of this and other orders, came to him as to a father and as the founder of this order. But when this holy man saw that the Cistercian order had increased much in a short time, while his own had declined and become so barren that it gave but little evidence of sanctity, he turned his mind to the resuscitation of his own order. By a remarkable increase in its spiritual membership, he brought the order into such ascendancy that he became known as its founder, and the monks were called Williamites (Guilielmitae) up to the time of Pope Innocent the Fourth, when it was transferred from the wilderness to the city and its name changed by the same pope and his successors to the Hermits of Saint Augustine. This William, with the consent of popes Anastasius and Adrian, began to live in the city; and he built the first monastery in Paris, under the title of the Mendicants. [In the time of Innocent IV, all the hermits solitaires and small separate confraternities, who had lived under no recognized discipline, were registered and incorporated by a decree of the Church, and reduced under one rule, called the rule of St. Augustine, with some more strict clauses introduced, fitting the new ideas of a monastic life. Innocent IV died before he had completed his reform, but Alexander IV carried out his purpose. At length these scattered members were brought into submission, and the whole united into one great religious body (1284) under the name of Eremiti or Ermitani Agostini, hermits or friars of St. Augustine; in English, Austin-Friars. Nothing is known of the birth of William, the founder of this order, nor of his early life, on which he preserved an impenetrable secrecy. Several writers have confused this William of Maleval with William of Mariemont, and even with William I, Duke of Aquitaine, and William IX, Duke of Guienne. It seems that in the year 1153 there appeared in Tuscany a man who sought to conceal himself from his fellow men. The islet of Lupocavio, in the district of Pisa, seemed to answer his desire. There he constructed a small habitation, and his edifying example attracted a number of persons to him. They undertook to follow his rule of life, and their undisciplined manners obliged him to withdraw from his solitude to Monte Prunio, where he erected a hut in order to be alone with his God. But he was soon joined by idle vagrants, under pretense of a religious life. Their hypocrisy drove him again from his resting place, or the miscreants ejected him because they could not bear his sanctity. William returned to the island of Lupocavio, but not finding his former associates, he fixed his habitation in a desert valley, called at that time the "stable of Rhodes," but since known as "the bad valley" (Maleval). It was situated in the territory of Sienna, about a league from Castigline, Pascara, and Buriano. It was in 1155 that he hid himself in this solitude, but in the beginning of 1156, he received a disciple, named Albert, who wrote the account of the close of his life. William practiced surprising austerities; thrice in the week he took only very little bread, and wine much diluted; on the other days he took bread, and herbs, and water. He wore sackcloth next his skin, and slept on the bare ground. He was endowed with a gift of prophecy. He died in the arms of Albert after having received the last sacraments from a priest of Castigline, who had been warned of the illness of the hermit. William was buried in his little garden. After his death, his disciples preserved the spirit of penitence and mortification with which he had inspired them during his life, and they endeavored to follow his maxims as their rule. And thus originated the order of Williamites (Guillemites), which rapidly spread from Italy, through France, the Low Countries, and Germany. From 1256, they had a monastery at Montrouge, near Paris, and were called White Mantles (Blancs-Manteux) from the great white mantles which they wore. They ceased to exist long before the French Revolution].

Three Suns, beside one another, were seen in the West at this time, on the Nones of September. The middle one went to rest two hours after the other two had disappeared. In the same manner three moons appeared in the following year. Upon the central one a cross appeared. This phenomenon was interpreted by some as envisioning the dissension of the cardinals in the election of a pope, and of the electors in the election of an emperor. For at this time four popes were elected against Pope Alexander (as previously stated). This was a serious schism, which endured for 17 years. [The Latin text for the concluding phrase of this sentence is: quod scisma xx. annis. xvii. duravit, which translates as 'which schism endured for 20 years 17.'] At this time also occurred such earthquakes, particularly in Syria and Sicily, that land, people and cities were destroyed.

John (Iohannes), son of Mesua, a physician of royal lineage, and a native of Damascus, was highly renowned at this time for his treatment and cure of diseases and plagues. In virtue of his knowledge of the art of medicine, he wrote several useful books on all kinds of medicines and their nature, properties, and application. He also began a book on the treatment and cure of illness, beginning with the head; but he died when he reached the heart. [John, son of Mesua, is supposed to have been a Jacobite Christian from Maradin on the Euphrates, who lived in the 10th century, according to Leo Africanus. As, however, none of his writings have ever been found in their original language and no Arabian bibliographer or biographer knows him, the personality of this author, in the course of time, became more and more improbable. "It is supposed that under the name of Messua is masquerading a Latin author of the twelfth century who hoped thus to obtain more ready recognition of his works." (Neuburger-Playfair I). According to Sudhoff, the author lived in the beginning of the 13th century in the Upper Italy. At any rate, these works soon gained an authoritative importance as the pharmacological quintessence of Arabistic therapeutics, and the esteem in which they were held is shown by the fact that they belonged to the first medical books to be printed (Venice, 1471). John's works consist of three books. The first, , also called , or , deals with the choice of purgatives according to their properties and actions, and with the correction of the same. They are divided into laxative, mild and drastic. The second book, the , or apothecary's manual (Antidotarium), was the most popular compendium of drugs in medieval Europe, and was used everywhere in their preparation. The work stands as the canon of the apothecary's art in the west, and throughout the Middle Ages was held in highest esteem. The third book, the , is a manual of special therapeutics. It remained incomplete, containing only the diseases of the head and chest, breaking off with the treatment of the heart diseases].

John, the bishop of Chartres, a confidant of the Blessed Thomas, bishop of Canterbury, and celebrated for his scriptural wisdom, learning and versatility, was held in high esteem and honor at this time. He wrote several beautiful manuscripts. Among others, he very accurately wrote a life of the Blessed Thomas himself. []

The Blessed Hartmann, bishop of Brescia (Brixia), and a native of Passau, withdrew from the world in early youth and entered the Regular Canons of Saint Nicholas at Passau. There he grew up in piety, morality, and learning. Bishop Conrad of Salzburg appointed him head of the monastery there. Later, according to the wishes of Margrave Leopold of Austria, he was given a new foundation to govern on the Danube. He soon became provost, and then began to castigate his body by fasting, vigils, and other penances. He loved to indulge in acts of humility. On the death of Reinbert, bishop of Brescia, he was elected successor by the common consent of the clergy. And there he spent his life in piety and miracles, withdrawing from all worldly and carnal pleasures, and devoting himself entirely to prayer and contemplation. He lived in great moderation and amazing austerity, and wore a hair-shirt under his habit. Emperor Frederick was very fond of him, respecting him as a father and confessor. Hartmann mitigated the emperor's animosity toward Pope Alexander. During this same time two olive branches brightened the churches of God: Eberhart, the bishop of Salzburg, and this Blessed Hartmann, bishop of Brescia, who consumed all his time in watching, praying, and contemplation, or in reading. He preached salvation and condemned war, and finally died in the winter while wading in a stream. After his death he was illustrious for many miracles, and is more especially the faithful patron of pregnant women, who during their travail, call upon the Lord to lend them his assistance.

Amalric (Almericus), the sixth king of Jerusalem, reigned for twelve years after the death of his brother Baldwin (Baldvino) the Third.

The chronicler seems somewhat confused in the lineage of the kings of Jerusalem. He considers Godfrey of Bouillon (1099-1100) as the first king. True, Godfrey did exercise the powers of a ruler, but he declined the title (Folio CXCVI recto). According to more modern chronology, Baldwin I, brother of Godfrey, was the first king of Jerusalem (1100-1118), although the chronicler regards him as the second (CXCVI recto). Baldwin I was succeeded by Baldwin II (1118-1131), nephew of Godfrey and of Baldwin I; and him the chronicler calls the third king of Jerusalem (CXCVIII verso). Baldwin II was succeeded by Fulk, his son-in-law (1131-1143), who according to the chronicler would be the fourth, and according to our reckoning the third king. In the woodcut of Fulk he is referred to as the "fifth" king of Jerusalem (CXCIX recto), which is not correct according to either reckoning.

Fulk was succeeded by his eldest son, Baldwin III (1143-1162), of whom no mention is made in the Chronicle. From Fulk he proceeds to Amalric I (1162-1174), whom he calls "Almeric sixth king of Jerusalem." Amalric I is truly the sixth king of Jerusalem according to our calculations, but if the chronicler had not omitted Baldwin III, he would have ranked him as the seventh. The following is a correct statement of the succession up to the time of the capture of Jerusalem by Saladin in 1187:

Godfrey of Bouillon	(1099-1100)
Baldwin I	(1100-1118)
Baldwin II	(1118-1131)
Fulk	(1131-1143)
Baldwin III	(1143-1162, omitted in the Chronicle)
Amalric I	(1162-1174)
Baldwin IV	(1174-1183)
Baldwin V	(1183-1186)

Baldwin III was the eldest son of Fulk, and became king in 1143, under the regency of his mother, which lasted till 1152. From the beginning of his reign the power of the Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem may be said to slowly decline. Baldwin was eighteen years of age at the time of the Second Crusade, and played his part by the side of Conrad III and Louis VII. They failed in their attack upon Damascus.

Baldwin III was the first of the kings of Jerusalem who was a native of the soil of Palestine. His three predecessors had all been emigrants from the west. They were half churchmen, half fighters, but Baldwin was a subtler type, capable of dealing with court intrigues and legal problems. He spent his spare time in reading, and had a particular affection for history. He had a faculty for remembering faces, and possessed the gift of impromptu eloquence and wit. His married life was a shining example to his people, and he was abstemious both in food and drink.

He was a strong and memorable man. He often fought with the infidels, and slew many of them. He stoutly besieged Alexandria, the capital of Egypt, which Tiracunus, governor of Saladin, the Turkish ruler, had taken from the Egyptian sultan by treachery; so that those of Alexandria (who would not submit to the Christians by any means), allied themselves with King Amalric, with the understanding that through him they should again come under the rule of the sultan. For this reason this Amalric received a large sum of money from the sultan, and left him the city of Alexandria. However, Amalric learned that the Sultan designed to employ treachery in the matter; for which reason, as a magnanimous man, he besieged the mighty city of Cairo (Chairum). But upon the advice of a false counselor, Amalric accepted a sum of money and moved on. [Amalric I, king of Jerusalem, (1162-1174) was the son of Fulk of Jerusalem and the brother of Baldwin III. His reign was occupied by the Egyptian problem. It became a question between Amalric and Nureddin which of the two should control the discordant diziers who vied with one another for the control of the decadent caliphs of Egypt. For some five years a contest was waged between Amalric and Shirguh (Shirkuh), the lieutenant of Nureddin, for the possession of Egypt; but the contest ended in the establishment of Saladin, the nephew of Shirguh, as vizier – a position which, on the death of the puppet caliph in 1171, was turned into that of sovereign. The extinction of the Latin kingdom then seemed imminent, and envoys were sent to the West with anxious appeals for assistance. But though in 1170 Saladin attacked the kingdom, the danger was not so great as it seemed. Nureddin was jealous of his over-mighty subject, and his jealousy bound Saladin's hands. This was the position when Amalric died in 1174; but, as Nureddin died in the same year, the position was soon altered and Saladin began the final attack on the kingdom. Amalric I, second of the native kings of Jerusalem, had the qualities of his brother, Baldwin III. He was something of a scholar, or, rather, perhaps still more of a lawyer, his delight being knotty points of law, and he knew the assizes better than any of his subjects].

Albertus, a celebrated soldier, after honorable fighting received the crown of martyrdom.

Anselm (Anshelmus), bishop of Beauvais, after having lived a pious and moral life, died at this time. At his grave a number of lamps were miraculously lighted, all but one, into which a usurer had poured oil.

Philip, king of France, son of the aforesaid Louis, reigned 44 years. When he heard that Jerusalem was lost again, he proceeded into Syria with many Christian princes. When he and Richard, the English king, reached Ptolemais [For Ptolemais, see note to Folio CXCV verso], and planned to return to Jerusalem, they began to quarrel among themselves over the kingdom. But Philip, having become ill, returned home, leaving Richard behind; and he consumed his remaining years in holy practices. [Philip II, better known as Philip-Augustus, king of France, son of Louis VII, was born in 1165. He was crowned joint king in 1179, and succeeded his father in 1180. He married Isabella of Hainault, the last direct descendant of the Carolingians. His first war against the Count of Flanders gave him Amiens. He punished heretics and despoiled the Jews, and reduced the Duke of Burgundy. He supported the sons of Henry II of England against their father. He and Richard the Lion-Hearted set out on the Third Crusade; but they quarreled in Sicily. After three months in Syria he returned to France, having sworn not to molest Richard's dominions; but no sooner had he returned than he made a bargain with John for the partition of Richard's French territories. Richard's sudden return occasioned an exhausting war until 1199. Philip became involved in a quarrel with the pope. He had put away his second wife, Ingeborg of Denmark, in order to marry Agnes of Meran, but the thunders of the Vatican forced him to restore Ingeborg to her throne. In 1204 Philip added to his dominions Normandy, Maine, Anjou, and Touraine, with part of Poitou, as well as the over-lordship of Brittany. The victory of Bouvines (1214) over the Flemish, the English, and the Emperor Otto, established his throne securely. He died in 1223].

Elizabeth, a pious nun, was illustrious in Saxony for her miracles. Through angelic revelations she wrote wonderful narratives, and more particularly, a book on the ways of the Lord. [Elizabeth was a visionary. She was placed in the convent of Schoenau, in Saxony, at the age of eleven, and after spending eleven years there, was said to have been visited with extraordinary ecstasies, revelations, and prophesies. First an angel appeared to her and announced certain woes that should befall the people unless they repented, and told her to proclaim them. And when she shrank from so doing, according to her own account written to the abbess Hildegard, the angel took a whip and beat her five times with it, so that her back ached for three days. Then she gave up a book in which she had written her prophecies to the abbot Hildelin. She saw visions of demons as well as heavenly ones, and gives full accounts of all the particulars, even to the color of the dresses of some of the actors in these events. Her visions continued for a period of thirteen years, until her death in 1165].

Year of the World 6384 | Year of Christ 1174

[The German edition of the has 'Year of Christ 1184' in place of the Latin edition's '1174.' Pope Lucius III, however, died in 1185].

Lucius, the third pope of this name, a Tuscan, born of noble lineage in the city of Lucca, was elected pope in the usual manner to succeed Pope Alexander. He undertook to remove the senators of the Romans; but the hand of the senate was so powerful that after Lucius was driven from the city, his favorites and adherents were cruelly persecuted. He who let it be known that he favored the pope or was one of his adherents, and did not take to safety, suffered the loss of his eyes. Afterwards the pope fled to Verona. There he summoned a council, and complained of the waywardness and pride of the Romans; and he admonished all Christian princes to rescue Jerusalem and the Holy Land. But while the emissaries were sent back and forth in this matter, the pope died in the fourth year, second month, and twenty-eighth day of his pontificate. [Lucius III (Ubaldo Allucingela), pope from 1181 to 1185, a native of Lucca, and a Cistercian monk, named cardinal priest of Santa Pressede by Innocent II, and cardinal bishop of Ostia and Velletri by Adrian IV, succeeded Alexander III. He lived in Rome from 1181 to 1182, but dissension compelled him to spend the remainder of his pontificate in exile, mainly at Velletri, Anagni, and Verona. In 1184, he held a synod at Verona, which condemned the Cathari, Paterines, Waldensians, and Arnoldists, and anathematized all heretics and their abettors. He died in the midst of a crusade in answer to appeals of Baldwin IV of Jerusalem, and was succeeded by Urban III].

Pope Urban the Third, a native of Milan, as soon as he became pope, diligently sought to establish confidence and unity among the Christian princes so that they would not succumb to the infidels in consequence of their dissensions. When he began to fear the power of Saladin, he exhorted the Christians, by a general summons, to send men to Asia. But as matters were delayed and neglected, he proceeded to Venice in a passionate state of mind, to summon the Christian knighthood to an assembly; but when he arrived at Ferrara, and received word of the defeat of the Christians, he died in sorrow of a fever in the first year, 10th month, and 25th day of his pontificate. [Urban III (Uberto Crivelli), pope from 1185 to 1187, was a Milanese, and had been made a cardinal priest of St. Lorenzo in Damaso, and archbishop of Milan by Lucius III, whom he succeeded. He vigorously continued the quarrels of his predecessor with the emperor, including the standing dispute about the territories that the Countess Matilda had willed and given to the Church. His opposition to the pretensions of the Roman senate to govern the Papal States compelled him to remain in exile throughout his pontificate. He suspended the patriarch of Aquileia for crowning the emperor's son, Henry, king of Italy, in 1186, in violation of his own rights as archbishop of Milan, and only the entreaties of the citizens of Verona, where he was stopping, prevented him from excommunicating Frederick. In 1187, he exhorted the Christian kings to renewed endeavors in the Holy Land, and the fall of Jerusalem is said to have caused his death. He was succeeded by Gregory VIII].

Pope Gregory the Eighth, a native of Benevento, was elevated to pope by a general election of the people. Through fervor and the heat of passion, he suffered death as his predecessor had done, but a speedier one. From the very beginning of his pontificate he sent dispatches and emissaries to the Christian princes, exhorting them to join him, with all their power and military forces, and to proceed to Jerusalem, to assist in its recovery. While he proceeded with these proposals, he went to Pisa, while the Pisans were at enmity with the Genoese. And as both parties were strong in naval power, and therefore could be very helpful to the crusade by sea as well as promote the cause, he established unity between them, on condition, however, that each party should send a strong naval force into Asia against the enemies of the Christian faith. But while this holy man thus diligently managed these matters, he died at Pisa on the fifty-seventh day of his pontificate. [Gregory VIII (Alberto de Mora), pope for a period of 57 days, from October 21st to December 17th, 1187, a native of Benevento and a Praemonstratensian monk, successively abbot of St. Martin and Laon, cardinal deacon of San Andriano al foro, cardinal priest of San Lorenzo in Lucina, and chancellor of the Roman Church, was elected pope to succeed Urban III. He died at Pisa while engaged in making peace between the Pisans and the Genoese in order to secure their help in a new Crusade that he was urging for the recovery of Jerusalem].

Joachim, an abbot of Calabria, came to Pope Urban at Verona. This Joachim, a man of great learning and extraordinary divine intelligence, was at this time held in great esteem by King William (Guilhelmum) and all the Calabrians. And (as they say) he was filled with the spirit of prophesy, prognosticating future events as though they were present occurrences. He did not acquire his knowledge from highly learned men, but received the gift of judgment by divine means; and he interpreted the difficult passages of the Scriptures with understanding. To him are also said to have been revealed the future relations between the kings of France and England, who were wintering at the city of Messina. On a certain occasion he was asked what was to be hoped for in the matter of the expedition of the Saracens, and he answered that the time for the recovery of Jerusalem had not yet arrived. But what he wrote concerning the future, we will commend to the judgment and cognizance of posterity, and leave to God to manage.

Joachim of Floris, or Fiore, an Italian mystic theologian, was born at Celico, near Cosenza, in Calabria, about 1145, and was brought up at the court of Duke Roger of Apuleia. At an early age he went to visit the holy places. After seeing his comrades decimated by the plague at Constantinople, he resolved to change his mode of life, and, on his return to Italy, became a monk in the Cistercian abbey of Casamari. He later became an abbot, and with some companions founded under a rule of his own creation the abbey of San Giovanni in Fiore, on Monte Nero in the massif of LaSila. In 1204 Innocent III approved the order and the rule which its founder had imposed upon it. Joachim died in 1202. His authenticated works are the Concordia Veteris et Novi Testamenti; the Expositio in Apocalypsin, the Psalterium decum choradum. He also wrote some "libelli" against the Jews or the adversaries of the Christian faith. It is impossible to enumerate all the works attributed to him. Some served their avowed object with great success, being powerful instruments in the anti-papal polemic and sustaining the Franciscans in their hope of an approaching triumph against a papacy which they considered altogether too temporal and unspiritual. Among the most widely circulated were the commentaries on the Jeremiah, Isaiah, and Ezekiel, the Vaticinia pontificum and the De oneribus ecclesiae. Joachim divides history of humanity, past, present, and future, into three periods—the age of the Law, or of the Father; the age of the Gospel or of the Son; and the age of the Spirit, which will bring the ages to an end. The third is the age of contemplation, more Eastern than Benedictine. In his opinion, the church of Peter will not be abolished, but purified; actually, the hierarchy effaces itself in the third age before the order of the monks, the virii spirituales ('spiritual men'). The entire world will become a vast monastery in that day, which will be the resting season, the Sabbath of humanity.

Joachim did not profess to be a prophet himself, but claimed to possess the gift of interpreting the meaning of Biblical prophecies, and he was later reckoned the national prophet of Italy. His ideas soon spread into Italy and France, and especially after a division had been produced in the Franciscan order. The rigorists, who soon became known as "Spirituals," represented St. Francis as the initiator of Joachim's third age. The books of Joachim were published under the name of the Evangelium aeternum, or "Everlasting Gospel." The work was confiscated by papal order, and the publisher suffered imprisonment for eighteen years. In 1260, a council held at Arles condemned Joachim's writings and his supporters, who were very numerous in that region. The Joachimite ideas were equally persistent among the Spirituals, and acquired new strength with the publication of the commentary on the Apocalypse. This book, probably published after the death of its author, contains an affirmation of the elect character of the Franciscan order, as well as extremely violent attacks on the papacy.

The Joachimite literature is very vast. >From the 14th to the middle of the 16th century a host of other writers repeated or added to without end the exegesis of Abbot Joachim. Such independent spirits as Roger Bacon often confronted themselves with the thought of the era of justice and peace promised by Joachim. Dante held Joachim in great reverence and has placed him in Paradise (Paradiso xii, 140-141). Joachim's "Everlasting gospel" derived its name from Revelation 14:6, "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people."

Baldwin (Baldvinus), the fourth of this name, seventh king of Jerusalem, and son of the aforesaid Amalric, reigned six years after his father. Although he was afflicted with the illness of leprosy, he ruled the kingdom with strength and wisdom. In daring and knightly affairs, he was an informed and experienced man. He caused the forces of Saladin to flee in a battle. Afterwards, before the city of Tiberias, with a small number of men, he slew twenty thousand Saracens, Turks and Arabs in the very presence of Saladin; and as often as he encountered the Saladin he manfully resisted him. Having a great abhorrence of his own leprosy, he refrained from taking a wife, and entertaining no hope of any issue, he decided to leave his kingdom to his sister's children. The younger sister, named Sibylla (Sibilla), he espoused to William (Guilhelmo), margrave of Monteferrato, and she bore a son the first year; and he was named Baldwin after his mother's brother, and succeeded Baldwin the Fourth after the latter's death. [Baldwin IV, son of Amalric I by his first wife Agnes, ruled in Jerusalem from 1174 to 1183, when he had his nephew Baldwin crowned in his stead. Educated by William of Tyre, Baldwin IV came to the throne at the early age of thirteen; and thus the kingdom came under the regency of Raymond II of Tripoli. The problems of the reign of Baldwin IV were two – his sister, Sibylla, and the fiery Raynald of Chatillon, once prince of Antioch, then a captive for many years in the hands of the Muslims, and since 1176 lord of Krak (Kerak) to the east of the Dead Sea. Sibylla was the heiress of the kingdom; the problem of her marriage was important. She was first married to William of Montferrat, to whom she bore a son, Baldwin, and was married a second time in 1180 to Guy of Lusignan. Dissension between Sibylla and her husband on the one hand, and Baldwin IV on the other, troubled the latter years of his reign. Meanwhile, Raynald of Krak took advantage of the position of his fortress on the great trade route from Damascus and Egypt to plunder the caravans, and thus helped to precipitate the inevitable attack of Saladin. When the attack came, Guy was made regent by Baldwin IV; but he declined battle and was deposed from his regency and right of succession, while Sibylla's son by her first husband was crowned king as Baldwin V in 1183. For a time Baldwin IV continued to be king, but, in 1184, he handed over the regency to Raymond of Tripoli, and died in the same year].

The Order of The Humiliati had its origin (as is said) at this time in Cisalpine Gaul; but others say, under Emperor Henry (Henrico). But when the emperor Frederick Barbarossa afflicted those in the eastern parts of Gaul with all manner of mischief, he also sent a large number of men, women and children from there to Germany as exiles. After being detained there ever so long, these exiles became distressed; and they all dressed in white and went to the emperor, asking pardon and mercy. He was so moved that he allowed all of them to return to their homes. When they arrived in their homeland, they lived together, probably in accordance with a vow, avoiding wantonness and going about in humble raiment. In course of time they became more strict in their mode of life. The men lived and worked together, but separate and apart from the women, according to the rule of the Blessed Benedict. Their superior was called a provost. The order so increased in membership and possessions that it was confirmed by the pope and granted many privileges. [Humiliati is the name of an Italian monastic order of obscure origin in the twelfth century. A group of Lombards came to Rome with the intention of obtaining the pope's approval of the rule of life that they had spontaneously chosen. While continuing to live in their houses in the midst of their families, they wished to lead a more pious existence than of old, to abandon oaths and litigation, to content themselves with a modest dress, and all in a spirit of Catholic piety. The pope approved their resolve to live in humility and purity, but forbade them to hold assemblies and to preach in public, the chronicler adding that they infringed the pope's wish and thus drew upon themselves his excommunication. Their name, Humiliati, arose from the fact that the clothes they wore were very simple and of one color. This lay fraternity spread rapidly and soon put forth two new branches, a second order composed of women, and a third composed of priests, to which Innocent III granted a rule. His object was to reconcile the order with the Waldensians, and indeed the rule reproduces several of the Waldensian propositions, ingeniously modified in the orthodox sense, but still very easily recognizable. It forbade useless oaths and the taking of God's name in vain; allowed voluntary poverty and marriage; regulated pious exercises; and approved the solidarity that already existed among the members of the association. Finally, by a singular concession, it authorized them to meet on Sunday to listen to the words of a brother "of proved faith and prudent piety," on condition that the hearers should not discuss among themselves either the articles of faith or the sacraments of the church. The bishops were forbidden to oppose any of the utterances of the Humiliati brethren, "for the spirit must not be stifled." So broad a discipline must of necessity have led back some waverers into the pale of the church, but the tradition of the independent Humiliati is confused with the history of the Waldensians throughout the later 12th century. The celebrated decretal of Pope Lucius III at the council of Verona (1184) against all heretics condemns at the same time as the "Poor Men of Lyons" "those who attribute to themselves falsely the name of Humiliati," at the very time when this name denoted an order recognized by the papacy. This order, though orthodox, was always held in tacit and ever-increasing suspicion, and was suppressed by Pius V in February 1570 and 1571].

The Final Capture of the City of Jerusalem

Guy (Guido) Lusignan, husband of the aforesaid Sibylla (Sibille), who was a sister of the leprous king Baldwin (Baldvini), reigned for two years after the death of said Baldwin and of Baldwin his sister's son. When Baldwin died the kingdom passed to Baldwin the child of his sister. The regency for the little king was assumed by Raymond, count of Tripoli, and Guy, the father of the infant. The child died in the eighth month after his uncle's demise, and while the dissensions among the Christians at Jerusalem were in progress. Sibylla was concerned that the count of Tripoli might be elected king by the knights and the people. However, by promises of rewards and gifts she succeeded in having Guy, her husband, elected king by the patriarchs, bishops, nobles, and those in power. This so offended Raymond, count of Tripoli, that he entered into a truce with Saladin; and he purloined from the kingdom of Jerusalem the county of Tripoli, together with the principality of Tiberias and Galilee, by means of marriage with a noblewoman, whom the same principality belonged to. Matters between the Christians and Saladin were now at peace; but Saladin decided to violate the peace. With a large army of foot and horse he went to Jerusalem and besieged it. He stormed it for ten days without success, and afterwards for twenty days. Finally, those within the city surrendered, not through fear of these attacks, but because they despaired of assistance and rescue. They capitulated upon condition that they be allowed to depart with as much of their household effects as each could carry. And thus the Christians left Jerusalem, some proceeding to Antioch, others to Tyre, and some to Alexandria. When Saladin entered the city, he threw the bells out of the towers and made inns of the churches. [The situation of the Christian kingdom of Jerusalem became more and more perilous after the Second Crusade. At length Saladin, sultan of Egypt, reduced a part of Palestine under his scepter. He granted the Christians of Palestine a truce; but when a Christian knight interrupted the passage of Saladin's mother, seized her treasures, and killed her attendants, the exasperated sultan of Egypt recommenced hostilities, defeated the Christians at Tiberias, took Joppa, Sidon, Acre, and other towns, and finally, in 1187, Jerusalem fell into his possession. Saladin, surpassing his Christian foes in magnanimity and virtue, treated the inhabitants of the Holy City with mildness, but caused the crosses to be torn down and the furniture of the churches to be destroyed].

Clement the Third was a Roman whose father was John (Ioanne), surnamed Scolari. When he noted that Christian affairs in Asia were becoming more precarious from day to day, he exhorted the Christians by a general call to place the sign of the cross of salvation upon their garments, and to take it into their hearts, urging them to take arms against the infidels for the glory of eternal blessedness. This exhortation moved the Roman emperor, Frederick Barbarossa, Philip of France, Richard the king of England, and Otto, the duke of Burgundy, who were followed by a countless number of archbishops, bishops, and other princes; as well as the Venetians and Pisans, and those from Friesland and Dacia with a great naval force, William of Sicily freed the seas of the infidels and pirates, and forwarded grain from Apuleia and Sicily. Those princes fought manfully in Asia, but with varying fortunes. Clement, however, devoted himself to the establishment of order and the correcting of clerical and spiritual matters; and through his earnestness he corrected various acts of misconduct and immorality. He also built the monastery of Saint Lawrence (Laurentii) outside the walls, restored the foundation of the Lateran, and ornamented the church with spiral work. He died in the third year and fifth month of his pontificate, and was buried in the Lateran Basilica. [Clement III, (Paolo Scolari), pope from 1187 to 1191, a Roman, cardinal bishop of Palestrina, was chosen pope in 1187. In 1188 he settled a controversy with William of Scotland concerning the choice of the archbishop of St. Andrews; and he removed the Scottish church from the legatine jurisdiction of the bishop of York, thus making it independent of all save Rome. Clement strenuously promoted the crusade, a movement which tended most unexpectedly to avert the antagonism of the emperor Frederick, who, forgetting his controversy with the pope, went to Asia with a large army in 1189; and there he met his death in 1191. The kings of France and England had joined this crusade, and Clement made a compact with the Romans in 1188, by which he settled the differences that had existed for fifty years between that people and the papal see, and thus took one great step toward the full possession of Rome by the pontiffs. He annoyed Henry VI of Germany by bestowing the crown of Sicily on Tancred, a natural son of Roger, duke of Apuleia, who was the eldest son of Roger, first king of Sicily. This greatly angered Henry, for the death of William II, king of Sicily, in 1189, appeared to promise great advantages to the imperial house, William, having given his father's sister Constantia in marriage to Henry, the emperor's eldest son, having also declared her his heiress, and having caused her, with her husband, to receive homage in a general assembly. But the Sicilians were unwilling to submit to foreign rule. Henry was at a distance, and the pope was not pleased that such measures had been adopted with regard to the Sicilian succession without his approval; and there were many who did not wish the kingdom to pass to the Swabian house, and particularly not to a prince so hostile to the papacy as the young king Henry].

Pope Celestine the Third, a Roman whose father Peter was surnamed Bobone (Bubonis), was previously called Giacinto, a cardinal. He was an aged man, rich in virtue, and was elected pope after Clement. In his pontificate there was a remarkable decline in the open hostility that the Sicilians had shown against his predecessors; for he determined to silence it. He was a good man. He crowned King Henry (Heinricum), mentioned below, as emperor. While he lived he employed all his zeal for the recovery of Jerusalem and the Holy Land. He gave the city of Viterbo [Viterbo is the provincial capital and Episcopal see of the district of Lazio (Latium), Italy, fifty-four miles by rail to the northwest of Rome. The cathedral, a fine basilica, of the 12th century, has a Gothic campanile in black and white stone. Here Pope Adrian IV (Nicholas Breakspear) compelled the emperor Frederick I to hold his stirrup as his vassal. The city was fortified by the Lombard king Desiderius, and is the center of the territory of the "patrimony of Peter," which the Countess Matilda of Tuscany gave to the papal see in the 12th century. In the 13th century it became a favorite papal residence]. its name; and there he founded an episcopal church. He died in the sixth year, seventh month, and eleventh day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Peter, mourned by all good people out of sadness and desire.

Celestine III (Giacinto Bobone), pope from 1191 to 1198, was formerly cardinal deacon of Santa Maria in Cosmedin. It seemed as if the possibility of deliverance from the danger which threatened the papacy had only appeared like a vision to Clement III, in order to make his successor Celestine III all the more sensible of the nearness of impending ruin. Henry VI, who succeeded to the empire after the death of his father Frederick, hastened to Italy in 1191 and compelled the pope to crown him.

After the death of Tancred in 1193, his heir, who was but a minor, and unable to continue the struggle with the emperor, Henry caused himself to be crowned king of Sicily without asking the pope's consent. Nor could the pope restrain him from harsh measures toward the adherents of the late king, and others, who opposed his pretensions. On the whole, Henry VI, during his short reign, was more formidable to the pope than his father had been. He forbade appeals to Rome throughout Italy, under the penalty of imprisonment; and he maintained his right of decision in disputed elections to bishoprics. Henry VI died in the prime of manhood in 1197, and Celestine followed him in 1198. This premature death of the emperor, coinciding with that of the aged and feeble Pontius, delivered the papal see from one of the most critical situations in which it had ever been placed. During his pontificate, Prince John of England and his barons refused to recognize the papal legate, the bishop of Ely, and Richard I had been set free before the dilatory pope had put Leopold of Austria under the ban. Celestine III was succeeded by Innocent III, then a man only 37 years of age.

Saladin, king of Egypt, being a powerful man and strict in all things, was elected king upon the death of Nureddin (Noradino), the king of the Saracens; and he reigned 16 years. Soon after accepting the sovereignty, he made war against the king of Egypt, took him prisoner and had him put to death. He made war throughout Egypt and Syria, and subjugated them to his authority. With a mighty army he robbed and murdered man and beast in the kingdom of Jerusalem; however, before that time he had been twice defeated by Baldwin (Baldvino) the king, as previously stated. Afterward he conducted an expedition against Emmanuel (Emanuelem), the Greek king, whom he defeated and killed. This victory made him so proud and haughty that with a powerful force he proceeded against the Christians at Jerusalem and (as above stated) captured this Holy City, which had been under Christian kings for eighty-eight years since King Godfrey (Gothefridum). And before he entered the Temple of Solomon, he caused it to be washed with rose-water and cleansed of its evil spirits. He lacked nothing except the name of a Christian to make him the subject of the greatest veneration. When about to die he prescribed that his corpse on its way to the grave should be preceded by a black cloth suspended from a lance, and that a herald should go before, crying, I, the master of all Asia, bring but this little piece of cloth, although I was so rich and mighty that no one was my equal.

Saladin (Salah-ed-din Yussuf ibn Ayub), whose name means "Honoring the Faith," was sultan of Egypt and Syria and founder of a dynasty. He was born at Tikrit, on the Tigris, in 1138. His father, a Kurd, was a governor at Tikrit under the Seljuks. He entered the service of Nur-ed-din, and was made grand-vizier of the Fatimite caliph, whom in 1171 he overthrew, constituting himself sovereign of Egypt. When Nur-ed-din died in 1174, Saladin began his conquests of Syria, and proclaimed himself sultan of Egypt and Syria, reduced Mesopotamia, and received the homage of the Seljuk princes of Asia Minor. By 1186, Saladin had subdued the last independent vassal, and now the Latin kingdom was enclosed on every side by a hostile empire.

In 1187, a four years' truce was broken by the brilliant brigand Raynald of Chatillon, and thus began Saladin's third period of conquest, the first having been the conquest of Egypt, and the second, the annexation of Syria. In May he cut to pieces a small body of Templars and Hospitallers at Tiberias, and on July 4th inflicted a crushing defeat upon the united Christian army at Hittin. He then overran Palestine and besieged and took the city of Jerusalem as a crown to his victories. Before entering the city he purified it, and showed chivalrous clemency to the Christian inhabitants. Saladin died at Damascus on March 4th, 1193, and was mourned by the whole East.

Alpais (Alpaidis), the holy woman of Cudot, at this time was famous. She lived many years without bodily sustenance. She was born of peasants, and was a herder of cattle. She was lean of body, and her innards were starved; but her countenance was as beautiful and full as if she had soared in an abundance of pleasure. She was often elevated to ecstasy through angelic guidance. Although born and reared in the country, her speech was wonderfully intelligent, and her words prudent. [Alpais (also spelled Alpaida, Alpaidis, and Alphais) of Cudot (d. 1211), is venerated by the Catholic Church. Born into a peasant family of Cudot, in the diocese of Sens, she came down with leprosy at a young age. It is said that she denied herself food, and for a long time her only nourishment was the Eucharist].

Henry (Heinricus), the sixth of this name, first son of Frederick, was elected future Roman emperor by the electors in the Year of the Lord 1190; and he reigned eight years. Having previously been made king by his father, he received the crown at Aix-la-Chapelle. He became involved in a war with those of Cologne; but after the bishop of Liege was slain, he pardoned them. Later he was crowned emperor by Pope Celestine on condition that after the recovery of the kingdom on this side and the further side of the sea of Sicily, he would pay an annual tribute out of his own funds and confirm the church-lands to the pope. In order that this might be accomplished more easily, he arranged that Constance, daughter of the Norman king at Palermo (Parnormi) [Palermo (Latin, Panormus or Panhormus), is a city of Sicily. It is the capital of an Italian province of the same name, and the see of an archbishop. It was taken from Carthage by the Romans during the Punic Wars (254 BCE). It was captured by the Vandal Genseric in 440 CE. It later became a part of the East-Gothic dominion, and was recovered for the Eastern Roman empire by Belisarius in 535. It was taken by the Saracens in 835 and became the Muslim capital of Sicily. After the Norman conquest, the city remained for a short time in the hands of the dukes of Apuleia; but in 1093, half the city was ceded to Count Roger, and, in 1122, the rest was ceded to the second Roger. During the Norman reigns, Palermo was the main center of Sicilian history, and perhaps the first successful multi-cultural state (where Normans, Arabs, Jews, Byzantine Greeks, and Sicilians, at least on a nominal level, worked together in the imperial government). The emperor Henry VI entered Palermo in 1194, and it became the chief scene of his cruelties. In 1198, his son Frederick, afterwards emperor, was crowned there]. now living in a cloister, be removed from there; and (now being regarded too old to bear) he married her with the permission of the pope. In the first year of his reign Henry and his spouse besieged Naples; but they returned to Germany on account of the plague. Afterwards, at the request of Pope Celestine, Henry led a mighty army into Italy, taking with him his wife Constance and Frederick his son, born to them beyond the expectations of everyone, on account of age. Without great effort he subjugated the city of Naples and so much of Italy as belonged to the kingdom of Sicily, and later Sicily itself. It is officially stated that he secured possession of an exceedingly large treasure which the Norman kings had been collecting for a long time, and secretly sent it to Germany. Pope Celestine asked him to come to Rome from Palermo where various matters were being transacted concerning the recovery of the Holy Land and of Jerusalem. Although Henry did not wish to undertake these matters in person, he agreed to participate through emissaries and advisers. He ordered the archbishop of Mainz and the Duke of Saxony to handle these affairs, and commanded them to assemble the people and the army throughout Germany. Simultaneously the Saracens with a large and mighty fleet proceeded to lower Spain; and they defeated the King of Castile and subjugated much land and many people. They held possession of the great city of Granada into the year 1492. When Henry again returned to the empire, he became seriously ill at Messina in Sicily; and he sent emissaries to Pope Innocent, commending to him his wife and son, and Philip his brother, to whom he invested with a feudal estate all of Etruria, with the title of duke, and the regency of the Roman empire, and the sovereignty of the kingdom of Sicily, until his son should become of age. Having arranged his affairs and made his will, he died at Palermo. His death caused no small amount of turmoil and destruction in Asia and Germany. Henry was strict in his affairs, keen in dealing with the enemy, generous, versatile, handsome of countenance, of medium stature, and intelligent. He was buried magnificently in the church of Palermo.

Henry VI, Roman emperor, son of the emperor Frederick I, and Beatrix, daughter of Renaud III, count of upper Burgundy, was chosen German king at Bamberg and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1169. In 1184 his father sought to procure his coronation from Pope Lucius III, but the pope refused because of the marriage arranged between Henry and Constance, daughter of Roger I, late king of Sicily, a step which threatened to unite Sicily with Germany. This marriage took place at Milan in 1186, and soon afterward Henry was crowned king of Italy. Having been recognized by the pope as Roman emperor elect, Henry returned to Germany, where a campaign against Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, was followed by a peace made at Fulda in 1190.

A promise of his coronation from Pope Clement III led Henry to cross the Alps in the winter of 1190. On reaching Rome, he found Clement dead and his successor, Celestine III, disinclined to carry out the coronation. However, the strength of the German army and a treaty made between the king and the Romans, induced him to crown Henry in 1191. Meanwhile, a party in Sicily had chosen Tancred, illegitimate son of Roger, son of King Roger II, as king. Henry marched to Naples, but was compelled to raise the siege and return to Germany. There the Welfs and their earlier opponents were united against the emperor, vacancies in various bishoprics added to the confusion, and Henry was suspected of being implicated in the murder of Albert, bishop of Liege. His salvation came from the captivity of Richard I, king of England, and the skill with which he used this event to make peace with his foes. When Henry the Lion came to terms, in 1194, order was restored in Germany. But the following May, Henry again went to Italy where Pope Celestine had espoused the cause of Tancred. When he reached Sicily, he found Tancred dead, and meeting with little resistance, entered Palermo where he was crowned king in 1194. Leaving his wife, Constance, as regent, he returned to Germany in 1195.

Having established his position in Germany and Italy, Henry began to cherish ideas of universal empire. To complete his scheme, two steps were necessary, reconciliation with the pope, and recognition of his young son Frederick as his successor in the empire. Henry met the princes at Worms in 1195 to secure confirmation of his schemes, but failed. In 1196, Henry again went to Italy to persuade the pope to crown his son who had been chosen king of the Romans at Frankfurt. Celestine refused. From Rome Henry proceeded to southern Italy where he put down an insurrection with terrible cruelty. He died at Messina from a cold contracted while hunting in 1197.

Helinandus, a monk, and a well-spoken, spiritual and learned man, lived at this time. He wrote a chronicle from the beginning of the world to his own time, and incorporated it in a large book. But this book has been so separated and scattered about that the entire work cannot be found anywhere. []

Papias, a Lombard, well versed in the Latin and Greek tongues, compiled a dictionary at this time, and wrote many elegant letters. []

Azo (Azonem), a native of Bologna, and highly learned in the imperial civil law, at this time wrote such excellent and numerous interpretations and expositions of the law, that the legal scholars called him the spring of imperial jurisprudence. [Azo (c. 1150-1230), Italian jurist, was born at Bologna, studied under Joannes Bassianus, and became professor of civil law at Bologna. Azo occupied a very important position among the glossators, and his , and , formed a methodical exposition of Roman law, and were of so much weight before the tribunals that it used to be said, "Chi non ha Azzo, non vada a Pallazo." Azo numbered among his pupils Accursius and Jacobus Baldvinus. He died about 1230].

Martinus, likewise called Bosianus, an excellent teacher of the same law, also flourished at this time. Other men learned in the law called him a luminary of jurisprudence, and a mirror of the world. [The text probably refers to Joannes Bassianus, Italian jurist of the 12th century, who is said to have been a native of Cremona. He was a professor in the law school of Bologna. His best known extant treatise is the , which Savigny regarded as one of the most precious works of the gloss-writers. Bassianus was remarkable for his talent in inventing ingenious forms to set forth his ideas, and perhaps his most celebrated work is his "Law-Tree" , the subject of many commentaries. It presents a kind of tree upon the branches of which the various kinds of actions are arranged like fruit. The civil actions, 48 in number, are on one side, and the equitable, 121, on the other. A further division of actions was made by him under 12 heads, and by a system of notation the student could class at once each of the two kinds of actions under its proper head. His lectures on the and the have perished].

Year of the World 6403 | Year of Christ 1204

Pope Innocent the Third, a native of Campania, whose ancestors were counts and whose father was Anagninus, was a man who led a most upright life in every way and was very learned. From youth he was devoted to study at Paris, and because of his Scriptural wisdom and good morals, he was made a cardinal by Pope Celestine. On the latter's death Innocent was elected pope. His books and works, too numerous to mention, show what a highly celebrated and honored man he was. He so despised bribery that he ordered that nothing was to be accepted from a stranger by any official of the papal court, except the scribes and sealers, whose compensation was fixed. In order that every one might have free and sure access to papal officials, he prescribed that there was to be no doorkeeper to the chambers of the notaries or public scribes. When great turmoil and discord in Asia followed upon the death of Henry, Innocent, with remarkable zeal, sought to put an end to these misunderstandings; but his efforts were in vain. When he learned that the power and might of the Saracens had gained the ascendancy in Asia, he called a great council at Rome. Attending it were many distinguished and honorable men. Later he wrote many beautiful, valiant, and elegant books and manuscripts, treating on various subjects; and he compiled a book of the Decretals and of the Canon Law. He made three statutes, namely, one providing that whenever a prince sued another prince, the fine or penalty inflicted should be paid to the pope; another, that princes, no matter of what degree, should honor the priests; the third and last statute concerned elections. The dealings of this pope received no small measure of support and encouragement from the two men, Dominic and Francis. This pope condemned a book written by Abbot Joachim, as well as the errors of the heretic Almericus, who afterwards, together with his adherents, was burned, at Paris. This pope also performed acts of kindness, not without good results. At Rome he built a hospital dedicated to the Holy Spirit; also another called the Hospital of the Tower, and repaired the dilapidated Basilica of Saint Sixtus. After arbitrating the differences of the Genoese and Pisans, he went to Perugia, where he died in the eighteenth year, seventh month, and 16th day of his pontificate. In his life and dealings he was so upright and just that nothing could be urged against him after his death.

Innocent III (Lotario de'Conti di Segni), pope from 1198 to 1216, was the son of Trasimondo, count of Segni. He laid the foundations of his profound knowledge of scholastic philosophy at the University of Paris. At Bologna he studied canon and civil law. On his return to Rome, he became a canon of St. Peter's, and was later made sub-deacon and cardinal-deacon in turn. In 1198, Celestine III died and on the same day Lotario, though not even a priest, was unanimously elected pope by the assembled cardinals, taking the name of Innocent III. His first acts were to restore the prestige of the Holy See in Italy, where it had been overshadowed by the power of Henry VI. The early death of that sovereign had left Germany divided and Sicily torn by warring factions. It was therefore easy for Innocent to depose the imperial prefect in Rome itself and to oust the German feudatories who held the great Italian fiefs for the empire. Spoleto fell; Perugia surrendered; Tuscany acknowledged the leadership of the pope; and papal rectores once more governed the patrimony of St. Peter. Finally, Henry's widow, Constance, in despair, acknowledged the pope as the overlord of the two Sicilies, and on her death appointed him guardian of her infant son, Frederick. The effective assertion of this world power is the characteristic feature of Innocent's pontificate. Other popes before him had upheld the theory of the supremacy of the spiritual over the temporal authority; but it was reserved for Innocent to make it a reality. In Germany his support of Otto IV against Philip of Swabia, then of Philip against Otto, and finally, after Philip's murder (1208), of the younger Frederick II against Otto, effectually prevented the imperial power during his pontificate from again becoming a danger to the papacy in Italy. Concessions of the cost of the empire in Italy were in every case the price of his support.

Meanwhile, Innocent promoted the crusade that ultimately led to the Latin occupation of Constantinople. He was the first pope to nominate a patriarch for that city, and expressed the hope that from that point on the church would be "one fold under one shepherd." In 1207, he proclaimed a crusade against the Albigensians. His authority within the church itself exceeded that of his predecessors, and the independent jurisdiction of metropolitans and bishops was curtailed. He brought the patronage of sees and benefices into his own hands by a system which led to intolerable abuses, and placed the church above the state. The 12th ecumenical council assembled at the Lateran under his presidency in 1215 is referred to in the following note.

In this year a Council was called by Innocent at the Lateran concerning the recovery of the Holy Land and Jerusalem. This was attended by thirteen hundred prelates, as well as the patriarchs of Jerusalem and Constantinople, seventy archbishops, four hundred and twelve bishops, eight hundred abbots, priors and convent brothers, the legates of the Greek and Roman empires, and the emissaries of the kings of Jerusalem, France, Spain, England, and Cyprus. And although many matters were considered, nothing of consequence followed, because of the war between the Pisans and the Genoese, and because of the difficulties in other parts of Italy. [The Fourth Lateran Council (12th ecumenical), convened by Pope Innocent III in 1215, was the best attended of all the church councils, and marks the culminating point of a pontificate which itself represents the zenith attained by the medieval papacy. Prelates assembled from every country in Christendom, and with them the deputies of numerous princes, besides the representative of absent prelates and a number of inferior clerics. The business before it, the disciplining of heretics and Jews, and the proclamation of a new crusade, etc, vitally concerned the states represented; yet the function of the great assembly was little more than to listen to and endorse the decretals read by the pope. The seventy decrees of the council begin with a confession of faith directed against the Cathars and Waldensians, which is significant if only for the mention of a transubstantiation of the elements in the Lord's Supper. A series of resolutions provided in detail for the organized suppression of the heresy and for the institution of the Episcopal inquisition. On every Christian, arrived at discretion, the duty was imposed of confessing at least once annually and of receiving the Eucharist at least at Easter. Enactments were also passed touching procedure in the ecclesiastical courts, the creation of new monastic orders, appointments of offices in the church, veneration of relics, pilgrimages and dealings with Jews and Saracens. Finally, a great crusade was resolved upon, to defray the expense of which it was determined that the clergy should lay aside one-twentieth—the popes and the cardinals one-tenth—of their revenues for the next three years; while the crusaders were to be held free of all burdens during their absence].

John (Iohannes) the Good, a restorer of the Order of Saint Augustine, and a native of Mantua, at this time led a very spiritual and holy life in Italy, and erected many monasteries. From this time on the brethren were named after him. And, full of days and good works, in the Year from the Nativity of the Lord 1222 he journeyed to the Lord.

Philip, a prince in Swabia, duke of Etruria, brother of Emperor Henry (Heinrici), and regent for Frederick, Henry's son, undertook the rule of the Roman empire. However, upon the death of Henry great dissension took place among the electors. Some elected Otto, brother of the duke of Saxony, while others wanted this Philip who had been appointed by Henry. Turmoil and war followed. The king of France took the part of Philip, while the king of England was on the side of Duke Otto. In the meantime the Italians recognized neither as emperor. Philip prepared for war, and in the year 1200 marched into Alsace, devastated it, and besieged Strasbourg, bringing it under his dominion. Two years later he did likewise in Thuringia, defeating the landgrave there. And as Henry and Frederick, this Philip's father and brother (as is known), had opposed the Roman Church, Pope Innocent confirmed Duke Otto as emperor. But Philip pursued Otto with an army, driving him out everywhere. Otto came to Cologne, where he was heavily besieged by Philip, who defeated Otto in battle before Cologne; and Otto was driven out by those of Cologne, who hailed Philip as the Roman king. But as the princes and states of the kingdom had become weary of this long war, peace was made, and Philip was declared Roman emperor. He reigned nine years, but not without care and hardship. He did not remain at rest for long after entering upon the sovereignty; for through the landgrave of Thuringia, or as several others write, through Otto, count palatine of Wittelsbach, he was slain at Bamberg on the 10th day of the Kalends of July, and his body was buried at Spire in Bamberg by the order of Frederick.

Philip (c. 1177-1208), German king and duke of Swabia, the rival of Emperor Otto IV, was the fifth and youngest son of the emperor Frederick I, and brother of the emperor Henry VI. He entered the church and was chosen bishop of Würzburg; but he forsook his ecclesiastical calling and was made duke of Tuscany in 1195, receiving an extensive grant of lands. On the death of his brother Conrad in 1196 he became duke of Swabia. He appears to have been designated as guardian of the young Frederick, afterwards the emperor Frederick II, in case of his father's early death. In 1197 he had set out to bring Frederick from Sicily for his coronation, when he heard of the emperor's death and returned at once to Germany. He found growing hostility to the kingship of a child, and the absence of the two Welf claimants, Otto and Henry, the sons of Henry the Lion, made possible Philip's own election in 1198.

Meanwhile, a number of princes hostile to Philip, under the leadership of Adolph, archbishop of Cologne, had elected an anti-king in the person of Otto, second son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony. A war followed in which Philip drew his principal support from south Germany, and he carried the war into his opponent's territory. In March 1201, Innocent III placed Philip and his associates under the ban, and began to work for Otto. Otto, aided by the king of Bohemia and the landgrave of Thuringia, drove him from north Germany. But the submission of the landgrave in 1204 marked the turning point of Philip's fortunes, and he was soon joined by Adolph of Cologne and Henry I, duke of Brabant. In 1205, Philip was crowned, though it was not until 1207 that his entry into Cologne practically brought the war to a close. Philip was then set free from the papal ban. He was preparing to crush the last flicker of the rebellion in Brunswick when he was murdered at Bamberg in 1208 by Otto of Wittelsbach, count palatine in Bavaria, to whom he had refused the hand of one of his daughters. He left four daughters, one of whom, Beatrix, afterwards married his rival, the emperor Otto IV. Philip was a brave man, and contemporary writers, among whom was Walther von der Vogelweide, praise his mildness and generosity.

Otto, duke of Saxony, the fourth of this name, was elected king by his Germans in the Year from the Nativity of the Lord 1209 upon the assassination of Philip; and he reigned three years. He soon journeyed to Rome and received the imperial crown from Pope Innocent; but after thus receiving it, he seized the lands and estates of the churches, contrary to the oath and obligation by which he was related to the Roman See. He likewise attacked the Neapolitan country. Although Pope Innocent often solicited Otto to return the estates of the churches to him as overlord, and reminded him of his obligation so to do, yet the pope failed to obtain them. For this reason the pope excommunicated Otto, who, however, continued his obstinate course, resulting in turmoil, robbery and murder in the streets of Rome. And so he was deposed as Roman emperor and German king, and his subjects were released of their obligation and fealty. In consequence, the king of Bohemia, the landgrave of Thuringia, the archbishops of Mainz and Trier, the duke of Austria, and the most distinguished among the knights and nobles deserted him. Then Otto returned to Germany, where Philip of France made war against him. Finally, in the year 1218, Emperor Otto died in sorrow and gloom.

Otto IV (c. 1182-1218), Roman emperor, second son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony, and Matilda, daughter of Henry II, king of England, was educated at the court of his uncle, Richard I, king of England, under whose leadership he gained valuable experience in war. When Emperor Henry VI died in 1197, some of the princes under the leadership of the archbishop of Cologne were anxious to find a rival to Philip, duke of Swabia, who had been elected German king. The choice fell on Otto, who was chosen king at Cologne in 1198. Hostilities broke out at once, and Otto was finally driven to Brunswick. Preparations were made to drive him from here, when the murder of Philip saved him. Otto submitted to a fresh election and was chosen German king at Frankfurt in 1208 in the presence of a large gathering of princes. A general reconciliation followed. The pope, who had previously recognized the victorious Philip, now hastened to the side of Otto; large concessions were made to the church.

In 1209, the king set out for Italy. He was received by Innocent at Viterbo; but he refused the papal demand to concede to the church the territories which had been in dispute, consenting, however, not to claim supremacy over Sicily. He was crowned emperor at Rome in 1209, a ceremony that was followed by fighting between the Romans and the German soldiers. The pope then requested the emperor to leave Roman territory; but he remained near Rome for some days, demanding satisfaction for the losses suffered by his troops. The breach with Innocent soon widened, and Otto attempted to recover for the Empire all the property that Innocent had annexed to the church.

Having occupied Tuscany, he marched into Apuleia, and in 1210, was excommunicated by the pope. Regardless of this sentence, Otto completed the conquest of southern Italy, but the efforts of Innocent had succeeded in arousing the rebels in Germany, who were supported by Philip Augustus, king of France. A number of princes assembled at Nuremberg, declared Otto deposed, and invited Frederick to fill the vacant throne. Returning to Germany in 1212, Otto made some headway against his enemies, but the final blow to his fortunes came when he was decisively defeated by the French at Bouvines in 1214. He escaped with difficulty and took refuge at Cologne. His former supporters hastened to recognize Frederick, and, in 1216, Otto left Cologne for Brunswick, which he had received in 1202 by arrangement with his elder brother, Henry. Otto died in 1218 at Harzburg, leaving no children.

Raynaldus (Rainaldus), archbishop of Cologne, after the destruction of Milan by Emperor Frederick, brought from there the remains of the three holy kings.

Richard, a child, was martyred at Paris by the Jews. He performed many miracles. When information reached King Philip of France that for many years the Jews had committed evil acts in outraging the Christian faith, he deprived them of all their possessions and estates, and drove them out of the kingdom.

The Order of The Cross-Bearers, begun in the Lateran Council, but inactive for a long time, was re-established and confirmed by Pope Innocent the Third in the 18th year of his pontificate. The order originated through the fact that a wicked and injurious heresy had arisen among the Albigensians Albigensian is the usual designation of the heretics – more especially the Catharist heretics – of the south of France in the 12th and 13th centuries; but the designation is hardly exact, for the center of the movement was at Toulouse and in the neighboring districts, rather than at Albi (the ancient Albige). The ‘heresy’, which had penetrated into these regions probably by trade routes, may have come originally from eastern Europe. The name of Bulgarians (Bougres) was often applied to the Albigensians, and they kept up communication with the Bogomil secretaries of Thrace.

It is exceedingly difficult to form any exact idea of their doctrines, as our knowledge of them is derived from their opponents and a few rare texts emanating from the Albigensians containing inadequate information concerning their metaphysical principles and moral practice. It is certain that they formed an anti-sacerdotal party in permanent opposition to the Roman Church, and raised a continued protest against the corruption of the clergy of their time. The Albigensian theologians and ascetics, the Cathari, or perfecti, were few in number. The mass of believers were perhaps not initiated into the Catharist doctrine; at all events they were free from all moral prohibition and all religious obligation, on condition that they promised to become “hereticized” by receiving the consolamentum, the baptism of the Spirit, before their death or even in extremis.

The first Catharist heretics appeared in Limousin between 1012 and 1020. Protected by William IX, duke of Aquitaine, and soon by a great part of the southern nobility, the movement gained ground in the south, and, in 1119, the Council of Toulouse in vain ordered the secular powers to assist the ecclesiastical authority in quelling the heresy. The people were attached to these bons homes, as these good Christians were called; for their asceticism and anti-sacerdotal preaching impressed the masses, and the movement maintained vigorous activity for another hundred years until Innocent III became pope. Innocent tried to pacify them and to effect their conversion, but he was opposed, not only by the people themselves, but also by the nobles who protected them, and by the bishops of the district who rejected the extraordinary authority that the pope had conferred on his legates. At last (1209) the pope ordered the Cistercians to preach the crusade against the Albigensians. This implacable war, which threw the whole of the nobility of the north of France against that of the south, and destroyed the brilliant Provencal civilization, ended, politically, in the Treaty of Paris (1229), which destroyed the independence of the princes of the south, but did not extinguish the heresy, in spite of the wholesale massacres of the heretics during the war. The Inquisition, however, operated continuously in the south of Toulouse, Albi, and other towns during the whole of the 13th century and a great part of the 14th, and succeeded in crushing it by means of its confiscations, bitter persecutions, and terrible measures. In 1245, the royal officers assisting the Inquisition seized the heretical citadel of Montsegur, and 200 Cathari were burned in one day. Moreover, the church decreed severe chastisement against all laymen suspected of sympathy with the heretics. Hunted down by the Inquisition, and abandoned by the nobles of the district, the Albigensians became more and more scattered, hiding in the forests and mountains, and only meeting surreptitiously. The sect, moreover, was exhausted and could find no more adepts in a district that, by fair means or foul, had arrived at a state of peace and unity.

, causing serious dissensions among the Roman people and the clergy. Therefore the pope sent against these heretics many who were marked by the cross; and they were overcome. And so he reestablished this long extinguished order, endowed with many privileges and favors. For this order Pope Innocent the Fourth, then at Lyons, prescribed a rule to the effect that the spirituals of this order should always carry a cross in hand. Quiriacus [Quiriacus (or St. Judas) previously referred to as Ciriacus, or Cyriacus (see Folio CXXX verso, Helena), was, according to Eusebius, the 15th bishop of Jerusalem. He is said to have been a Jew who was the nephew of Stephen the first martyr, and grandson of Zacharias, and is credited with having revealed to Helena the place where the cross of Christ was hidden. He was converted by the miracles said to have been wrought on its discovery, and was baptized under the name of Quiriacus, or Cyriacus, and became bishop of Jerusalem. The story is too absurd to need refutation. There is no patriarch named Cyriacus, and Judas died in 133. Helena did not visit Jerusalem until 326], the bishop and martyr, is said to have been the founder and leader of this order in the time of Helen, mother of Constantine the Great; but the order declined since then and came to nothing.

Beginning of the Kingdom of the Tartars

David, a Persian, born of ignoble parents, king of the Tartars, and an arrogant man, at this time, with hostile intent, migrated from the mountains of India, with all the men and women of his tribe, plundering and robbing all the cities near by. By dividing the spoils among his people he encouraged them to proceed through Parthia, Media, Assyria, Persia, Armenia and Sarmatia in a short time; and they proceeded as far as the Palus Maeotis [Palus Maeotis (Sea of Azov), is an inland sea on the borders of Europe and Asia, north of the Black Sea, with which it communicates. It receives the waters of the great river Tanais (Don)], where they settled down. These Tartars are an ill-formed people, with large bulging eyes, broad face, flat forehead and nose, and of medium stature. They are so proud and haughty that they call their leader Cham [Cham no doubt refers to Genghis Khan, the Mongol emperor and warrior of many conquests. He conquered northern China, Tartary, and Persia, and his military operations are said to have caused the death of five million people. This Mongol emperor was born on the banks of the river Onon in the year 1162. Nurtured as the chief of a petty Mongolian tribe, he lived to see his armies victorious from the China Sea to the banks of the Dnieper; and, though the empire which he created dwindled in the hands of his descendents, leaving not a trace of it behind, we have in the presence of the Turks in Europe a consequence of his rule, since it was the advance of his armies which drove their Osmanli ancestors from their original home in northern Asia, and thus led to their invasion of Bithynia under Othman, and finally their advance into Europe under Amurath I], a son of God. Historians write many more things about their character [This sentence is replaced in the German edition of the with the following: 'Now Uso is their prince.'].]

Tatars (less correctly Tartars) is a name given to several million inhabitants of the Russian empire, chiefly Muslim and of Turkish origin. The majority – in European Russia – are remnants of the Mongol invasion in the 13th century, while those who inhabit Siberia are survivals of the once much more numerous Turkish population of the Ural-Altaic region, mixed to some extent with Finnish and Samoyedic stems, as also with Mongols. The name is derived from that of the Ta-ta Mongols, who in the fifth century inhabited the northeastern Gobi, and, after subjugation in the 9th century by the Khitans, migrated southward, there founding the Mongol empire. The present Tatar inhabitants of European Russia contain very little admixture of Mongolian ancestry, but belong to the Turkish branch of the Ural-Altaic stock. On the Volga they mingled with remnants of the old Bulgarian empire, elsewhere with Finnish peoples, and with remnants of the ancient Italian and Greek colonies in Crimea, and Caucasians in Caucasus. The name of Tatars, or Tartars, given to the invaders, was afterwards extended to the different stems of the same Turkish branch in Siberia, and even to the bulk of the inhabitants of the high plateau of Asia and its northwestern slopes, described under the name of Tartary. The Tatar inhabitants of the Russian empire formed three large groups – those of European Russia and Poland, those of Caucasus, and those of Siberia.

The early history of the Mongols is extremely obscure. Even the meaning of the name “Mongol” is in dispute, though a general consent is now given to the etymology of the word from ‘mong,’ meaning brave. In the absence of historical particulars, legend has been busy with their early years. The Mongol historian, Sanang Setsen, gives currency to the myth that the Mongols sprang from a blue wolf; while the soberest story on record is that their ancestor Budantsar was miraculously conceived of a Mongol widow.

The Order of The Carmelites was originated at this time by Albert, the patriarch of Jerusalem, at Mount Carmel in Syria; and he endowed it with many privileges. By virtue of his authority he prescribed a rule for the order. When this order spread out in the world, increasing daily in membership and in the number of its excellent cloisters, it suffered many attacks over a long period of time. However, when Pope Honorius, the third of this name, observed that this holy order had been unjustly subjected to these attacks for a long time, and had been persecuted, he made some change in the dress of the order, and gave the order the name of the Virgin of Mount Carmel. [The Carmelites chose for the protectress of their order the Virgin Mary; and Honorius III commanded that they should be styled “The Family of the Most Blessed Virgin.” Thus in all the convents of the Carmelites the Virgin holds a conspicuous place, being frequently exhibited with her mantle outspread, while her “Family” – the friars and nuns of the Order – are gathered beneath its protecting folds; and among them Albert as bishop, Angelus the martyr, etc]. It is said that while the members of this order were the original habit, the order was held in great veneration by the Sultan, and endowed with many alms; but after the habit was changed, he drove the order out of his kingdom, making it necessary for its members to go to Europe. There the order grew marvelously, giving birth to many distinguished and celebrated men of piety and ability, such as Angelus [Angelus, according to the apocryphal legend, came from the east, landed in Sicily about 1217, and preached at Palermo and Messina. He was assassinated by a certain Count Berengar, a powerful lord of that country, who for several years had lived openly in unhallowed union with his own sister. For this Angelus rebuked Berengar, who caused him to be hung upon a tree and shot with arrows. At least his martyrdom is so represented by Caracci], a very passionate declaimer, Albert of Sicily [Albert of Vercelli, bishop there and patriarch of the city of Jerusalem, is regarded by historians as the real founder of the Carmelite Order. He is usually depicted in his Episcopal robes, carrying the palm as martyr; for it is recorded in his Life that being summoned from Palestine by Innocent III to attend a council in the Lateran, as he was preparing to embark, he was assassinated at Acre by a wicked man whom he had reproofed for his crime], and Cyril (Cirillus), a very learned Greek man, who, on account of the many books he published, was famous for the gift of prophecy. And others very famous. [The historical origin of the Carmelites must be placed at the middle of the 12th century, when a crusader from Calabria, named Berthold, and ten companions established themselves as hermits near the cave of Elias on Mount Carmel. About 1210 the hermits on Carmel received from Albert, Latin patriarch of Jerusalem, a rule of 16 articles. The life prescribed was strictly eremitical: the monks were to live in separate cells or huts, devoted to prayer and work; they met only in the oratory for the liturgical services, and were to live a life of great silence, seclusion, abstinence and austerity. This rule received papal approbation in 1226. Soon, however, the loss of Christian arms in Palestine made Carmel an unsafe place of residence for western hermits, and so they migrated first to Cyprus and from there to Sicily, France, and England. The locality being changed, the institution was adapted to its new western surroundings. The austerities were mitigated, and the life was turned from eremitical into cenobitical, but on the mendicant rather than on the monastic model. The Carmelites became one of the four great orders of Mendicant Friars].

Saint Dominic, a Spaniard, endowed with piety and learning, a leader and famous father of the Preachers, at this time shone like a morning star of the Christian faith. He was born in the village of Calaroga in the diocese of Osna (Exoniensis). His father was named Felix, his mother Joanna. They had three sons, educated and consecrated as priests; the third was this blessed Dominic. In her sleep his mother dreamed she carried a little whelp, holding a lighted torch in its mouth; and as it issued from her body it lighted up the whole world, foretelling that an excellent and extraordinary preacher would be born of her. He was a marvelous reviler of vice, a fierce opponent of heresy, and a most diligent exhorter to the Christian faith; and from youth he developed compassion. At first he was a brother of the Regular Canons; but later, through divine call, he and his brethren, with incredible zeal, founded the Order of the Preachers, receiving the habit of the order from the most exalted Mother of God. He uprooted the heresy that sprang up in Gaul. After Pope Honorius learned that the enemies and dissenters in Toulouse had been tamed, this Dominic, father of the clergy, received confirmation of his Order from the pope. After such confirmation Dominic erected many cloisters; and having performed many miracles and passed through various regions, preaching and enlightening the people, in the twelve hundred and twenty-third Year of Salvation in the Italian city of Bologna on the Nones of August he finally journeyed to the Lord. By order of Gregory the Ninth he was enrolled among the number of the saints on account of his miracles and glorious life.

Dominic was born in 1170 at Calaroga, in the kingdom of Castile. His father was of the illustrious family of Guzman; his mother, Joanna d'Aza, was also of noble birth. Before he was born, his mother dreamed she had brought forth a black and white dog carrying a lighted torch in his mouth; and when his godmother held him in her arms at the font, she beheld a star of splendor descend from heaven and settle on his brow. These portents were interpreted to denote that the child was destined to be a light to the universe.

Dominic spent ten or twelve years in study at Palencia, and at about 1195 was ordained and became a canon in the cathedral chapter of Osna, his native diocese. The years from 1195 to 1203 were filled up with fabulous stories of missions to the Moors, and Dominic accompanied the bishop of Osna on an embassy to "The Marches," in behalf of the king of Castile. When the embassy was over, the bishop and Dominic journeyed to Rome, and Innocent III charged them to preach among the Albigensians in Languedoc. Although a significant number of converts were made, the results were not such as had been hoped for, and after Dominic's preaching the population still remained at heart Albigensian. The Order of Dominicans grew out of the little band of volunteers that had joined Dominic on this mission. Dominic conceived the idea of forming an order whose vocation should be to preach and send missions throughout the whole world. In 1214, the nucleus of such an institution was formed round Dominic, and known as the "Holy Preaching." In 1215, the Bishop of Toulouse, established them in a church and house of the city, and three years later pope Honorius authorized the founding of the order. The last years of Dominic's life were spent in journeying back and forth between Toulouse and Rome, and in extended journeys all over Italy, and to Paris, and into Spain, establishing friaries and organizing the order wherever he went. It propagated and spread with extraordinary rapidity. In 1221, worn out by incessant toil and fatigue and the austerities of his laborious life, he died at his monastery at Bologna. He was canonized in 1234 by Gregory IV. The Dominicans are known in England as the Black Friars, from the black mantle worn over a white habit. The Carmelites are known as the White Friars.

Francis (Franciscus), an Italian, native of Assisi, a very good man, was the founder of the Order of the Lesser Brothers. Around the Year of the Lord 1208 he was a merchant, and entirely a man of the world until his 25th year; but afterwards he scorned all earthly affairs, and followed Christ throughout life. Having gone on for some time shod and adorned with rings, he became conscious of the words of the Lord: He who comes to me, not having denied himself everything, cannot be my disciple. Francis discarded all things, donned humble white raiment, girded himself with a cord, and soon entered upon the founding of a new order. By means of this order he enlightened the Christian status like a sun shining upon the world. He was so strict and severe with himself that during the winter, in order to overcome the desires of the flesh, he covered himself with snow and ice. He scorned praise, called poverty his constant mistress, but diligently avoided carrying it to excess. His heart yearned for martyrdom, and so, in the sixth year after the founding of his order, he departed for Syria to visit the sultan, who received him with every honor. Two years before his death he had a vision of an angel with six wings, his hands extended, his feet placed together, and nailed to a cross. Two wings were extended over his head; two outstretched, as if to fly; while the remaining two covered his entire body. After having contemplated the vision for some time, scars appeared in the hands of Francis, and on his right side, as if pierced by a lance. After having wearied his body, and given his flesh no rest, he died at Assisi, his homeland, in the Year of Our Salvation 1222. Two years later, on account of the miracles attributed to him, Gregory the Ninth, in a great council, called for that purpose, enrolled him among the number of the saints.

Francis of Assisi (1181/82-1226), founder of the Franciscans, was born at Assisi, his father Pietro Bernardone, being one of the more successful merchants of that town. His education was slight and the habits of his youth appear to have been irregular. He was the recognized leader of the young men of the town in their revels, though he was always conspicuous for his charity to the poor. One day he gave a banquet to his friends, after which they roamed the streets, Francis being crowned as the king of the revelers; after some time they lost him, and on retracing their steps they found him in a trance, a permanently altered man. He devoted himself to solitude, prayer, and the service of the poor, and before long went on a pilgrimage to Rome. On his return, he spent three years in abject poverty, ministering to lepers and outcasts. One day the words of the gospel came to him as a call: "Everywhere on your road preach and say – The kingdom of God is at hand. Cure the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, drive out devils. Freely have you received, freely give. Carry neither gold nor silver, nor money in your girdles, nor bag, nor two coats, nor sandals, nor staff, for the workman is worthy of his hire" (Matthew 10:7-10). Layman as he was, he preached to the poor; disciples joined him, and when they were twelve in number, they obtained the sanction of Innocent III, and gave themselves up to apostolic preaching and work among the poor.

Probably no one as Francis has ever set himself so seriously to imitate the life of Christ and to carry out his work so literally. Another striking feature was his constant joyousness, a precept of his rule, and one that he enforced strictly. He was a great lover of nature, animate and inanimate, and his preaching to the birds is a favorite theme in art. He regarded them all as his brothers. Before everything he was an ascetic and a mystic – an ascetic who, though gentle to others, wore out his body by self-denial. He was a mystic who believed that he was irradiated with the love of God, and endowed in an extraordinary degree with the spirit of prayer.

Earthquakes and miraculous phenomena occurred everywhere in this year. The cities of Antioch, Tripoli, and Damascus were destroyed to a great extent. In Sicily the sea receded, and returning, drowned a thousand persons. In Italy hailstones larger than goose eggs fell.

A miraculous sign, in the form of a star, appeared after sunset and proceeded from south to west; and radiance was seen in the form of a beam, rising high into the firmament. Preachers at this time assert that many other signs occurred. [The last sentence of this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle].

1. Dominic, founder of the Dominican Order of Preaching Friars, is represented by a full-length woodcut, in white tunic and long black cloak with a hood. He carries a staff, although usually represented with a lily in one hand and a book in the other. A star is on his forehead, emblematical of a certain radiance on his brow observed by those who looked upon him earnestly. At his side is the dog with the flaming torch in his mouth, an attribute peculiar to Dominic, and which is explained in the text and note.
2. Francis, founder of the Franciscan Order, is portrayed at full length. He stands before us in the habit of his order, both hands raised in exhortation.
3. Elemental Disturbances are represented by a small woodcut showing a threatening sky from which flashes of lightning and heavy drops of rain are being precipitated.

Folio CCVIII verso

Year of the World 6413 | Year of Christ 1214

Pope Honorius the Third, a Roman whose father, Almeric, was a Roman citizen, was elected pope by the cardinals at Perugia. It was decided to have such election take place more speedily than in previous cases; for the citizens of Perugia, considering the distress and complaints of the Holy Land, which had been lost, and the war in Italy, locked up the assembly of the cardinals and decreased their food from day to day to hasten the election, so that consideration of peace and of matters concerning Christianity might be accelerated. After receiving the pontificate and being inducted into office, this pope undertook, through emissaries and legates, to carry out the transactions begun by his predecessors; and in these actions he was also urged by Peter, emperor of Constantinople, who, together with his spouse Yolande (Iolem), was not long afterwards invested with the imperial crown in the Basilica of Saint Lawrence outside the city of Rome. Soon afterwards the pope appointed the cardinal, John (Ioannem) of the Pillars, legate of the papal see, to manage the affairs of the Christians. This pope gave Frederick the Second the imperial title, but afterwards deposed him for misconduct in office. He received the king of Jerusalem, who had come to Rome, very kindly. He also enacted many ecclesiastical laws, and made costly additions to the churches. Finally he died in the tenth year, seventh month, and 13th day of his pontificate, and was buried in the Basilica of Santa Maria Maggiore at the manger.

Honorius III (Cencio Savelli), pope from 1216 to 1227, highly educated, and a pious Roman, after holding various church offices, succeeded Innocent III as pope. He made peace with the emperor Frederick II. He was eager to carry out the decrees of the Lateran Council of 1215 against the Albigensians, and to further the crusade proclaimed by his predecessor. He crowned Peter of Courtenay emperor of Byzantium, in April 1217; espoused the cause of Henry III of England against the barons; accepted the Isle of Man as a perpetual fief; and made special ecclesiastical regulations for the Scandinavian St. Dominick papal major-domo in 1218. In 1223, he approved the San Franciscan Order, and authorized many of the tertiary orders. He was succeeded by Gregory IX.

The manger is, purportedly, the remains of the actual manger in which Jesus slept after his birth. The architect Domenico Fontana was called to design the chapel to house the presumptive relics of the Nativity manger. The original Nativity Oratory, with the presepe ('manger' or 'crib') built in the 13th century by Arnolfo di Cambio, is below the chapel.

Pope Gregory the Ninth, a Hernicus by birth from the region of Anagni, was from a family of counts and the nephew of Innocent the Third. And he, when he was elected pope, reminded Frederick of his vow to undertake a crusade to the Holy Land, and threatened to confirm and enforce anew the ban of excommunication pronounced by his predecessors against Frederick, unless Frederick would appear at once. For that reason Frederick promised to undertake the matter, and a day was fixed for a meeting at Brindisi (Brundisii). To that place came a large number of people, and particularly from Germany, the landgrave of Hesse, who died there with a large number of his knights. In the meantime Frederick remained in Sicily, feigning illness. But when Frederick was informed of the landgrave's death, he sailed to Brindisi in great haste, and took possession of all the property and treasures left by the landgrave. When Pope Gregory became aware of the cunning of Frederick, he confirmed the former judgment of excommunication and deposition of his predecessors against Frederick. During the course of these events, and while the pope was away from Rome, the Roman senate took measures against the statutes of the Church, and to secede from it. Hannibal, one of the members of the Senate, was favorable to a heresy into which many priests had fallen. They feared the pope's return, and so caused a revolt. But divine vengeance soon silenced them; the Tiber became so swollen that it caused much damage; and this was followed by such a plague that hardly one person out of every ten survived. The pope privately and openly bestowed many alms; and he also made a great number of improvements, constructing buildings and taking other protective measures in Rome. After he had suffered much distress and worry through Frederick, he called a general council of the Christians on the advice of the kings of France and England. But Frederick barred access to it by land and sea, and the cardinals were imprisoned by the Pisan fleet. Thus the council was prevented. Finally this pope died in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred and forty-one in the fourteenth year and third month of his pontificate. [Gregory IX (Ugolino Conti de Segni), pope from 1227 to 1241, was a nobleman of Anagni, and probably a nephew of Innocent III. He studied at Paris and held a number of ecclesiastical offices before he became pope. In 1227, he excommunicated the emperor Frederick II, for continual neglect of his vows and refusal to undertake the crusade. When Frederick finally set out in the following June, without making submission to the pope, Gregory raised an insurrection against him in Germany, forcing him to beg absolution. The Romans, however, disapproved of the temporal power and exiled the pope in the following year. Hardly had this controversy been brought to an end, favorable to the papacy, when Gregory again came into conflict with Frederick (1235). He again excommunicated the emperor and released his subjects from allegiance (1239). Frederick invaded the Papal States and prevented the assembling of a general council convoked for Easter (1241). Gregory systematized the Inquisition and entrusted it to the Dominicans. He died in 1241 while Frederick II was advancing against him].

Celestine the Fourth, of Milan, formerly a Sabinian bishop, a man of virtue and learning, but old and feeble, was elected pope to succeed Gregory. He sent emissaries to Frederick who was besieging the city of Faenza, and attempted to mollify him with numerous promises; but before Frederick could reply, Celestine died on the eighteenth day of his pontificate. At that time the papal see was vacant for twenty-one months, for the cardinals were in prison, as previously stated, protesting and attesting that without them no papal election could take place. At this time all of Italy was so oppressed with turmoil by the aforesaid Frederick that his capture of Rome became a matter of daily concern. [Celestine IV (Godfrey Castiglione), pope in 1241, was archpriest and chancellor of Milan before he joined the Cistercians. In 1227, he was created cardinal priest, and cardinal bishop of Sabina in 1233. He succeeded Gregory IX in 1241, but died within 16 days (not the 18 as noted in the) and before his consecration].

Frederick, the second emperor of this name, in the Year of the Lord 1212 was chosen by the electors to succeed the aforesaid deposed Emperor Otto. He was confirmed and crowned as emperor by Pope Honorius, and reigned 33 years. This Frederick was born to Henry (Heinrico) the Sixth by his wife Constance, daughter of the king of Sicily, in a tent in the middle of a street in the city of Palermo. The queen was of an age at which no one believed she would ever bear; and, as many would scorn the fact, the women were given free access to her travail, and she bore publicly. Frederick was reared under the government of the Church and Pope Innocent. And afterwards he became so mighty as emperor of Italy, Sicily, Sardinia, Jerusalem, and Swabia, that no ruler of the Roman empire has ever equaled him in power. He was experienced in war, and informed in the Latin, German, Greek, French, and Saracen languages. He was strong, kind, and magnanimous; but not without vice. He was unchaste and concerned himself only with the present. He had quarrels and wars with many popes; but erected large buildings in all the cities of Apuleia and Sicily. He had two sons by his first wife—Henry and Conrad, whom he made his associates in the sovereignty. By his second wife, the daughter of the king of Jerusalem, he had a son, Jordan; and by his concubine he had Frederick, king of Antioch, Manfred, count of Tarentum (afterwards king of Sicily), and Rentzius, whom he made king of Sardinia. After receiving the crown as German king at Mainz, Frederick established his residence in Swabia, the land of his family. When he heard of Emperor Otto's defeats he brought back under his power the imperial city of Aix-la-Chapelle, which had been suffering a siege; and there, on the authority of Pope Innocent the Third he received the royal crown according to the usual custom. To show his gratitude to God, he permitted himself to be marked with the cross, and made a public vow to assist Christianity in Asia; and, moreover, not to appear ungrateful to the Roman Church, he gave it a good county in the kingdom of Sicily. And now, having been elected Roman emperor, he journeyed to Rome after the death of Otto, and there received the imperial crown from Pope Honorius. Although his mother Constance, up to his twenty-eighth year, reared him in paths of virtue and the observance of commendable things, after her death he abandoned his good morale; for he ignored his said vow, and indulged in gross conduct, particularly toward the church. By many kindly requests and exhortations he was urged to carry out his vow. But he refused; nor would he return to the churches the estates which had been wrested from them. For this reason he was excommunicated by the pope. And although Frederick later made a number of promises to carry out his obligation and the wishes of the pope, he was tardy and negligent in doing so. He sailed from Brindisi, but returned again at night. However, when Pope Gregory excommunicated him, Frederick sent his seneschal in advance against the sultan, and later himself arrived before the city of Ptolemais, at the same time leaving behind him emissaries to secure for him absolution from the pope. But as the pope would not grant this, Frederick returned to Italy; and there he subjected land and people to much distress and evil, assisting the antagonistic Ghibellines and Ghelfs against each other. Finally Pope Innocent condemned and deposed him, and relieved his subjects of their allegiance. Afterwards he was defeated in battle at Parma, and was finally suffocated or poisoned by his son Manfred.

Frederick II (1194-1250), Holy Roman emperor, king of Sicily and Jerusalem, was the son of Henry VI and Constance of Naples, daughter of Roger I, king of Sicily, and therefore the grandson of Frederick I. He was born in 1194, and in 1198, after his father's death, was crowned king of Sicily at Palermo. His mother who had assumed the government during his minority, died in November of the same year, leaving Innocent III as regent of Sicily and guardian of her son. In 1208, he was declared of age and in 1209 he married Constance, daughter of Alphonso of Aragon, and widow of the king of Bohemia. In 1211, a number of influential German princes met at Nuremberg, deposed Otto IV, and invited Frederick to the throne. He accepted; and having recognized papal supremacy over Sicily, and procured the coronation of his son as king, he reached Germany in 1212, and was chosen king of Germany a second time, and crowned at Mainz. He renounced all lands claimed by the pope since his father's death, gave up the right to interfere in Episcopal elections, and acknowledged the right of appeal to Rome. He again affirmed papal supremacy in Italy, and promised to uproot heresy in Germany. His son, Henry, was brought to Germany and chosen German king at Frankfurt in 1220, although Henry assured the new pope, Honorius III, that this step, which would involve the future union of Sicily and Germany had been taken without his consent. In 1220, Frederick was crowned emperor of Rome, renewing his promise to go on a crusade. The clergy were freed from taxation and lay jurisdiction. The ban of the empire was to follow the ban of the church, and heretics were to be severely punished.

But Frederick was occupied until 1225 in restoring order in Sicily; and in that year he married his second wife, Yolande (or Isabella), daughter of John, count of Brienne, titular king of Jerusalem. In 1227, preparations were made for the crusade, and on September 8th, Frederick sailed from Brindisi for the East. However, a pestilence which attacked his forces compelled him to return to Italy three days later, and on the 29th of the same month he was excommunicated by the new pope, Gregory IX. Observing an increase in Frederick's strength, Gregory denounced him in a public letter, to which the emperor replied in a clever document addressed to the princes of Europe, calling attention to the absolute power of the popes. This, even at Rome, was received with so much approval that Gregory was compelled to flee to Viterbo. Frederick again set sail to Palestine, and secured possession of Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Nazareth, and the surrounding country. He entered Jerusalem in 1229, and crowned himself king. These successes he won in spite of Gregory's hostility. While Frederick was away on this crusade, Gregory attempted to undermine him in Germany and Sicily, but failed; and when Frederick returned unexpectedly, he had no difficulty in driving back his enemies and in compelling the pope to sue for peace. By a treaty, the ban was removed, while Frederick promised to respect papal territory, and to allow freedom of election to the Sicilian clergy. In 1231, Royal officials were appointed in Sicily, the church placed under royal jurisdiction, and all gifts to the church were prohibited.

After quelling all disturbances and a revolt on the part of his son Henry, a splendid diet was held at Mainz in 1235, and a general peace (Landfrieden), which became the basis of all such peaces in the future, was sworn to. He conquered Austria, Styria, and Carinthia, and, in 1237, secured the election of his son, Conrad, as German king at Vienna. A controversy with the Lombards resulted in an alliance for which Frederick was excommunicated by the pope in 1239. In Italy, Spoleto and Ancona were declared part of the imperial dominions, and Rome itself was threatened. Ecclesiastics bound for a council called by Gregory were captured in a sea-fight at Meloria, and the emperor was about to besiege Rome when Gregory died (1241). His successor, Celestine IV died soon after election; and after a delay of 18 months, during which Frederick twice marched against Rome and ravaged the lands of his opponents, one of his partisans, Sinibaldo Fiesco, was chosen pope as Innocent IV. Difficulties with Lombard cities failing of adjustment, the emperor again ravaged papal territory. Innocent fled to Lyons, where he summoned a general council in 1245, in which sentence of excommunication and deposition were pronounced against the emperor, and the Germans ordered to elect a new king. This was done, but neither the new king nor his successor succeeded in driving the Hohenstaufen from Germany. However, news suddenly reached Frederick that his troops besieging Parma had been surprised by the Ghiblins during his absence on a hunting expedition. The men of Parma had made a sortie and stormed the imperial camp set up before Parma. The emperor's forces were destroyed or scattered; the treasury and some of the most trusted ministers fell into the hands of the victors. Thaddeus of Suessa, the emperor's justiciar was hacked to pieces by the mob.

In 1248, Enzo, the emperor's natural son, was captured by the Bolognese. The emperor's spirit was completely broken. He retired to southern Italy, and, after a short illness, died in 1250.

The character of Frederick is one of unusual interest. Though licentious and luxurious in his manners, he was cultured and catholic in taste. His Sicilian court was a center of intellectual activity, open to every nationality and creed. He himself knew six languages, and was acquainted with mathematics, philosophy, and natural history, also taking an interest in medicine and architecture. He founded the university of Naples, and was a liberal patron of the medical school at Salerno. He formed a menagerie of strange animals, and wrote a treatise on falconry, remarkable for its accurate observations of the habits of birds. It was in his court too that, as Dante points out, Italian poetry had its birth. His rule in Germany and Italy was a failure, due to inevitable conflicts with the papacy. His chief claim to fame is as a lawgiver. The code of laws he gave Sicily has been described as "the fullest and most adequate body of legislation promulgated by any western ruler since Charlemagne."

A total eclipse of the sun occurred at about the ninth hour of June 6th in the year 1238, making it as dark as night. As it is said, this portended the death of Gregory the Ninth and the suppression of the churches by Frederick.

A great earthquake and hailstorm occurred in the Salvii Mountains [The location of these mountains is unknown to the editor], and about five thousand people perished. In the same year Frisia [Frisia (also Friesland) here refers to a coastal North Sea region extending from the Netherlands to Denmark]. was entirely inundated by the sea; and about one hundred thousand persons perished.

The Order of The Preaching Friars was brought to life at this time in a divine manner, like a new constellation, by the Blessed Dominic, and founded on the rule of Saint Augustine. When he (i.e. Dominic), together with Fulk, the bishop of Toulouse, went to the Lateran Council and came to Pope Innocent, desiring confirmation of this Order, they found him difficult to convince on account of the novelty of the matter. During the night, however, the pope, in his sleep, saw the Lateran Church about to loosen its structure, and to fall; but Dominick, the man of God, stood under it, bracing and holding it with his shoulders. By reason of this vision the pope accepted their plea, and directed them to choose a rule. And so Dominick returned to his 16 brethren, and at Toulouse established the rule of the Preaching Friars, which was afterward accepted and confirmed by Pope Honorius. This Order, among all others, has always been the most powerful and vehement in the dispersion, expulsion, and eradication of heresy. And so they might not suffer hindrance in the office of preaching, they discarded all estates, annual interest and rents; and such was the conclusion of the general chapter later held at Bologna. This Order was afterwards marvelously enhanced in learning and order by Raymond, the successor of Dominic, and by others who gave their lives. The most distinguished of these are Peter Martyr of Verona, Thomas of Aquinas, and Vincent, all enlisted among the saints; also Peter of Tarantasia, called Innocent the Fifth, and Pope Benedict the Eleventh; Hugo the Cardinal; Albertus Magnus; Peter Paludanis, Jacobus de Varagine, Antonio, bishop of Florence, the holy confessors, and many others.

The Dominicans, otherwise called Preaching Friars, and in England Black Friars, from the black mantle worn over a white habit, is a religious order founded by Dominic as explained in the text and note at Folio CCVIII recto. Their first house was in Toulouse, where, in 1215, the bishop established them in the church of St. Romain. Dominic secured from Pope Innocent III permission to found an order of preachers whose sphere of activity should be the whole world; but the pope insisted they must adopt one of the existing rules. Dominic, having been an Augustinian canon, caused the rule of that order to be adopted. In 1218, an encyclical bull was issued to the bishops of the whole Catholic world recommending to them the "Order of the Preaching Friars," followed by another in 1221 ordering them to give these friars facilities to preach and to hear confessions in their dioceses. By this time the friars had penetrated into parts of Italy, France, Spain, Poland, and Bohemia.

The Order took definite shape at the two general chapters held at Bologna in 1220-21. The manner of life was very austere. At the founder's suggestion the general chapter determined that the poverty practiced in the Order should not be merely individual, as in the case of the monastic orders, but corporate, as among the Franciscans; so that the Order should have no possessions, except the monastic buildings and churches, no property, no fixed income, but should live on charity and begging—a mendicant order. Dominic died in 1221, but the order progressed in the hands of able successors, penetrating into Denmark, Sweden, Russia, Prussia and Poland; and soon they made their way to Greece and Palestine, and from there to central Asia. From the 14th century to the middle of the 17th they had missions in Persia, India, and China, and northern Africa. They followed the Spanish explorers and conquerors to the East and West, and many suffered martyrdom. They also became a power in the universities, occupying chairs in Paris, Bologna, Palencia, Oxford, Padua, Cologne, Vienna, Prague, and Salamanca. Albert the Great and Thomas Aquinas were the leaders in the medieval theological development, which to this day has maintained the principles and methods of Thomas.

The Dominican name is specially associated with the Inquisition, the office of Inquisitor in all the countries being held by the Dominicans. In 1425, Martin V allowed the order to hold property; and to have fixed sources of income, and the order soon ceased to be mendicant.

The first nunnery was established by Dominic in 1206 at Prouille in the diocese of Toulouse, as a refuge for women converted from the Albigensian heresy, and the converts soon spread. The rule resembled that of the friars, except that the nuns were to be strictly enclosed and purely contemplative; but in course of time they undertook educational work.

The Order of the Lesser Brethren was at this time confirmed by Pope Honorius, though with difficulty; for the ancient enemy recognized the future influences of this order in the churches of God, and therefore labored to bring it to naught. This Order was planted like a garden of pleasure and poverty by Saint Francis with great labor. He himself first entered it, seeking refuge from the turmoil of the world in service and adherence to God, and so that he might supply his brethren with the spiritual waters of learning and grace. When he saw the Order increase through the cooperation of the Holy Spirit, he made a rule that he himself observed with a zealous heart; and he admonished his brethren to do likewise. This is the rule: To observe the Gospels of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to live in poverty and chastity unto death. From this garden sprang many pious and highly educated men, namely: Louis (Ludovicus), a bishop; Anthony of Olisipo (Ulixbonensis); Bonaventura, a cardinal; and Bernardino of Siena; all numbered among the saints; also Nicholas, the fourth of this name, Alexander the Fifth, and Sixtus the Fourth, very great popes; also Alexander of Ales, Richard of Media Villa, and countless other celebrated teachers.

The Franciscans, Dominicans, and Carmelites are the three great Mendicant Orders, and arose simultaneously in the beginning of the 13th century. The career of Francis was the subject of text and note at Folio CCVII recto. The Franciscans and Dominicans were spiritual democrats, mingling with the people, yet not of the people. They took cognizance of the public and private affairs, domestic concerns and affections, cares and pleasures, from which their vows personally cut them off. Neither order in the beginning possessed anything of its own; nor did its members. Their vocation was to look after the stray sheep and to preach, exhort, and comfort. They were not called 'Padri,' fathers, but 'Frati, Suori,' brothers and sisters of all men. The Dominicans took the title Frati Predicatori ('Preaching Brothers'), while Francis, in his humility, styled his commentary Frati Minori ('the Minorites' or 'Lesser Brothers'). In England they were distinguished as Black-Friars and Grey-Friars.

One important innovation in religious communities was common to Franciscans and Dominicans – the admission of a third class of members (besides the professed friars and nuns) called the Tertiary Order, or Third Order of Penitents. It included both sexes and all ranks of life. The members were not bound by vows, nor required to quit their secular occupations, though they entered into an obligation to renounce secular pleasures and vanities, be just in all their dealings, and charitable to the extent of their means.

After some time the habit of the Franciscans changed from gray to dark brown. It consisted of a plain tunic with long loose sleeves. The tunic is fastened around the waist by a knotted cord, symbolic of the bridle of a subdued beast, for such Francis considered the body in subjection to the spirit. A cape, rather scanty in form, hangs over the shoulders, and to the back of the cape is attached a hood, drawn over the head in bad weather. The Dominicans are always shod; the Franciscans are generally barefoot or wear sandals—usually of wood.

The Franciscans aspired to a greater degree of sanctity and humility than the Dominicans—a more absolute self-abnegation. They were most loved by the people. Francis, as the Padre Serafico, patriarch and founder, holds the highest place in the order. Clara, as the Madre Serafica, first Franciscan nun, as the founder of the Poor Clares. Bonaventura, il Dottore Serafico, was the greatest prelate of the order. Anthony of Padua is generally figured as a pendant to Francis. Bernardino of Siena was the greatest preacher and reformer of the order.

In the Year of Salvation twelve hundred twenty-one the Tartars overran and ravaged Georgia and Armenia Major, bringing them under their dominion. Later they crossed the Rhaetian Mountains and entered Poland and Hungary, damaging, destroying and wasting these Christian regions by devastation, burning and slaying. [The history of the Tartar Empire was begun at Folio CCVII verso, and a note will be found there.]

The city of Jerusalem was now, for the fifth time, leveled to the ground by Cordirius, son of the great Saladin, while the Christians were besieging the city of Damietta [See Damietta, Folio CCX verso]; but the temple of the Lord remained unharmed. But when he decided to attack the Holy Sepulchre the Christians pleaded with him and softened his heart, so that he desisted from carrying out his evil decision.

Folio CCX recto

Clara, admirable, and holy virgin of the city of Assisi, born of noble family (for her father was a knight) and instructed in the ways of divine virtue through the discipline and example of Saint Francis, was held in high esteem at this time in the city of Assisi for her virtue, piety and grace. She started a congregation and order of poor women at Saint Damian's Church; and there she was illustrious for 42 years through remarkable castigations of the flesh, and in the practice of virtue. She also performed various miracles by the sign of the cross. But when the Church was oppressed by Emperor Frederick, and the enemy took Assisi, and the Saracens attacked the convent of Saint Damien, although ill, she caused herself to be carried before the enemy, a silver box containing the Holy Sacrament preceding her. And in tears she said her prayers to God, asking: My Lord, is it your wish that your unarmed servants shall be given up to the infidels? Dear Lord, protect your servants. And soon she heard a voice saying, I will always protect you. Shortly afterwards the enemy, who had already surmounted the walls, gave up the hostile undertaking. Pope Innocent the Fourth, together with his cardinals, visited Clara while she was dying; and he absolved her of all sin. She was so strengthened by God that for thirteen days she lived without food, and then died in blessedness. Her sister Agnes soon followed her. And as the Lord performed many miracles in Clara's honor, she was enrolled among the number of the saints in the year 1255.

Saint Clara of Assisi, daughter of a noble knight, was the eldest of his children. Her beauty and parental wealth exposed her to many temptations and offers of marriage; but she longed to follow the example of those who sought the crown of salvation by mortification and prayer. While still young she secretly devoted herself to a religious life, and went to Francis for counsel. He advised her to renounce the world, and she became his disciple. On his advice, she took refuge in the convent at San Paola, where her father and kinsman pursued her, but failed to induce her return. Her sister Agnes followed her example, and soon their mother joined them. Other ladies of rank did likewise, and from this point dates the commencement of the Order of the Poor Clares. Their habit was gray, girded with knotted cord, and they went barefoot or sandaled. Abstinence and silence were maintained, and poverty insisted upon. They existed on charity. The extreme austerity of her life wasted Clara's health.

At this time, Emperor Frederick ravaged the shores of the Adriatic and had in his army a band of Saracens who plundered Spoleto. One day they advanced to the gates of Asissi and attacked the convent of Damiano. Though bedridden, Clara arose, took the silver container holding the sacrament from the altar, placed it on the threshold and began to sing, "You have rebuked the heathen, you have destroyed the wicked, you have put out their name forever and ever!" The story goes that at that point the barbarians were said to have thrown down their arms and fled.

Pope Innocent IV visited Clara in person and confirmed the rule of the Order. She died at 60, in a kind of trance or rapturous vision. She was canonized in 1256.

Anthony (Antonius), a Spaniard, native of the city of Olisipic (Vlixibona) [Vlixibona, or Olixibona, correctly Olisipic (now Lisbon), a town in Lusitania, near the mouth of the river Tagus, was a Roman municipium with the surname Felicitas Julia. Its name is sometimes written Ulyssipo, because it was supposed to have been founded by Ulysses], Barefoot Brother, and a man of piety and virtue, first baptized as Ferdinand, was originally a Regular Canon. But when he learned that several Barefoot Brothers had suffered death for the sake of Christ he joined that order on their account, and honored the body of Christ in a wonderful manner. He lived and preached in Padua for a long time and is therefore called as of that place. At the pope's request he preached many pilgrimages at Rome, and his tongue became so fluent that the Greeks, French, Germans, Latins, English, and all others who heard him clearly understood him; for he was so highly educated that he was called an ark of the Holy Scriptures. He died at this time in Padua, celebrated for his countless miracles, and soon after Pope Gregory the Ninth enrolled him in the number of the holy confessors in the year 1232. After his remains had been interred for some time, and he was being translated to another city, his tongue was found to be still fresh and red as though he had just died. Of the same tongue the saintly Bonaventura said, O blessed tongue, which always blessed God! Now it appears what great merit you have. Afterwards, in the Year of the Lord 1263, those of Padua erected a beautiful large church to his honor.

Anthony of Padua, Portuguese by birth, took the habit of Francis, and devoted himself to the life of a missionary with the fixed determination to obtain the crown of martyrdom in the cause of Christ. He arrived at Assisi when Francis was holding the first general chapter of his order. Feeling the lack of a man of science and learning in his community, Francis encouraged him to devote himself to his studies. He taught divinity with distinction in the universities of Bologna, Toulouse, Paris and Padua, but gave up this career to preach among the people. He preached peace.

Anthony generally preached in the open air, for his audiences were too great for any church to hold. Like Francis, he was a man of poetic imagination, tender of heart, and a lover of nature. After an active ministry of ten years he died, worn out by fatigue and austerities, in his thirty-sixth year. The following year he was canonized by Gregory IX and the citizens of Padua ordered that a church be erected to him at public expense. The magnificent edifice was begun in 1237, but was not completed until two centuries later. It is said that in all Italy there is not a church richer in ancient and modern monuments of art than this one.

The Order of The German Brothers originated at this time in Prussia, which was occupied by the Prussians (Pruteni) [The early Prussians, here called the "Pruteni," were known as the Borussi, that is, inhabitants along the river Memel, which Ptolemy calls the Rutta. They were of Lithuanian origin, and during the 10th and 11th centuries successfully opposed the introduction of Christianity], a barbarous pagan people until the time of Frederick, the second emperor of this name. When the Christians during the reign of said Frederick lost the city of Ptolemais in Syria, the German Brothers of Saint Mary were driven from there and returned to Germany. They were noblemen, learned and experienced in knightly affairs. In order that they might not fall into dissipation through idleness, they called Frederick's attention to the fact that Prussia, the country adjoining Germany, was not of the Christian faith, and that the pagans there often attacked and injured the Saxons and other Christian peoples in the vicinity; and so they suggested that the German Brothers stood ready to tame these coarse pagans, if the emperor would allow them to retain such lands in Prussia as they might conquer by the sword. To this the emperor and Conrad, duke of Masovia, who called himself ruler of the same country, assented; and accordingly the emperor gave them a letter under the golden seal. The German Brothers soon brought the entire land of Prussia into their dominion by the sword. This region is rich in grain, fish, game, cattle, water, pastures and meadows. It has many inhabitants, renowned cities, and fortifications. Since then the German tongue and Christian faith have been in the ascendant there; and later many episcopal churches were erected there. Here also is a large noble castle, called Marienburg, where the grand master holds his court and has his residence. As the Germans originally founded this order, no one was admitted to it, unless he were a German of noble parentage. The members wore a white habit, inscribed with a black cross to indicate their readiness to fight the enemies of the cross. They all wore beards, except the priests, and in place of (observing) the canonical hours, they make use of the Lord's Prayer; but they did not study the Scriptures. They were very rich, quite equal to kings in power, and they often fought with the Poles.

The Teutonic Order, or Teutonic Knights of St. Mary's Hospital at Jerusalem (Der Deutsche Order, Deutsche Ritter) was one of three great military and religious orders that sprang from the Crusades. It traces its birth to the third Crusade. The order had its beginnings amidst the privations and plagues that attended the siege of Acre (called by its ancient Hellenistic name Ptolemais in the Chronicle). In the winter of 1190-91 certain pious merchants from Bremen and Lübeck laid the foundations of a hospital in a vessel which had been drawn ashore. Within a few years, the foundation apparently became attached to the German Church of St. Mary the Virgin of Jerusalem, and in March 1198 (there being present in the Holy Land a number of Germans, the relics of the projected crusade of Henry VI), the great men of the army and the kingdom raised the brethren of the German Hospital of St. Mary to the rank of an order of knights. The original members were thus ennobled, and from that time on it was the rule that only Germans of noble birth could join the Order.

The Teutonic Order began with charity, developed into a military club and ended as something of a chartered company, exercising rights of sovereignty on the troubled confines of Christendom. Even in its last phase, the Order did not forget its original purpose; it maintained several great hospitals in its new home on the southwest shore of the Baltic, in addition to an hotel des invalids at Marienburg for its sick and aged brethren. But long before that period, the Order had begun to find that its true work lay on the eastern frontiers of Germany. In 1228 Christian, bishop of Prussia, who had received from the Polish duke of Masovia a part of Kulmerland as a fief, had founded the knightly Order of Dobrzin, and was attempting to subdue the non-Christian peoples of Prussia. Unsuccessful in the attempt, he invited the Teutonic Order to come to the rescue, and on the Order he bestowed Kulm and some of the frontier towns of his territory, with such lands as it should conquer.

Thus the Order took its place as the founder of one of the marks on the eastern frontier of Germany, and began to play its part in the Drang nach Osten, which is perhaps the vitally important thing in the history of Germany from the 12th to the 14th century. In 1229, the Order began the conquest of Prussia, founding fortresses at each step to rivet its conquest (for instance, at Thorn, named after Toron in Palestine); and, in 1234, the Order established its independence of all authority except the Papacy by surrendering its territories to the Holy See and receiving them back again as a fief. The pope gave to those who joined in the work of the Order the privilege of Crusaders; and the knights, supported by numerous donations and large accessions to their ranks, rapidly increased their territories. But, in consequence, the Order lost its connection to the East, and after the fall of Acre in 1291, the grand master (whose seat had been at Acre, while the German master (Deutschmeister), had controlled the Order in Germany) moved first to Venice, and then, in 1308, to Marienburg on the Vistula.

With the accession of large territories, the Order became a governing aristocracy; the original care of the sick, and even the later crusading zeal of the period of conquest gave way to the problem of governing a frontier state. A whole system of administration arose. At Marienburg, the grandmaster maintained a magnificent court.

The concord of the Order at this time with the towns and the Hansa was one of the causes of its prosperity until the close of the fourteenth century, and the Order was able to weather the storm that destroyed the Templars at the beginning of the 14th century. For a time the Order lay under papal sentence of excommunication; but the transfer of his seat to Marienburg in 1308 gave the grand master a basis from which he was able to make easy terms with the pope. Nor was the Order, during the 14th century, unfaithful to its calling. It was the school of northern chivalry, engaged in unceasing struggle to defend Christianity against the non-Christian Lithuanians.

But at the height of its glory irretrievable ruin descended upon the Order. It suffered a crushing defeat at the hands of the Polish king Ladislaus at Tannenberg in 1410; and although this brought Ladislaus little immediate gain, it stimulated the elements of unrest in Prussia to new activity. The discontented clergy in Livonia; the towns, such as Danzig; the native aristocracy, organized in a league (the Eidechsenbund, or 'League of the Lizard'), all sought to use this opportunity. It was in vain that the heroic grandmaster, Henry of Plauen (1410-1413) sought to stem the tide of disaster; he was deposed by the chapter of the Order for his pains. The success of the Hussite raids in Germany gave fresh confidence to the Slavs of Poland. The Order was at variance within itself; some of the houses of the brethren refused to obey the marshall, and the grandmaster quarreled with the German master. Above all there arose in 1440 the Prussian League in which the nobles and towns joined together, nominally for protection of their rights, but really against the Order. The League naturally sympathized with Poland, not only because under Poland it hoped to enjoy the practical liberty which Polish anarchy already seemed to offer. The final result was that in 1454 an embassy of the League offered Prussia to the Polish king, and that, after many years of war, the peace of Thorn, Danzig, and other towns; and, while leaving East Prussia to the Order, made the Order the vassal of Poland for the territory which it retained. Henceforth the grandmaster was to sit in the Polish diet on the left of the king, and half of the knights were to be Polish.

From this point on the Teutonic Order lived in Germany and in Livonia. The master of the latter province had beaten off an attack of the Russians in 1502, and secured a 50 years' peace. The Order was now confined to Germany alone. In 1809, the Order was entirely suppressed by Napoleon I, and its lands went to the secular principalities in which they lay. But in 1840 the Order was resuscitated in Austria as a semi-religious knighthood, closely connected with the Hapsburgs. But its real heirs were the Hohenzollerns of Prussia. When Frederick the Great gained West Prussia by the first partition of Poland (1772), he was uniting together once more the dominions of the Order, sundered for 300 years.

Of Damietta and Its Siege

The Christian princes, who sometime before, through the diligence of Innocent the Third and the Lateran Council had been influenced to rescue the city of Jerusalem, collected an army and, some by land and some by water, proceeded to Constantinople; and from there, under the leadership of the papal legate, to the city of Acre (Acconem). [Acre, here called Acco, and also called Ptolemais in the . See Folio CXC verso, and note on Ptolemais]. In this host were Andrew (Andreas), king of Hungary; the duke of Austria; Count Henry (Heinricus) of Nivernais, and Walter (Gualterius), the chamberlain of the king of France. Together with King John (Ioannes) of Jerusalem they decided to attack the city of Damietta, lying on the river Nile, in Egypt, with the expectation that having taken this city, they could more readily conquer Cairo and Babylon, the great cities, which touched each other [Babylon (in Egypt) is now incorporated into the city of Cairo].; and having subjugated these cities, where the Saracen sultans resided, they hoped to eradicate all the barbarian Saracen people not only from Jerusalem and the Holy Land, but from the confines of the earth. Accordingly the city of Damietta was besieged in the month of May in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred eighteen. This same city is surrounded by three very thick tile walls, and a branch of the Nile, as wide as the Tiber at Rome, flows about it. It is situated three days' journey to the east of the New Babylon, and seven days' journey from Mount Sinai. This city of Damietta lies between the sea and the Nile, and has 28 tall towers and countless small ones. Among others was a tower called Pharea, the like of which in thickness and height has never been found, and out of which the suburban city of Crema and the outer public buildings could be watched and guarded against pirates and night prowlers. When our army was moving upon the city, the Sultan caused the city to be protected with defenses and bulwarks, and this tower to be protected and fortified round about. While our people were storming the defenses and bulwarks, and were destroying the tower round about, many people were injured daily, but more of the infidels than of our own. After our people had besieged the city for five months, some of our men went forth to spy out the sentinels of the enemy. And when they found them either asleep, or were not challenged by them, our men mounted the walls to destroy the gates, and they stabbed the Saracens who came running up when they heard the commotion. In the meantime the Christians crowded through the open gates. Thus they captured the city, and all the fortifications and gates were surrendered to the Christians. And the first and foremost temple of the city was converted into a church in honor of the glorious Virgin, the Mother of God, and consecrated as a bishopric. At that time Damietta was a widely celebrated and mighty city, in which an abundance of gold, silver and costly household furnishings were found; all of which the papal legate, the king, and the generals distributed among the Christian knights; and so also action was taken concerning the distribution of the possessions and estates in the city and in the country.

Damietta is a town of Lower Egypt on the eastern branch of the Nile, a few miles above its mouth, and 125 miles northeast of Cairo by rail.

Damietta is a Byzantine corruption of the Coptic name, Tamiata, Arabic Dumyat. The original town was four miles nearer the sea than the modern city. Under the Saracens it had great wealth and commerce, and, as the eastern bulwark of Egypt, was frequently attacked by the crusaders. In 1249, Louis IX of France occupied Damietta without opposition, but being defeated in the following year at Mansura, and compelled to surrender himself prisoner. Damietta was restored to the Muslims as part of the ransom exacted. To prevent further attacks from the sea of Mameluke, sultan Bibars around the year 1260 blocked up the Phatnitic mouth of the Nile, razed old Damietta to the ground, and transferred the inhabitants to the site of the modern town.

In the meantime the affairs of the Christians improved from day to day; and the papal legate, Andrew (Andreas), king of Hungary, and other knights and nobles hoped soon to crush the sultan and his Saracens. By common counsel they decided to proceed to the cities of Cairo and Babylon, into which the sultan, taking with him all removable possessions, ornaments and treasures of the Saracens, had fled. Now the sultan employed such cunning that he caused to be filled up all the channels by which the water of the Nile was conducted into the country, and ordered all fodder to be removed, so that not enough remained to sustain man and beast for three days. In consequence the Christians suffered such great concern that they feared that upon their return to Damietta they would come to grief because of the damming up of the channels. Therefore they sent emissaries to the Sultan; and of him they secured peace upon condition that they surrender the city of Damietta, together with all the possessions in it; and the Sultan agreed to return to them the piece of the cross which was in his possession, and to exchange prisoners. This occurred in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred twenty-one. [The story here told is that of the Fifth Crusade, the last one started in that pontificate of crusades – the pontificate of Innocent. It owed its origin to his feverish zeal for the recovery of Jerusalem, rather than any pressing need in the Holy Land; for here peace had reigned almost unbroken during the forty years following the loss of Jerusalem, and the brother and successor of Saladin had granted the Christians a series of truces (1198-1203, 1204-1210, and 1211-1217). But Innocent could never consent to forget Jerusalem in spite of the tragedies and failures of the past. In the fourth Lateran Council of 1215 he found the opportunity to rekindle the flickering fires. Before this gathering of all Christian Europe he proclaimed a crusade for the year 1217, and it was resolved that a truce of God should reign for the next four years, and for the same period all trade with the Levant should cease. There was to be peace in Europe and a commercial war with Egypt. In Germany, where Frederick II took the cross in this same year, a large body of crusaders gathered together; in 1217, the southeast sent the duke of Austria and the king of Hungary to the Holy Land; while in 1218, an army from the northwest joined at Acre the forces of the previous year. It was resolved to begin the crusade by the siege of Damietta. The original leader of the crusade was John of Brienne, king of Jerusalem, who had succeeded Amalric II; but after the end of 1218, the cardinal legate Pelagius claimed the command. The crusaders captured Damietta, but nothing was done to clinch the advantage. The entire year 1220 was spent by the crusaders in Damietta, partly in consolidating their immediate position, and partly in waiting for the arrival of Frederick II. In 1221, Hermann of Salza, master of the Teutonic Order, along with the duke of Bavaria, appeared in camp before Damietta. Without waiting any longer for Frederick, the cardinal, against the advice of King John, gave the signal for the march on Cairo. The sultan reiterated his former terms of peace – cession of most of the kingdom of Jerusalem, surrender of the cross that had been captured by Saladin in 1187, and the restoration of all prisoners. King John urged acceptance; but the legate insisted on a large indemnity in addition and the sultan prepared for war. The crusaders were driven back toward Damietta, and Pelagius had to make a treaty by which he gained a free retreat and the surrender of the Holy Cross at the price of the restoration of Damietta. The treaty was to last for eight years].

Elizabeth, daughter of a Hungarian king, and lawful spouse of the landgrave of Hesse, was illustrious in Germany in the Year of the Lord 1230. From youth she was devoted to divine service, and all her deeds were conformable to the will of God. She was an extirpator of vice, an image of patience, and a mirror of innocence. She suffered much persecution and scorn at the hands of her husband and her kin; but the Lord was her secret comforter. Her husband, the landgrave, left her free to practice good works and to serve God; and she devoted herself to those things with all her might until the time of her death. She banished all merriment from her lips, cared for the poor, bathing them and washing their bedding and clothing, and erecting a hospital for them. And now, having set up a treasury of good deeds by her virtuous practices, she veered from communion with her earthly spouse to a communion with Christ, laying aside her worldly attire, and receiving from master Conrad of Marburg a coarse habit; and she scorned the pomp and renown of riches, and disdained the world. On the 14th day of the Kalends of December she journeyed to the Lord. Among other countless miracles which God performed through her are the raising of 16 dead, and the restoration of sight to one born blind. She was enrolled among the saints by Gregory the Ninth, who ordered that her feast day be celebrated on the 13th day of the Kalends of December. [Elizabeth of Hungary (1207-31), daughter of Andrew II, king of Hungary, at the age of 14 married Louis IV, landgrave of Thuringia, and devoted herself to religion and to works of charity. According to legend, Louis at first forbade her unbound gifts to the poor. One day he saw his wife descending from the Warburg with a heavy bundle of bread; but when he sternly asked her to open it, he saw nothing but a mass of roses. The miracle converted him. On the death of Louis "the Saint" in 1227, Elizabeth was deprived of the regency by his brother, Henry Raspe IV, on the pretext that she was wasting the estates by her alms. With her three infants she was driven from her home, but ultimately her maternal uncle, Egbert, bishop of Bamberg, offered her a house, adjoining his palace. Through the intercession of some of the principal barons, the regency was again offered her, but renouncing all power, she chose to live in seclusion at Marburg, doing penance and ministering to the sick. She died there in 1231, and was canonized by Gregory IX in 1235].

The five books of the canon law, so called in analogy to the five senses, and known as the Decretals, were compiled at this time by Pope Gregory the Ninth through Raymond, and arranged in five parts. In them are comprehended various statutes and ordinances touching upon the Holy Trinity, the Christian faith, the courts, the clergy, marriage, and penalties pertaining thereto, etc. [For Raymond, see the following text and note].

Raymond, of the Preaching Order, and its third general teacher after Jordanis, its second teacher, was a man at this time holy and conspicuous for his learning and the holiness of his life. He was of assistance and counsel to Pope Gregory the Ninth in the assembling, arrangement, and preparation of the five books of the canon law, called the Decretals. He lectured on the canon law at the university of Bologna; and, as it is said, was illustrious for his miracles. [Raymond of Pennaforte, celebrated jurist in the canon law, was born in 1180 at the castle of Pennaforte, in Catalonia. He studied jurisprudence at Bologna and became a canon at Barcelona. He joined the Dominicans in 1222, and, by his diligence in the service of the Inquisition and in preaching the crusade against the Saracens, he attracted the attention of the papal court. In 1230, Gregory IX named him his confessor and high penitentiary, and engaged him to edit a systematic law book made up chiefly of the earlier Decretals, and which is known under the title , which constitutes the second part of the . He also reduced ecclesiastical jurisprudence into scholastic form by his ; and on his return to Spain was appointed archbishop of Parragona. In 1238, he became general of his Order. He retired to a contemplative life in 1240, and was canonized in 1601].

Accursius of Florence, a highly learned jurist, lived at this time. On the strength of his knowledge in his field, and his experience in matters of civil government, he wrote a commentary upon the entire body of the civil law. [Franciscus Accursius, Italian jurist, born at Florence in 1182, first practiced law in his native city and was later appointed professor at Bologna. He arranged in one body the countless comments and remarks on the , , and . This compilation, entitled or , but usually known as the “Great Gloss,” though written in barbarous Latin, has more method than that of any previous writer on the subject. His eldest son, Franciscus, (1225-93) also lectured at Bologna, and, on invitation of Edward I, at Oxford].

Bartholomew of Brescia, highly renowned doctor of the canon law, at this time wrote various annotations upon and a glossary of ecclesiastical law; also a book of letters, and a chronicle of the Italian cities, etc. [Bartholomew of Brescia, instructor in the canon law at Bologna, and a fertile writer, is particularly renowned for his Glossary on the of Gratian].

Roffredus (Odefredus) of Benevento, a celebrated doctor in both civil and canon law, compiled a very useful book. [Roffredus of Benevento (c. 1170-c. 1244) was a civil lawyer who had worked at the papal court and wrote a summary of canon law in the 1230s].

Year of the World 6443 | Year of Christ 1244

Pope Innocent the Fourth (previously called Sinibaldo), a Genoese, having been a cardinal, was elected pope. The news displeased Emperor Frederick, who knew this man's strength, virtue and courage. When this pope entered upon his pontificate, he made known his desire for peace with the emperor; but learning that the emperor entertained animosity against him, he went to Genoa, where he became seriously ill. When recovered, he took refuge with King Philip of France, who ordered the pope to be honorably received and conveyed to Lyons. There the pope called a council and summoned the emperor to appear. And when the emperor disobediently delayed doing so, this pope excommunicated and deposed him. This so enraged the emperor that he proceeded to Parma and leveled the houses and beautiful villas that belonged to the pope's relatives, and also causing much mischief in other places. Beside his transactions in this council, this pope also wrote many excellent books at Lyons; and he there canonized Saint Edmund (Eadimundum) of Canterbury. At this council he also ordained that the cardinals, when appearing in public, should wear red hats as a symbol of their readiness to shed their blood for the Christian faith and the salvation of the Christians. He canonized Peter of Verona, of the Preaching Order, who was slain by the heretics at Perugia; likewise Stanislaus, bishop of Krakow, who was illustrious for many miracles in his lifetime. Finally, at the suggestion of the Sicilian nobles, this pope went to Naples; and there he died, and was buried with great honor in the Church of Saint Lawrence, in the eleventh year, second month, and twelfth day of his pontificate. This pope ordained that in the Christian churches the eighth day of the festival of the birth of the Virgin Mary should be celebrated annually.

Innocent IV (Sinibaldo Fiesco), pope from 1243 to 1254, belonged to the noble Genoese family of the counts of Lavagna. After taking orders at Parma, when he was made canon of the cathedral, he studied jurisprudence at Bologna. In 1223, Pope Honorius III gave him a benefice in Parma, and, in 1226, he was established at the curia. He was next promoted to vice-chancellor of the Roman Church, and, in the same year, created cardinal priest of San Lorenzo in Lucina. In 1243, he was elected pope by the cardinals assembled at Anagni. At this time the emperor Frederick II lay under excommunication, but hoped great things from the elevation of a member of an imperialist family; but it was soon clear that Innocent intended to pursue the traditions of his predecessors. Overtures were made and interchanged, but neither side felt prepared to carry out its part of an agreement by which the emperor would satisfy the demands of the pope and receive absolution in return. Innocent began to feel unsafe in Rome, where the imperial partisans had the ascendancy. He fled to Sutri, sailed to Genoa, and proceeded to Lyons, at that time a nominal dependency of the empire. From there he issued a summons for a general council, before which he cited Frederick to appear in person or by deputy. The council met in 1245 and was attended by the partisans of the pope; and though Frederick condescended to be represented by his justiciar Thaddeus of Suessa, the judgment was a foregone conclusion. Innocent renewed the sentence of excommunication, and declared Frederick deposed as emperor and king of Naples. He proclaimed a crusade against Frederick, arming the Dominican and Franciscan friars with special indulgences for those who would take up the cross against the imperial heretic. At the same time he sought to undermine Frederick's authority in Germany and Italy, and fomented a conspiracy amongst the feudal lords. At his instigation, the German archbishops and a few secular nobles, in 1246, elected Henry Raspe, landgrave of Thuringia, German king; but the landgrave died in the same year, and the papal party elected William II, count of Holland, as his successor.

Innocent's relentless war against Frederick was not supported by lay opinion. It wrought havoc and misery in Germany, increasing resentment against the priests. The pope's legate was driven from England, and not even the saintly king, Louis IX of France, approved the pope's attitude. Failure of the crusade in 1248 against the Muslims in Egypt was ascribed to the deflection of money and arms to the war against the emperor. Nor were the clergy a unit behind Innocent. At first the war went in Frederick's favor, but the defeat of his camp before Parma by the papal partisans was a blow from which he never recovered. He died in 1250.

Innocent IV left Lyons for Italy in 1251. He continued the struggle with Frederick's son, Conrad IV, who in 1252 descended into Italy, reduced the rebellious cities, and claimed the imperial crown. After Conrad's capture of Naples, Innocent feared that Rome itself might fall into his hands.

But Conrad died in 1254, leaving the infant son Conradin under the pope's guardianship. Innocent posed as the champion of the infant, exercising his rights over the kingdom of Sicily by nominating his own relatives to its most important offices.

Finally, when Manfred, who by Emperor Frederick's will had been charged with the government of the two Sicilies, felt himself obliged to acknowledge the pope's suzerainty, Innocent IV threw off the mask, ignored his ward's claims, and formally asserted his own claims to Calabria and Sicily. He entered Naples; but in the meantime Manfred had fled, and had raised an army of considerable strength. The news of Manfred's initial successes reached Innocent as he lay sick, and is said to have hastened his end. He died in 1254, and was succeeded by Alexander IV.

Pope Alexander the Fourth was hastily elected pope after the death of Pope Innocent the Fourth in the month of January in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred fifty-four. This Alexander, the fourth pope of this name, formerly called Rinaldo (Raynaldo), was a native of Campania and cardinal of Ostia. He was elected without delay to protect the churches against the power of Manfred, king of Sicily, whom the pope warned not to undertake any measures against the church. Alexander was a man of magnanimous disposition and counsel, and kind to the poor Christians; and for that reason he destroyed several books written against poverty by a certain William (Guilhelmo). This Alexander excommunicated said Manfred in open council at Anagnia, and persecuted the ravagers and tyrants. He undertook to arbitrate the war between the Venetians and the Genoese. Through a vision, in which the Blessed Augustine appeared to him, he accomplished the unification of the hermit brethren, a measure which his predecessors had begun; and he forced said order to leave its hermitage and to live in the city, where its members would be more useful in teaching and preaching, in setting examples, and in hearing confessions. In this way he confirmed the order, and gave it and the Preaching and Barefoot Friars many privileges, advantages, and concessions. He also gave them much assistance and support, being particularly favorable to the learned of the Order, and promoting many of them to cardinals and bishops. And after this pope in the third year of his pontificate had canonized the virgin Clara in the city of Anagnia, he again undertook to arbitrate and settle the matters involved in the war between those mighty communities of Italy, the Venetians and the Genoese. For that purpose he proceeded to Viterbo. There he was so distressed by the delays in the matter that he died; and there he was buried with great solemnity in the vicinity of the church of Saint Lawrence, in the 7th year of his pontificate; and the chair was then vacant for three months and four days. [Alexander IV (Rinaldo), pope from 1254 to 1262, was elected at Naples to succeed Innocent IV. His succession also involved the guardianship of Conradin, last of the Hohenstaufen, to whom he promised benevolent protection; but in less than a fortnight, he conspired against Conradin and bitterly opposed Conradin's uncle, Manfred. With excommunication and interdict, he fulminated against the party of Manfred, but in vain; nor could he enlist the knights of England and Norway in a crusade against the Hohenstaufen. Rome itself became too Ghibelline for the pope. He withdrew to the Viterbo; and there he died in 1261].

Folio CCXII recto

After Emperor Frederick had persecuted the Roman popes for some time and distressed the Roman See with many calamities, he was finally excommunicated by Pope Innocent in the Council of Lyons, deposed from his royal and imperial authority, and deprived of the two kingdoms of Sicily and Apuleia. After such deposition the sovereignty was in abeyance for 28 years up to the time of Pope Gregory the Tenth and Emperor Rudolf.

This refers to the period of the German Interregnum. The chronicler assumes that this began with the deposition of Frederick II in 1245. Frederick did not die until 1250. Although the papal party elected Henry Raspe, landgrave of Thuringia, to the German throne in 1246, he was never acknowledged as sovereign, and was defeated at Ulm by Conrad, Frederick's son, and died in the same year. Then the pope caused William of Holland, a youth of twenty, to be proclaimed emperor. William was strongest in the north of Germany, where he allied himself with the Guelphs, or papal party; but Conrad IV, who succeeded his father, prevailed in Southern Germany. The imperial towns and most of the German nobles were on Conrad's side. In the meantime, the hostilities between the Guelphs and Ghibellines raged in Italy, resulting in frightful atrocities. Family was arrayed against family, and city against city. Frederick crushed the revolts in Naples and Sicily; but the excesses of Ezzelino, leader of the Ghibelline nobility, neutralized Frederick's successes in Southern Italy. In 1247, Parma revolted and defeated the besiegers. The emperor's son Frederick captured Florence, but his other son, Enzo, was captured and kept a prisoner by the Bolognese for twenty years.

Worn out by constant struggles with hostile popes, the emperor died in 1250. William of Holland was slain in a war with the Frislanders in 1256. Conrad IV barely escaped assassination instigated by the bishop of Regensburg. Conrad raised an army, and, in 1251, marched into Italy. With the assistance of his half-brother, Manfred, he overran Apuleia and took Capua and Naples. Conrad IV died in 1254, leaving his son Conradin.

When Innocent IV heard of the death of Frederick II, he returned to Rome in triumph, declared Naples and Sicily lapsed fiefs, and excommunicated Conrad IV and Manfred who were struggling for possession of their paternal inheritance. Conrad died soon afterwards, as stated, but Manfred successfully continued the struggle, forcing the papal troops to retreat to papal territory. This so distressed Innocent that it hastened his death. But his successor, Alexander IV, pursued the same policy toward the Hohenstaufen dynasty. He conferred the kingdom as papal fief on the tyrannical Duke Charles of Anjou. And although Manfred continued to defend his paternal inheritance, he was defeated by Charles at Beneventum in 1266, breaking the power of the Ghibellines who were now punished with death, imprisonment and exile, and their possessions divided among the French and Guelphic soldiers.

But the Ghibellines rallied about young Conradin, who with his youthful friend, Frederick of Baden, and a few faithful adherents continued the struggle. He put the pope to flight and entered the kingdom of Naples. But his hasty advance caused him to be ambushed and defeated by Charles of Anjou. Conradin was betrayed, and he and his friend Frederick of Baden were beheaded at Naples in 1268. The remaining Hohenstaufen princes also suffered cruel fates. Enzo died in prison. Manfred was defeated and killed near Benevento in 1266, and his sons ended their lives in prison.

The death of Conrad IV left William of Holland sole king of Germany. He was considered of little importance by either side, and, when slain in 1256, the German princes were left free to choose a new king. The chief candidates were two foreign princes – Richard of Cornwall, brother of Henry III of England, and Alphonso the Wise, king of Castile – both of whom bribed the electors. The party headed by the archbishop of Cologne chose Richard; that led by the archbishop of Treves elected Alphonso. Although Richard was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, he visited the country only three times afterwards; while Alphonso never entered it at all.

This period, when Germany was virtually without a sovereign, was called the Interregnum. For Germany, the Interregnum began with the death of William of Holland in 1256. Violence and lawlessness prevailed, and the strong alone could obtain justice. Nobles and knights degenerated into marauders and robbers. The princes and bishops occupied themselves in enlarging their territories and possessing themselves of privileges, while knights and vassals waylaid and plundered the defenseless. They dragged travelers into their dungeons, holding them for ransom, and, behind their strong walls, defied the impotent laws and tribunals. Only within the strong walls of the cities did industry venture to function at all.

This condition was ended by the death of Richard of Cornwall in 1271. Until that time, the pope held himself aloof from German affairs, since the vacancy of the imperial throne increased his own importance and prevented the rise of a rival.

But as the papal revenues could not be collected without the aid of imperial authority, Gregory X at last notified the electors of Germany that if they would not elect a new king, he would appoint one. And so, in 1273, the Interregnum ended by the election of Count Rudolf of Hapsburg, as king of Germany.

Henry (Heinricus), the seventh of this name, was declared Roman emperor. At this time German affairs were in a state of great unrest and dissension. After the excommunication and deposition of Frederick, the electors of the empire, at the command of the pope, held an election and chose Henry, landgrave of Thuringia, as Roman emperor. He was opposed by Conrad, said Frederick's son, whom Frederick had previously made king. After the crusade had been preached by papal order against this Conrad and the adherents of Emperor Frederick, the landgrave of Thuringia won many supporters and favorites; but before long he died at Eisenach without issue. [Henry Raspe was the second surviving son of Hermann I, landgrave of Thuringia. When his brother, the landgrave Louis IV died in Italy in 1227, Henry seized the landgraviate and expelled his brother's widow, Elizabeth of Hungary, and her son, Herman. In 1236, Henry accompanied the emperor, Frederick II, on a campaign against the duke of Austria and took part in the election of his son, Conrad, as German king at Vienna in 1237. But he did not appear at the diet of Verona in 1238, possibly because he disliked the betrothal of his nephew, Hermann, to the emperor's daughter, Margaret. At all events, when the projected marriage had been broken off, he supported the emperor in 1239 in opposition to a plan formed by various princes to elect an anti-king. In 1241 Henry's loyalty again wavered, and he was himself mentioned as a possible candidate. Frederick's visit to Germany in 1242 prevented this step for a time; but in 1246 Pope Innocent IV requested the German princes to choose Henry as Frederick's successor. He was elected and became known as the Pfaffen-König, or parson's king. Collecting an army, he defeated Conrad near Frankfurt, held a diet at Nuremberg, and undertook the siege of Ulm. He died at the Wartburg in 1247, leaving the male line of his family extinct].

William (Guilhelmus), count of Holland, after the death of the landgrave of Thuringia, was elected Roman emperor by the electors, in opposition to the emperor Frederick; but not long afterwards he was slain by the Frislanders. And thus, neither he nor the aforesaid Henry attained to imperial coronation. [William (1227-1256), king of the Romans and count of Holland, was the son of Count Floris IV and his wife, Matilda, daughter of Henry, duke of Brabant. He was about six years of age at his father's death, but his long minority, under the guardianship of his two paternal uncles, was peaceful. In 1247, William allowed Pope Innocent to proclaim him king of the Romans in opposition to the excommunicated Frederick II, and he was crowned in 1248. He thus became recognized head of the Guelph party; but even after Frederick's death he had gained only a few adherents. He was killed in 1256].

The Origin of the Guelphs and Ghibellines

The very disastrous names of the Guelphs and Ghibellines were contrived at Pisa at this time, to the detriment of all Italy, by two German brothers, while the pope and Emperor Frederick were at enmity; for among the people of all Italy arose such madness and unreason that father raged against son, son against father, and brother against brother. This discord was caused by Emperor Frederick. Names were given to the partisans by him or his Germans. Those who adhered to the pope or the churches were called Guelphs; those who favored the emperor, Ghibellines. And as Ptolemy, a native of the city of Lucca, states, these unhallowed names were first heard in the city of Pistoria; before long these names poisoned and blackened all Italy (with the exception of Venice), and this has continued for about one hundred fifty years since then, with such madness, rage, and perniciousness that the Italians during this period committed more evil, wantonness and injury among themselves than they had suffered at the hands of foreign infidels; for in their fury the cities, the country, and the people suffered through spilling of blood and extermination. This was true, not alone of people in the same vicinity, but also of those far removed from one another; for wherever they met, they injured each other. Each party, through hatred of the other, had its own means of identification by colors, distinctive dress, course of conduct, manual signs, voice, and personal carriage. [See Guelphs and Ghibellines, Folio CCI recto and note, above].

Conrad was the son of Frederick and Yolanda (Iole), daughter of King John (Johannis) of Jerusalem; and upon him descended the paternal estate of his father; for Manfred, Frederick's natural son, waived the inheritance. Conrad also inherited Swabia, but spent little time there. Afterwards he went to Verona, and led a large army through its gates into the kingdom of Apuleia. As the historians state, Conrad was very much like his father in covetousness and evil. Later, in a grim and hostile attitude, he appeared before Naples and breached the walls in many places. He overturned the walls of the city of Capua, and burned the noble city of Aquina. Part of the time he lived in Germany, but the remainder of his life he spent in the recovery of Sicily. He finally died of poison, which it was suspected had been administered to him in an enema by the physicians at the instigation of his brother Manfred. Before his death he set up a regency for his son Conradin in the kingdom of Sicily in order to permit him to study the arts. [Conrad IV, German king, son of Emperor Frederick II and Yolanda (Isabella) of Brienne, was born in Apuleia in 1228. In 1235 he was made duke of Swabia, and in 1237 was chosen king of the Romans, or German king, at Vienna, an election that was subsequently confirmed by the diet at Spire. Although defeated at Frankfurt in August 1246 by the anti-king, Henry Raspe, he obtained help from the towns and from his father-in-law, Otto II, duke of Bavaria, and drove Henry Raspe to Thuringia. He was carrying on the struggle against Raspe's successor when the emperor died in 1250, and, a few days later, Conrad narrowly escaped assassination. Conrad raised an army, marched to Italy, and arrived at Verona in 1251. He sailed from Pola to Siponto, and with the help of his half-brother Manfred, overran Apuleia and took Capua and Naples. He died of a fever at Lavello, not far from Melfi].

A very large mountain in Burgundy tore asunder, shattering itself, and suffocating about five thousand persons. The rent ran many miles and finally stopped miraculously at other mountains.

Saint Cyrillus, a Greek, a Carmelite prior and doctor, flourished at this time in piety of life and in the spirit of prophecy. He wrote prophecies of the world's future, and was illustrious for many miracles; all to the honor of God, and the wonder and terror of the world. [Cyrillus was the third Prior General of the Carmelite Order. He was born at Constantinople in 1190, and died on Mount Carmel in Palestine in 1224].

The Grossoni, or Grossoini, an Arab people, at this time, at the instigation of the Sultan of Babylon, persecuted and oppressed the Christians in Asia, in many ways, particularly the Templars and Hospitalers. Afterwards they came to Jerusalem, where they exterminated by death the Christians whom the sons of Saladin had left unharmed; and with great scorn they dishonored and despoiled the Holy Sepulchre, which until then had remained unmolested.

Louis (Lodovicus), the blessed king of France, was crowned and anointed at the age of 13 years, upon the death of his father; and he reigned 41 years. This Louis, a zealous lover of the Christian religion, was reared from childhood by Queen Blanche, a devout woman, in every virtue; and his thoughts, words and deeds were confined to what pertained to God. In the twentieth year of his reign he collected a great and mighty army, and sailed over seas to the banks of the river Nile in Egypt. And so the Saracens decided upon a retreat from the city of Damietta. In this host was a papal legate, the patriarch of Jerusalem, and many French bishops and abbots. Robert, count of Poitiers, king Louis's brother, besieged the city of Damietta with a new force. In a heavy engagement King Louis captured the city, and afterwards fought various engagements with the Saracens. But he was finally defeated and taken prisoner, and for his ransom the city was returned to the Saracens. Later he fought against them, often with good fortune. At last death decimated his forces, and Louis, his brother John (Ioanne), and many nobles were taken by death. He was enrolled in the number of the holy confessors. Afterwards his body was brought back to Paris.

Louis IX, or St. Louis, king of France, was born in 1215, succeeding his father, Louis VIII, in 1226. During a dangerous illness he made a vow to go on a crusade. Having appointed his mother (the pious Blanche of Castile) regent, he landed with 40,000 men in Egypt in 1249. He captured Damietta, but was afterwards defeated, taken prisoner, and ransomed for 100,000 marks in 1250. He proceeded to Acre with the remnant of his army, and remained in Palestine till his mother's death (in 1252) compelled him to return to France.

Louis did much to strengthen loyalty to his house, determined by the Pragmatic Sanction the relation of the French Church to the pope, founded the Sorbonne, set up royal courts of justice or parliaments in the French provinces, and authorized a new code of laws. He embarked on a new crusade in 1270, died of the plague the same year and was canonized in 1297.

Edmund (Eadimundus), archbishop of Canterbury, not long after his death, was enrolled in the number of the saints by Pope Innocent the Fourth in the Year of the Lord 1257. He was a man of wonderful piety and great wisdom. He was born in an English village, and retained his virginity to the time of his death. Being a master of liberal arts, he heard masses daily, and this was also useful and advantageous to his students. Afterwards he devoted himself to study of the Holy Scriptures. He was an extraordinary preacher and a very keen debater. Later he was elected archbishop of Canterbury, and there he flourished in great virtue. But being persecuted, he secretly fled from England overseas to Pontigny, and from there to the monastery at Soissy. While he lay sick and dying he received the Holy Sacrament. He died sitting up in bed, his head resting on his hand. His remains were carried to Pontigny and buried in the Church of Saint Jacob, where they were illustrious in many miracles.

Edmund (Edmund Rich) was born at Abingdon about 1175. His father, a retired merchant, with the consent of his wife, retired to a monastery, leaving the education of their family in her hands. Edmund entered the grammar school at Oxford, and at the age of 12, took a vow of perpetual chastity in the Virgin's church at Oxford. After graduating at Paris, he lectured for six years on the liberal arts. Having attracted the notice of the Roman court, he was appointed in 1227 to preach the crusade in England. In 1233, he was elected archbishop of Canterbury at the express suggestion of Gregory IX, and at once leaped into prominence for rebuking the king in following the advice of foreign favorites.

In common with the baronical opposition, Edmund treated Henry III as responsible for the tragic fate of Richard Marshal, earl of Pembroke, and threatened the king with excommunication. The king bowed before the storm, dismissed the foreign counselors, made peace with Marshal's adherents, and was publicly reconciled with the barons. But it was with the object of emancipating himself from Edmund's control that the king asked the pope to send him a legate (1236). On the arrival of Cardinal Otto in the following year, the archbishop found himself thwarted at every point. The marriage between Simon de Montfort and the Princess Eleanor, which Edmund had pronounced as invalid, was ratified at Rome upon appeal. The king and legate upheld the monks of Canterbury in their opposition to the archbishop's authority. On all public occasions the legate took precedence on the archbishop. By the advice of his suffragans, Edmund laid a protest before the king, and excommunicated in general terms all who had infringed the liberties of Canterbury. These measures led to no result, and after the papal encroachments of 1240, when the English clergy were required to pay a subsidy of a fifth for the war against Frederick II, and simultaneously three hundred Romans were "provided" with English benefices in return for their political services to the Holy See, Edmund withdrew to Pontigny. The state of his health drove him later to Soissy (near Provins), where he died in 1240.

Stanislaus, bishop of Krakow, in Poland, illustrious for his learning and piety, flourished at this time. After many works of virtue he died in blessedness, and was enrolled among the saints by Pope Innocent the Fourth; for during his life and after his death he was illustrious for his miracles. [Stanislaus was born in 1030 in a town of Austrian Galicia, formerly part of Poland. He was educated at Gnesen and in Paris, and, on the death of his parents, devoted his wealth and service to the church. He was ordained and given a canonry, and, in 1072, became bishop of Krakow. At this time, Boleslaus II was king of Poland. He was a man of cruelty and unbridled lust; for this reason Stanislaus threatened to excommunicate him. Because of this threat the king cut open the head of Stanislaus with his sword, and in his rage mutilated the face of the dying man. His attendants hacked the body to pieces, and cast it into the field, where three eagles are said to have defended it from wild dogs, until some of the faithful secretly buried it. Stanislaus was canonized by Innocent IV in 1253].

Also Saint Albert of Trapani (Tarpano), a native of Sicily and a Carmelite, renowned for his service, miracles and learning, and an image of perfection, flourished at this time. [Albert of Trapani (Albert of Sicily) (c. 1250 - August 7, 1306) was born in Trapani, Sicily, and entered the Carmelite monastery there at a very young age. He was later transferred to the Carmelite house at Messina, where his celebration of Mass while the city was being besieged and slowly starved to death in 1301 is believed to have saved the city by allowing ships loaded with grain to pass through the blockade].

A large stone fell into the monastery of Saint Gabriel. It was inscribed with a cross and an image of Christ. It bore the golden letters: Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews. It restored sight to a blind man.

Peter, a new martyr, a native of Verona, of the Preaching Order, and a sturdy defender of the true faith, resembled a rose sprung from thorns; for his parents were heretics attached to the Manichean fallacy. While still a youth he left the world and his parents, entered the Preaching Order, and there led a commendable life for 30 years as a zealous devotee and exceptional and earnest defender of the faith. And when, in the Year of the Lord 1252 on the day before the Kalends of May, pursuant to papal command, he was about to leave the city of Como (where he was a prior of the brothers of the Preaching Order) to search out heretics in Milan, and with his fellow-wayfarers was on his way from Lake Como to Milan, he was seized by Arian heretics near the city of Barlassina [Barlassina is Barzano, a municipality in the Province of Lecco in the Italian region Lombardy, located about 19 miles (30 km) northeast of Milan and about 9 miles (14 km) southwest of Lecco], stabbed in the side with a knife, and martyred. During his lifetime this defender of the faith warded off all pernicious, heretical fallacies; and after his death, by way of merited reward and through his illustrious miracles, he uprooted these heresies to such an extent that many persons entered the fold of the church. Because of his piety and manifold miracles Pope Innocent enrolled him in the number of the martyred saints.

Peter Martyr, next to Dominic, is the glory of the Dominican Order. He was born in Verona in 1205. His parents belonged to the heretical sect of the Cathars, prevalent at the time in the North of Italy. Peter, however, was sent to a Catholic school where he learned the creed according to the Catholic form. Dominic, finding him an apt disciple, prevailed on him to take the Dominican habit at fifteen. He became an influential preacher, remarkable for the intolerant zeal and unrelenting cruelty with which he pursued heretics. For these services, he was appointed inquisitor-general by Pope Honorius III. At length, two Venetian noblemen whom he had delivered up to the secular authorities, and who had suffered imprisonment and confiscation of property, hired assassins to waylay him on his return from Como to Milan. One of them struck him down by the blow of an ax; and they pursued and stabbed his companion. They finally dispatched Peter with a sword. He was canonized by Innocent IV in 1253.

In his lifetime Peter was not beloved by the members of his own brotherhood, and his severe and intolerant persecuting spirit made him generally detested. Yet, since his death, the influence of his order has made him one of the most popular saints in Italy.

Ezzelino (Ezelinus) and Alberic (Alberinus), brothers, of the house of Romano, are also remembered here. A displacement of the lineage of the nobles of Italy occurred at this time. It was generally known that other noble families of Italy were of more ancient lineage than Ezzelino; for he was of rather obscure origin, his forefather having been a German knight and warrior in the service of Otto the Third in Italy. Ezzelino, under Frederick the Second (whom he resembled in life and manners), came into such wealth and power that he practiced such tyranny and destruction as Italy had never suffered at the hands of any king or emperor. Through him the emperor brought Verona under his dominion. When affairs in Germany had been silenced, and Emperor Frederick proceeded to Italy, those of Padua, through the cunning and flattery of Ezzelino, were influenced to take the emperor's part; but soon afterwards Ezzelino reduced them to servitude under the Germans and Saracens. Many were sent into exile; youths were mutilated and blinded, and no one was spared. By such terror he brought the cities of Vicenza and Brescia under his dominion. Having ravaged all the regions of Venice, he returned to Milan. But his plans miscarried, and he was defeated, seriously wounded, and died in despair after having subjugated and oppressed many cities over a period of thirty-four years.

Ezzelino da Romano, head of the Ghibellines in Italy in the time of Emperor Frederick II, was born in 1194, the son of Ezzelino II, a monk, and was of noble ancestry. His forefathers migrated from Germany into Italy under Conrad II. From early youth he participated in the feuds of his house. In 1226, he was made podesta of Verona, lost control in 1227, but recovered it in 1230. In 1232, he joined his former antagonist, Frederick II, who, in 1236, made him ruler of Vicenza; in 1237, of Padua and Treviso; and, in 1238, gave him his natural daughter in marriage. From this time, Ezzelino diligently pursued his purpose to gain independence for his house in the war with the Guelphs, and to set up a substantial kingdom comprehending the entire Trevisian March. He retained a secure hold upon his conquests. The reign of terror which he set up in the subjugated territories rendered his name detestable in the history of Italy, although he was always subservient to Frederick, and later supported his son, Conrad, in Italy.

Although generally hated, Ezzelino checked all secret attempts against him by his watchfulness. The papal ban pronounced against him was of no avail. In 1256, while Manfred was making an attack upon Mantua, an army of crusaders, under Archbishop Philip of Ravenna, joined by fugitives from Vicenza, Treviso, and other cities, attacked him and captured the city of Padua. But, in 1258, Ezzelino inflicted a total defeat, bringing his power into greater ascendancy than before. However, when, with the assistance of the nobility of Milan, he attempted to subjugate that city, a new alliance was formed against him. In 1259, he was defeated at Soncino and taken prisoner. He died a few days later. It is said that over 50,000 persons perished at his command. In the following year his brother Alberic was compelled by starvation to unconditionally surrender his castle; and after his sons and daughters had been cruelly martyred before his eyes, he was tied to the tail of a horse and dragged. With him died the lineage of Romano.

Hugo, of the Preaching Order, and renowned for his learning, was made a cardinal by Pope Innocent the Fourth, who showed great and special favor to learned men, elevating them to high offices and stations. After accepting this honor Hugo suffered no change in the humility, spirituality and devotion that had characterized his former life.

Manfred, son of Emperor Frederick by a noble concubine, attained the kingdom of Sicily upon the death of his brother Conrad; and he reigned 13 years. This Manfred was exhorted by Pope Alexander to venture nothing against the rights and possessions of the Church in Sicily; but he ignored this papal admonition, saying he was his deceased brother's lawful heir. For this reason the pope excommunicated him and sent a great army against him. Manfred, in response, enlisted many Saracens and unbelievers and reduced the papal forces to flight, slaying some of them and making prisoners of the rest. Later he attacked the Neapolitans, and caused much turmoil in other parts of Italy. For this reason Pope Urban sought the assistance of Charles, brother of Saint Louis, against Manfred, and proclaimed him king of Sicily. Charles came with an army, killed Manfred, and obtained the kingdom in peace.

Manfred (c. 1232-1266), king of Sicily, was a natural son of the emperor Frederick II by Bianca Lanzia. Frederick appears to have regarded him as legitimate, and, by his will, named him as prince of Tarentum and representative in Italy of his half brother, the German king, Conrad IV. Manfred acted loyally and with vigor in the execution of his trust, and, when Conrad appeared in southern Italy in 1252, his authority was quickly and generally acknowledged. When Conrad died in 1254, Manfred, after refusing to surrender Sicily to the pope, accepted the regency on behalf of the infant Conradin.

On a rumor (1258) that Conradin was dead, Manfred was crowned king of Sicily at Palermo. The report was false; but the new king declined to abdicate, and pointed out the necessity of a strong native ruler. The pope declared Manfred's coronation void and pronounced sentence of excommunication. In conjunction with the Ghibellines, Manfred's forces defeated the Guelphs at Monte Aperto in 1260. He was eventually defeated and killed near Benevento in 1266. Contemporaries praise his noble and magnanimous character. He was renowned for his physical beauty and great intellectual attainments.

Pope Urban the Fourth, a native of France, and patriarch of Jerusalem, was elected pope after Alexander. Although he was born of a low humble family, yet he was a distinguished, extraordinary and eloquent man. When once upon a time he heard a slur to the effect that he was born of a mean, ignoble father, he answered: It is not the corporal birth but a virtuous life that makes a man noble. This pope instituted the festival of Corpus Christi, making it a day of great indulgence [The Feast of Corpus Christi is a Roman Catholic festival, instituted by Pope Urban IV in 1264, and observed on the Thursday of the week after Pentecost. The institution was the natural result of the acceptance of the doctrine of transubstantiation. It was not made an article of faith until the time of Innocent III. By the institution of Corpus Christi Day, this doctrine was expressed in liturgical form, and its popularity was secured. Roman legend states that, in 1230, Juliana, a nun of Liege, while looking at the full moon, saw a gap in its orb; and by a peculiar revelation from heaven, learned that the moon represented the Christian Church, and the gap, the want of a certain festival – that of the adoration of the body of Christ in the consecrated host – which she was to begin to celebrate, and announce to the world. In 1264, while a priest at Bolsena, who did not believe in the change of the bread into body of Christ, was going through the ceremony of the benediction, drops of blood fell on his surplice, and when he endeavored to conceal them in the folds of his garment, formed bloody images of the host. The bloody surplice is still seen as a relic at Civita Vecchia. It was in this year that Pope Urban published his bull, and it is upon such a tradition that the holiday was instituted]. This Urban resolved to bring the churches greater wealth. He allowed those marked with the cross to proceed on their way, and exhorted Count Charles (Carolus) of France, King Louis' (Ludovici) uncle and son-in-law, to concern themselves with the protection of the Church; and in this matter Charles agreed to please the pope and the king. But, when he was told of the pope's death, it was surmised that he would not proceed with his undertaking. The pope died at Perugia in the third year, first month, and fourth day of his pontificate, and he was buried there in the episcopal basilica. The seat was then vacant for five months. This Urban was partial to the mendicant orders, favoring and promoting them by his good will, assistance, and the grant of privileges. [Urban IV (Jacques Pantaléon), pope from 1261 to 1264, was the son of a shoemaker of Troyes. Having received a monastic education, he became archdeacon of Liege and papal legate of Innocent IV to Poland and Prussia. He was consecrated bishop of Verdun in 1253, and two years later was translated to the patriarchate of Jerusalem. He was on a visit to Italy when elected to succeed Alexander IV, and spent most of his pontificate at Orvieto. Under him began the preponderance of the French in the curia, which later led to the papal residence at Avignon, and indirectly to the Great Schism. In 1264, he instituted the festival of Corpus Christi. He favored the claim of Charles of Anjou to the crown of the Two Sicilies. He died on the arrival of Charles of Anjou, and was succeeded by Clement IV].

Pope Clement the Fourth, previously called Guido Fulcodi, of Narbonne, was by reason of his piety and learning, deservedly elected pope. He was the foremost and most distinguished jurist in all France, and the best counselor at the royal court. He had a wife and children, but after his wife's death he was appointed bishop of Podiensis; then archbishop of Narbonne; subsequently he was made a cardinal, and was finally elected pope. Being a cardinal of great reputation and worldly experience, the pope dispatched him as a legate to arbitrate and settle the misunderstandings between King Henry (Heinricum) of England and Simon (Symonem), Count of Montfort. In the meantime Urban died, and this Clement was elected pope in his stead, making it necessary for him to return home. There was a great urgency for his return; but on the way Clement feared Manfred, the deposed king of Italy; for this reason he proceeded by land in the habit of a mendicant. When he reached Paris the cardinals took him to Viterbo. There, together with the cardinals, he considered the matter of enlisting Charles (Caroli). Not long afterwards Charles sailed out of Marseilles to the Tiber and from there to Rome. Clement used prudence and discretion in the conduct of the papal office, and employed the wealth of the church in alms and divine works, rather than bestowing it upon his friends and relatives. Before he became pope his wife died, leaving him two daughters. One of these he put into a convent, with 30 small Tours (Thuronesium) pounds [The 'Tours pound' (in French, livre tournois) was one of several currencies used in France in the Middle Ages]. The other he espoused with three hundred Tours pounds as a marriage portion, upon condition that she ask nothing more of him. He had a kinsman who held three offices, and him he compelled to choose one and give up the other two. And when this kinsman asked for a greater office the pope told him to live for the Lord God, and not according to his lay desires. He died afterwards at Viterbo in blessedness after having been in office 3 years and nine months; and the seat rested two years on account of dissension among the cardinals. [Clement IV (Gui Foulques), pope from 1265 to 1268, son of a lawyer, became a valued legal adviser of Louis IX of France, and after the death of his wife, took orders. In 1258, he was made bishop of LePuy; in 1259, Archbishop of Narbonne, and, in 1261, cardinal-bishop of Sabina. He was elected pope at Perugia in 1265. He invested the avaricious Charles of Anjou with the kingdom of Sicily, but subsequently came into conflict with him after the death of Manfred in 1266. When Conradin, last of the Hohenstaufen, appeared in Italy, Clement excommunicated him and his supporters. Clement died at Viterbo in 1268].

Bernard of Compostela, a very highly informed priest and doctor of both branches of the law, attendant and chaplain of the aforesaid Pope Innocent, was by the example and zeal of the same pope moved to write various elegant manuscripts on jurisprudence and other subjects, which he left behind. []

In the Year of the Lord 1263 a remarkably large comet appeared for over three months, proceeding from the East to the center of the heavens, and directing its beams toward the west. On the night of Urban's death it ceased to appear.

Folio CCXIII recto

The electors of the Empire who met after the death of Frederick and his son Conrad in the year 1256, were so divided in the choice of a Roman king, that they elected two kings, namely Alphonso, king of Castile [Alphonso X, El Sabio ('the Wise' or 'the Learned,' (1252 – 1284) is one of the most interesting, though not the most capable, of the Spanish kings of the Middle Ages. His scientific fame is based mainly on his encouragement of astronomy. As a ruler, he showed legislative capacity and a desire to provide his kingdoms with a code of laws and a consistent judicial system. His descent from the Hohenstaufen through his mother, daughter of the emperor Philip, gave him claims to represent the Swabian line. The choice of the German electors, after the death of Conrad IV in 1252, misled him into wild schemes of no effect but immense expense. To obtain money, he debased the coinage, and then endeavored to prevent a rise in price by an arbitrary tariff. The little trade of his dominions was ruined and the burghers and peasants were deeply offended. His nobles, whom he tried to cow by sporadic acts of violence, rebelled against him. His second son, Sancho, enforced his claim to be heir in preference to the children of the elder brother who died in Alphonso's life. Son and nobles alike supported the Moors when he tried to unite the nation in a crusade; and when he allied himself with the rulers of Morocco, they denounced him as an enemy of the faith. A reaction in his favor was begun in his later days, but he died defeated and deserted at Seville, leaving a will by which he endeavored to exclude Sancho.], and Count Richard of Cornwall [Richard, earl of Cornwall and king of the Romans (1209 – 1272), was the second son of the English king John by Isabella of Angouleme. He was the junior of his brother, Henry III, and received the earldom of Cornwall in 1225, from which date he was a prominent figure in politics. In 1240, he took command of the crusade in order to escape the troubled atmosphere of English politics. In 1257, a bare majority of the German electors nominated him king of the Romans, and he accepted their offer. He obtained recognition in the Rhineland, which was closely connected with England by trade relations; but otherwise he was unsuccessful in securing German support. On the outbreak of civil war in 1264, he took the side of his brother Henry III, and his capture in a windmill near Lewes after the defeat of the royalist army is commemorated in the earliest of English vernacular satires. He remained prisoner till the fall of Montfort. He died in 1272], brother of the king of England; but neither of them was confirmed. Consequently the Roman imperial sovereignty was without a head for a number of years, until the time of Pope Gregory the Tenth and Rudolf, King of the Romans.

The historian Ptolemy of Lucca clearly states concerning Charles (Carolo) that said Charles, together with his spouse, Beatrice, through various cardinals sent for the purpose by Pope Clement, were invested with the royal crown of Jerusalem and Sicily at the Lateran Church. It is also known that Charles before receiving the crown obligated himself and agreed in writing to pay the sum of forty-eight thousand guilders annually as a reward for his fief, and in acknowledgment of his subservience to the Roman Church. By the same treaty it was also agreed that the successors to the Roman imperial sovereignty, even though chosen by the electors, should consider themselves bound by such treaty. And this conclusion was arrived at, having in mind the former emperors Frederick the First and Second, and the antagonism, uproar and dissensions which occurred in their time; for Alphonso, in view of the dissension in the election intended to acquire the Roman imperial title by grant and by the sword. Had the electors disregarded the Count of Cornwall (considering him of little consequence) and elected Charles, the result would have been disappointing to Alphonso, and he might have overrun Italy with an army had he not feared invasion of the kingdom of Castile in the meantime by his two brothers Henry (Heinricus) and Frederick, one of whom he had exiled to France and the other to Africa.

Pilgrimages had a marvelous rise at this time, not only in Italy, but among the people elsewhere; and so, through the temptations of the Devil, 2,000 children were marked with the cross, and proceeded to the various seaports in hordes. Many were captured by pirates, and but few returned. [Child Pilgrimages became a religious epidemic in Europe in 1212, although the last boy crusade was in 1459. Threats and persuasions, love and fear, had no effect on the boys, who wept day and night, pined and trembled in every limb. There was no difference in the social scale, in children of counts and barons running away from home as well as the sons of shepherds and tradesmen. The Children's Crusade of 1212 was preached in France by Stephen, a peasant boy, and, in Germany, by Nicholas, also a peasant boy. Some 90,000 children proceeded "to rescue the Holy Land from the infidels," and ships were placed at their disposal. The French contingent embarked at Marseilles, and part perished in the first month by shipwreck on the island of San Pietro; while the rest were sold into slavery through the Muslims. The German contingent reached Genoa, but was dispersed by various disasters before spring].

Albertus Magnus, a native of the town of Lauingen, on the Danube, in Swabia, and of the Preaching Order, was at this time the most renowned and praiseworthy teacher of the church among all the celebrated men at Paris—the splendor and ornament of Germany. He was of such pious life and great learning that no one excelled him or could be compared to him; for this reason he was called the Great. In the Year of the Lord 1262 he was appointed bishop of Regensburg; but because of his love of learning he left the bishopric, spending many years in Cologne and Paris, teaching the Holy Scriptures and philosophy. He also wrote commentaries on all the works of Aristotle, and very intelligently opened up Christian theology. Writing more than four books of thoughts, he explained a great part of the Bible. He made eminently clear the Gospels and the Epistles of Paul. He also composed a very beautiful book on animals as well as other things worthy of praise. Finally he returned his spirit to God at Cologne at the age of eighty-seven years, and was buried with great honor in the choir of Church of the Holy Cross before the highest altar in a stone chest with Sisfridus, the archbishop of Cologne, officiating; and (as it is said) he performed many miracles during life and after death.

Albertus Magnus, Albert of Cologne (c. 1193/1206-1280), scholastic philosopher called Doctor Universalis ('Professor of Everything') was born of the family of the counts of Bollstädt, at Lauingen, in Swabia. In 1223, he joined the Dominican order, and after teaching at Cologne, Hildesheim, Freiburg, Ratisbon, Strasbourg, and again at Cologne, was sent to Paris from 1245-1248, and there acquired great fame. When he returned to Cologne in 1248, Thomas Aquinas, who had been under his direction at Paris, went with him. From 1254 to 1257, he was provincial of the German province, during which time he defended the Mendicants against the University of Paris and its spokesman, William of St. Amour. From 1260 to 1262, he held the bishopric of Regensburg. From that date to 1270, when he returned to Cologne as a lector, he seems to have been traveling about, preaching a crusade in Germany and Bohemia, and undertaking various other ecclesiastical missions. His works, which were mostly completed before 1256, were published in 21 folio volumes at Lyons in 1651, and reprinted in 36 volumes at Paris in 1890. They include paraphrases of all Aristotle's works, a commentary on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, an incomplete Summa Theologiae, a treatise against Averroes, and the curious De Causis et Processu Universitatis – a work of Neoplatonic coloring.

Albert had a remarkable affinity with the early Franciscan philosophers of Oxford; thus, his love of experimental science, and his knowledge of geography, astronomy, medicine, zoology and botany are strongly reminiscent of Grosseteste and Bacon, while his interweaving of Aristotelian, Arabian, Jewish, Neoplatonic and Augustinian elements bear a close resemblance to the system of Thomas of York. However, as far as his Dominican successors are concerned, Albert's chief influence seems to lie in his successful propagation of an esteem for Aristotle.

The Latin and German editions of the Chronicle differ greatly in the second half of the mini-biography devoted to Albertus Magnus. Below is the German edition following the sentence (shared by both editions) "In the Year of the Lord 1262 he was appointed bishop of Regensburg; but because of his love of learning he left the bishopric, spending many years in Cologne and Paris, teaching the Holy Scriptures and philosophy."

He skillfully compiled many elegant, useful, keen, subtle, and sensible commentaries, not only on the Holy Scriptures, but also books on natural philosophy, and other works. In particular this learned man stated that a humble contemplation of the passion of Christ is more beneficial than fasting on bread and water throughout the year, or daily flagellation to the point of drawing blood. So that every man might earn a great reward with little labor, a book was printed at Nuremberg under the memo of the Schatzbehalter, which teaches an easy way to eternal blessedness.

The German edition once again abridges and summarizes the contents of the Latin text. But here, unusually, it also adds a single piece of new information, one that is directly connected to the publisher of the Chronicle. The Schatzbehalter was written by Stefan Fidolin, a monk, was printed by Anton Koberger at Nuremberg on November 8th, 1491, under the title Das Buch, der Schatzbehalter oder Schrein der waren reichthumer des heils und ewyger seligkeit genant, or "Shrine of the Veritable Riches of Salvation and Eternal Bliss." It consists of 352 leaves, printed in two columns, and contains 96 full-page illustrations by Michael Wohlgemut (master of Albrecht Dürer), printed from 91 wood blocks, the difference representing repeated illustrations. The author died in 1498.

Bonaventura, a native of Tuscany from the town of Bagnoregio, was born from the faithful union of John (Ioanne) of Fidenza and Ritella. At the age of twenty-two he adopted the habit of the Franciscan Order. Through the teaching and guidance of Alexander of Hales he attained to such perfection in scriptural wisdom that in the seventh year after entering the order, he taught the Holy Scriptures as a master of the other brethren. Thirteen years after his entry into the Order he was made a general, and after that a cardinal. In addition to his great piety he was so gifted with ingenuity and great and worthy devotion, that his renown radiated through out the world. He wrote many excellent things conducive to devotion and contemplation. After his corpse had turned to dust, his heart was found perfectly intact. For that reason, and because of his manifold miracles, he was enrolled in the host of the saintly confessors by Pope Sixtus the Fourth in the Year of the Lord 1482.

Bonaventura (John of Fidenza), (1221-1274), Franciscan theologian, was born at Bagnoregio, in Tuscany. He became a Franciscan about 1243, and studied at Paris under Alexander of Hales and John of Rochelle, to whose chair he succeeded in 1253, having been lecturing from 1248. His opposition to the master of the University who, under the leadership of William of Saint-Amour, sought to exclude the mendicants from teaching, was successful owing to the intervention of Alexander IV, and as a result he received the degree of doctor in 1257, some few months after he had been appointed general of his Order. In 1273, Gregory X made him cardinal and bishop of Albano, and insisted on his presence at the great Council of Lyons (124). At this meeting he died. Bonaventura, known as Doctor Seraphicus ('Angelic Professor') was canonized in 1482 by Sixtus IX, and ranked as sixth among the doctors of the Church by Sixtus V in 1587.

Bonaventura combined the character of a man of action with that of a philosopher, theologian and mystic.

Alexander of Hales, an incontrovertible and distinguished teacher, was at this time illustrious for his skill and learning. And by virtue of his intelligence and at the request of Pope Innocent he compiled a summary of the Holy Scriptures. He wrote many good and valiant things, and an exposition of the Old and New Testament; for these reasons he earned for himself the epithet the Spring of Life. Because of his divine wisdom, and the exceptional devotion and contemplation that he exhibited toward the most Blessed Virgin, he adopted the habit of the brothers of Saint Francis in his declining days. He gave assurance that if anyone, in the Virgin's name, asked for anything possible to grant, he would fulfill it. A brother (sc. of the Order of St. Francis), carrying a bag for the collection of alms in the city, met him; and to Alexander he said; Inasmuch as you have served the world with renown for a long time, and our Order has no master, I pray you, for the sake of God and the Virgin Mother, and for the benefit of your soul and the honor of our Order, to adopt the habit of our Order. He answered, I will follow you at once and do as you desire. And thus he retired from the world and entered the order. [Alexander of Hales, known as Doctor Irrefragabilis (the Unanswerable Doctor) was one of the first English scholars and theologians to make his influence felt in Paris. Born about 1175 in Gloucestershire, he went to Paris to study, and there became a master of arts sometime before 1210. About 1231 he entered the Friars Minor, and after his appointment as the first magister regens of the chair of theology held by his order in the university became celebrated as a teacher. John of Rochelle, Bonaventura and probably Roger Bacon were among his pupils. He died in 1245. Bacon tells us that Alexander's weighed more than a horse and was not entirely of his own composition. The latter statement is well substantiated. However, we know that he attempted to correlate the predominating Augustinianism of his day with the newly introduced philosophy of Aristotle and the Arabians. HE admits the plurality of forms, the independence of body and soul, the existence of an intelligible matter or potency in all spiritual creatures, and the Augustinian theory of Divine Illumination in knowledge. Alexander's was extensively utilized by Albert the Great, Saint Thomas and Saint Bonaventura].

Guido Bonatti (Bonatus), an astronomer, was at this time so well informed in his art and the practice of it, that nothing was unknown to him. [Guido Bonatti (date of birth unknown; date of death sometime between 1296-1300) was a famous Italian astronomer and astrologer. An advisor of powerful men of the 13th century (e.g, Frederick II, Ezzelino da Romano III, Guido Novello da Polenta, Guido I da Montefeltro), he also served the governments of Florence, Siena and Forli. His influential book ('Book of Astrology') was written around 1277. Dante places him in hell as punishment for his astrology].

Martinus Scotus of the Cistercian Order, a great teacher, and a man who lived an extraordinary life, was at this time held in great esteem at Rome. He wrote a short history, named Martiniana, after himself. But the Preaching Order gives credit for this work to another Martinus, a bishop of their Order. [Martinus Scotus ('Martin the Scotsman') is unknown to the current editor].

Alexander of Villa-Dei, teacher of the Holy Scriptures, a Benedictine (though some say a Franciscan) at this time wrote a book very useful to students. He divided it into three parts, and it begins with the words Scribere clericulis, etc. [Alexander of Villa-Dei (French Villedieu) was a French author and mathematician born around 1175 in Villedieu-les-Poêles in Normandy. He was a Franciscan (not a Benedictine) and a writer of educational works, including the ('Instruction for Children'), a versified grammar that became a standard text in the Late Middle Ages, and the ('Poem on Algorithm'), on arithmetic, which was also widely used in the 13th-15th centuries. He taught at the University of Paris, and died in 1240].

Vincent of France, a native of Burgundy, historian, master of the Holy Scriptures, and a brother of the Preaching Order, was also illustrious at this time. He wrote countless histories and many excellent works on diverse subjects.

Vincent of Beauvais (in Latin Vincentius Bellovacensis; c. 1190 – c. 1264) wrote the most famous encyclopedia of the Middle Ages. The date of his birth as well as of his death is uncertain, and very little is know of his career. He at one time held the post of "reader" at the monastery of Royaumont (Mons Regalis), not far from Paris.

The Speculum Maius ('The Great Mirror'), the great compendium of all the knowledge of the Middle Ages, as it left the pen of Vincent, seems to have consisted of three parts: (1) Speculum Naturale ('Mirror of Nature') divided into 32 books and 3,718 chapters, a vast summary of all the natural history known to western Europe toward the middle of the 13th century; (2) Speculum Doctrinale ('Mirror of Instruction') in 17 books and 2,374 chapters, a summary of all the scholastic knowledge of the age, being intended as a practical manual for the student and official alike; and, to fulfill this object, it treats of the mechanical arts of life as well as the subtleties of the scholar, the duties of the prince and the tactics of the general. It also treats of mathematics, under which head are included music, geometry, astronomy, astrology, weights, and measures, and metaphysics. It is noteworthy that in this book Vincent shows a knowledge of the Arabic numerals, though he does not call them by this name. The last book of the 17 treats of theology or mythology, and concludes with an account of the Holy Scriptures and of the Fathers down to Bernard of Clairvaux, and the brethren of Saint Victor. (3) Speculum Historiale ('Mirror of History') is an expansion of the last book of the previous volume, and consists of 31 books divided into 3,793 chapters. It brings history down from the Creation to the Crusade of Saint Louis. Four of the medieval historians from whom the author most frequently quotes are Sigebert of Gembloux, Hugh of Fleury, Helinand of Froidmont, and William of Malmesbury.

Vincent can hardly be reckoned an original writer, but is deserving of high praise for his immense industry in collecting, classifying, and arranging these three huge volumes of 80 books and 9,885 chapters. The undertaking to combine all human knowledge into a single whole was in itself a colossal one. Indeed, more than six centuries passed before the idea was again resuscitated; and, even then, it required a group of brilliant Frenchmen to do what the old Dominican did unaided. All the printed editions of Vincent consist of four parts, the additional one being Speculum Morale, clearly the production of a later hand.

The Florentines, after the death of Emperor Frederick, who had so greatly oppressed them, again obtained their freedom, bringing home the Guelphs whom he had driven out; and they re-established themselves in their proper status and mode of life under a commendable government.

Dissension and war occurred at this time between the Venetians and Genoese concerning a cloister in Asia, to the great detriment and injury of both cities and all Christians as a whole.

Michael Palaeologus, a Greek and friend of Emperor Theodore, drove the French and Venetians out of Greece, and killed the said two sons, who had been under his guardianship, and usurped the sovereignty. He reigned 45 years. And thus ended the Roman Empire in Greece, and the Greeks commenced to rule. The Greek sovereignty continued for 196 years until the Year of the Lord 1454. [Michael VII, Palaeologus (1234 – 1281), was the great grandson of Alexius Angels, emperor of Constantinople. He rose to distinction at an early age, and ultimately became commander of the French mercenaries in the employ of the emperors of Nicaea. A few days after the death of Theodore Lascaris II in 1259, Michael, by the assassination of Muzalon, became guardian of the young emperor John Lascaris. Afterward invested with the title of “despot,” he was finally proclaimed joint emperor and crowned alone at Nicaea in 1260. In 1261, Michael conquered Constantinople, and blinded and banished John Lascaris. For this last act he was excommunicated by Arsenius, and the ban was not removed until the accession of a new patriarch in 1268. Subsequently Michael was involved in wars with the Genoese and Venetians, whose influence in Constantinople he sought to diminish by maintaining the balance of strength between them. In 1269, Charles of Sicily, aided by John of Thessaly, made war with the alleged purpose of restoring Baldwin to the throne of Constantinople, and pressed Michael so hard that he consented to the papal supremacy at the council of Lyons in 1274. The union thus brought about between the two Churches was, however, extremely distasteful to the Greeks, and the persecution of his “schismatic” subjects to which the emperor was compelled to resort weakened his power so much that Martin IV was tempted to enter into an alliance with Charles of Anjou and the Venetians for the purpose of re-conquering Constantinople. The invasion, however, failed, and Michael so far had his revenge in the “Sicilian Vespers,” which he helped to bring about. He died in Thrace in December 1282].

Henry (Heinricus), cardinal of Ostia, was at this time a man highly educated in civil and canon law; For this reason he was greatly esteemed by Pope Alexander, at whose request he wrote many good and useful things, and a wonderful summary on both branches of the law. []

Odofredus, second of the name, highly educated in the civil law, wrote many commendable manuscripts on that subject at this time. [Odofredus, Italian jurist of the 13th century, was born at Bologna and studied law under Baldwin (Baldvinus) and Accursius. After having practiced as an advocate both in Italy and France, he became professor at Bologna in 1228. The commentaries on Roman law attributed to him are valuable as showing the growth of the study of law in Italy, and for their bibliographical details of the jurists of the 12th and 13th centuries. Odofredus died at Bologna on December 3rd, 1265].

Aymo, an Englishman, general of the Barefoot Order, and highly learned in the Holy Scriptures, also flourished in the time of the men mentioned above. [Aymo (Aimo?) is unknown to the current editor].

Thomas Aquinas, of the Preaching Order, a teacher, and a disciple of Albertus Magnus, was born of a noble family in the vicinity of Apuleia and Sicily. During these uncertain times of change and turmoil in the kingdom of Sicily (during which King Conrad the Swabian destroyed the city of Aquino), the noble parents of Thomas, being the foremost family in that town, fled from there, placing Thomas under the care of the brothers of Monte Cassino, to be brought up there. Here he devoted himself to learning and spirituality; and afterwards, through the guidance of divine grace with which he was endowed from childhood, he entered the Dominican Order. To the end he lived a very spiritual and perfect life, during which he attained to such extraordinary ability in the Scriptures and in philosophy that no one was found to excel him. For he went to Cologne and advanced to such an extent that after the lapse of several years he became the foremost teacher in Paris. There he wrote four excellent books, and became known as the angelic teacher. Later he was called to Rome by Pope Urban, and offered a higher dignity; but he ignored the offer, and devoted himself entirely to study and writing, producing many vigorous and commendable works, as well as clear and commendable expositions and interpretations, not only of the Holy Scriptures, but also in natural philosophy. Moreover, he became very renowned for his miracles. Finally he was again summoned to Rome, to proceed from there to the Council at Lyons, called by Gregory X. But when he reached Monte Cassino, he was seized with illness; and he journeyed to the Lord in blessedness, on the Nones of March in the Year of the Lord 1274. Because of his manifold miracles he was enrolled among the saintly confessors by Pope John XXII at Avignon on the 15th day of the Kalends of August in the year 1323, fifty years after his exit from the world.

Thomas Aquinas (Thomas of Aquino), prince of scholastic philosophers, and known as Doctor Angelicus (‘Angelic Teacher’) was born at the castle of Roccasecca, near Aquino in the province of Naples, about 1225. Having received his elementary education at the abbey of Monte Cassino, in 1239 he went to study the seven liberal arts at the University of Naples. There, five years later, he entered the Order of Saint Dominic against the wishes of his family. From 1245-48 he studied in Paris under Albertus Magnus, and, when Albert returned to Cologne in 1248, Thomas went with him. In 1252, he was again in Paris, where four years later, after composing the commentaries on the Bible and on the Sentences, he received the degree of Licentiate in Theology, and shortly thereafter that of Master in Theology. For the next few years, he was engaged in teaching and defending the rights of his Order against William of St. Amour, the spokesman of the University of Paris. From 1259-68 he taught at the Pontifical Curia in Rome, and again in Paris from 1268-72, where he began his opposition to Siger of Brabant and the Latin Averroists, and to the Franciscan supporters of Augustinianism. In 1272, he was recalled to his native country to teach at Naples. Like his friend, Bonaventura, he was summoned by Gregory X to the General Council of Lyons (1274) which proposed to reconcile the differences between the Greek and Latin churches, but, while on his way to Lyons, he died on March 7th, 1274.

In spite of the condemnation of many of his doctrines by various churchmen, Thomas was canonized in 1323 by Pope John XXII, and, in 1567, his festival was ranked by Pius V with those of the four great Latin fathers – Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory. No theologian, save Augustine, has had an equal influence on the theological thought of the Western Church, a fact strongly emphasized by Leo XII in his Encyclical of August 4th, 1879, which directed that the teachings of Thomas should be taken as the basis of theology. At least three further justifications for bestowing this honor could be suggested: (1) Thomas was a many-sided nature, as keenly interested in politics or mysticism as in metaphysics or theology. (2) He was the ideal scholar, persuading instead of denouncing his opponents, critical within reason, sober in judgment, and proving all things while holding fast to that which is good. (3) He was the producer of a most astounding Synthesis of past philosophical thought.

All the many writings of Thomas are preparatory to his great work, the Summa Theologica. He began, in 1254, with his Commentary on the Sentences of Peter the Lombard, a work in which the influence of Albertus Magnus and of Augustinianism that he was to desert later, is very evident. Then came his deliverances upon speculative theological problems and his commentaries on certain of the Scriptures. About the same time, he was producing commentaries on Boethius and on certain works of Aristotle. Most of the important doctrines of all these works and the later Opuscula, are set forth in a simplified manner in the two great Summae, the Summa contra Gentiles, and the Summa Theologica.

In the Summa contra Gentiles, the chief work of the Middle Ages on natural theology, Thomas attempts to meet the views and objections of non-Christians by clearly distinguishing the spheres of natural reason and faith. Reason and faith, he thinks, are both concerned with the same object, but in different ways; the former starts from sense-data, and attains to a knowledge of the existence, unity, goodness, intelligence and will of God; the latter rests on revelation and authority, and attains to a knowledge of God as a purely spiritual Being, that is, a Being with a Trinity of persons. Each requires to take into account the knowledge arrived at by the other, and, on account of the difference in their method, there need be no fear of contamination; they cannot be confused and they should not be isolated. Of the two, faith is the more important, because it bestows on man knowledge that he could not ordinarily possess, and thus it is said to transcend reason. True reason and faith can never be contradictory, for they both come from the one source of all truth, God, the Absolute One.

In 1265, Thomas began his Summa Theologica, intended to be the sum of all known learning. It is divided into three parts—God, Man, and the God-Man. The first and second parts are wholly his own work, but in the third only the first 90 questions are his; the rest of it was finished in accordance with his designs by Reginald of Piperno. Part I treats of the existence of God, of his nature and attributes, of the Trinity, of the Creation, of problems pertaining to the angels and to man, and lastly, of the divine government of the world. Part II deals firstly of general morality as founded on the ethics of Aristotle, and including man's end, his will, the passions of his soul, virtue in general, sin, the old law and the new law of grace—the latter dealing with special morality, including the theological and cardinal virtues which raise numerous practical issues, and the contemplative life. In the third part of the Summa, Thomas discusses the person, office, and work of Christ, and had begun to discuss the sacraments when death ended his labors.

Charles (Carolus), brother of King Louis (Ludovici) of France, was declared king of Sicily by Pope Clement upon the death of Manfred; and he reigned 7 [Charles I ruled Sicily for 17 years (as the German edition states), not 7 years]. years. Not long afterwards he brought the kingdom of Sicily and Apuleia under his dominion. Then he proceeded to Viterbo to help the pope with his entire army. But when he learned that the youthful Conrad, grandson of King Conrad the Swabian, had been called forth to proceed against the Guelphs in Italy, he marched into Etruria. And there occurred a great battle in which Conradin was taken prisoner and beheaded. After this Charles made peace with the Pisans, and with them he went to the assistance of his brother King Louis. But when he found his brother dead, he made peace with the king of Tunis, upon condition that he pay the king and his successors, forever, an annual tribute.

Charles I (1226 –1285), king of Naples and Sicily, and count of Anjou, was the seventh child of Louis VII of France and Blanche of Castile. Louis died a few months after Charles' birth and was succeeded by his son, Louis IX (St. Louis), and, on the death in 1232 of the third son, John, count of Anjou and Maine, those fiefs were conferred on Charles. In 1248, Charles accompanied Louis in the crusade to Egypt, but, on the defeat of the Crusaders, he was taken prisoner with his brother. He was ransomed and returned to Provence in 1250. In 1262 Pope Urban IV determined to destroy the power of the Hohenstaufen in Italy, and offered the kingdom of Naples and Sicily to Charles of Anjou, in consideration of a yearly tribute. Charles accepted and collected a large army to take possession. Pope Clement IV conferred on the expedition all the privileges of a crusade. After narrowly escaping capture by Manfred's fleet, Charles reached Rome safely and was there crowned king of the Two Sicilies. In 1266, he encountered his rival Manfred, son of Emperor Frederick II, at Benevento, where Manfred was defeated and slain, and the whole kingdom was soon in Charles' possession. In 1268 he defeated Conradin, Frederick's grandson and last legitimate descendant of the Hohenstaufen, at Tagliacozza. Conradin was taken prisoner, tried as a rebel, and executed at Naples.

In 1272, Charles took part with Louis IX in a crusade to North Africa. The election of Rudolf of Hapsburg as German king, and that of Nicholas III to the Holy See, diminished Charles' power. The cruelty of the French rulers of Sicily provoked in 1282 the rebellion known as the Sicilian Vespers. Charles determined to subjugate the island, but his fleet was completely destroyed, as was also that of Charles' son, who was taken prisoner. Charles came to Naples with a new fleet, and was preparing to invade Sicily again, when he died at Foggia in 1285.

The sect of the Flagellants had its origin in Italy; and from there permeated into Germany and France. They whipped themselves with scourges provided with knots and barbs. Out of this practice originated many errors of faith and in the sacrament. To some extent this sect was finally exterminated by fire and sword.

A sect of fanatics (Flagellants) started in Perugia in 1260, flourished for a brief while in Italy, and were almost forgotten, when the ravages of the Black Plague in Europe (1347-1349) caused their revival, appearing first in Magdeburg in 1349. Believing that their sins had called down the vengeance of heaven, vast processions of penitents passed through the streets, armed with scourges, lashing themselves and one another until the blood flowed. They marched with torches and banners at night in the winter, and penetrated into the solitudes of mountain and forest. The penance was repeated twice a day—morning and evening, and continued for thirty-three and one half days, in memory of Christ's earthly life.

The greatest enthusiasm was excited on their behalf throughout Germany. It often happened that after they had lashed themselves in the churches, they were entertained in the market place. Clement IV and succeeding pontiffs issued bulls against them, and they were condemned by the Council of Constance in 1414.

The theologians say that at this time the following prayer was praised by the upper classes, Blessed be the sweet name of the Lord Jesus Christ and his Mother, the glorious Virgin Mary, forever and ever. Amen. The Virgin Mary and her good Son bless us. Amen. And whoever should say this or make this prayer was, at the request of Louis (Ludovici) the Saint, King of France, rewarded by Pope Innocent with an indulgence of three years, for each time it was repeated.

Philip, son of Saint Louis (Ludovici), the king, assumed the sovereignty upon the death of his father and brother in Africa. He reigned fifteen years and resembled his father in piety of life. He fled from the plague in Africa into Italy, and established a five years' truce between the Genoese and the Venetians. For the sake of the Christian faith he performed many commendable deeds of kindness at home and abroad. He provided a beautiful sepulcher for the remains of Mary Magdalene, and a larger chapel, and locked her head in a little silver shrine. He also did many similar and far greater things. [Philip III (1245 – 1285), surnamed 'the Bold,' king of France, son of Louis IX, had many of the virtues of his father, but neither decision of character nor devotion to duty. He was pious, charitable, of unimpeachable morality, quick tempered, but forgiving, no great scholar, and energetic only as a hunter. His lack of fitness to rule made his court the arena of intriguing factions, which, in reality, ruled France during his reign of fifteen years. Mathew of Vendome, abbot of St. Denis, an old servant of Louis IX, acted as Philip's counselor throughout the reign. He died in 1285].

Pope Gregory the Tenth (formerly called Theobald), an Italian, born at Piacenza of a noble family, which had been driven from Milan, and an archdeacon of Liege, while in Asia was elected pope by an assembly of the cardinals at Viterbo. During all his life he was a renowned man, wise and prudent in all his affairs and business, brave and firm in disposition, a scorner of wealth and mundane things, and mild and kind-hearted toward the poor Christians, particularly those who took refuge in the bosom of the Papal See. As soon as he entered upon the pontificate he undertook, with the assistance of King Philip of France, to arbitrate the turmoil and war between the Genoese and Venetians. After this arbitration he proceeded to Florence with Charles (Carolo) the king of Sicily. Through sympathy for the citizens who had been exiled from this city, and with the support of King Charles, he took measures for their return. The pope then proceeded to Lyons to hold a council there. And to Lyons came Palaeologus, emperor of Constantinople. And so Rudolf was chosen Roman Emperor by the electors. After good management of this council the pontiff again returned to Italy. On the way he was approached by Alphonso, the king of Castile, who complained of the election of Rudolf to the imperial sovereignty, because his rights to the imperial title under the former election had not been respected. But the pope pacified Alphonso with kind words and many reasons; and in consequence Alphonso abandoned and waived his rights and demands against the newly elected Roman emperor. The pope then proceeded to Arezzo; and there he died in the fourth year, second month, and tenth day of his pontificate. [Gregory X (Tebaldo Visconti), pope from 1271 to 1276, was born at Piacenza in 1208, and became Archdeacon of Liege. While accompanying Edward of England on the crusade, he was elected pope and consecrated in 1271. He summoned the 14th general council at Lyons in 1274 for the purpose of considering the eastern schism, the condition of the Holy Land, and the abuses of the church. The Greeks were persuaded to consent to a union for the time being, and Rudolf of Hapsburg renounced at the council all imperial rights in the States of the Church. Gregory issued the constitution determining for the first time the form of conclave at papal elections. He was on his way to Rome to crown Rudolf when he died at Arezzo on January 10th, 1276].

Innocent the Fifth, a Burgundian, formerly called Peter of Tarentaise, of the order of Saint Dominic, a man highly learned in the Holy Scriptures, was elected pope at Arezzo in the Year of the Lord 1275. At this time the Florentines sent emissaries to Rome to secure removal of the ban which had been pronounced against them; and this the pope granted. He would have brought the Genoese and Venetians to his way of thinking, had he not been suddenly taken by death; for he died in the Lateran Palace on the second day of the sixth month of his pontificate. [Innocent V (Pierre de Champagni or de Tarentaise), pope from January 21st to June 22nd, 1276, was born about 1225 in Savoy, and entered the Dominican order at an early age. He studied theology under Thomas Aquinas, Albertus Magnus and Bonaventura. He was made archbishop of Lyons in 1271; cardinal-bishop of Ostia and Velletri and grand penitentiary in 1275; and, partly through the influence of Charles of Anjou, was elected to succeed Gregory X. As pope he established peace between the republics of Lucca and Pisa, and confirmed Charles of Anjou in his office of imperial vicar of Tuscany. He was seeking to carry out the Lyons agreement with the Eastern Church when he died. Before he became pope, Innocent prepared in conjunction with Albertus Magnus and Thomas Aquinas a rule of studies for his order, which was accepted in 1259. He was also the author of several works in philosophy, theology and the canon law. He was succeeded by Adrian V].

Adrian (Hadrianus) the Fifth, a Genoese, formerly called Ottobuono, was elevated to the papacy in the hall of the Lateran at Rome. He was a relative of Innocent the Fourth, who had previously made him a cardinal. He was a man of magnanimous disposition, and as soon as he had accepted the care of the papal see he journeyed to Viterbo to make proposals to mitigate the power of Charles (Caroli); and for that reason he invited King Rudolf to assist him; but Rudolf was delayed in doing so because of the war in which he was engaged with the king of Bohemia. It was this pope's plan to carry out many beneficial measures, but death intervened. He died on the fiftieth (or, as others say, fortieth) day of his pontificate at Viterbo. [Adrian V (Ottobuono de' Fieschi), pope in 1276, was a Genoese. He was created cardinal deacon by his uncle, Innocent IV. In 1264, he was sent to England to mediate between Henry III and the barons. He was elected pope to succeed Innocent V on July 11th, 1276, but died at Viterbo on August 18th, without having been ordained, even to the priesthood].

A council or great assembly was convened at Lyons in this year by Pope Gregory the Tenth. The first matter considered was the recovery of Jerusalem. To this council came the Greek emperor, Michael Palaeologus, with a large entourage, and consented, for the thirteenth time, to the union of the eastern and the Western or Roman Churches, in accordance with the wishes of the Greeks. A number of wellborn and noble people of Scythia, who accompanied the said emperor, received baptism and adopted the Christian faith. And Rudolf, who had been chosen Roman emperor by the electors, was confirmed in the same council by Pope Gregory upon condition that he peaceably come to Italy in the following year to be anointed and to receive the imperial crown, and afterwards lend his utmost assistance toward the recovery of the city of Jerusalem.

Year of the Lord 1273

Rudolf, count of Hapsburg, was elected Roman emperor by the common and unanimous choice of the electors, after the long interregnum of the Roman sovereignty and the destruction of the estates of the Roman Empire. He was elected upon condition, as stated previously, that he proceed to Rome the following year to receive the imperial crown, and was authorized by Pope Gregory to rescue the Holy Land. He was an intelligent, prudent, and ingenious man, strict in his dealings, earnest in warfare and defense, just and God-fearing, invulnerable in the excellence of his reputation, strong of body, of handsome countenance, wise counsel, magnanimous, and very generous. In consideration of such commendable ability and characteristics, he became emperor; and he reigned for 19 years, transacting the business of the German nation and of the country with care and industry. Rudolf had been the major-domo of Ottakar, the king of Bohemia; but when he was chosen defender of the common Christian welfare, he demanded through his imperial emissaries that Ottakar deliver up to him Austria, Kernten, and other places bordering on Italy, as possessions of the Roman Empire. When Duke Frederick of Austria died without bodily issue, his sister Margaret inherited that country. She married Ottakar, to whom the Austrian principality consequently reverted. Ulrich, who possessed the principality of Kernten, also was without issue of his body; for this reason he sold to Ottakar, Kernten, Krain, and the Wendic March, and other lands. But since Austria was no longer a female fief, and Ulric held the aforesaid lands without the authority or consent of the Roman emperor, and consequently had no authority to sell them, Emperor Rudolf asked Ottakar to surrender the same. This the Bohemian king Ottakar refused to do; nevertheless they were united through subjugation, and Austria became subject to the emperor. On both sides they intermarried their children with one another, and thus the non-assenting lands became espoused estates. Although the Bohemian king took an oath to observe these things, he was so influenced by the words of his wife that he collected a large army against the emperor. The emperor engaged the king in a great battle and killed him. Finally Rudolf died at Erfurt, of weakness and age. However, before his death, his daughter Gutta, together with her husband Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia and son of Ottakar, came to him at Erfurt. He was removed to Spire and buried with the Roman emperors in the Year of the Lord 1291 in the 22nd day of July.

Rudolf I (1218-1291), German king, son of Albert IV, count of Hapsburg, and Hedwig, daughter of Ulrich, count of Kyburg, was born at Limburg on May 1st, 1218. At his father's death in 1239, Rudolf inherited the family estates in Alsace, and, in 1245, married Gertrude, daughter of Burkhard III, count of Hohenberg. A partisan of the emperor Frederick II and his son, Conrad IV, he was richly rewarded by them, but, in 1254, was excommunicated by Innocent IV. In the general disorder after the fall of the Hohenstaufen, he increased his estates largely at the expense of his uncle, Hartmann of Kyburg, and the bishops of Strasbourg and Basle, becoming the most powerful prince in south-western Germany. His election as German king at Frankfurt (September 29th, 1273) was largely due to the efforts of his brother-in-law, Frederick II, of Hohenzollern, burgrave of Nuremberg. The support of Albert, duke of Sax-Lauenburg, and of Louis II, count palatine of the Rhine and duke of upper Bavaria, had been purchased by betrothing them to two of Rudolf's daughters; so that Ottakar II, king of Bohemia, a candidate of the throne, was almost alone in his opposition. Rudolf was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle on October 24th, 1273. To win the approbation of the pope, Rudolf renounced all imperial rights in Rome, the papal territory and Sicily, and promised to land a new crusade; and Pope Gregory X, in spite of Ottakar's protests, not only recognized Rudolf himself, but persuaded Alphonso X, king of Castile, who had been chosen German king in 1257, to do the same. From 1274-78, Rudolf was engaged in an intermittent struggle with Ottakar, which ended with the latter's death. Rudolf then set about consolidating his authority in Austria and the adjacent countries, where he met much opposition. At length, in December 1282 Rudolf invested his sons, Albert and Rudolf, with the duchies of Austria and Styria at Augsburg, and so laid the foundations of the greatness of the house of Hapsburg.

In 1281, Rudolf compelled Philip I, count of upper Burgundy to cede some districts to him, forced the citizens of Berne to pay tribute, and in 1289 marched against Philip's successor, Otto IV, and compelled him to do homage. He was much less successful, however, in maintaining order in Germany, although in 1289 he led an expedition into Thuringia and destroyed some robber castles. In 1281, his first wife died, and on February 5th, 1284 he married Isabella, daughter of Hugh IV, duke of Burgundy. In 1291, he attempted to secure the election of his son, Albert, as German king, but without success. Rudolf died at Spire in 1291 and was buried in the cathedral there.

Conradin, grandson of Emperor Frederick the Swabian, born of his son Conrad, at the request of the Ghibellines, proceeded against the Guelphs with a large powerful army of Germans, and arrived at Verona. Afterwards he went to Pavia, and from there passed through Cararra as far as the gulf of Genoa. He then collected a large army of Ghibellines from Lombardy and Romandiola and at Arezzo and slew King Charles's Sicilian marshall. After this Conradin and the Duke of Austria, both still young, engaged in battle with Charles. From this battle they fled, but after the expiration of eight days they were spied out, brought before Charles, condemned to death by the sword, and slain. With the death of Conradin the duchy of Swabia came to an end, together with his shield and helmet. The duke of Swabia had gloriously ruled over the Roman Empire until the year 1250. [Conradin (1252-1268), king of Jerusalem and Sicily, son of the German king Conrad IV, was born in Bavaria in 1252. Although he had been entrusted by his father to the guardianship of the Church, Pope Innocent IV sought to bestow the kingdom of Sicily on a foreign prince. Innocent's successor, Alexander IV, continued this policy, offered the Hohenstaufen lands in Germany to Alphonso X, king of Castile, and forbade Conradin's election as king of the Romans. Having assumed the title of king of Jerusalem and Sicily, Conradin took possession of the Duchy of Swabia in 1262. Conradin's first invitation to Italy came from the Guelphs of Florence, by whom he was asked to take arms against Manfred, who had been crowned king of Sicily in 1258. This invitation was refused, but, after Manfred's fall in 1266, envoys came again to Bavaria. Conradin crossed the Alps and issued a manifesto at Verona setting forth his claim on Sicily. His partisans both in the north and south of Italy took up arms; his envoy was received with enthusiasm at Rome; and the young king himself was welcomed at Pavia and Pisa. In November 1267, he was excommunicated, but his fleet was victorious over that of Charles, duke of Anjou, who had taken possession of Sicily on Manfred's death; and in July 1268, he was himself greeted with great enthusiasm at Rome. In August 1268 he unsuccessfully encountered the troops of Charles of Tagliacozzo. He was seized at Astura and handed over to Charles. Tried as a traitor, he was beheaded with his friend, Frederick of Baden, titular duke of Austria. With his death, the Hohenstaufen race became extinct].

At this time Henry (Heinricus), younger son of King Richard, duke of Cornwall, went to the pope concerning his paternal kingdom; and Guido, count of Montfort, also still a youth, together with King Philip of France, went there as well. And it so happened that on a certain day they met in the church of Saint Lawrence at Viterbo. But when Guido was informed of the presence of said Henry there, and learned that he was the son of King Richard, by whom Simon, his father, was treacherously slain in England, he came upon him and stabbed him there in violation of the sanctity of the aforesaid church.

Hedwig (Hegwidis), a duchess of Poland, a widow of marvelous sanctity, by her father a margravine of Bada, and by her mother an Eastern margravine and countess of Rochlitz, was sent to Kitzingen for education. She was espoused to Duke Henry (Heinrico) of Silesia, and bore three sons and as many daughters. The oldest was slain in a battle with the infidels. She erected a noble cloister to the Cistercian Order at Trebnitz, not far from Breslau; and in it she established her daughter Gertrude as abbess over one hundred virgins. Upon the death of her husband she lived a pious life there. Upon her death she was enrolled among the number of the saints because of her manifold miracles.

Hedwig, Berthold XI, Count of Andechs, Marquis of Istria, duke of Dalmatia and Meran, by his wife Agnes of Rochlitz, had four sons, Egbert, bishop of Bamberg; Berthold, patriarch of Aquileia; Henry, who succeeded to the marquisate of Istria; Otto, who inherited the duchy of Meran; and three daughters: Hedwig, Agnes and Gertrude.

Hedwig was born in 1174, educated at Kitzingen, and espoused, at the age of twelve, to Henry I, duke of Silesia. She became the mother of three sons and a like number of daughters. In 1238, being now a widow, she retreated to the Cistercian convent of Trednitz, near Breslau, which she herself had founded and richly furnished. Depressed by the misfortunes of her kin, she died in 1243, was canonized in 1268, and is regarded as the patroness of Silesia.

ILLUSTRATION

Hedwig is portrayed as a nun. In her left hand she holds a model of the convent she founded at Trednitz, near Breslau; in her right hand, an image of the Virgin and Child. The portrait is not in accord with the traditional portrayal. She is usually represented as a Cistercian nun, with crown and mantle; also as barefooted and carrying her shoes in her hand, as was her custom.

John the Twenty-First, a native of Spain or Portugal, from the city of Lisbon, a Tusculanian bishop and cardinal, previously called Peter the Physician, was elected pope. And although this man was otherwise educated and fond of learned people, yet it is said that he was ignorant and awkward in the conduct of his office and dealings, and inconsistent and indifferent in his observance of the customs. They say he wrote much during his lifetime, particularly different rules applicable to medicine; also a book that physicians called the Treasure of the Poor. This pope exhorted Michael Palaeologus, the Greek emperor, to observe the union established and confirmed by the Council of Lyons. In the time of this pope the Venetians pursued those of Ancona with a severe war. At the same time the Templars residing in the city of Tyre accorded the Venetian merchants many rights and privileges. In the meantime the aforesaid Greek emperor, with enticing and equivocal words, influenced this Pope John to go to Viterbo into a chamber which this pope was causing to be built, and which fell, causing his death in the eighth month of his pontificate. [John XXI (Pedro Giuliano-Rebulo), pope from September 8th, 1276 to May 20th, 1277 (should be named John XX, but there is an error in the reckoning through the insertion of an antipope), a native of Lisbon, educated for the church, became archdeacon and then archbishop of Praga (1271-75). He ingratiated himself with Gregory X at the council of Lyons (1274) and he was taken to Rome as cardinal-bishop of Frascati, and succeeded Gregory after an interregnum of twenty days. As pope, he excommunicated Alphonso III of Portugal for interfering with Episcopal elections, and sent legates to the Great Khan. He was killed in 1277 by a fall of the roof in the palace he had built at Viterbo. His successor was Nicholas III. John XXI has been identified since the 14th century with Petrus Hispanus, a celebrated Portuguese physician and philosopher, author of several medical works. John XXI is often referred to as a magician by ignorant chroniclers].

Pope Nicholas the Third, a Roman of the Orsini family and formerly called Giovanni (Iohannes) Gaetano, was elected pope after an interregnum of six months; for the cardinals, soon after the death of the aforesaid Pope John, went to Rome for the purpose of electing a new pope; and King Charles (Carolus) of Sicily, with the support of the Roman senate, attempted to secure control and custody of the assembly of cardinals, which resulted in great detriment to the church and various disadvantages to himself; for he preferred to see a Frenchman rather than an Italian elected pope. In consequence the election was delayed into the seventh month, to the marked prejudice and peril of Christendom; for this reason the nobles and common people of Italy became estranged from the king and regarded him with disfavor; and therefore this Giovanni Gaetano, a cardinal, was elected pope; and he was called Nicholas the Third. This Nicholas was so well endowed physically and mentally that he accomplished many things; and he undertook many more on the strength of his knowledge and magnanimity. Yet he considered nothing of more consequence throughout his pontificate than to quell and mitigate the power and might of said King Charles; and this he accomplished by ingenuity born of his striking prudence and intelligence, recovering from King Charles many cities and communities which his ancestors had forcibly taken from the Roman Church, and which he still held. This Nicholas was a wise counselor, a promoter and lover of men of learning, and a generous distributor of spiritual dignities. He created a number of bishops and cardinals, selecting them from among the learned men of the Preaching and Barefoot Orders and others. He also made a number of beautiful additions to the churches at Rome. It is stated that he performed the office of the mass with such inward feeling and devotion that he shed tears all the while. Yet he was subject to aspersions; for he was accused of favoring his relatives and bestowing many possessions and estates upon them. He died of a stroke at Rome in the third year of his pontificate. Then (the seat) was vacant for five months. [Nicholas III (Giovanni Gaetano Orsini), pope from 1277 to 1280, was a Roman nobleman who had served under eight popes. He succeeded John XXI largely through family influence, after a vacancy of six months in the Holy See. A born politician, he concluded a concordat with Rudolf of Hapsburg in 1278, by which the Romagna and the exarchate of Ravenna were guaranteed to the pope. He issued an epoch-making constitution for the government of Rome that forbade foreigners taking civil office. He repaired the Lateran and the Vatican at enormous cost. Nicholas brought just reproach on himself by his nepotism].

William (Guilhelmus), citizen of Placentia, and a highly renowned physician, lectured at this time at Verona for a common wage. And there he wrote an excellent book on surgery which he later ably extended into four volumes, including all plagues and diseases.

William (Guilhelmus) Durand of the Preaching Order, surnamed Speculator, a bishop of Provence, a disciple of Hostiensis the teacher, and an excellent instructor in the canon law, at this time as he himself attests wrote a useful work on jurisprudence called the Speculum, from which he derived the surname Speculator. As some say, he also wrote another book entitled Rationale Divinorum Officiorum.

William (Guillaume) Durand (1230-1296), was a French canonist and liturgical writer who studied law at Bologna and taught canon law at Modena. Under Nicholas III and Martin IV he held high offices in the Church. He successfully defended the papal territories, both by diplomacy and arms. In 1295 he refused the archbishopric of Ravenna, and in 1296 retired to Rome, where he died the same year. His principal work is the Speculum iudiciale ('The Judicial Mirror' or 'Mirror for Magistrates'), while his Rationale divinorum officiorum ('Explication of the Divine Office') on the origin and symbolism of the Christian ritual is an authority on the Western liturgy. Indeed, the latter work is, perhaps, the most important medieval treatise on the symbolism of church architecture and rituals of worship. This work, often ranked with the Bible as one of the most frequently copied and disseminated texts in the Late Middle Ages, served as an encyclopedic compendium and textbook for liturgists and remains an indispensable guide for understanding the significance of medieval ecclesiastical art and worship ceremonies.

This Guillaume Durand is not to be confused with the Dominican Guillaume Durand (Durandus of St. Pourcain), French scholastic theologian, surnamed Doctor Resolutissimus ('Most Stubborn/Resolute Teacher').

The Saracens sailed from Africa into Upper and Lower Spain, but the Christians, miraculously marked with the cross, defeated them in battle.

While a dance was proceeding on a bridge over the Meuse, at Utrecht, the most Holy Sacrament was being carried in advance of the dancers to a sick person. Because the dancers showed no respect or honor to the said Sacrament, the bridge broke, and about 200 persons fell into the river Meuse and were drowned as a punishment of their forgetfulness of the gratitude due to God. [See note on Folio CCLXI recto (Illustration)]

A noble woman, in the bishopric of Constance, had a very unusual birth at this time—a miraculous lion.

In the city of Esslingen, in upper Bavaria (as it is said) a monster was born to a woman. From the navel up it had two breasts and two heads facing each other, and four arms embracing; also two pudenda. The monster died after it was born.

Fifteen Swabian counts formed an alliance against Emperor Rudolf, causing him much distress. The most renowned and distinguished among them were the counts of Montfort, Helffenstein, and from Württemberg and Toggenburg [Toggenburg (here called Tockenbourg) is an ancient country in the upper valley of the river Thur, in Switzerland, whose former owners, the counts of Toggenburg, belonged to the wealthiest and most distinguished dynasty of the country. The line became extinct in 1436]. But he destroyed their possessions and estates and made them forever subject to the empire. Later he destroyed the castles of the robbers in many parts of Germany, and established peace from the mountains of Italy to Britain.

The Venetians and Genoese from time to time up to the present continued the war which they had begun at Ptolemais; and of this we will make some mention. In the twelve hundred sixty-third year the Venetians sent a great and mighty fleet under their general Rainerio (Raynerio) Zeno to the vicinity of Sicily, where they had hoped to find the Genoese fleet. Being disappointed, they sailed to Asia. At Tyre they unexpectedly encountered the Genoese fleet and defeated it. Elated with their triumph, they undertook the capture of the city of Tyre with the assistance of those of Ptolemais and Acco; but the enterprise failed. The Genoese having received information that a number of vessels laden with merchandise were proceeding overseas from Venice, secretly lay in wait for them; but when the Venetians were warned by their spies and messengers, they deposited the cargo of their ships on shore, and lost the empty vessels. Three years later the Venetian ships accidentally encountered Genoese ships at Lilybaeum [Lilybaeum (now Marsala) situated on the promontory of the same name, which forms the extreme west point of Sicily, now called Capo Boeo. It was a city of military and commercial importance in ancient times, and, after the fall of the Roman Empire, continued to be one of the most important cities of Sicily. The people, during the Arabian dominion in Sicily, attached too much value to its port that they called it Marsa Alla – the port of God – from which has come its modern appellation of Marsala. It was not until the 16th century that this celebrated port was blocked up with a mole or mound of sunken stones by order of the Emperor Charles V in order to protect it from attacks of the Barbary corsairs. From that period, Trapani has taken its place as the principal port in the West of Sicily; but Marsala is still a considerable town, and a place of some trade, especially in wine. Lilybaeum was originally founded by the Carthaginians, and continued in their hands until it passed under the domain of Rome], and captured them. When the news reached Genoa, the Genoese sent a strong fleet in pursuit of the Venetian ships; and the Genoese attacked the Venetians in the straits of Drepanum [Drepanum (now Trapani) is a city and Episcopal see of Sicily, capital of the province of the same name, and situated on the west coast of the island. The ancient Drepanum (Greek for 'sickle,' from the shape of the low spit of land on which it stands) was originally the port of Eryx. It is represented by Virgil in the as the scene of the death of Anchises. It was an important Carthaginian naval station in the First Punic War. Under the Norman kings at the time of the first crusade it became a place of importance; it was a residence of the Aragonese kings. Trapani has a harbor of some importance. There are also large salt-pans to the south of the city, extending along the coast as far as Marsala], and both sides became involved in a great battle. The Genoese sustained heavy damage through the burning and loss of their ships. Because of this defeat Emperor Michael of Constantinople, scorning his association with the Genoese, entered into a five-years' peace with the Venetians.

The historian Ptolemy Lucensis states that Pope Nicholas (if death had not altered his plans), would have created two kings, one in Lombardy, the other in Etruria, through whom Italy might have protected and defended itself against the Roman and Sicilian kings who had abused their office. The same pope ordained that henceforth no one of royal blood should be elevated to the office of Roman senator.

The Tartars, together with the Armenians, defeated one hundred thousand Babylonians, slaying many, and reducing the rest to flight. In this year also, the island of Sicily seceded from Charles (Carolo), its king; and the count of Apuleia, son of said Charles, was defeated by the son of the king of Aragon in a naval engagement, with the loss of many men, and was taken to Apulia and lodged in prison.

. Dance on the bridge at Utrecht, is represented by a fair sized woodcut. The scene is depicted as a very narrow rivulet, over which a miniature corduroy bridge has been constructed. Across this bridge passes a priest with the Holy Sacrament, an acolyte at his side carrying a lantern and bell. They have passed over the bridge, and are followed by a group of dancers, one of them playing on a musical instrument. They are unmindful of the mission of the priest, and of the presence of the Sacrament. The bridge has parted, and a number of them are struggling in the water. But in spite of the cries and commotion made by the submerged ones, the rest of the party is nonchalantly going forward to the same fate. The banner of the resurrection is suspended from the boy carrying staff of the lantern and flutters in the breeze.

2. A miraculous lion born to a woman in the bishopric of Constance, rests in contentment on a soft cushion ornamented with tassels. Unlike the vague, rather generic description in the Chronicle, this miraculous lion is depicted as having a child's head and lion's body.
3. The subject is one person up to the navel, where it divides into two bodies, chest and head facing each other, arms embracing. The woodcut does not agree with the text in all the details (text = four arms; woodcut = two arms; text = two sets of pudenda; woodcut = one set of pudenda).

Pope Martin the Fourth, previously called Simon, a cardinal, and a native of France, was elected pope six months after the death of Pope Nicholas and after a long controversy. This pope made six cardinals on the day of the Resurrection; and he reinstated King Charles (Carolus), who came to him, in the office of senator, from which he had been deposed by Pope Nicholas. At the request of said Charles, and upon his complaint that the Greek emperor Palaeologus had disobeyed and ignored the decision of the Council at Lyons, this pope, in the first year of his pontificate (in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred eighty-one) excommunicated Palaeologus as well as the Aragonese king for his wanton and violent retention of the kingdom of Sicily. In the beginning of the following year, after the Perugians had overrun the Fulgmates [Probably those of Fulginium (Latin for Foligno)], devastating their country, and besieging their city and taking it by force, the pope placed the Perugians under the ban, subjected them to a heavy money fine, and reconciled them to the Church. This pope also conducted a war against the Forlians, who had seceded from Church, and soon reduced them to obedience. Because of the revolt of the Ghibellines against the Guelphs this pope fled to Paris, where he died of a fever not long after, and was buried in the episcopal basilica there. At his grave many sick persons were restored to health by God in recognition of this saintly pope's merit.

[Martin IV (Simon Mompitit de Brion), pope from 1281 to 1285, should have been named Martin II. He was born about 1210 in Touraine, and became a priest at Rouen and a canon of St. Martin's at Tours. He was made chancellor of France by Louis IX in 1260 and cardinal-priest of Santa Cecilia by Urban IV in 1261. As papal legate in France he conducted the negotiations for the assumption of the crown of Sicily by Charles of Anjou, through whose influence he succeeded Nicholas III after a six-month struggle between the French and Italian cardinals. The Romans at first declined to receive him, and he was consecrated at Orvieto on March 31st, 1281. His excommunication of the emperor Michael Palaeologus, who stood in the way of the French projects against Greece, weakened the union with Eastern Christians, dating from the Council of Lyons in 1274. Martin unduly favored his own countrymen, and, for three years after the Sicilian Vespers (1282), he employed all the resources of the papacy on behalf of his patron against Peter of Aragon. He was driven from Rome by a popular uprising and died at Perugia. He was succeeded by Honorius IV].

Pope Honorius the Fourth, a Roman of the ancient noble family of the Savelli, formerly called Giacomo (Iacobus), a cardinal, was elected pope at Paris without much delay; for with this matter the cardinals concerned themselves as being of first importance. He came to Rome in the one thousand two hundred eighty-fifth Year of the Lord, a time when his brother Pandolfus held the office of senator. At this time law and order prevailed at Rome. This pope was entirely favorable and partial to the conduct of the French king, during his whole life an upright pious man, and a great lover of the Christians and the clergy. He confirmed the Carmelite order which had been attacked by many and not adequately defended at a former council. He was very fond of learned, able, intelligent and worldly-wise people, and showed particular favor to those who were attached to the papal court and defended it. Finally, not long afterwards he died in the second year and first day of his pontificate, and his body was carried from Saint Sabina to the Basilica of Peter in a great funeral procession. And he was buried in marble sepulcher, which is still in existence. The seat then was vacant for 10 months as many cardinals were suffering from a lingering illness. [Honorius IV, formerly Giacomo (James) Savelli, studied in Paris and was made a cardinal in 1261. He was elected pope in 1285 and died in 1287].

Emperor Rudolf sent his chancellor to Etruria under command and with authority to grant liberty to all who would pay for it and declare their fidelity to the Roman Empire. Those of Lucca gave twelve thousand guilders, and were given their liberty. And so the Florentines established a new and useful form of government by a constitution providing for the order of their rulers, and defining and distinguishing the duties of the various offices.

A number of cities in Upper Swabia, formerly considered villages, were enclosed with walls by the Roman emperor, and endowed with civic rights and privileges, particularly Esslingen, Reutlingen, and Heilbrunn.

In the month of February of this year a sea fish in the form of a lion was caught and brought to Pope Martin in the ancient city. The animal howled, shouted and cried like a human being, and many who heard it were frightened and amazed. And this was a sign of great dissension.

At this time a child, with claws like a bear, was born to the cousin of Martin himself. Of this he was so ashamed that he caused all the pictures of bears in his houses to be scraped from the walls.

Charles (Carolus) the Second, son of the king of Sicily, as a youth attained to the sovereignty after the death of his father in this year; and he reigned 25 years. He had many battles with Peter, the king of Aragon, finally wounding him so seriously that he died. And now having freed himself of his enemy, he consumed the rest of his days in peace. In the fifth year of Charles's reign the king of Hungary having died without male issue, his kingdom descended upon Charles by his wife through inheritance, and he bequeathed it to his first born son Charles. Finally, he died at the age of 40, leaving behind nine sons and four daughters by his wife Mary, daughter of the Hungarian king. The most renowned of these were Charles, surnamed Marcellus, king of Hungary; Ludwig, who joined the Barefoot Order; and Robert, who succeeded to the kingdom. [Charles II (1250-1309), king of Naples and Sicily, son of Charles I, had been captured by Ruggiero di Lauria in the naval battle of Naples in 1284, and, when his father died, he was still a prisoner in the hands of Peter of Aragon. In 1288, Charles was liberated with the understanding that he retain Naples alone, Sicily being left to the Aragonese, and induce his cousin Charles of Valois to renounce the kingdom of Aragon, given to him by Martin IV. He went to Rieti where the new pope Nicholas IV immediately absolved him from all the conditions he had sworn to observe, crowned him king of the Sicilies, and excommunicated Alphonso, while Charles of Valois, in alliance with Castile, prepared to take Aragon. Alphonso III, the Aragonese king, being hard pressed, promised to withdraw the troops he had sent to help his brother James in Sicily, to renounce all rights there, and pay tribute to the Holy See. Alphonso died childless in 1291 before the treaty could be carried out, and James took possession of Aragon, leaving the government of Sicily to the third brother, Frederick. The new pope, Boniface VII, elected in 1294, under the auspices of King Charles, mediated between the latter and James, and a most dishonorable treaty was signed. An attempt was made to bribe Frederick into consenting to the arrangement, but being backed by his people, he refused, and was later crowned king of Sicily. Peace was made in 1302, Charles giving up Sicily and agreeing to the marriage of his daughter Leonora to King Frederick; the treaty was ratified by the pope in 1303. Charles died in 1309, and was succeeded by his son, Robert].

Wenceslaus, the second of this name, sixth king of Bohemia, who was eight years of age when his father Ottacar was slain, was taken to Franconia by Otto, the margrave of Brandenburg, who acted as his regent in Bohemia for five years; after which Wenceslaus himself assumed the sovereignty. This Wenceslaus rebuilt the city of Prague so handsomely after it had been destroyed by fire that the fire was regarded as a blessing. Afterwards his spouse Gutta, daughter of Emperor Rudolf, judged the war between Albert her brother, and her husband. It is said that during his coronation a remarkable number of travelers on horseback were seen at the royal court at Prague, and also a countless number on foot. He subjugated the Poles and received the royal crown at their hands. To the Hungarians, he gave, at their request, as king, his 13-year old son Wenceslaus. Later, at the request of the Hungarians he recalled and took back home Charles the son of the king of Sicily, whom Pope Boniface had sent to them. Wenceslaus died at the age of 30, leaving his son Wenceslaus as successor to the kingdom.

Thaddeus of Florence, an excellent physician, at this time lectured and taught medicine at Bologna. He also wrote many commendable works on medicine, as well as commentaries on the works of other physicians. He died at Bologna at the age of eighty years, leaving countless riches that he had amassed by virtue of his great renown and the practice of his art; for when he was engaged by the Italian princes he charged them one hundred gold coins per day. When Pope Honorius asked him to attend him, he refused to come until he had been promised one hundred gold coins for each day's attendance; but when the pope was cured of his illness and well again, he gave Thaddeus ten thousand ducats. [Thaddeus Alderotti (Thaddeus of Florence, also called Taddeo Fiorentino), was, during his lifetime, considered the most illustrious physician, not only in Bologna, where he taught, but of all Italy. His contemporary Dante refers to him in the as great teacher (Canto XII). He was the real founder of the medical school of Bologna, and the chief apostle of the scholastic or dialectic method in Italy. His commentary on the works of Hippocrates is similar in dialectic method to the commentaries of the lawyers of his time on Justinian. In addition to teaching medicine, he was also a corn chandler in the public granary at Or San Michele. His services were at all times in great demand, and his charges made accordingly. Called to the bedside of Pope Honorius IV, he declared he would not move for less than a hundred ducats a day. In Florence he maintained a sumptuous villa. Many of his pupils became famous men, including Gentile da Foligno and the two brothers, del Garbo. Taddeo was the originator of the so-called , records of actual interesting cases. This style of medieval literature became the vogue at the end of the 17th century. Taddeo died in 1270].

Philip, king of France, surnamed the Fair, son of King Philip, began to rule over France upon the death of his father; and he reigned 29 years. He conducted a serious war against Edward (Edouardum), the king of England, who sustained heavy losses. He caused Pope Boniface the Eighth to be imprisoned for his haughtiness. Having determined to extirpate the Templars, he caused their grand master to be burned, ordering the rest cruelly put to death. The remainder fled from the kingdom in fear. For their greed and misdeeds he deprived the Jews of their possessions and estates and drove them out of the kingdom.

Philip IV (1268-1314), called 'the Fair,' king of France, was the son of Philip III and his wife, Isabella of Aragon. His reign began in October 1285 and is one of the most momentous in the history of medieval Europe. Little is known of the part Philip personally played in these events. Contemporary writers characterize him as a handsome, lethargic nonentity, although some paint him as a master of statecraft. Yet this was the king who brought the papacy under his yoke, carried out the destruction of the powerful order of the Temple, and laid the foundations of the national monarchy of France. He was one of the few monarchs who have left to their successors reasoned programs of state reform. The greatest event of this reign was the struggle with Pope Boniface VIII, who went so far, in 1296, as to forbid any lay authority to demand taxes from the clergy without his consent. When Philip retaliated by a decree forbidding the exportation of any coin from France, Boniface gave way to save the papal dues, and the bulls issued by him in 1297 were a decided victory for the French king. There was a truce until 1301, when the arrest of a bishop by Philip's orders resulted in the renewal of the quarrel. To insure the support of his people, the king had called in assembly the three estates of his kingdom at Paris in 1302; in the following year, Guillaume de Nogaret seized the pope at Anagni, an event immortalized by Dante. Boniface escaped from his captors only to die, but the short pontificate of his saintly successor, Benedict XI, was occupied in a vain effort to restore harmony to the church. The issue of the conclave that met at Perugia on his death was ultimately determined by the diplomacy and gold of Philip's agents, and the new pope, Clement V, was the weak-willed creature of the French king. When, in 1309, the pope installed himself at Avignon, the new relation of the papacy and the French monarchy was patent. It was the beginning of the 'Babylonian captivity' of the popes. The most notable of its first fruits was the hideous persecution of the Templars, which began with the sudden arrest of the members of the order in France in 1307, and ended with the suppression of the order by Pope Clement at the council at Vienne in 1313.

In 1294, Philip IV attacked Edward I of England, then engaged in the Scottish war, and seized Guienne. In 1297, Edward was obliged to make peace. Then the Flemish cities rose against the French royal officers, and utterly defeated the French army at Courtrai in 1302. The reign closed with the French position not much improved in Flanders. Philip died November 29th, 1314.

Aegidius of Rome, a general of the Augustinian order, archbishop of Bourges (Bituricensis), and an Aquitanian primate, was at this time, for his great ingenuity, called the prince of teachers of the Holy Scriptures. He was a noble Roman of the family of Colonna. By reason of his learning and scriptural wisdom, he enlightened his order and the entire Christian Church, and defended the teachings and writings of his master Thomas Aquinas. He was illustrious for his miracles, and lived to a blessed end. [Aegidius a Columnis (Egideo de Colona, called Aegidius Romanus, after Rome, his birthplace, and sometimes called Giles of Rome in English) (c. 1243-1316), a scholastic, and called, because of his deep learning, Doctor Fundatissimus ('Best-Grounded Teacher') was a student of Thomas Aquinas, and later preceptor of Philip the Fair, of France. In 1296, he was bishop of Bourges. He died in 1316. He became an Augustinian monk early in life, was one of the most important realists, and sought to treat the Augustinian teachings in a scholastic manner. Among his numerous works is the book ('On the Guidance of Princes') written for Philip IV, the royal ward under his tutelage].

Year of the World 6489 | Year of Christ 1288

Pope Nicholas the Fourth, a Pisan of Ascoli, formerly called Jerome (Hieronimus), a brother of the Barefoot Order, and afterward a cardinal, was elected pope ten months after the death of Pope Honorius and placed in the Chair of Saint Peter himself. With the papal court he soon journeyed to the city of Reate [Rieti, anciently Reate, a city and episcopal see of Italy, capital of the province of Rieti, in Italy. It is situated on the right bank of the Belino (a torrent tributary to the Tiber), which at this point issues from the limestone plateau; the old town occupies the slope and the new town spreads out on the level. In 1149 Reate was besieged and captured by Roger I of Sicily. In the struggle between church and empire, it always held with the church; and it defied the forces of Frederick II and Otto IV. Pope Nicholas IV long resided at Rieti, and it was there that he crowned Charles II of Anjou king of the Two Sicilies. In the 14th century, Robert, and afterwards Joanna of Naples, managed to keep possession for many years, but it returned to the Sates of the Church under Gregory IX. About the year 1500, the liberties of the town, long defended against the encroachments of the popes, were entirely abolished. An earthquake in 1785 was followed in 1799 by the pillage of Rieti by the Neapolitans.]; but at the end of the year he returned to Rome and held his court there. He made cardinals from most of the clerical orders, for he loved them all alike, and didn't feel more indebted to his kin and near relatives than to any other good person. Although this Nicholas was a pious man, yet many detrimental and unhallowed things occurred in the realm of Christianity during his pontificate. In his time the kings of Aragon and France made peace; but it did not last long. Considerable turmoil, discord, arson, and murder occurred in various forms in the city of Rome. In the second year of his pontificate the city of Tripoli was ravaged with slaughter and fire by the sultan, although the pope, at his own expense, sent many warriors to its rescue and undertook to send other crusaders. But after the affairs of Christendom became more difficult in the course of his pontificate, this pope (as some maintain) fell into a state of melancholy; and he died in the fourth year, first month and 8th day of his pontificate, and was buried in Santa Maria Maggiore at the head of the basilica. The seat then was vacant for almost three years through dissension among the cardinals. [Nicholas IV (Girolamo Masci), pope from 1288 to 1292, a native of Ascoli and a Franciscan monk, succeeded Bonaventura as general of his order in 1274, was made cardinal-priest of Saint Prassede and Latin patriarch of Constantinople by Nicholas III, cardinal-bishop of Palestrina by Marin IV, and succeeded Honorius IV after a ten-months' vacancy in the papacy. He was a pious, peace-loving monk with no ambition save for the church, the crusades, and the extirpation of heresy. He steered a middle course between the factions at Rome, and sought a settlement of the Sicilian question. In May 1289, he crowned Charles II, king of Naples and Sicily, after the latter had expressly recognized papal suzerainty, and, in February 1291, concluded a treaty with Alphonso III of Aragon and Philip IV of France, looking toward the expulsion of James of Aragon from Sicily. The loss of Ptolemais in 1291 stirred the pope to renewed enthusiasm for a crusade. He sent the celebrated Franciscan missionary, John of Monte Corvino with some companions to labor among the Tartars and Chinese. He issued an important constitution in 1289 granting the cardinals one-half of all income accruing to the Roman See, and a share in the financial management; and thereby he paved the way for that independence of the college of cardinals, which, in the following century was to be detrimental to the papacy. Nicholas was succeeded by Celestine V].

Pope Celestine the Fifth, previously called Peter of Morrone, a clerical monk, was elected pope at the request of King Charles (Carolo) and cardinal Latinus. Although not highly educated in the Scriptures, he was a pious man. After unwillingly accepting the pontificate he went to Aquileia, and summoned the cardinals to join him there. There also he made twelve new cardinals, and himself received the papal crown. At his coronation there were present two hundred thousand persons, who came there in consequence of the long delayed election and to marvel at the piety of this man, who although a hermit and separated from the world, had come into such a high office. But Celestine did not alter the strictness of his former life. However, as he was not a man of worldly discernment, and therefore not regarded as qualified to administer the papal office and the common welfare, men began to consider his deposition. Then this came to the notice of King Charles, he took the pope to Naples with him, and in various ways exhorted him not to resign the pontificate, nor to leave the Church that he had governed so well. But Benedict, the cardinal, a sly and enterprising person, learned in the written law, showed the pope that unless he acknowledged himself unqualified, and abdicated, he would seriously and in many respects sin against the canon law. And to that end he caused a statute to be passed making it proper for a pope to abdicate. Not long afterwards Celestine gave up the papacy, leaving the cardinals the power and privilege of electing another pope. Accordingly the cardinals before long elected Benedict Gaetano. But after Peter of Morrone had abdicated, and while he was returning to his hermitage, he was taken prisoner by order of Benedict, who had been elected pope and was called Boniface the Eighth. Celestine was taken to the castle of Fumone, and there held in such close confinement that he soon died; for Boniface feared that as long as Celestine lived the people might love this holy man more than they would a man like himself, inflated with his own ability, and would nevertheless follow Celestine. This Celestine was enrolled among the saints by Clement the Fifth, and his feast day is observed on the 14th day of the Kalends of July. [Celestine V (born Pietro da Morrone, 'Peter of Morrone'), pope in 1294, was born of poor parents at Isernia about 1215, and became a Benedictine. Living as a hermit, he attracted other ascetics, whom he organized into a congregation of Benedictines, which was later called the Celestines. A fight between the Colonna and the Orsini, as well as dissensions among the cardinals, prevented a papal election for over two years after the death of Nicholas IV. Finally, in 1294, Celestine was elected. Multitudes came to his coronation and he began his reign as the idol of visionaries, of extremists, and of the populace. But the pope was in the power of Charles II of Naples, and became his tool against Aragon. When he wished to abdicate, Benedict (Benedetto) Gaetano, destined to succeed him as Boniface VIII, removed all scruples against this unheard of procedure by finding a precedent in the case of Clement I. Celestine abdicated in 1294, and died in a monastic cell in the castle of Fumone in 1296. He was canonized by Clement V in 1313].

Ugolino, of the Augustinian order, an illustrious teacher of the Holy Scriptures, first a bishop of Armenia, and then a patriarch of Constantinople, was held in great esteem at Paris at this time, and occupied the highest chair of learning. In addition to his scriptural wisdom he was a man of good morals, and consequently very useful, helpful and beneficial to the churches of God at this time. He wrote many commendable things, and his works are not unknown to the learned.

Ugo Boliomus, of the Preaching Order, a renowned doctor and cardinal, was illustrious at this time for his piety and writings. John (Jo.) of Parma, of the Barefoot Order, an excellent master of the Holy Scriptures, was likewise. []

Adolph, count of Nassau, was a strong man, whom the German electors unanimously elected Roman king upon the death of Emperor Rudolf; and he reigned for six years. He was an able man, but not very powerful in people and money. After accepting the sovereignty, and before securing the imperial crown from the pope, he collected an army in the Year of the Lord 1292 and proceeded against Meissen. King Wenceslaus of Bohemia came forth to meet him at Grünheim. There they intermarried their children; and the emperor added the margraviate of Meissen to the Roman Empire. But when he finally demanded homage and obedience from the ruling house, he encountered marked opposition from Duke Albert of Austria, who had the cooperation and support of several electors. Therefore Adolph made war against Albert, but on account of the small number of his men, Adolph was defeated and slain between Spire and Worms on the day of Saints Processus and Martinian. [Adolph of Nassau (c. 1255-1298), German king, son of Walram, count of Nassau, was chosen to succeed Rudolf I by an election due more to the political conditions of the time than to his personal qualities. His position was unstable, and the allegiance of many of the princes, among them Albert I, duke of Austria, son of the late King Rudolf, was merely nominal. He claimed Meissen as a vacant fief of the empire, and, in 1294, allied himself with Edward I, King of England, against France. Edward granted him a subsidy, but Adolph turned his arms against Thuringia which he had purchased from the landgrave, Albert II. This bargain was resisted by the sons of Albert, and, from 1294 to 1296, Adolph was campaigning in Meissen and Thuringia. He had been unable to fulfill the promises made at his election and the princes grew suspicious. Wenceslaus II, king of Bohemia, fell away from his allegiance, and Adolph was deposed in 1298, when Albert of Austria was elected his successor. In the same year, Adolph was killed in the battle of Goellheim by, it is said, the hand of Albert].

CONCERNING THE LOSS OF THE EASTERN CITIES

Tripoli, a renowned city in Asia, was brought under the dominion of the Babylonian sultan by siege, and force of arms in the second year of the pontificate of Pope Nicholas the Fourth. After the slaughter of many people and the manifold plunder of countless treasures of incalculable worth, as well as other property and possessions found there, the city was ravaged with fire and its buildings were destroyed. In the third year of said pope the same sultan by the same cruel means captured the cities of Tyre, Sidon and Berytus [Modern Beirut, chief seaport of Syria, situated on a triangular promontory backed by the Lebanon range. The bay thus formed to the north is known as St. George's bay, for it is here, according to legend, that he slew the dragon], together with their fortifications, markets and castles; and, as in the case of Tripoli, ravaged them with fire. The Christian princes of the west did not go to Asia to avenge the calamity thus visited upon the Christians by fire and sword, and the sultan made a treaty with the city of Ptolemais, providing for a peace of two years. Pope Nicholas, however, at the expense of the church, sent five hundred horsemen, who were followed by a large army, without any particular leader, thus involving great risk. They proceeded to Ptolemais. Now there were formerly in this city a countless number of inhabitants; so the expeditionary forces indulged in murder, robbery and incendiarism in the regions of the sultan for some time. The sultan patiently endured this for a long while, but after it had continued for a year, he sent his son with one hundred fifty thousand soldiers to Ptolemais and heavily besieged the city. In the meantime his father died, and the army elected him to succeed his father. Those in the city concluded to leave with their wives and children, the sick, and all their household effects, and to hold the city with twelve thousand warriors. But the new sultan took the city by force, killed all persons found in it, and cruelly damaged the city with fire, and destroyed its fortifications and walls. This occurred in the Year of Salvation twelve hundred ninety. [Two projects of crusades were started before the final expulsion of the Latins from Syria. In 1274, at the Council of Lyon, Gregory X preached the crusade to an assembly which contained envoys from the Mongol khan and Michael Palaeologus as well as from many western princes. Gregory was successful in uniting the eastern and western churches for the moment, and in securing for the new crusade the aid of the Palaeologi, now thoroughly alarmed by the plans of Charles of Anjou. Thus was a new papal crusade begun, backed by an alliance with the Constantinople. In 1276, Gregory died, and his plans with him; there was to be no union of East and West in a common crusade. Charles was able to resume his plans. In 1277, Mary of Antioch ceded her claims to him, and he was able to establish himself in Acre; in 1278, he took possession of the principality of Achaea. With these bases, he prepared a new crusade, to be directed against Constantinople. But the Sicilian vespers, followed by the coronation of Peter of Aragon as Sicilian king, occupied the rest of his days. This was the last serious attempt to recover the dying kingdom of Jerusalem. The fall of the great power of Charles of Anjou set free Kala'un, the successor of Bibars' son, to complete the work of the great sultan. In 1289, Kala'un took Tripoli, and the country of Tripoli was extinguished; in 1290 he died while preparing to besiege Acre, which was captured after a brave defense by his son and successor Khalil in 1291. Thus, the kingdom of Jerusalem came to an end].

The Order of The Celestines, so called after the aforesaid Pope Celestine, its founder, began at this time under the rule of Saint Benedict, and it prospered marvelously; for after this most holy man's death in prison, many noble and highly educated men, scorning the pomp and wealth of the world, entered this order in view of this pope's numerous miracles; and soon the order grew in membership and the number of its cloisters. [Celestine, a religious order founded about 1260 by Peter of Morrone, afterwards Pope Celestine V (1294). It was an attempt to unite the eremitical and cenobitical modes of life. It followed the Benedictine rule supplemented by increased austerities. The form of government was borrowed largely from those prevailing in the Mendicant Orders. But even though the Celestines are reckoned as a branch of the Benedictines, there is little in common between them. During the founder's life, the order spread rapidly, and eventually there were about 150 monasteries in Italy, and others in France, Bohemia, and the Netherlands. The French houses formed a separate congregation, the head-house being in Paris. The French Revolution and those of the nineteenth century destroyed their houses, and the Celestine Order seems no longer to exist].

ORDER OF THE SERVITES

The Order of The Servants of The Virgin Mary was founded by Philip, a very religious man. He died not far from Florence. He established this order under the rule of Saint Augustine, and by word and example he gave it form, making certain additions. This order was afterward confirmed by three popes—Benedict the Eleventh, Boniface, and Urban the Sixth, and is reckoned as a Mendicant Order. [The Servites or "Servants of Mary," an order under the rule of St. Augustine, was founded in 1233 by seven merchants of Florence, recently canonized as "the seven holy Founders," who gave up their wealth and position, and, with the bishop's sanction, established themselves as a religious community on Monte Senario, near Florence. They lived an austere life of penance and prayer, and being joined by others, they were, in 1240, formed into an order following the Augustinian rule supplemented by constitutions borrowed from the Dominicans. They established houses in Italy, France, Germany and Spain. The order received papal approbation in 1255; in 1424 it was recognized as a Mendicant order, and, in 1567, it was ranked with the four great orders of Mendicant friars].

Folio CCXIX verso

Boniface the Eighth, a Campanian, previously called Benedetto Gaetano (Benedictus Caietanus), was elected pope in Naples at the close of the year one thousand two hundred ninety-four. He was a highly learned man of public experience; for he was at the papal court for a long time, and rose to the pontificate through all the official stations. While a cardinal he undertook everything which he considered of promotional advantage toward the attainment of the high papal office. It is said that he cunningly arranged that several of his predecessors secured secret access to the bed-chamber of Celestine, and spoke to him in simulation of a voice from heaven, to the effect that he would attain to blessedness if he should give up the papal chair [They employed the following contrivance to induce Celestine to abandon the pontificate: Having been informed by a chamberlain that the pope was frequently in the habit of shutting himself up in a secret chapel to give himself up to fasting and prayer, as he did in his cell at Mount de Mouron, the cardinal caused the wall to be pierced behind the place occupied by the crucifix, and introduced into the opening a speaking trumpet, which communicated with a chamber of the upper story; then, during the silence of the night, when the pontiff had retired to his chapel to pray, he called out to him in a terrible voice: "Celestine! Celestine! Cast aside the burden of the papacy – it is a charge beyond your strength."]. After Boniface attained to the pontificate he began to ignore everyone. He persecuted the Ghibellines, and deprived the cardinals, Peter and James (Iacobum) of the family of the Colonna, together with their uncle Sciarra (Sara), of their paternal castles. Yet he established dual festivals for the apostles, the evangelists, and the four Doctors, Gregory, Augustine, Jerome and Ambrose; and enrolled among the number of the saints the Blessed Louis (Ludovicum) of the royal lineage of France and of the Barefoot Order. He recovered for the Church the city of Eugubium [Gubbio, a town and Episcopal see of Umbria, Italy (anciently Iguvium, medieval Eugubium). A bishop of Iguvium is mentioned as early as 413 CE. It was taken and destroyed by the Goths in 552, but rebuilt with the help of Narses. Modern Gubbio occupies an important place in the history of majolica. In the struggles of this period, it was generally on the Ghibelline side.], which the Ghibellines had taken from it. Three times he declined to confirm the election of Duke Albert of Austria as ruler of the empire. He was the first to institute, in the year one thousand three hundred, the Jubilee, during which complete absolution from all sins was granted to those who should visit the churches of the apostles. Because of this such a great and countless number of people came to Rome that it was impossible for people to pass each other in that spacious city. This pope, through a course of negotiations, subjugated the kingdom of France, deposed Philip, the French king, and crowned the said Duke Albert as king of France and as Roman emperor. Because of this Philip, the deposed king, secretly and by night sent the aforesaid Sciarra to Anagni, and secured the assistance of the Ghibellines, who had been persecuted for a long time by this pope. They fell upon the pope in the bedchamber in which he was born, in his father's house, and carried him off to Rome as a prisoner; and there he died of dejection after twenty-four days, in the eighth year, ninth month, and seventeenth day of his pontificate.

Boniface VIII (Benedetto Gaetano), pope from 1294 to 1303, was born of a noble family at Anagni, and studied canon and civil law in Italy and possibly at Paris. After being appointed to canonicates in both of these countries, he accompanied Cardinal Ottobuona to England in 1265 for the purpose of reconciling Henry III and the baronial party. Later he became advocate and notary at the papal court, and, in 1281, was made cardinal-deacon, and, in 1291, cardinal-priest. It was he who headed the conspiracy to depose his predecessor, Celestine V, in order to satisfy his own ambitions. After the retirement of Celestine, the cardinals waited ten days before reassembling, so as to give him time to finish his measures, and to assure himself of a majority in the sacred college. The conclave having at last formed in the palace of King Charles, he was chosen sovereign pontiff.

As soon as Boniface had been proclaimed pope, he left Naples for Rome. The streets and public places were strewn with flowers, and the pope was greeted with shouts of joy. He first went to the church of the Lateran to be seated on the pierced chair. From there he went to St. Peter's, where he was solemnly consecrated, in the year 1295. On the succeeding day, he caused the abdication of Celestine to be confirmed by the sacred college in contempt of all the ecclesiastical rules, which prohibited the abdication of a pontiff. These precautions did not appear to him to be sufficient, for he caused his unfortunate predecessor to be apprehended, confining the old man in a castle, giving him orders to confess that he might prepare to die. While the holy hermit was unveiling the secrets of his soul, the pope was concealed behind a tapestry, and, when he had finished his confession, the new pope suddenly appeared before him, reproached him for the regrets he had expressed for his abdication, and caused him to be placed in a dungeon. It is said that fearful of an uprising of the people in favor of the victim, Boniface decided to starve him to death, and it was announced some days afterward that Celestine, enfeebled by age, had expired while in the act of blessing the holy father.

In his attempt to exercise authority in temporal, as well as in spiritual affairs, Boniface involved the papacy in many controversies with European powers. The attempt to build up the greatest estates for his family, chiefly at the expense of the ancient house of Colonna, made mortal enemies. Until 1303, he refused to recognize Albert of Austria as the rightful German king. Assuming himself overlord of Hungary, he declared that its crown should fall to the house of Anjou. He humbled Eric VIII of Denmark, but was unsuccessful in the attempt to try Edward I, the conqueror of Scotland, on the charge of interfering with a papal fief; for Parliament declared in 1301 that Scotland had never been a fief of Rome. In 1296, by papal bull, Boniface forbade the levying of taxes on the clergy without his consent. Philip IV, king of France, retaliated by ordinance prohibiting the exportation of gold and other property from France, thereby crippling the papal revenues; but Boniface, in the spirit of reconciliation, canonized the king's grandfather, Louis IX. However, hostilities were later renewed. Philip caused grave charges to be placed against the pope and sent his vice-chancellor Nogaret to arrest him and bring him to France to be deposed by an oecumenical council. With Sciarra Colonna, Nogaret surprised Boniface at Anagni as the latter was about to pronounce sentence of excommunication against the king. Boniface was saved from the vengeance of Colonna by Nogaret, imprisoned for three days until released by the citizens of Anagni, conducted to Rome, only to be confined by the Orsini in the Vatican, where he died in October, 1303. Dante, who had become embittered against Boniface while on a political mission in Rome, calls him the "Prince of the New Pharisees" (Inferno 27, 85), but laments that "in his Vicar, Christ was made a captive" and was "mocked a second time" (Purgatory, 20, 87 f.). Boniface patronized the fine arts, interested himself in the Vatican Library, and founded the University of Rome.

Benedict the Eleventh, from Treviso, formerly called Nicholas, of the Preaching Order, a cardinal, was elected pope. He entered the Preaching Order in his youth and was so competent and virtuous that he became a general of the order. He was made pope because of his virtue, and so conducted himself that after death he was justly regarded as one of the blessed. He excommunicated five citizens of Anagni, and restored the king of France to his realm and freedom. He also restored to grace John (Johannem) and James (Iacobum) of the family of the Colonna, the cardinals deposed by Boniface. It was his intention to aid and rescue the Christians who had gone to Syria and Palestine to combat the Tartars and the infidels. In order to accomplish this more skillfully and conveniently he journeyed to Perugia with his court; but, weakened by sickness, he died there on the Nones of June in the eighth month and seventeenth day of his pontificate, his undertaking unexecuted. He was buried with great pomp in the cloister of the Preaching Order in the one thousand three hundred and third year. The seat as then vacant for 11 months. [Benedict XI (Niccolo Boccasini), pope from 1303 to 1304, entered the Dominican Order in 1254 at the age of fourteen years, became lector, prior of the convent, provincial of his order in Lombardy, and, in 1296, its general. In 1298, he was created cardinal priest, and, in 1300, cardinal-bishop. He was a loyal supporter of Boniface VIII against Philip the Fair of France, and, in 1303, was unanimously elected pope. He did much to conciliate the enemies made by his predecessor, but, in 1304, excommunicated Nogaret and all the Italians who had captured Boniface in Anagni. Benedict died at Perugia in 1304. His successor, Clement V, transferred the papal residence to Avignon. Among Benedict's works are the commentaries on part of the Psalms and on the Gospel of Matthew. His beatification took place in 1733].

Pope Boniface himself published the sixth book of papal law in these years. He ordered that this book be compiled by the three most learned men who had published the new decretals. And he ordered by public decree that it be observed and that it be read in the public universities. And this book the archdeacon of Bologna expounded on. [The German edition of the does not have this paragraph. Instead, in an attempt at editorial improvement, it abridges the Latin paragraph's content as "He wrote the sixth papal book of the canon law, and ordered it read in the universities." and includes that sentence in the paragraph on Boniface above (before the sentence "He recovered for the Church the city of Eugubium, which the Ghibellines had taken from it.")].

Louis (Ludovicus), of royal lineage born of Charles (Carolo), king of Sicily, and Mary his mother, a Sicilian and Hungarian queen, had a spiritual preceptor in the days of his youth. Two of his brothers took him to Catalona, where he was given over as a hostage for the release of his father King Charles. There he was instructed in the liberal and spiritual arts for seven years by the Barefoot brothers, and became a lecturer on spiritual and lay matters. He was zealous in prayer, and such a lover of chastity, that outside the cloister he never spoke to anyone other than his mother and sister. All his life he castigated himself. Firstly at the request of the Barefoot Order, and later at the request of Pope Boniface, he accepted the rule of the bishopric of Toulouse. He performed marvelous works of kindness, and, after living a pious life, was favored with a blessed end. [Louis of Naples was a son of Charles II, King of Naples and Sicily (Folio CCXVIII recto and note), and was fourteen years of age when sent as a hostage for his father into Spain. There he spent seven years in captivity, during which time he became dangerously ill, and, thinking himself dying, he vowed to join the Franciscans if health was restored to him. Upon his release he returned to Naples where he took holy orders and was ordained a priest. A favorite friend was Jacques d'Euse, a little deformed man, a cobbler's son of Cahors. He had followed in his youth the fortunes of an uncle who had a small trading capital at Naples. He was encouraged to study by a Franciscan friar, but refused to enter the Order. The poor scholar was recommended to the instructor of the king's children. He ingratiated himself into the favor of Louis; and, mounting step by step, he finally became pope (as John XXII) at Avignon (1316). One of his first acts was to canonize his friend and benefactor, Louis of Naples. Louis died at the age of twenty-three, two years and ten months after he left captivity, and during that time became bishop of Toulouse and Pamiers].

Folio CCXX recto

Albert, the first of this name, a duke of Austria, and son of the emperor Adolph, in the year 1298, after the slaying of the emperor Adolph, was elected Roman king; and he reigned ten years. But as the electors were not unanimous in their first choice, he waived his rights under this election in order that he might not be accused of having assumed the sovereignty by force. For this reason he was then unanimously elected, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. In war, arms, and defense, he was a stern, earnest and able man; although some write that he was one-eyed, and had a coarse and boorish countenance; that he was avaricious, and preferred the interests of his children to the common good. Although he often requested Pope Boniface to confirm his election, the pontiff, who was a proud and haughty man, repeatedly withheld it. But when discord arose between this proud pope and King Philip of France, because Philip had called a great council at Paris to consider the injustice of accusations made by Boniface, and to complain of the pope's unworthy assumption and possession of the pontificate, the pope became so angry, that he not only confirmed said Albert, but subjugated King Philip's kingdom to Albert; and this was the origin of much discord among Christian peoples. Albert had a brother, named Rudolph, to whom Agnes, the sister of King Wenceslaus of Bohemia, was espoused. He died at Prague, and left a son named John (Iohannes), who requested of his uncle a division of his paternal inheritance; but in mockery Albert sent him a small green wreath in place of it. After Albert had performed many excellent deeds, and had sternly transacted his affairs, and was journeying across the Rhine, he was assassinated at Rhinefelden, not far from the village bridge, by his nephew John, who had accompanied him under the guise of friendship. But John afterward rued the deed; and he journeyed to pope Clement the Fifth, asking him to absolve him of the murder. The pope replied that the slayer of an emperor should be judged by an emperor. And John went to Emperor Henry (Heinricus) VIII, who was at Pisa. As a penance and punishment for his crime Henry ordered John to enter a cloister of the Order of Saint Augustine to do penance there for the rest of his life; and this he did without protest.

Albert I (c.1250-1308), German king and duke of Austria, eldest son of king Rudolph I, was invested with the duchies of Austria and Styria in 1282. On Rudolph's death in 1291, Albert was obliged to acquiesce in the election of Adolph of Nassau as German king; but, in 1298, he mustered sufficient allies to enable him to defeat Adolph at Göllheim, near Worms; and he was elected king, and later crowned. Pope Boniface VIII declined to recognize him until 1303, when Albert admitted the right of the pope to bestow the imperial crown and promised that none of his sons would be elected king without papal consent. In 1306 he secured the crown of Bohemia for his son, Rudolph, but tried in vain to impose his own claims on Thuringia in 1307. His action in abolishing all tolls established on the Rhine since 1250 led to the formation of a league against him by the Rhenish archbishops and the count palatine of the Rhine; but, aided by the towns, he soon crushed the rising. He was on the way to suppress a revolt in Swabia when he was murdered in 1308, at Windisch, on the Reuss, by his nephew John, whom he had deprived of his inheritance.

Although a hard, stern man, he had a keen sense of justice when his selfish interests were not involved, and few of the German kings possessed so practical an intelligence. He encouraged the cities and, not content with issuing proclamations against private war, formed alliances with the princes in order enforce his decrees. The serfs, whose wrongs seldom attracted notice, found a friend in this severe monarch, and he protected even the despised and persecuted Jews. The stories of his cruelty and oppression in the Swiss cantons first appear in the 16th century, and are now regarded as legendary.

In these times, and after the death of Saint Louis (Ludovici), six sons and five daughters were born to Charles (Carolo) the Second, the king of Naples, by his wife Mary, who was the daughter of the king of Hungary. The eldest son, Charles, expected the Hungarian kingdom as his maternal inheritance; while Robert, duke of Calabria, the second son, expected the Neapolitan kingdom as his paternal inheritance. Philip, the third son, obtained the principality of Tarentum. The first daughter, Clementia, was espoused to Charles, the firstborn son of king Philip of France; the second daughter, Blanche (Blancam), to James (Iacobus) the king of Aragon; and the third daughter, Leonora, to the brother of James.

Wenceslaus (Wentzeslaus) the Third, the seventh Bohemian king, son of the aforesaid Wenceslaus, was a drunken, unchaste, villainous man, who consumed the estates of others, and dishonored other men's wives, and practised adultery with them. At the age of eighteen he was stabbed to death in the house of the dean of the cathedral of Olmütz, but by whom is not known, except that a bloody dagger was seen upon Conrad, a Thüringian horseman, who being suspected, was slain in a commotion before he had been questioned about it. At the same time Duke Henry (Heinricus) of Carinthia, who was acceptable to the king's sister, came to Prague, and the Bohemians chose him as their king. This displeased Albert; and he invaded Bohemia with an army, drove Henry out, installed his own son Rudolph as king, and gave him as wife the widow of the elder Wenceslaus. Rudolph died without issue in the first year of his reign. Therefore the Bohemians were compelled to elect another king; and finally the aforesaid Duke Henry retained the kingdom against the wishes of Emperor Albert.

At this time a comet appeared in the heavens as an omen of the future affliction and misery of the Christians. On Saint Andrew's day in the same year an earthquake suddenly occurred, the like of which had never taken place; and in consequence many buildings were destroyed.

At this time a number of the imperial electors, more particularly the ecclesiastical leaders, were not in unison; and they entered into an alliance against Emperor Albert. They accused him of slaying his sovereign, Adolph, in battle, and therefore considered him unworthy of the imperial dignity. Accordingly the distinguished princes of Germany appointed Duke Rudolph, Palsgrave of the Rhine, as arbiter of the empire. He was a courageous man and was therefore chosen to henceforth exercise that office in order that the Roman emperors might not venture upon evil or reprehensible undertakings and bring the imperial dignity into disrepute. [See Albert I and note, Folio CCXX recto].

A cunning deceiver, availing himself of various pretences, represented himself to be the lost emperor Frederick [The impersonation was of Frederick I, whom the Italians called "Barbarossa." (See Folio CCIII recto and note). On June 10th, 1190, Frederick was either bathing in or crossing the river Calycadnus (Geuksu), near Seleucia (Selefke), in Cicilia, when he was drowned. The news of his death threw all Germany into a state of mourning, particularly the lower classes. In later years, in times of great distress, Frederick was regarded as the greatest ruler of the empire, and his return was longed for. It was on this account that the saga, which really refers to his grandson, Frederick II, was applied to Barbarossa. He did not die, but sleeps in the Untersberg, near Salzburg, or in a cavern in the Kyffhaeuser Mountain in Thüringia, waiting until the needs of his country call him to the rescue. Meanwhile, his beard has grown through the top of the stone table at which he sits. Occasionally, he moves his head to see whether the ravens are circling about the mountain, or whether the hour of his awakening has come, and, with it, the Golden Age of Germany]. Although he had secured many followers through his cunning, he was imprisoned by the emperor, and, having confessed his deception, was burned.

The Jews, who had multiplied in many places, were burned in the first year of emperor Albert at Nuremberg, Würzburg, Rotenburg, and many other places, because of their evil deeds. Sparing no one of this unhappy race on account of sex or age, several thousand are said to have perished except for the children who had been baptized. [The German edition of the abridges this paragraph as follows: "The Jews, who had multiplied in many places, were burned at Nuremberg, Würzburg, Rotenburg, and many other places, because of their evil deeds."]

When in the year twelve hundred ninety-nine it became known that James (Iacobum) of Aragon, the Sicilian king, had died, Robert, the duke of Calabria, proceeded to Sicily with a large force at the behest of his father, King Charles (Caroli); and he captured the city of Catania [Catania, ancient Catina; city and Episcopal see of Sicily]. He was soon followed by his brother Philip, duke of Tarentum, with a well equipped fleet. But in the meantime the Sicilians took up arms to oppose Robert by land and sea. In the meantime the fleet of Philip had taken to sea without caution, relying on the assistance of Robert, who had taken possession of the aforesaid city. From afar Philip saw the ships of Robert coming to join him from the port of the city; but Robert was unprepared for action. And so the Sicilians, who were well prepared for battle, vigorously attacked both fleets, first engaging the supporting ships, a number of which were captured, some sunk, and others dispersed. Only a few of the ships returned to Robert at Catania. Then followed a severe engagement with the fleet of Philip. In the meantime Duke Robert became so frightened that he fled. He left the city of Catania with the few ships that remained; and returned to Italy.

Dinus of Mugello, a highly informed scholar in both branches of the law, at this time attained to first rank among the scholars and teachers of Italy. He was so powerful and convincing in his addresses, disputations, and conclusions that he became renowned for his wisdom in all juristic councils. He set forth the entire body of the civil law, with commentaries and interpretations, in a number of books; and he gave much excellent advice. [Dinus of Mugello, a 13th century jurist, born in the valley of Mugello, near Florence, taught at Bologna, and, at the request of Boniface VIII, participated in the preparation of the Sixth Book of Decretals. He died at Bologna soon after 1298].

Peter de Bella Partita, a Burgundian, and easily the peer of the said Dinus in Scriptural wisdom and teaching, at this time, with a skill and ingenuity equal to his, wrote much upon the civil law and its interpretation, as well as other commendable things.

The Year of Salvation one thousand three hundred came in which, pursuant to good counsel, and in emulation of the Fathers of the Old Testament, Pope Boniface the Eighth established the first year of the Jubilee. It was to be observed every hundred years. All persons coming over the mountains or by sea to Rome, and sojourning there for eight days, and those living in Italy or its islands and going to Rome and remaining there for fifteen days, visiting the churches and holy places, were to be absolved of all sin. By means of this indulgence many persons previously either having a public or private feud became reconciled in peace and good will.

A Jubilee is a solemn season, recurring at stated intervals in the Church of Rome, chiefly marked by the indulgences then granted by the pope to all his communion. Boniface VIII was the first to institute it, in 1300, in imitation of that of the Jews, ordering it to be observed every hundredth year. Clement VI reduced it to fifty, Urban IV to thirty, and Sixtus IV to twenty-five, where it has remained. Beside this, the popes, upon their exaltation to the see of Rome, have frequently celebrated a jubilee, as also on other extraordinary occasions. The ceremony observed at Rome, at the end of every twenty-five years, which they call the Holy Year, is this: The pope goes to St. Peter's to open the holy gate (as they call it), which is walled up, and only opened on this occasion; and, knocking three times at the gate with a golden hammer, says these words, "Open to me the gates of a righteousness; I will go into them and I will praise the Lord." (Psalms 118:19); immediately after this the masons fall to work to break down the wall; which done, the pope kneels before it, while the penitentiaries of St. Peter wash him with holy water, and then, taking up the cross, he begins to sing Te Deum and enters the church, followed by the clergy. In the meantime, three cardinal legates are sent to open the other three gates with the same ceremonies which are in the churches of St. John Lateran, of St. Paul, and St. Mary Major; and, the next morning, the pope gives his benediction to the people, in the jubilee form. When the holy year has expired, they shut up the holy gates again on Christmas Eve in this manner: The pope, after he has blessed the stones and mortar, lays the first stone, and leaves there twelve boxes full of gold and silver medals.

The Jewish jubilee was celebrated every fifty years. The word is derived from 'jovel,' which, in Hebrew, signifies the blast of a trumpet (Joshua 6:4,13), because the year of the jubilee was proclaimed with trumpets. This year was one of general rest and universal liberty in which all servants were restored to their freedom, and all sold possessions returned to their first owners. The Jews observed these jubilees very exactly until the Babylonian captivity, but, after their return, they no longer observed it.

James (Iacobus) of Arena was a highly learned jurist, whose opinion and good counsel in the interpretation of the law were always on the side of righteousness. He also wrote many elegant treatises on jurisprudence.

Nicholas of Naples, who was alive at this time, was a jurist, and also wrote many excellent treatises and interpretations of the civil law.

ILLUSTRATION

Burning of the Jews: In an open field, a closely packed gathering of Jews are being burned to death. As the flames roar about them, they are sinking into the ground. An executioner with fuel-wood on his shoulders is feeding the flames. Some of the victims are bare-headed, some wear caps, while at least for of them wear the pointed or cone-shaped hat which, beginning in the twelfth century, was prescribed by law so that no Jew might be taken for a Gentile. These hats were of orange-yellow color with a white brim, or white with a yellow brim, and at times were turned back in the form of a horn. Pope Innocent III gave strong impetus to the repression of the Jews, especially by ordering the wearing of a badge. Such distinctive marks worn on the outer clothing usually consisted of a circular piece of cloth as shown in the illustration accompanying the Ritual Murder of Simon of Trent (see Folio CCLIV verso).

John (Ioannes) Scotus, of the Barefoot Order, a subtle teacher of the Holy Scriptures, flourished in the Year of the Lord 1300, or thereabout, as a second Apollo, and wrote very subtle books on the other teachers or the Holy Scriptures; and concerning the book of Sentences, particularly the fourth, on the higher criticism (which he then reduced to order, as it is said), he wrote many subtle things; for this reason he was called the Subtle Scholar. In addition, he also wrote many expositions and interpretations of the Holy Scriptures, and other works well known to the learned. Being a highly educated man, he made other men learned. Through his ingenuity the body of scriptural wisdom marvelously took form. He finally died of a stroke, although some say he was buried alive. [John Duns Scotus, one of the greatest of the medieval school-men, was born about 1265 in the village of Duns, Scotland. Joining the Franciscan Order, he studied at Merton College, Oxford, where shortly after 1290 he lectured on the , philosophy and theology. He then spent four years in Paris and after retuning to Oxford, was again, by 1302, lecturer in Paris. There he received the master's license. He was transferred to Cologne, where he died in 1308. His works are chiefly commentaries on the Bible, on Aristotle, and on the of Peter Lombard. Duns Scotus was the critic of preceding scholasticism, and the founder of a new type of thought. The schoolmen of the thirteenth century, especially Thomas Aquinas, had systematized and defended the Christian theology by means of the philosophy of Aristotle. On certain points, Aquinas diverged from Aristotle, but the disagreement of Duns Scotus went much deeper. He contended that Aquinas was wrong in subordinating the practical to the theoretical, and seeking in speculation, instead of in practice, for the foundation of Christian theology. This contention struck at the whole Aristotelico-Christian philosophy. Theology, he holds, rests in faith, and faith is not speculative, but practical – an act of will. The system of theology built up by Aquinas is subjected by Duns Scotus to a searching criticism, conducted with consummate dialectical skill, and abounding in refined distinctions, which gained him the title Doctor Subtilis ('The Subtle Scholar'). In his own system he maintained a strict orthodoxy. He carried on a zealous controversy against the Dominicans (Aquinas' order) in defense of the doctrine of the Immaculate Conception].

Raynerius of Pisa, of the Preaching Order, an excellent master, courageous in teaching and speech, a very pious and holy man, was held in high esteem at this time. Just how highly learned, scripturally wise, and ingenious he was, appears by a book which he began to write, and being without a title, begins thus, Absolution, etc. The material in this book shows how scripturally wise and of what pious disposition this man was. For this reason he is justly remembered among other excellent, highly learned, and praiseworthy men. [Raynerius of Pisa (d. 1348), a Dominican, wrote an alphabetical summary of the doctrine of Thomas Aquinas which some scholars believe even today is useful].

Nicholas of Lyra, of the Barefoot Order, a distinguished luminary among the teachers of the Scriptures, at first disputed and wrote against the ill will of the Jews, devoting much care and labor to the subject. And later, to their revilement and derision, he interpreted and explained the Old Testament with zeal and industry in many works; and in consequence of this he became renowned throughout the world. It is said that in the beginning he was a teacher of the Jews, and thus knew their tongue and script and was very learned in them. He is said to have been converted to Christ from the Jewish faith, afterwards adopting the Barefoot Order. [Nicholas of Lyra (c. 1265-1349), French commentator, born in Lire, now Vieille-Lyre (Eure), entered the Franciscan order at Verneuil about 1300, and studied at Paris, becoming a scholar before 1309. He taught there for a number of years. He was a provincial of his order in France and later in Burgundy, and as Executor of the estate of the widow of King Philip VI, he founded the college of Burgundy at Paris. He died there in 1349. Among his authentic works are two commentaries on the entire , one following the literal sense, the other the mystic sense. He also wrote two treatises against the Jews, a theological work on the Beatific Vision, directed against Pope John XXII, as well as a book of devotions].

Alanus, a very highly learned scholar, lived, as some say, at this time. Although well informed in all the arts he was so renowned in the Scriptures and in natural philosophy that he was deservedly called the Scholar of Everything. He was buried in the Cistercian cloister, and his marble tomb is on the right as one passes out of the chapel of the church; and on it is written, Alanus, who knew all there is to be known [Alanus ab Insulis ('Alanus from the Islands'; also called Alain de Lille), scholastic philosopher, born about 1128, probably at Lille, was a Cistercian monk. About 1151, he became bishop of Auxerre. He died in 1202 or 1203. Among his best known theologico-philosophic works are those dedicated to Clement III, in five books, entitled ('The Art of the Catholic Faith'), in which he defends the principal teachings of the Christian Church against the attacks of the pagans, Jews and heretics. Of his political works, is one of the most celebrated poems of the Middle Ages].

Clara, a native of the little town of Montisfalconi [Probably Montefiascone, a town and Episcopal see in the province of Biterbo, Italy], of the Augustinian Order, a virgin renowned for her virtuous and pious life, there departed from this world in blessedness in the year 1299. This most holy virgin performed such great services and so many miracles that she might well be enrolled in the number of the saints. In praise of her piety we give this testimonial which may be seen with open eyes and which has never been read concerning any other pious person. For when she died, there was seen in her heart a clearly defined image of the crucifix, with the scars of suffering; also three small stones of equal weight, as an obvious indication of her holiness.

The Fraticelli, the heretics, together with their heresies, were condemned by Pope Boniface and ferreted out with great zeal. It was ordered that they be extirpated at all costs. Therefore the corpse of Hermannus, originator and beginner, which had remained interred for twenty years at Ferrara, was dug up and burned. These heretics met in caves by night; and during the day the initiates sang according to the Christian custom; but after midnight they exhorted men and women to promiscuity in a loud voice. And when a child was born, it was passed from hand to hand among them all until it died. Later the dead child was roasted and the ashes put in a small cask and wine poured on it; and when the now converts drank this, they were regarded as confirmed in their heretical faith.

The Fraticelli originated in the marquisate of Ancona about 1294, most of them being apostate monks, under a superior named Pongiloup. They drew women after them on pretense of devotion and were accused of licentiousness in their nocturnal meetings. They were charged with maintaining a community of wives and goods. An abundance of libertines flocked after them because they countenanced their licentious way of life. Their opponents claimed that when a child was born as a product of their promiscuous relations, it was tossed about from hand to hand in their assemblies until it died. The member of the cult upon whose hands the death occurred became the high priest of the order.

The name Fraticelli was given during the 13th, 14th, and 15th centuries to a number of religious groups in Italy, differing widely from each other, but all derived more or less from the Franciscan movement. The word is a plural diminutive of the Italian frate ('friar'). As early as 1238, Gregory IX condemned all who begged or preached in a habit simulating that of the mendicant orders, and this condemnation was repeated by his successors. The term Fraticelli was used contemptuously to denote not any particular sect, but the members of orders formed on the fringe of the church. But the name may be more justly applied to an extreme and fanatical offshoot of Franciscanism, which we hear of definitely in 1322 as established in Sicily, and known as Fraticelli. This group of exalted and isolated ascetics began to regard itself as the sole legitimate order of the Minorities and then as the sole Catholic Church. After being excommunicated as "schismatics and rebels, founders of a superstitious sect, and propagators of false and pestiferous doctrines," they proceeded to elect a general, and then a pope called Celestine. For nearly a century they were able to carry on an active campaign of getting their message out throughout Italy, until Pope Martin V, in 1426, appointed two of the strict and orthodox sections of the Franciscan Order as Observants, with orders to make a special crusade against the heresy of the Fraticelli. From 1426 to 1449 the Fratricelli were unremittingly pursued, imprisoned and burned. The sect gradually died out after losing the protection of the common people, whose sympathy was now transferred to the austere Observants and their miracle-worker Capistrano. From 1466 to 1471 there were sporadic burnings of Fraticelli, and, after the latter date, the name disappears from history.

Year of the World 6504 | Year of the World 1305

Pope Clement the Fifth, a Vasconian bishop of Burdegalia [Burgdelia (Burdiglia or Burdegala), modern Bordeaux], previously called Bertrand de Gouth (Bernardus Gotho), son of a noble, was elected pope after a lengthy controversy; for the cardinals were held in conclave by the Parisians until they agreed upon the election of Bertrand, who was then in Gaul. When he received the news of his election he went to Lyons, and there he summoned the cardinals to him. And after some delay they came in the month of August, in the Year of Salvation thirteen hundred five. There the pope was crowned in the presence of King Philip of France, his brother Charles (Carolus), John (Iohannes), duke of Britain, and all the nobility of France. And while the pope was being carried through the city with great pomp, a high wall, from which the people were viewing the pageant, fell to the ground. Under it fell the duke of Britain, and many unnamed persons; so also, Charles, brother of the king of France, fell in a faint. In the turmoil which ensued the pope was crowded and driven back and forth, so that his tiara fell from his head, and a costly jasper was lost from it. He made so many cardinals from Gaul that it was easy to conjecture that in the future no one except those from Gaul could be elected pope; yet he conceded to the wishes of the Romans and Italians by reinstating the two Roman cardinals, James (Jacobus) and John, the Colonna; And so that the Romans might not be impatient and become antagonistic because of the long absence of the papal court from Rome, he ordered the appointment of three legates with consular authority to proceed to Rome and to govern Italy. Later, at his command the heresy of the men called the Dulcinists was suppressed, and the Order of the Templars entirely extinguished. At the instance of those of Ferrara, he interdicted the Venetians, prohibiting singing, readings, and the Sacrament. He did likewise with those of Florence and Lucca. For that reason the Florentines undertook to burden the clergy with heavy levies and taxes. But when he turned his attention to pacifying the Church, he held a council; in it the first book, named Clementarium, after him, was made, and Celestine, under the name of Peter, was enrolled in the number of the confessors. After enduring much painful illness, he died in the eighth year, ten month, and fifteenth day of his pontificate. The seat was then vacant for two years, three months, and 17 days. [Clement V (Bertrand de Gouth), pope from 1305 to 1314, was born of a noble Gascon family about 1264. After studying at Toulouse, Orleans, and Bologna, he became a canon at Bordeaux, then vicar-general to his brother, the archbishop of Lyons; in 1295, bishop of Cominges; and, in 1299, archbishop of Bordeaux. On June 5th, 1305, he was chosen to succeed Benedict XI. From the beginning, Clement V was subservient to French interests. Among his first acts was the creation of nine French cardinals. Early in 1306 he modified those features of former bulls which were offensive to the king. In March of 1309, the entire papal court settled at Avignon, a fief of the king of Sicily. Thus began the 70 years "Babylonian captivity of the Church." In October of 1307 came the arrest of all the Knights Templar in France, whom the king had charged with heresy, immorality, and abuses. Hearing that the State would proceed independently against the alleged heretics, Clement summoned the Council of Vienne, which was unable to conclude that the Templars were guilty of heresy. The pope abolished the Order, however, as it had outlived its usefulness. Its French estates were granted to the Hospitallers, but actually Philip IV held them until his death. In his relations to the empire, Clement was an opportunistic. He refused to favor the candidacy of Charles of Valois, brother of Philip IV, lest France become too powerful; and recognized Henry of Luxemburg, whom his representatives crowned emperor at the Lateran in 1312. When Henry, however, came into conflict with Robert of Naples, Clement supported Robert and threatened the emperor with interdict. Henry's unexpected death was soon followed by that of the pope on April 20th, 1314, at Roque-maure-sur-Rhone].

Dulcinus and Margaret, his wife, the heretics, in the Year of Salvation one thousand three hundred seven, at the city of Novara in Lombardy, collected followers for their heresies by the thousands, and poisoned them with their evil seed, and incited the laity to envy and hatred of the priests and clergy. In their assumed purity and innocence they considered themselves superior to all other persons, and in an unseemly manner they caused the people to intermingle in promiscuity. This continued for two years, after which they were driven into the mountains by the emissaries of Pope Clement, and were killed by frost and starvation; while Dulcinus and Margaret were torn limb from limb, burned, and their ashes scattered to the winds. [The Dulcinists were so called from one Dulcinus, a layman of Novara in Lombardy, who lived in the beginning of the 14th century. He pretended to preach the reign of the Holy Spirit; and, while he rejected the pope's authority, he foolishly made himself out to be the head of a third reign, saying that the Father had reigned from the beginning of the world to the coming of Christ; and the Son's reign then began and continued until the year 1300. He was followed by a great many people to the Alps, where he and his wife were taken and burnt by the order of the pope. This sect was a reaction against the worldliness of the Church].

In the Year of the Lord 1311 on the Kalends of November a general council was held at Vienne, attended by 300 bishops and other prelates from various parts of the world. And although Pope Clement, to satisfy the wishes of the king of France, had promised to efface the memory of Pope Boniface, and employed every effort to that end, he could not secure the consent of the Council to the purpose. Yet he invoked an illegal proceeding against the king of France. It was ordained that all the possessions and estates of the Templars should be accredited to the Hospitallers at Jerusalem. In the same council general statutes affecting the status of the clergy were considered. And although Pope Clement did much to encourage the rescue of the city of Jerusalem, all was in vain and for naught. [The Council of Vienne ranks as the fifteenth ecumenical synod. It met from October 16th, 1311 to May 6th, 1312 under the presidency of Pope Clement V. The transfer of the Curia from Rome to Avignon (1309) had brought the papacy under the influence of the French crown; and this position Philip the Fair of France now endeavored to utilize by demanding from the pope the dissolution of the powerful and wealthy order of the Temple, together with the introduction of a trial for heresy against the late Pope Boniface VIII. To evade the second claim, Clement gave way on the first. On the 22nd of March, the order of the Temple was suppressed by the bull, while further decisions as to the treatment of the order and its possessions followed later. Additional decisions were necessitated by the violent disputes which raged within the Franciscan order as to the observance of the rules of Francis of Assisi].

Folio CCXXII recto

Henry (Heinricus), the eighth of this name, or (as some write who do not count Henry the landgrave of Thuringa) the seventh, a count of Luxemburg, was chosen Roman king by the electors in the Year of the Lord 1308 at Frankfurt, and was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. He then sent the Duke of Bavaria and Lord Guido of Namur, brother of the Count of Flanders, to the pope at Avignon to arrange for his confirmation; and this they obtained, but upon condition that Henry come to Italy within two years to receive the imperial crown. But Henry did not take advantage of this period of grace; for, sending his emissaries to Italy in advance, he proceeded to that part of Germany which lies near Italy and adjoins the mountains. The royal emissaries first went to the Florentines, who at that time, above all others, were scorners and enemies of the Roman imperial and royal name. This Henry was a wise, righteous, and merciful man, a stern warrior, devout, honorable and courageous, and an intelligent counselor. In the meantime he requested Elizabeth, the sister of Wenceslaus II of Bohemia, then 18 years of age, to come to him at Spire, and he espoused her to his son John (Iohannem), then four years younger (sc. than Elizabeth). At the same time he collected three armies. One of these he led into Italy against the Brescians; and he also reduced the Lombards to obedience. The second army he employed against the counts of Württemberg, who had been disobedient to the Empire, and with the sword he wrested from them 72 well fortified castles and cities out of 80, and restored them to the Empire. The third army, collected in Franconia and Bavaria, he sent into Bohemia under the leadership of his son and Peter, the archbishop of Mainz. Meanwhile Henry crossed the mountains against those of Taurinorum [Augusta Taurinorum, or Taurasia; modern Turin].; and they came forth to meet him and made their submission. Those of Asti did likewise, and Henry appointed a governor for them and for many other cities. And so also the lords of LaScala at Verona pledged allegiance and submitted. Among the citizens of Milan were two partisans, one a leader of the Guelphs, the other of the Ghibellines. And when Henry approached the city, both parties became afraid, and in consequence Henry's will prevailed, and he secured possession. He put the city under the control of Duke Leopold of Austria and the Germans. In the meantime Henry received the imperial iron crown at Milan. Afterwards he proceeded to Genoa, from there to Pisa, and finally to Rome; and there he was crowned. Still later he deposed Robert, the king of Naples, besieged Florence, and secured dominion over Pisa and Siena. Finally Emperor Henry became seriously ill. On advice of the physicians he took the baths; but as these did not help him, on the advice of the physicians he sought another climate, proceeding to the city of Benevento, twelve miles from his camp. After he had secured the city by a siege, he died. Many historians state that certain indications of poisoning appeared in his corpse; and Ptolemy of Lucca states that he died of poison administered to him in the Holy Sacrament by a brother of the Preaching Order; and another adds that this was done at the instigation of the Florentines. The death of Emperor Henry was good fortune to Robert, but to others it was a catastrophe. His body was buried in an elevated tomb behind the high altar in an ancient and noble temple at Pisa. Henry was a magnanimous man, who, if he had lived longer, would have accomplished great things; but he reigned only five years and eight months, and the Empire was without a ruler for a year after his death.

Henry VII (c. 1269-1313), here called Henry VIII, for reasons explained in the text, was the son of Henry III, count of Luxemburg, and passed his early days under French influence. In 1308, he succeeded Albert as king of Germany, for Albert's unpopularity prevented the electors from choosing his successor from the Austrian house of Hapsburg. The Bohemians, having become dissatisfied with their ruler, Henry V of Carinthia, Henry married his son, John, to Elizabeth, a sister of Wenceslaus; and thus John became king of Bohemia, the crown of which long remained under the Luxemburg dynasty.

In 1310, Henry VII crossed the Alps, hoping to reunite Germany and Italy. He was joyfully welcomed by the oppressed Ghibellines, while Dante hailed him as the deliverer of Italy, celebrating his appearance by a Latin essay, called Monarchy, and reserving a place for him in his Paradiso, marked with a crown. Having entered Milan in 1311, Henry placed the iron crown of Lombardy on his head. He met with an honorable reception in the Ghibelline city of Pisa.

But trouble soon showed itself. Poverty compelled Henry to exact money from the citizens; and the peaceful professions of the Guelphs were insincere. Notwithstanding all his efforts at reconciliation, the Guelphs and Florence, under the leadership of Robert of Sicily, rose against him. The pope also opposed him, and the king of Naples threw a garrison into Rome. Henry forced this garrison to retire into the Leonine City, while they held the Church of St. Peter against him. Thus cut off from the great cathedral, Henry was crowned emperor in the Church of St. John Lateran on June 29th, 1312.

Henry now endeavored to crush the Guelphic revolt, and raised an army, which he led into Tuscany, with the intention of chastising Florence; but the fatal air of Rome had so undermined his constitution that he died on August 24th, 1313. His body was taken to Pisa and was buried in the Campo Santi, a churchyard of the city. This event changed the situation. The Germans, deprived of their sovereign, disbanded and recrossed the Alps; and the Guelphs were again in the ascendancy. Henry died in the flower of his age and was the last of the German emperors who exercised any real authority in Italy. He was a man of great ability and noble character. The Guelph Villani wrote of him, "He was a man never depressed by adversity; never in prosperity elated with pride or intoxicated with joy." His successors were not emperors in the sense in which that title can be employed to describe him and his predecessors. They were mainly the leaders of a faction of the Italian people, and some of them were never crowned emperor. The death of Henry was followed by a civil war in Germany, occasioned by a disputed succession.

The suspension of the imperial Roman sovereignty before the time of the aforesaid Henry resulted in this, that nearly all the Italian cities belonging to the Empire became subject to tyrants and usurpers; for the three kings preceding Henry did not go to Italy; so that the Italians, not incorrectly, said that the Empire was in abeyance. Thus the city of Verona had for its lords the LaScala; Mantua, the Passineros; and Padua, the Carraras. And it is said that the marquises of Este governed the city of Ferrara for the Church.

While Pope Clement and his court still held forth at Pictavia [Pictavia; Pictavi, modern Poitiers], the king of France was so misled by his officials (as it is said), that he informed the pope that the grandmaster of the Templars and his brethren had fallen into certain errors and vices, and had scorned, blasphemed and mocked Christ, to whose cause they had been dedicated and for whom they had fought; also that they were in accord with the Turks and Saracens and hostile to the Christians. And so they were persecuted and deprived of their possessions and estates, and the same estates were devoted to other uses and diverted to other ecclesiastical defenders of the Christian faith. And the order (as previously stated) grew in wealth; but their piety became less. And now one Jacobus [James Molay, grand master of the Templars], a Burgundian who had entered this order, was, upon the death of the grand-master, made grand master at the instigation of the princes. And it so happened that he fell into disfavor with King Philip of France, to whose son he had acted as godfather, so that under a decree of the pope, all the most distinguished members of the order, together with said Jacobus, their grand master, were, at the command of said King Philip, arrested throughout the kingdom on the same day, robbed of their cities, castles, treasures, possessions, and estates, and all the prisoners brought to Paris. They were held in confinement for a long time, charged with many shameful acts, but which they denied. All except Jacobus and three of his associates were condemned to be burnt; and although they acknowledged the Christian faith and denied the charges, they were burnt. Jacobus was taken to Lyons, and after confessing certain charges held against him by the pope, was brought back to Paris, and together with one of his associates, who was a brother of Delphin, was condemned to death. When the sentence was read to him in the presence of two papal legates, he testified that he was deserving of death, although not guilty of the things for which he was being condemned. After this he, together with Delphin's brother, resolutely suffered the death penalty in the presence of the king. [See Note to the Templars, Folio CXC VII verso].

Trusianus, a physician of Florence, and a disciple of Thaddeus, the physician, at this time wrote a large interpretation on Galen's book of medicine; but when he later noted that he was not happy in medicine, he devoted himself entirely to spiritual matters, and adopted the Carthusian Order.

Richard de Media Villa, a man highly educated in the Holy Scriptures, and of the Barefoot Order (as some say) lived at this time. He was so intelligent and wise in the Scriptures that nothing contained in the divine books was unknown to him. Among other proofs of his ingenuity he wrote an elegant exposition of higher criticism.

Jacobus of Viterbo, of the Augustinian Order, also a distinguished teacher of the Holy Scriptures, archbishop of Naples, and illustrious for his virtue, at this time made and compiled many writings known to the learned.

In the year 1314 three moons and a comet appeared in the north for a period of three months. And in the same year Philip of France died, having reigned 29 years; for during a chase a wild boar got under the king's horse, causing Philip to fall from it, and he died not long afterwards. He was a very handsome man, straight of limb and well proportioned; but he sought too much amusement, leaving the care of the kingdom to his dependents, to the instability of his realm. He left three sons, namely, Louis (Ludovicum), king of Navarre; Philip, the

Folio CCXXIII recto

Count of Poitiers (Pictaviensis); and Charles (Carolus) the Count of the March. All three became kings of France in a short time, and were very handsome men, but unfortunate because of their wives; for Louis ordered his wife strangled. Philip divorced his wife, but took her back again. Charles imprisoned his wife, and it is conjectured that this misfortune was due to the fact that she married in the prohibited degrees, or because of her father's wickedness in causing Pope Boniface to be imprisoned. [See Philip IV, the Fair, Folio CCXVIII recto and Note].

The Island of Rhodes, lying opposite the coast of Lycia, came under Christian dominion in the year 1308, and was given to the Order of the Blessed John under papal authority. For after the city of Jerusalem was completely lost, and the Templars were totally extinguished by the pope for their great errors, the soldiers of the Order of the Blessed John went to this island and drove out the Turks. With the aid and protection of the Christians they rebuilt the city which had been completely destroyed, and renewed its fleet so that it not only protected this island, but also gave aid and support to the island of Cyprus and to other Christian peoples nearby. In reward for their protection of the Christian faith, these knights, through the pope and other Christian princes, were given all the estates of the Templars in the East. Moved by devout considerations, they wished to adopt the rule of the Blessed Augustine; and the pope favored them with ecclesiastical privileges and benefits. For five years the Sultan of Egypt fought against them with his fleet; but he suffered more damage than he meted out. The Turks also attacked the territory of these knights on four occasions, and thus sustained great slaughter and defeat. At last the Turkish Sultan ravaged the island, as stated below. They say the Rhodians have a very well fortified castle, called Saint Peter, which they protect at great cost, and to which the Christians very often fly from the Turks. There they raise and keep dogs, which they let out by night. It is said that these dogs know the footsteps of the Christians and are friendly to them, but they discover the Turks and attack and bite them. [The Island of Rhodes is the most easterly one in the Aegean Sea and lies off the coast of Asia Minor. It has a considerable history (see Rhodes, Folio XXVI verso and notes, above). During the later Roman Empire it was the capital of the "Province of the Islands." Its history under Byzantine rule is uneventful, but for some temporary occupation by the Arabs (653-658, 717-8) and the gradual encroachment of Venetian traders since 1082. In 1309, it was conquered by the Knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem at the instigation of the pope and the Genoese, and converted into a fortress to protect the southern seas against the Turks. Under their mild and just rule, the native Greeks and Italian residents carried on a brisk trade. But the piratical acts of these traders, sometimes joined by the knights themselves, and the strategic position of the island between Constantinople and the Levant, necessitated its reduction by the Ottoman sultans, and the knights evacuated the island after honorable capitulation to Sultan Suleiman I in 1522. The population henceforth dwindled in consequence of pestilence and emigration. The castle of Saint Peter occupies the site of the ancient Acropolis, of which considerable remains are visible. (See also Order of the Knights of St. John, Folio CXC VII verso).

John (Iohannes), son of Emperor Henry (Heinrici), was espoused to Elizabeth, the sister of Wenceslaus (Wentzeslai) the Second. He took possession of the kingdom of Bohemia after his marriage and ruled with a strong hand for 35 years. While his father was absent in Italy he governed the German portion of the Roman Empire as his vicar. By the time of the emperor's death many Italian cities had surrendered and John marched over the mountains with a large army and protected them for a number of years. After he had taken over the cities of Brescia, Bergamo, Lucca, Parma, Reggio, Modena, and others, he provided them with castles and fortifications. The citadel he built at Bergamo may still be seen there. Later he also recovered the cities of Eger and Breslau as well as other cities in Silesia. He made war on the Austrians and carried off so much plunder that he was able to richly reward the troops in his expedition. Finally the king of France asked for his aid against the English, and John was slain in battle with many of his men. He left a son named Charles (Carolo), then 31 years of age.

John (1296-1346), king of Bohemia, was a son of the emperor Henry VII by his wife, Margaret, daughter of John I, duke of Brabant, and was a member of the family of Luxemburg. Born in 1296, he became count of Luxemburg in 1309, and, at about the same time, was offered the crown of Bohemia, which, after the death of Wenceslaus III, the last of the Premyslide kings, in 1306, had passed to Henry, the duke of Carinthia. The emperor accepted this order on behalf of his son, who married Elizabeth, a sister of Wenceslaus, and after Henry's departure for Italy, John was crowned king of Bohemia at Prague, in 1311. Henry of Carinthia was driven out of the land, order restored, and Moravia again united with Bohemia.

As imperial vicar, John represented his father at the imperial diet of Nuremberg (1313), and was leading an army to his assistance in Italy when he heard of the emperor's death. His claim to the imperial throne was disregarded on account of his youth, and he became a partisan of Louis, duke of Upper Bavaria, afterwards the emperor Louis the Bavarian, whom he helped in his struggle against the rival claimant, Philip the Fair of Austria. While Bohemia, where John and his German followers were unpopular, relapsed into revolt and anarchy, John fought campaigns all over Europe. He fought against the citizens of Metz and against his kinsman, John III, duke of Brabant; he led the knights of the Teutonic Order against the non-Christians in Lithuania and Pomerania, and promised Pope John XXII to head a crusade; and, claiming to be king of Poland, he attacked the Poles and brought Silesia under his rule. He obtained Tyrol by marrying his son, John Henry, to Margaret Maultasch, the heiress of the country, assisted the emperor to defeat and capture Frederick the Fair at the battle of Mühldorf (1322), and was alternately at peace and war with the dukes of Austria, and with his former foe, Henry of Carinthia. Soon after the battle of Mühldorf, the relations between John and the emperor became strained, partly owing to the king's friendship with the Papacy and with France, and partly owing to territorial disputes. An agreement, however, was concluded, and John invaded Italy with a small following, and made himself ruler of much of the peninsula (1331).

But John's soldiers were few and his enemies were many, and a second invasion of Italy in 1333 was followed by the dissipation of his dreams of making himself king of Lombardy and Tuscany, and even of supplanting Louis on the imperial throne. The fresh trouble between king and emperor caused by this enterprise was intensified by a quarrel over the lands left by Henry of Carinthia, and still after by the interference of Louis in Tyrol; and, with bewildering rapidity, John was allying himself with the kings of Hungary and Poland, fighting against the emperor and his Austrian allies, defending Bohemia, governing Luxemburg, visiting France and negotiating with the pope.

About 1340 the king was overtaken by blindness, but he continued to lead an active life, successfully resisting the attacks of Louis and his allies, and campaigning in Lithuania. In 1346, acting in union with Pope Clement VI, he secured the formal deposition of Louis and the election of his own son, Charles, margrave of Moravia, as German king (1346). Then, journeying to help Philip of France against the English, he fought at the battle of Crecy, where his heroic death, on August 26th, 1346, was a fitting conclusion to his adventurous life.

John was a chivalrous and romantic personage; but, as a ruler, he was careless and extravagant, interested only in his kingdom when seeking relief from his constant pecuniary embarrassments.

Dante Alighieri of Florence, a renowned bard and poet, and a famous teacher of the Holy Scriptures at this time, was driven from Florence by those who envied him, and went to the university of Paris. After he became a subtle and ingenious poet he wrote a beautiful and praiseworthy poem entitled the Comedy, by which he gave consideration to celestial, earthly, and internal things; and he also wrote upon many other subjects. After he left France he attached himself to Frederick, the king of Aragon, and Can Grande of the Della Scala at Verona. After the death of the same lord at Verona, Dante died at Ravenna in the Year of the Lord 1321 at the age of fifty-six.

Dante Alighieri, a lawyer's son, was born at Florence in May, 1265. He was baptized Durante, afterward contracted into Dante. His Vita Nuova is the story of his early love for Beatrice. There is no evidence that any similar feeling was aroused in her heart. She was married early to another, but neither this nor the poet's own subsequent marriage interfered with his pure and Platonic devotion to her, which became even more intensified after death, in 1290. Shortly afterwards, Dante married Gemma Donati, daughter of a powerful Guelph family. That his marriage was unhappy is a mere conjecture, but it appears that, after his exile, Dante never saw his wife again. In 1289 he fought at Campaldino, where Florence defeated the Ghibellines, and was at the capitulation of Caprona. He held a number of minor public offices. His sympathies were with the 'White Guelphs,' or more moderate section, and as prior he procured the banishment of the heads and leaders of the rival factions, showing characteristic sternness and impartiality to Guelph and Ghibelline, White and Black, alike. Shortly afterward, the leaders of the Whites were permitted somehow to return. The partiality thus shown was a prominent feature in the accusation against Dante; but he had a complete answer in the fact that then he was no longer in office.

In 1301, in alarm at the threatened interference of Charles of Valois, Dante was sent on an embassy to Pope Boniface VII at Rome. From that embassy he never returned, nor did he ever set foot in his native city again. Charles espoused the side of the Neri or Blacks, and their victory was complete. In 1302, sentence of banishment went forth against Dante and others, nominally on the baseless charge of malversation in office. This was followed by a severer sentence, condemning them to be burned alive if caught. The sentence was repeated in 1311 and 1315. During this period, he is said to have visited Paris, and those who, like Boccaccio, take him to France during his exile, suppose him to have been recalled to Italy and politics by the election of Henry of Luxemburg as emperor and his visit to Italy, where no emperor had set foot for more than fifty years. The exile's hopes though now roused to the highest pitch were crushed by Henry's unexpected death in 1313, after which Dante took refuge in Romagna, and finally in Ravenna, where, for the most part, he remained until his death on September 14th, 1321. He was buried with much pomp at Ravenna, and there he still lies, restored in 1865 to the original sarcophagus. Dante had seven children, but his family became extinct in the sixteenth century.

His most celebrated work is the Commedia (later called Divina Commedia), a vision of Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven. It gives an encyclopedic view of the highest culture and knowledge of the age with respect to philosophy, history, classical literature, physical science, morals, theology, all expressed in the sublimest and most exquisite poetry, and with consummate power and beauty of language. His next most important work is the fragment called the Convito, or Banquet. The De Monarchia (in Latin) expounds Dante's theory of the divinely-intended government of the world by a universal emperor acting in harmony with the universal pope.

Something remains to be said of the Scaliger or Della Scala family, under whose members, as rulers, the city of Verona during the Middle Ages rose to a foremost position politically and artistically in spite of the struggles between Guelphs and Ghibellines. Can Grande (Francesco della Scala) was the best and most illustrious of his line, and is especially famous as the hospitable patron of Dante. When a fresh sentence of death had been pronounced by Florence upon the poet in 1315, he took refuge with his illustrious protector, Can Grande, then a young man of twenty-five, rich, liberal, and the favored head of the Ghibelline party, whose name has been immortalized by an eloquent panegyric in the 17th canto of the Paradiso.

HISTORY OF THESE TIMES IN ITALY

The marquises of Este, who exercised lordship over Ferrara for the benefit of the church, and subdued Modena and Reggio after the year of the Jubilee, became so mighty that Charles (Carolus) the Second, the Neapolitan king, espoused Beatrice, his daughter, to Azzo, then marquis of Este. But Azzo did not avail himself of the honors and joys of this marriage for long; for in the first year of the marriage, Friscus, his youthful son by a strange woman, caused him to die in prison. By the favor of certain Ferrarians and the bishop, this youth secured the lordship of the cities of Ferrara, Modena, and Reggio. And there, at his request, the Venetians assisted him with their ships; for the castle, called Thealdum [Probably Tedaldo], lay by the bridge giving passage from the city over the river Po toward Bologna. But Friscus did not dare to take this castle without ships, a fact known to Cardinal Pelagura, whom the pope had sent to Bologna; and so he commanded the Venetians, under threat of an interdict, to withdraw from the Ferrarian affair, and to depart from there with their men and ships. But the Venetians continued their warfare against the castle, set fire to all the ships of the Ferrarians, and took possession of the portion of the city adjacent to the bridge. Before the command and order of the papal legate became known, the Venetians had burned and destroyed the bridge, and taken possession of the castle. Meanwhile Friscus, assisted by Rinaldus, captain of the expedition, set half the city of Ferrara on fire. When the commotion caused by the Venetians had somewhat subsided, the Ferrarians surrendered to them. Then Pope Clement publicly interdicted the Venetians at Avignon, and ordered that wherever Venetians might be found, they were to be seized and sold as slaves; and so many of their estates in Flanders and elsewhere were taken and confiscated.

The Marquises of Este constituted one of the oldest reigning houses of Italy. The house is in all probability of Lombard origin. The lordship of the town of Este was first acquired by Alberto Azzo II, who also bore the title of Marquis of Italy. In 1097, the house divided into a German and an Italian branch. The former was founded by Welf IV, who was made duke of Bavaria by the emperor Henry IV in 1070; and from him are descended the Este-Guelph House of Brunswick and Hanover, and the sovereigns of Great Britain. The Italian branch was founded by Welf's brother, Fulco I. As heads of the Guelph party, the princes of the house of Este received, at different times, Ferrara, Modena, Regio, and other fiefs and territories. Obizzo I, son of Fulco, was the first to bear the title of marquis of Este. He entered into the Guelphic league against the emperor Frederick I, and was comprehended in the treaty of Venice of 1177 by which municipal podestas (foreigners chosen as heads of cities to administer justice) were instituted. In 1184, he was reconciled with Frederick, who created him marquis of Genoa and Milan. By the marriage of his son Azzo to the heiress of the Marchesella family, he acquired great influence in Ferrara. But he was opposed by the hardly less powerful house of Torelli. Obizzo died in 1194 and Azzo V, having predeceased him, the marquise devolved on his grandson, Azzo VI (1170-1212), who became head of the Guelph party, and to whom the people of Ferrara sacrificed their liberty by making him their first lord in 1208. But during his lifetime, civil war raged in the city between the Este and the Torelli, each party being driven out again and again. Azzo (also called Azzolino) died in 1212 and was succeeded by Aldobrandino I, who, in 1213, concluded a treaty with Salinguerra Torelli, the head of that house, to divide the government of the city between them. On his death in 1215, he was succeeded by his brother, Azzo VII, surnamed Novello, but Salinguerra Torelli usurped all power in Ferrara, and, in 1222, expelled Azzo. In 1240, Gregory IX determined it wise to begin by crushing the chief Ghibelline houses. Thus Azzo found himself in league with the pope and various Guelph cities in his attempt to regain Ferrara. After a four-month's siege the two surrendered, Salinguerra was sent to Venice as a prisoner, and Azzo ruled in Ferrara once more. The Ghibelline party was annihilated, but the city enjoyed peace and happiness within, although her citizens took part in the wars raging outside. The Guelph cause triumphed, Frederick being defeated several times, and, after his death, Azzo helped in crushing the terrible Eccelino da Romano, who upheld the imperial cause at the battle of Cassano, in 1259. He died in 1264 and was succeeded by Obizzo II (1240-1293), his grandson, who, in 1288, received the lordship of Modena, and that of Reggio in 1289. Obizzo died in 1293 and was succeeded by his son, Azzo VIII, but the latter's brothers, Aldobrino and Francesco, who were to have shared in the government, were expelled and became his bitter enemies. The misgovernment of Azzo led to the revolt of Reggio and Modena, which shook off his yoke. He died in 1308 and left a disputed succession. The history of the house now becomes involved and of little interest until the time of Nicholas III (1384-1441), who ruled Ferrari, Modena, Parma, and Reggio, waged many wars, was made general of the army of the church, and, in his later years, governor of Milan, where he died, not without suspicion of poison. The history of the house of Este from this time forward is beyond the scope of the present account.

The city of Ferrara, capital of the province of the same name, is situated on a branch of the Po, thirty miles northeast of Bologna. The most prominent building is the square castle of the house of Este, in the center of the town. It is a brick building surrounded by a moat with four towers. The origin of the city is uncertain. It was probably a settlement formed by the inhabitants of the lagoons at the mouth of the Po. It appears first in a document of Aistulf of 753 or 754 as a city in the exarchate of Ravenna. After 984 we find it a fief of Count Tedaldo of Modena and Canossa, who was a nephew of the emperor Otho I. It afterwards made itself independent, and, in 1101, was taken by siege by the countess Matilda. At this time it was mainly dominated by several aristocratic families, among them the Adelardi. In 1146, the property of Guglielmo Adelardi passed, as the dowry of his niece Marchesella, to Azzolino d'Este. His grandson, Obizzo II, succeeded him, and the pope nominated him captain-general and defender of the states of the Church; and the house of Este was from henceforth settled in Ferrara.

Robert, son of Charles (Caroli) the Second, king of Sicily and Apuleia, reigned there for 33 years after the death of his father. He was a noble king, and a son endowed with every virtue. He was highly praised by many orators and poets, and was renowned, not only for his knowledge and experience in military affairs, but esteemed among his contemporaries for his ingenuity and wisdom in the Holy Scriptures, philosophy and medicine. In his old age he expressed a wish to hear Francis Petrarch the poet. Robert was crowned by the pope at Avignon, according to the usual custom. Afterwards he dispatched his brother John (Iohannem) against the emperor Henry (Heinricum) at Rome; but Henry deposed Robert. However, Pope Clement would not consent to this. Later on Robert subjugated the city of Genoa. On his deathbed he provided that his grandson Andrew (Andream), king of Hungary, should succeed him, Robert having no son of his own. [Robert (1275-1343), king of Naples, was the son of Charles II, duke of Anjou and king of Naples, whom he succeeded on the throne in 1309. He was crowned by Clement V at Avignon, and appointed papal vicar in Romagna to resist the emperor Henry VII and the imperialists. Henceforth, Robert was recognized as the leader of the Guelphs or papal faction. On various occasions he obtained for himself or his sons the suzerainty over Rome, Florence, and other cities, and was regarded as the most powerful Italian prince of his day. He was a man of learning, a generous patron of literary men, and a friend of Petrarch. He died in 1343].

ORIGIN OF THE RULE OF THE LORDS DELLA SCALA (SCALIGERORUM)

Canis Della Scala (Scaliger), being a man of stern disposition, was surnamed the Great. He assumed the lordship of Verona, and for fully twenty years governed with such righteousness, wisdom and justice, that by his kindness rather than by the sword, he reduced the district of Romaniola to submission. He was a just prince, gracious and kind, and specially loved and esteemed the learned. After he had made the city of Verona renowned for its great buildings, he died in the Year of the Lord 1329 on the 22nd day of July without male issue, leaving the government to his cousins, the brothers Alberto and Mastino. He was mourned by every man, and his remains were buried with great pomp in the church by the market place of the city. His magnificent tomb, with his statue and an inscription, may be seen at the church door. [The Scaligers or Lords della Scala: In the Middle Ages Verona grew in size and importance, though, like other cities of northern Italy, it suffered much during the Guelph and Ghibelline struggles, rising to a foremost position under its various rulers of the Scaliger or Della Scala family. The first prominent member of this family and founder of his dynasty was Mastino I, della Scala, who ruled over the city from 1260 until his death in 1277. Alberto della Scala, who died in 1301, was succeeded by his eldest son, Bartolomeo, who was confirmed as ruler of Verona by the popular vote, and died in 1304. It was in his time that Romeo and Juliet are said to have lived. Alboino, the second son, succeeded his brother, and died in 1311, when the youngest son of Alberto, Can Grande, who, since 1308, had been joint-lord of Verona with his brother, succeeded to the undivided power. Can Grande (Francesco della Scala) was the best and most illustrious of his line. He died in 1329. The dynasty lasted for more than a century. In 1387, a duke of Milan conquered Verona, and, soon after his death, the city fell by treacherous means into the hands of Francesco II, di Carrara, lord of Padua. In 1404-5, Verona, together with Padua, was finally conquered by Venice, to which it remained subject until the overthrow of the Venetian republic by Napoleon in 1797, when it was ceded to the Austrians with the rest of Venetia].

Louis (Ludovicus), son of King Philip of France, reigned for two years as his father's successor. He was a lover of the Christian faith and the clergy. When he learned that the cardinals in various cities of France had become dispersed and so remained for a long time because of dissensions, and that two cardinals had been slain, he reassembled them under summons to appear at Lyons for the election of a pope. They obeyed him and elected Jacobus the bishop of Porto. In the year this pope was elected Louis fled, leaving a child, John (Johanne), who reigned only twenty days. [Louis X (1289-1316), king of France and Navarre, called le Hutin ('the Quarreller'), was the son of Philip IV whom he succeeded in 1314. Need of money inspired one famous ordinance of this reign: in 1315, the serfs of the royal domains were invited to buy their civil liberty—an invitation which did not meet with great enthusiasm, as the freed man was merely freed for further exploitation, and Philip V was obliged to renew it in 1318. Louis X died suddenly in 1316. His first wife, Margaret, died a prisoner in the chateau Gaillard. He left a posthumous son, King John I].

Folio CCXXXIII recto

ORIGIN OF THE REIGN OF THE LORDS OF CARRARA.

Marsiglio (Marsilius), a prince of the noble house of Carrara. After he had undertaken the lordship of Padua and reigned for many years, not as a tyrant, but as a father, he stood in such fear of Can Grande della Scala's (Magni Canis Scaligeri) power and might that he willingly surrendered the lordship to him. But when Can Grande died in the following year, Marsiglio returned to Padua, resumed the lordship and reigned ten years. He was a very kind man, of lordly manners, conduct and bearing, and endowed with many virtues. He died without male heirs, leaving his entire inheritance to a relative, Ubertino. [Carrara or Carrares, a powerful family of Lombard origin, ruled Padua in the 14th century. They took their name from the village of Carrara near Padua. In the wars between Guelphs and Ghibellines, the Carraresi at first took the latter side, but subsequently went over to the Guelphs. This brought them into conflict with Ezzelino da Romano, who besieged Jacopo da Carrara in his castle of Agna; and while attempting to escape Jacopo was drowned. Another Jacopo in 1312 led the Paduans against Can Grande della Scala, lord of Verona, and though taken prisoner, managed to negotiate a peace in 1318. To put an end to the perpetual civil strife, the Paduans elected him their lord; but, at his death (1324), his nephew and heir, Marsiglio, was forced to give Padua over to Can Grande and was appointed its governor. When Can Grande died in 1329, and was succeeded by his nephew, Martino, Marsiglio negotiated with the Venetians in 1336, and, in 1337, secretly introduced Venetian troops into Padua, and regained the lordship. He died in 1338, and was succeeded by his relative Ubertino, a typical medieval tyrant].

In the Year of the Lord 1310 several families at Venice, coveting the lordship, revolted against the duke Peter Grandenigus; but the revolt was soon silenced by the nobility; the Quirinians and their followers were driven from the city, while the most prominent instigators, together with two Florentines, were beheaded. This was the first partisan disturbance among the families of Venice. Later, during the reign of Duke John (Iohannes) Forantius, Jacobus Quirinus and Marinus Varotius attempted to incite discord among the people; and for this they were beheaded. At that time the six procurators of Saint Mark were established by the council.

Arnold of Villanova, a great philosopher, taught at Paris; and he took it upon himself to prove the coming of the Antichrist by the prophecies of Daniel and the Sibyl Erithrea; and he prophesied that the persecution of the Church would take place between the Years of the Lord 1300 and 1400, specifically in the year 1376. On this subject he wrote a book; but it was rejected and at once regarded as heretical, for many masters at Paris were antagonistic to the views expressed in it. Fearing the Inquisitor General, he secretly fled from Paris and came to Sicily. From there King Frederick of Sicily sent him to the pope; but he died at sea.

Arnold of Villanova, often called the Catalan after the district of his birth, was born near Valencia in Spain about 1235. Where he studied medicine is not definitely known; Montpellier, Salerno, Naples, Paris, and Aix, are mentioned by historians. Few men have had a more picturesque career. He taught at Montpellier, was physician to popes and kings, an alchemist and experimenter, traveled widely, was Spanish ambassador on a number of occasions, wrote on theology, was accused of heresy, but acquitted by Pope Boniface VIII, whom he is said to have cured of kidney stones. Through the pope's contact and friendship with him, the pope himself was accused of heresy after death. Arnold died in Genoa in 1311, though some say he died in a ship wreck. His Breviarium, which deals with the diseases from "head to foot," especially in surgery, gynecology, and poisons, was the best known and most influential work in the Middle Ages. Quaintly enough, the last two subjects are joined in one chapter, and this the author justifies by the observation that "women are chiefly poisonous animals." In the Breviarium, he reproduces some of the prescriptions contained in the Thesaurus Pauperum ('Treasury of the Poor'), written by Peter Hispanus, the only physician ever to become pope (see Folio CCXVI verso, John XXI), especially the famous aqua mirabilis, the 'wonder water' consisting of filings of silver, copper, gold, etc. in a boy's urine. "It elevates the physician who can prepare it to the rank of a prophet."

Arnold's most profound work, which he dedicated in 1300 to Philip the Fair, king of France, is the Parabolae medicationis secundum instinctum veritatis aeternae ('Illustrations of the Healing Art According to the Instinct of the Eternal Truth'). It deals to some extent with internal medicine, but more with surgical diseases. Some of his aphorisms sound distinctly modern: He who in his chosen branch educates himself not for science but for gain, becomes an "abortion." A knowledge of names is essential to science, but no cure is ever achieved by a mere formula. That mode of treatment is best which achieves the desired end with the fewest means. An intelligent and pious physician makes every effort to cure disease with proper foods rather than with drugs.

Though a product of the age of scholasticism, he was an opponent of the scholastic method, and engaged in chemical experimentation with the alchemist Raymond Lull. Some credit him with the discovery of sulphuric, nitric, and hydrochloric acid and of oil of turpentine. He was one of the most famous alchemists, and the first to recommend distilled spirit of wine impregnated with certain herbs as a valuable remedy; and from this we may date the introduction of chemical mixtures and tinctures.

Philip, brother of King Louis (Ludovici) of France, reigned for five years after the death of King John (Johannem), Louis' son.

Philip V (c. 1294-1322), 'the Tall,' king of France, second son of Philip the Fair and Jeanne of Navarre, received the country of Poitiers as an appanage, and was affianced when a year old to Jeanne, daughter and heiress of Otto IV, count of Burgundy. The marriage took place in 1307 when he was thirteen years of age. When his elder brother, Louis X, died on July 5th, 1316, leaving his second wife, Clemence of Hungary with child, Philip was appointed regent for eighteen years by the parliament of Paris, even in the event of a male heir being born. Clemence's son lived only four days, and Philip proclaimed himself king (November 19th, 1317). The barons all did homage, except Edward II of England, and Philip's position was secured. The war with Flanders, which had begun under Philip IV the Fair, was brought to an end on June 2nd, 1320. The revolt of the Pastoureaux who assembled at Paris in 1320 to go on a crusade was crushed by the seneschal of Carcassonne. One of the special objects of their hatred, the Jews, were also mulcted heavily by Philip, who extorted 150,000 livres from those of Paris alone. He died at Longchamp on the night January 2nd, 1322.

Philip was a lover of poetry, surrounded himself with Provençal poets and even wrote in Provençal himself, but he was also one of the most hard-working kings of the house of Capet. The insecurity of his position made him seek the support of national assemblies and of provincial estates. He published a series of ordinances organizing the royal household and affecting the financial administration, the "parlement" and the royal forests. He abolished all garrisons in the towns except those on the frontier and provided for public order by allowing the inhabitants of his towns to arm themselves under the command of captains. He tried hard to procure a unification of coinage and weights and measures, but failed owing to the opposition of the estates. Philip, as a reformer, was in many ways before his time, but his people failed to understand him, and he died under the reproach of extortion.

Pietro D'Abano (Petrus Apponus), a highly renowned physician and philosopher, and a celebrated teacher at Paris, wrote many excellent and profound works on medicine and natural philosophy. In order to understand a number of books written in Greek, he went to Constantinople to learn the Greek tongue. Having accomplished this, he translated many Greek books written by Galen into Latin. D'Abano was highly informed in all the liberal arts, and flourished in the city of Padua during the popular regime. It is said that he was a great necromancer, and demonstrated many things by the black arts. [Pietro d'Abano (1250-1316), in English Peter of Abano, was a remarkable man, a contemporary of Giotto, Dante, and Marco Polo with whom he came in contact. He was a philosopher, astronomer, mathematician, botanist, and a physician with an enormous practice. He taught medicine at Bologna and Padua, and was called a second Aristotle. He translated some of the works of Aristotle and Galen from Greek into Latin; also the astrological writings of Abraham ben Ezra into Latin; for he was a firm believer in astronomy. His most famous work is (or) ('Reconciler of the Differences Between Philosophers and Physicians'). Puccinotti speaks of the pestiferous Arabic seed scattered in the University of Padua and Venice by d'Abano. The Averroistic influence introduced by him remained potent for a long time. He was accused of heresy by the Church, which looked upon Averroism as heretical (see Averroes, Folio CCII recto). The Dominicans hailed him before the Inquisition, where he was tried, but acquitted. According to a legend that spread after his death, he told the students and fellow-physicians who stood about his bed when he was dying that he devoted his life especially to three noble sciences, of which one made him subtle, and that was philosophy; the second made him rich, and that was medicine; the third made him a liar, and that was astrology. Among d'Abano's pupils at Padua were Dino del Garbo and Gentile da Foligno. Probably owing to d'Abano's nonconformity, the University of Padua had a more liberal trend than other schools of learning in Italy. Another element was the rather skeptical attitude of Venice, the suzerain of Padua. They were more tolerant than the other Italians ("We are Venetians first, and Christians afterwards.")].

Dino Del Garbo, a Florentine physician, being a highly educated and well informed man in medicine, at this time wrote many very useful commentaries on the books written by the ancient physicians; and on the subject of medicine he left behind him many good things. [Dino del Garbo, a Florentine physician, was a pupil of Taddeo Alderotti and Pietro d'Abano. For years he was the chief glory of Bologna, but envy and jealousy eventually drove him away. He returned to Florence, where he completed a commentary on Avicenna. He also wrote a compendium on Hippocrates on obstetrics, and a book on surgery. Later in life he retired to Sienna, and so great was his fame that many Bolognese students followed him there. Villari calls him the greatest doctor of physics and natural science, and of philosophy. His brother Tommaso del Garbo held the chair of surgery at Bologna. He died in 1327].

Gentile da Foligno (Gentilis Fulginas), of Paris, a very wise physician, was of no less praise and renown in this period than the aforementioned Dino. This is demonstrated by his keen and laborious interpretation of the books of Avicenna, and his subtle comprehension of the words of Avicenna. In addition to such subtle interpretations he wrote much useful advice against the plague, and demonstrated many extraordinary questions from the medical tables. [Gentile da Foligno was a pupil of Taddeo Alderotti (Thaddeus of Florence). He lectured on medicine at Perugia in 1325. His contribution to contemporary literature on the Black Death (which is surprisingly limited on the medical side), was his ('Advice Against the Plague'). He sacrificed himself for his patients during the Plague, and died of it in April 1348. While in his general writings he follows Galen, Avicenna, and Giles de Corbeil, in his against the plague he exhibits independent thought and observation. He gave sensible advice to the cities of Genoa and Perugia, drawing up directions regarding food and drink, purgation, bloodletting, medicines and disinfection].

Matthew Silvaticus, a physician, born of noble parents at Mantua, at this time wrote an excellent book on the art of medicine, and dedicated it to King Robert of Sicily. [Matthew (Mattheus) Sylvaticus was one of the most important botanists and pharmacologists of the Middle Ages. He died at Salerno in 1342. His ('Book of the Pandects of Medicine'; written in 1317) is a compilation from the works of earlier physicians, brought into alphabetical sequence, thus forming a dictionary of medical terms].

Pope John (Iohannes) the Twenty-Second, previously called Jacques (Jacobus) of Cahors, a bishop of Porto, was elected pope in the cloister of the brethren of the Preaching Order at Lyons in the Year of Salvation thirteen hundred sixteen after a long period of dissension on the part of twenty-three cardinals, and after the cardinals of the Roman church, in order to secure an election, had been locked up together at Lyons by the ardor of Philip, count of Picardy. Before this the papal chair had been vacant for two years. This pope received the crown of the papal see in the cathedral church at Lyons, and from there he proceeded to Avignon. There he made eight cardinals, one of whom was his kinsman, Jacques of Cahors, and another, John Gaetano (Iahannes Caiectani) of the Orsini family. He refused to confirm the election of Duke Louis (Ludovicum) of Bavaria as Roman emperor, because Louis assumed more power as a Roman emperor than was proper. This pope was a highly learned man, endowed with great wisdom, and a lover of the learned. He made an archbishopric of the church of Toulouse, and cities of six of its castles. He was so inclined to innovations that he divided, several bishoprics, and made a bishopric of each division. He also converted a number of abbeys into bishoprics, and bishoprics into abbeys. He confirmed the book of the canon law, called the Clementarium, and brought into better form and condition the Order of Grandmont (which through the misdeeds of a number of irreligious persons had declined), deposing a number of the order for their evil conduct, and making additional regulations for the advancement and promotion of the order. This pope also elevated to a bishopric the Church of Caesar Augustus, which he exceedingly loved, and dedicated to it five other episcopal churches. He also founded a new order of knighthood. After having prudently managed many matters pertaining to the church, this pope in the seventh year of his pontificate enrolled Thomas, the bishop of Erfurt, and Thomas Aquinas of the Preaching Order among the number of the holy confessors of Christ. Later he repealed and annulled the election of King Louis, excommunicating him as a schismatic and enemy of the church; and he condemned many heretics. Finally he died at the age of ninety years in the nineteenth year and fourth month of his pontificate; and he left a great fortune, the like of which no pope before had left.

John XXII, pope from 1316 to 1334, was born at Cahors, France, in 1249. His original name was Jacques Duèse. After studying with the Dominicans at Cahors, he studied law at Montpellier, and law and medicine in Paris, and finally taught at Cahors and Toulouse. At Toulouse he became intimate with the bishop of Louis, son of Charles II of Naples. In 1300, he was elevated to the Episcopal see of Fréjus by Pope Boniface VII at the insistence of the king of Naples, and, in 1308, was made chancellor of Naples by Charles, retaining this office under Charles' successor, Robert of Anjou. It was he who, in 1310, advised Clement V to suppress the Templars, but rendered an opinion against the condemnation of Boniface as a religious affront to the church and a monstrous abuse of the lay power. In 1312, Clement appointed him cardinal-bishop of Porto. Clement died in 1314, but the cardinals assembled at Carpentras in 1316, and, after deliberating for more than a month, they elected Robert of Anjou's candidate, Jacques Duèse, who arrived at Avignon in the same year, and remained there for the rest of his life.

John's pontificate was continually disturbed by his conflict with Louis of Bavaria and by the theological revolt of the Spiritual Franciscans. In October 1314, Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria had each been elected German king by the divided electors. John affected to ignore the successes of Louis, and in 1323 forbade his recognition as king of the Romans. Louis appealed to a general council at Nuremberg, where his position was sustained by the jurists and theologians. In 1324, Louis was excommunicated, and again appealed to a general council, accusing John of being an enemy of peace and law, stigmatizing him as a heretic on the grounds that he opposed the principle of evangelical poverty and professed by the strict Franciscans. In 1324, the pope interdicted the places where Louis or his adherents resided, but this bull had no effect in Germany.

Louis penetrated into Italy and seized Rome in 1328 with the help of the Roman Ghibellines led by Sciarra Colonna. Louis had himself crowned by the deputies of the Roman people, instituted proceedings for the deposition of John, whom the Roman people declared to have forfeited the pontificate (1328) and finally caused a Minorite friar, Pietro Rainalucci da Corvara, to be elected pope as Nicholas V. But after Louis left Rome and Italy the antipope was abandoned by the Romans and handed over to John, who forced him to make a solemn submission with a halter round his neck. Nicholas was condemned to perpetual imprisonment, and died in obscurity at Avignon; while the Roman people submitted to King Robert, who governed the church through his vicars.

John kindled very keen animosity, not only among the upholders of the independence of the lay power, but also among the upholders of absolute religious poverty, the exalted Franciscans. He condemned the protests of the Spirituals, and four Spirituals were burned shortly thereafter at Marseilles. These were immediately hailed as martyrs, while the exalted Franciscans at Naples and in Sicily and the south of France regarded the pope as the antichrist. By another bull, John excommunicated them and condemned their position, based upon the fact that Christ and the apostles possessed no property, personal or common. The minister general of the order, Michael of Cesena, though opposed to some of what he believed were the more extreme beliefs of the Spirituals, joined with them in protesting against the condemnation of the fundamental principle of evangelical property. The pope cited Michael to appear at Avignon with two other members of the order. All three fled to the court of Louis of Bavaria, while the majority of the order made submission and elected a general entirely devoted to the pope. The pope next launched a terrible bull against Louis, calling the people to arms, and promising indulgences to all who should take the cross against the heretic, Louis of Bavaria. Louis, in turn, convened a grand assembly of the clergy, nobility, and people, in the public square of the Church of Saint Peter, condemning the pope and ordering his possessions confiscated. Before his death, John was accused of heresy by the monks. He died on December 4th, 1334.

Year of the World 6534 | Year of Christ 1335

Pope Benedict the Twelfth, of Toulouse, and of the Cistercian Order, formerly called Jacques (Jacobus), was elected pope at Avignon sixteen days after the death of John (Iohannes), his predecessor. He confirmed the excommunication formerly pronounced by John against Louis (Ludovicum) the duke of Bavaria. And as Pope John had died, and all the Italian princes and the people were unanimous on the question of war, and Bologna had also turned to them, they became so haughty that they avariciously attempted many things; and so they divided among themselves the four cities which John, the king of Bohemia, had held for the honor of the church. Parma fell to the Della Scala; Reggio, to Gonzago; Modena to the Marquises d'Este; Lucca to the Florentines. Fearing that during the vacancy of the imperial throne Italy might be attacked by external enemies, the pontiff, in the exercise of his papal power, placed over the above and other great Italian cities, the aforesaid persons, and also appointed other governors there; and as the cities given the marquises d'Este belonged to the church, he levied on them an annual tribute of ten thousand gold coins payable to the church. This pope made six cardinals, excellent men. He was so firm that he could not be turned from righteousness by force, petition, bribe or gift. He loved the pious and openly persecuted the evil. He made every effort, though without avail, to restore peace between the kings of England and of France. At last he died in the 7th year, 3rd month, and 17th day of his pontificate; and he left a large fortune in gold, not to his kinsmen and friends, but to the Church. [Benedict XII (Jacques Fournier), pope from 1334 to 1342, was born at Saverdun on the Arriege. Entering the Cistercian cloister, Bolbonne, and graduating as doctor of theology at Paris, he became in 1311 abbot of Fontfroide, in 1317, bishop of Pamiers, and, in 1327, of Mirepoix. In 1327, he was created cardinal-priest by his uncle, John XXII, whom he succeeded as pope in 1334. He was careful in his appointments, reformed monastic orders, and consistently opposed nepotism. He was a learned theologian. He died on April 25th, 1342].

Louis (Ludovicus) the Fourth, son of Duke Louis of Bavaria, was chosen by some of the electors in the Year of the Lord 1315; and he reigned 32 years. After the death of Emperor Henry (Heinrico) the electors met at Aix-la-Chapelle, and not being unanimous, elected to the sovereignty two cousins who were antagonistic to each other, namely, Louis of Bavaria and Frederick of Austria. Between them a war occurred which endured for eight years. Finally they and their armies met between Micheldorf and Öttingen and a battle took place. Many men were lost on both sides; but the number of slain was greater in the Austrian army. Duke Frederick was wounded, captured and imprisoned, though later released through the kindness of King Louis, upon condition that from henceforth no duke of Austria should attempt to secure the Roman imperial sovereignty as against the dukes of Bavaria. But Frederick, forgetting his consent, refused to reconcile himself to this condition. And so Louis, taking advantage of his victory, considered himself Roman king; and he decreed and transacted many things proper for a confirmed and crowned king to do, ignoring the advice and judgment of the Roman pope. For while dissension and war in Italy were present, he undertook to employ imperial powers in the Italian cities without regard for papal authority. He so protected Matthew, the viscount, and his sons Galeacius, Mark, Lucinus, John and Stephen, that they shamefully undertook to rule the city of Milan as tyrants. When he was about to proceed to Rome, he secured the friendship of the counts of Milan, so that with their assistance he might more easily secure the Roman imperial title. But Pope John excommunicated the said counts and Louis, who afterwards oppressed the Guelphs. Louis now returned to Germany, and later appeared before Trent with a large German army; and he again proceeded to Milan, where the bishop crowned him with the iron crown. From there he went to Rome; and while at Rome, upon the advent of the nobility and the emissaries of the Italian cities who came there daily, he elevated a member of the Barefoot Order to the papacy upon the advice and suggestion of the Romans; and by him he was crowned as emperor. For this reason Louis was condemned by Pope John with various judgments and penalties. Now this Louis was a prudent intelligent man, and well qualified to rule the Roman Empire; but he did not know the Latin tongue, to his great loss; for it is said that one Ulrich of Augsburg, Louis' secretary and chancellor, was the cause of the misunderstandings between the king and the pope. For the said chancellor was ill spoken of by King Louis with reference to certain transactions, which he was obliged to justify before fifteen prelates at Nuremberg. Afterwards, in revenge against the king, the chancellor, in writing a letter for the king to the pope, placed in it, without the king's knowledge, reflections on the pope; as the chancellor in his last illness confessed. Louis died in the Year of the Lord 1347 in a peasant's home at Fürstenfeld, after drinking from a flask containing two kinds of drinks, offered him by a duchess of Austria, while engaged in a hunt in the forest. He was buried at Munich; and at Landsberg his sons divided the country. Upper Bavaria passed to the elder Duke Louis, and Duke Louis born at home, and Duke Otto the younger. Stephen, William and Albert possessed Lower Bavaria, Hannogau, Holland, Zealand, and Friesland. Emperor Louis had a brother Rudolph, Palsgrave of the Rhine, who gave his vote at the election to the Duke of Austria; for which reason he was driven out. He left three sons, to whom Emperor Louis was very friendly; and from these three sons the palsgraves had their origin.

Louis IV, or V (c. 1287-1347), surnamed "the Bavarian," Roman emperor and duke of Upper Bavaria, was the second son of Louis II, duke of Upper Bavaria and count palatine of the Rhine, and Matilda, daughter of the German king Rudolf I. At his father's death in 1294, he inherited (jointly with his elder brother, Rudolf) upper Bavaria and the Palatinate, but passed his time mainly at the court of the Habsburgs in Vienna. In the quarrel with his brother over their joint possessions, Louis was supported by his uncle Albert I, the German king. When Albert was murdered in 1308, Louis became a candidate for the German throne, but his claim was not strongly supported. The new king, Henry VII, was very friendly with Rudolf, and as Louis had not received his share of the paternal inheritance, he demanded a partition of their lands, and received the northwestern portion of Upper Bavaria; but, Rudolf refused to surrender any part of the Palatinate. In 1310, on the death of Stephen I, duke of Lower Bavaria, Louis undertook the guardianship of his two young sons. This led to a war between the brothers, which lasted until June of 1313, when peace was made at Munich. Frederick I (the Fair), duke of Austria, called in by the nobles of Lower Bavaria, was defeated in November 1313.

In August of 1313, the German throne again became vacant and Louis was chosen at Frankfurt in 1314, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle in the same year. War followed between Louis and the rival candidate, Frederick of Austria. Louis' embarrassments were complicated by a new dispute with his brother; but in 1317 Rudolf renounced his claims on Upper Bavaria and the Palatinate, in consideration of a yearly subsidy, and Louis was able to give undivided attention to the war with Frederick. In this, Louis was completely victorious. Frederick of Austria was taken prisoner, but the struggle was continued by his brother, Leopold, until the latter's death in 1326. Supported by Philip V of France in his desire to free Italy entirely from German influence, Pope John XXII refused to recognize either Frederick or Louis, and asserted his own right to administer the empire during a vacancy.

After the battle of Mühldorf, Louis sent an army into Italy which soon compelled the papal troops to raise the siege of Milan. The pope threatened Louis with excommunication unless he resigned his kingdom within three months. The king appealed to a general council, but was placed under the papal ban in 1324, a sentence which he answered by publishing his charges against the pope. In this contest, Louis was helped by the Minorites, who were upholding against John the principle of the clerical poverty. Taking the offensive, Louis met his Ghibelline supporters at Trent and reached Italy in March 1327, receiving the Lombard crown at Milan in the following May. Louis compelled Pisa to surrender, and, in 1328, was crowned emperor in St. Peter's by Sciarra Colonna, a Roman noble; he answered the continued attacks of Pope John by pronouncing his deposition, and proclaiming Peter of Corvara pope as Nicholas V. He then undertook an expedition against John's ally, Robert, king of Naples, but was compelled to retire to Rome, and finally to Germany. The struggle with the pope was renewed in Germany, and a formidable league had been formed against Louis. But the pope died in December 1334, and Benedict XII, John's successor, was prevented from coming to terms by the influence of Philip VI of France. Louis's position was improved when the electors meeting at Rense in July 1338 banded themselves together to defend their elective rights, and when the diet of Frankfurt confirmed a decree which declared that the German king did not require the papal approbation to make his election valid.

The heiress of Tyrol, Margaret Maultasch, quarreled with her husband, John Henry, margrave of Moravia, and fled to the protection of Louis, who seized the opportunity to declare her marriage void and to unite her, in 1342, with his son, Louis. The emperor also increased his possessions by his own marriage. In the course of a war between Louis and the enemies made by his policy of acquisition which ensued in Germany, he was forced to submit to humiliating terms, though he would not accept the election of Charles, margrave of Moravia (afterward the emperor Charles IV) as German king in 1346. Charles consequently attacked Tyrol; but Louis died suddenly at a bear-hunt in 1347. He had seven sons, three of whom were subsequently electors of Brandenburg, and ten daughters.

As a soldier, Louis possessed skill as well as bravery, but he lacked perseverance and decision in his political relations; and the fact that he remained almost undisturbed in the possession of Germany in spite of the utmost efforts of the popes, is due rather to the political and intellectual tendencies of the time, rather than to his good qualities. He encouraged trade and commerce and gave a new system of laws to the duchy.

A comet was seen for two months during the last year of Emperor Louis (Ludovici) the Fourth.

Also at that time there was a great famine throughout all of Italy in which a multitude of beggars are said to have barely sustained themselves on food not eaten by humans. [This paragraph and the one preceding it are combined as a single paragraph in the German edition of the that reads as follows: "A comet was seen for two months during the last year of this Emperor; and at that time there was a great famine in Italy."]

Robert, king of Apulia, died with no son surviving him. He gave his granddaughter as wife to Andrew (Andream), the son of his brother Charles (Caroli), and the king of Hungary, and ordered him to rule after him (i.e, Robert). And he reigned for three years.

Robert, king of Naples (also called Robert of Anjou, or Robert the Wise; Italian Roberto d'Angiò, or Roberto il Saggio), was born in 1278 and died Jan. 19, 1343, in Naples. According to Britannica.com ("Robert." www.britannica.com/EBchecked/topic/505359/Robert), Robert was an:

Angevin prince and Guelf (papal party) leader who ruled Naples as king for 34 years (1309–43).

Robert's early years were clouded by the War of the Sicilian Vespers (1282–88), in which his father, Charles II of Anjou, was taken prisoner by the Aragonese. By the terms of the treaty Charles was freed, and Robert took his place as hostage at the Aragonese court. Taking the title of duke of Calabria (1296), he led an expedition attempting to recover Sicily from the Aragonese prince who ruled it as Frederick III. Robert's military success produced the Peace of Caltabellotta (1302), by which the Aragonese agreed to return Sicily to the House of Anjou when Frederick died.

On the death of his father in 1309, Robert inherited Naples and extensive territories in northern Italy and southern France. For several years Robert skirmished politically and militarily on the side of the Guelf party in northern Italy against the Ghibelline (pro-imperial) faction led by the Visconti of Milan, whom he defeated at Sesto, west of Genoa, in 1319. His desire to enlist the interest of Pope John XXII in a final defeat of the Ghibellines of northern Italy caused Robert to take up residence at Avignon, the papal seat, but in 1324 the victory of the Visconti over Guelf forces at Vaprio, east of Milan, brought him back to Italy to defend his lands.

Robert remained neutral when the German king Louis the Bavarian marched into Italy, was crowned emperor in Rome as Louis IV (1328), and set up an antipope, Nicholas V. Relations between Robert and John XXII terminated when the Pope allied himself with King John of Bohemia, who invaded northern Italy in 1330. In return for King John's support, the Pope offered him Robert's territories in southern France. The Pope's diplomacy shattered the traditional Guelf-Ghibelline alignments in Italy, and the league that Robert joined, consisting of members of both parties, drove King John out of Italy in 1336. The final years of Robert's reign were marked by defections of his northern Italian towns, and his failure to regain Sicily after Frederick III's death in 1337 brought a steady decline of Angevin power and influence.

This paragraph on Robert is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Then Andrew, king of Apulia, was killed with a cord with the consent of his children born after their father had made his will who were greedy for his kingdom. After him that kingdom was in arms for seven years under various quarrels of its princes.

In 1343 Robert the Wise was succeeded on the throne of Naples by his granddaughter, Joan I, who was sixteen years old, and married to her cousin Andrew, brother of the King of Hungary. In 1345 Andrew was murdered at Aversa with Joan I's connivance.

This paragraph, like the one preceding it, is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Folio CCXXV verso

Munich (Monacum), a city of Upper Germany, situated on the river Isar, is highly celebrated among the princely cities of Germany, and is the most renowned city in Bavaria. Although considered modern, it excels other cities in noble, public, and exceptional buildings. It has very beautiful houses, wide streets, and handsomely decorated churches. Although this city had its origin in the time of Otto the First, it was enlarged and adorned with buildings by the aforesaid Emperor Louis (Ludovico). When Otto the First received the imperial sovereignty in Germany in the Year of the Lord 962, part of Bavaria was in the possession of Duke Henry (Heinricus) of Braunschweig as a maternal inheritance. The castle at Veringen was his residence. At that time and in the same place there was a public street or thoroughfare over the Isar; and said Duke Henry caused a bridge to be built over the Isar near the monastic estate on which the city of Munich now stands; and he ordered it to become a public street appurtenant to a little village. But when Bishop Albert of Freising [Freising, situated a short distance to the northeast of Munich on the river Isar, has been the seat of an Episcopal see (Munich-Freising) since the 8th century], saw his tolls and privileges diminish because of it, he complained to Emperor Otto, who ordered the streets at Veringen to remain as they had been according to ancient custom. In the meantime Duke Henry died, leaving a son named Ernest. Before long Eadgyth (Odyecia) [Also known as Editha ('Edith') of Wessex (d. 946)], wife of Emperor Otto and daughter of an English king, also died. So then Emperor Otto married Adelaide, the widow of the deceased Bavarian Duke Henry. Duke Ernest, son of Adelaide, being a wellspoken man of extraordinary accomplishments, was very acceptable to his stepfather, Emperor Otto. Ernest desired the emperor to confirm unto him as a municipality this little village with a public street; and after various conferences the emperor agreed, on condition, however, that the city pay to Freising an annual toll of 50 pennyweight. And thus the city, endowed with royal privileges and liberties, had its origin. After being thus created by Duke Ernest, it increased from day to day in population and buildings. In the Year of Salvation twelve hundred seventy, in the time of Duke of Conrad of Freising this city was divided into two parishes, and the Church of Our Lady was made a parish; for until then Saint Peter's had been the only parish church. Afterwards, in the time of Louis, duke of Bavaria and Roman emperor, this city increased remarkably; for he caused the suburbs and many other structures to be surrounded by a wall, while in the city he built the old castle with the Barefoot monastery, and also the monastery of the Augustinian Order. In this city, before the high altar in the parish Church of Our Lady, Emperor Louis lies buried; and there may be seen his imperial crown and epitaph. This city of Munich was built in a delightful location on the Isar; and through it the merchants passed from time to time in traveling from Italy into Germany. There is also an elegant castle here, a large stately court, with many handsome and wonderful buildings and apartments, chambers and vaults. Up to the present Munich has had various rulers; and now it is in the possession of the illustrious prince, Albert the Duke of Bavaria, son-in-law of Emperor Frederick III. In the spirit of a benefactor he maintains many lions there; and in this city a lioness whelped a large litter of cubs. [Munich, capital of Bavaria, and the fourth largest city in Germany, is first mentioned under the name of Villa Munichen, or Forum ad monachos, so called after the monks who owned the land. The name occurs in the monastic annals of Tegersee (1102-1154); but the monk did not appear in the city's coat of arms until the 13th century. In 1158, it was the site of a mint, and the emporium for salt coming from Hallein and Reichenhall. As early as 1164, it was already walled and had a civic status. The outer wall was built in 1301. In 1327, the city was almost entirely destroyed by fire, but was rebuilt afterwards by Emperor Louis in its present form. In 1632, it was occupied by Gustavus Adolphus, and, in 1705, and again in 1742, it was in the possession of the Austrians. The old town forms a semi-circle with its diameter towards the left bank of the river, while round its periphery sprang up the greater part of the modern city of Munich. The wall with which Munich was surrounded was pulled down in 1791, but some of the gates have been left].

PRIVILEGES OF THE NOBLE FORESTORI.

Mapheus of Bergamo, born of the ancient and noble family, called the Forestori, was highly learned in both branches of the law. He was a well-spoken man of worldly experience and at this time held in great esteem by Emperor Louis (Ludovicum) for his beneficence; for this reason he was granted many privileges, for himself and his heirs, including the power to create notaries to legitimate the illegitimate, to appoint regular judges, and the like.

Raynald, son of Aldromandrini [Aldobrandino?], Marquis d'Este, attained to the lordship of Ferrara in this year. With his brother Nicholas he ruled four years. He drove the French occupational forces from the city, relieving it of their domination. He subjugated the city of Argenta [Argenta, an Italian city lying midway between Bologna and Ravenna, at a distance of about twenty-five miles from each]. He attacked and dispersed the pontifical army which besieged the city of Ferrara. Finally he died in peace, leaving as heir and successor, Obizzo, son of his brother Nicholas.

ILLUSTRATION
City of Munich

A special woodcut extending over a double page depicts the city of Munich. Like Rome and Florence, London and Paris, Munich owes her existence to a river. From her high mountain cradle the river Isar rushes, clean and cold, through the heart of the city – a turbulent flood, now shorn and parceled into a dozen streams controlled by sluices, but beyond the bridges flowing on straight as an arrow toward the horizon. Immediately above the city the river emerges from a narrow gorge upon sandy flats, over which it drains along through shallow channels easy to ford. In the woodcut the Isar appears in the foreground, crossed by a serpentine bridge.

At one of the fords of the river, during the 8th century, if tradition is to be trusted, the abbots of the cloister at Tegernsee stationed an outpost of their rich abbey, thus fastening upon the settlement its permanent name, which, in its varying forms – Muniha, Munichia, Monaco, Mönchen, München, or Munich – means ‘the Place of the Monks.’ Here, in 1158, again because of the ford, Duke Henry the Lion established and fortified a station where tolls could be levied on the convoys of Reichenhall. Munich’s visible character, no less than her origin, is determined by her river. The Isar is the source and center of that dominance of green which sets this city apart from others. All the roads of the plain lead to Munich. Salt dug from the caverns in the mountain sides brought her into existence, wealth of metals, and tall, fair pines were floated down the river to swell her riches. An examination of the woodcut shows a number of rafts used in this industry, while the timber is stored in a number of places at the water’s edge.

Knights, men-at-arms, and pike-men, passed and re-passed here in countless armies, led by the German King of the Romans to work his will upon the Cisalpine land, which gave him crown and title, and to wrest imperial unction from the hand of an unwilling pope. Over the passes, which may be seen from the high places of Munich, wound the caravans, bringing to the northern tribes the silks of Lombardy, the cloth of Florence, and costly spices for which the argosies of Venice held the gorgeous East in fee.

Munich owes her existence to a deed of rapine. Since 903, the Isar Village of Oberföhring had belonged to the rich and powerful Bishops of Freising, who fortified it, built a large bridge over the river, and levied tolls upon the rich convoys of salt from Reichenhall. Jealous of this lucrative revenue, Henry the Lion attacked Oberföhring, demolished bridge and fortress, and obliged the salt carriers to cross the Isar three miles further up stream, at Muniha, which may have been a village, but more probably a monastic hospice established by the wealthy monks of Tegernsee. Here the duke built a new bridge, established a new station, market, and mint. In the state archives of Munich, a fragment of parchment, dated June 14th, 1158, records the imperial ratification of this act of violence.

And thus this little community was born of salt and water. It grew rapidly, but soon lost her truculent Welf master. In 1181, Henry the Lion was deposed by Frederick Barbarossa and the house of Wittelsbach was set over the land which it has held since then. The first of the line was Otto of Wittelsbach, who had faithfully served Barbarossa as warrior and diplomat; and thus the emperor repaid their fidelity, declaring the duchy of Bavaria hereditary in the family, and bestowing upon its members the additional powers and title of Count Palatine of the Rhine.

In 1302 and until 1347, Bavaria was ruled by the first of the two princes who in the thousand and six years of the Holy Roman Empire, obtained the honor of the imperial crown – the emperor Louis, the Bavarian, to whom country and capital alike owe much. Louis was successively Duke of Bavaria, German king, and Roman Emperor. His reign was a ceaseless struggle to preserve the authority of the Empire against the papacy on the one hand, and his belligerent vassals on the other. When he died in 1347, the papal ban which had been laid upon him and his descendants to the fourth generation did not hinder the faithful burgesses of Munich from receiving his body and burying it in the Church of Our Lady – forerunner of the Frauenkirche, where his dust still rests.

While yet a village, Munich was surrounded by a wall less than a mile in circumference. To this was added a second or outer wall, as appears by the woodcut, capped by more than 100 turrets and running parallel to the inner wall, being separated from it by the usual moat. When the outer wall was strengthened, the fortifications were also increased, although, throughout the five centuries of their history they were never put to the test of a real siege. The heart of the modern town still remains within the limits set by the walls erected in 1319. Munich has grown by circles, like the ripples caused by a stone thrown into a pond. Its walls and gates have disappeared.

The oldest church in Munich was that of St. Peter, which is the single link which connects us with the beginnings of the town. Mentioned twelve years after the foundation of Munich, it has passed through more vicissitude and change than any other church in the city. The building of the 12th century was probably a Romanesque Basilica, with a flat wooden roof and two west towers, enlarged 100 years later, and burned to the ground in 1327. The rebuilding progressed slowly and it was not until 1338 that the new church, still uncompleted, could be consecrated. Of this 14th century structure, the walls of the choir still stand, Romanesque in style and massive in character. But the nave seems to have been Gothic, as well as the single heavily-buttressed tower which replaced the double towers of the old church, and still stand. It is difficult to identify St. Peter’s on the woodcut.

As we look beyond the double wall, just beyond the city gate, in the center of the illustration, we note a large church with two towers that terminate neither in steeples nor in cupolas. This structure is the largest and greatest of the works of medieval Munich and is built of brick. It is 3230 feet long, 118 feet wide, and 108 feet high to the clusters of the vaulting. The towers, 318 feet high, are square until level with the roof gable, then octagonal, and finally surmounted with round caps of copper which were added at some time between 1492 and 1530. Apparently the towers were still without cupolas when this woodcut was made, which may have been sometime before the publication of the Chronicle in the middle of 1493. The cupolas are vegetable-shaped, very much resembling an onion, and towers of this design are referred to by the Germans as 'Zwiebel Thürme' or Onion Towers. The twin towers of the Frauenkirche ('Church of Our Lady') have been likened by George Eliot to gigantic pepper-pots, and have been referred to by local humorists as mugs of beer, capped with foam. These towers are visible even from advantageous view points among the Alps. This structure was built as a parish church at a time when the city had not yet become the seat of a bishop. Today it is the cathedral of the archdiocese of München-Freising ('Munich-Freising'). It was built not by a prince of the church, nor by a secular one, but by the people, as an expression of their collective faith. An interval of 100 years separates the completion of the town parish church, the Peterskirche, from the consecration of this, the next considerable ecclesiastical enterprise of the citizenry. Twenty years of building saw the completion of the roof and towers. Only the characteristic copper cupolas were added later as already stated.

The Frauenkirche was built upon the site of an older parish church dedicated to Our Lady. On February 9th, 1468 the cornerstone was laid. The citizens built it themselves, appointed their own architect, and laid down the lines for him to follow. A certain unity of plan and consistency of detail distinguishes this church from other great medieval structures. It is no miracle of frozen music, but an embodiment of solidity and strength, realizing three ideals – size, massiveness, and height.

The traditional monastic origin of Munich, perpetuated in its name, may also be noted from its civic armorial device – a child clad in an ecclesiastical garment, resembling a monk's habit, its hand raised in blessing. This quaint symbol may originally have represented one of the many versions of the Christ-Child legends, and the child probably held in its hands a Bible and the keys of St. Peter. But popular fancy worked a characteristic transformation, replacing the religious symbols by a beer-mug and a radish – the traditional local means of provoking a caving for the contents of the mug. As a French writer has wittily observed, the sentiment indicated by the raised hand has become Prosit ('Cheers!') instead of Pax Vobiscum ('Peace be with you').

In the days of the Chronicle Munich already appears to have been a densely built up town, and well fortified. It is unfortunate that a number of the larger structures behind the walls cannot be identified. As usual in these panoramas, the inhabitants are not at large. The only implications of activity are from the rafts in the river, the timber stacked up on the shore, and what would appear to be a mill, to the left and further end of the bridge.

Folio CCXXVI verso

The new Order of Jesus Christ was established by Pope John in Lusitania (which is called Portugal) so that its brothers might practice knighthood and drive out the Saracens and infidels who distressed and injured the Christians everywhere. The head of this order is in the city of Marino, in the bishopric of Sylvensis [Silves?] where he established the chief house. With the consent of the king of Portugal he gave these knights for the maintenance and strengthening of their order all the estates of the Templars. The chief of this order is the abbot of the Alcohasian cloister, Cistercian Order, in the bishopric of Lisbon, who has authority and power to enlist and to depose such knights.

Clementinarum, a book of the canon law, so called, was at this time confirmed by Pope John XXII and sent to all the universities, with instructions to all the doctors in these schools to read it publicly. The predecessor (of John), Pope Clement, held a council of three hundred prelates at Vienne in which he made many and various laws and ordinances affecting the clergy; and these same laws and ordinances Pope John caused to be compiled in book form and named Clementinarum after the said Clement; and he confirmed it by virtue of his papal authority. [See Clement V, Folio CCXXI verso, and note; also Council of Vienne, Folio CCXXI verso, and note.]

THE TWENTY-FIRST SCHISM

Pietro (Petrus) da Corbara (Corbariensis), of the Barefoot Order, was set up in this year as a pope against Pope John, as Nicholas the Fifth, at the behest of Emperor Louis (Ludovico). He was a boorish person with a young wife who envied him his elevation. He was honored by the emperor and by many others as a vicar of Christ, and to him were attached many miscreants, dissenters, and condemned and wanton persons of his own kind. Through him many received offices as cardinals, bishops and priests, and they became so insolent that they publicly called Pope John a heretic. And as Pietro was a chief and protector of the Fraticellian heresy, he undertook to augment this devilish school of heresy according to his means. In order to conceal their evil purpose these heretics said that Christ and his disciples were so poor that they possessed nothing in particular nor in common among them. But this error was looked upon as heretical by those highly learned in the Holy Scriptures, and was condemned by the pope. Finally this Pietro was taken as a prisoner by Boniface of Pisa to the pope at Avignon. There he asked pardon and forgiveness, but as a penance was imprisoned for three years: and there he died. [Pietro da Corbara, antipope as Nicholas V, in Italy from 1328 to 1330 during the pontificate of John XX at Avignon, was a native of Corbara in the Abruzzi. He joined the Franciscan order in 1310, and through the influence of the excommunicated emperor, Louis the Bavarian, he was elected pope by an assembly of priests and laymen, and consecrated at St. Peter's in 1329 by the bishop of Venice. After spending four months in Rome, he withdrew with Louis to Viterbo and from there to Pisa, where he was guarded by the imperial vicar. He was excommunicated by John XXII in April 1329, and sought refuge with Count Boniface of Donoratico near Piombino. Having obtained assurance of pardon, he presented a confession of his sins first to the archbishop of Pisa, and then to the pope at Avignon. He remained in honorable imprisonment in the papal palace until his death in October of 1333. (See also Fraticelli, Folio CCXXI recto; also John XXII, Folio CCXXIV verso, and notes.)]

Augustine of Ancona, Augustinian Order, commendable for his wisdom and teaching, and for the piety of his life, lived at this time. In clarity of scriptural knowledge he excelled all the teachers of his time for wisdom and understanding of the Holy Scriptures. With keenness and subtlety he interpreted not only the New Testament, beginning with the Gospel of Matthew, but he also undertook many expositions and interpretations of the Holy Scriptures, as the learned well know. [Augustine of Ancona (1270-1328). Also called Augustinus Triumphus, was a native of Ancona and a Hermit of Augustine. The most significant theme of his main work, the ('Complete Treatment of Ecclesiastical Power'), is his extraordinary support of papal supremacy].

Albertus of Padua, of the same order, disciple of Aegidius of Rome, and a highly learned teacher of the Holy Scriptures, was at this time regarded as a prince of preachers. And being highly endowed with scriptural wisdom, he produced a great many elegant, commendable and useful works for the instruction of the clergy and many sermons for the people. He also interpreted the five books of Moses, and all the epistles of Paul. On account of the excellence of his learning and teaching he was honored in the palace in Padua.

Albert of Padua was an early 14th-century theologian associated with the Aegidian School, founded by Giles of Rome (in Latin written Aegidius Romanus; in Italian Egidio Colonna; c. 1243-1316). Its members included Giacomo Capoccio of Viterbo (d. 1307), Augustinus of Ancona (a.k.a. Augustinus Triumphus; d. 1328), Prosper of Reggio, Gerard of Siena, Henry of Frimar, and Thomas of Strasburg (the latter four all active in the first half of the 14th century).

The last sentence in this paragraph is not in the German edition of the chronicle.

Bonaventura of Padua, a general of the same order, and a cardinal of the Roman Church, was in great esteem at this time for his teaching and scriptural ability. Being a defender of the privileges of the Church he was shot with an arrow by a lord of Carrara and crowned with martyrdom.

Folio CCXXVII recto

Roch (Rochus) of Narbonne, a confessor of Christ, was born near Montpellier, in the city previously called Agathopolis. John (Iohanne), his father, was a nobleman there; and his mother was Liberia (Libera). When he reached the age of 12 he began to decrease the amount of his food and drink. When his parents died they left him a large estate, which he at once began to distribute to the poor. He divested himself of the administration of the paternal properties, turning them over to his uncle. And thus, leaving all behind, and wearing a short garment, a hat, wallet and staff, he left France for Italy as a pilgrim. Having journeyed through many cities and all that region of France between the mountains of Lombardy and the English Sea, in which the plague prevailed, and having restored many persons to health by the sign of the cross, he came to Piacenza, where the plague also raged. He went into the hospital there and restored all the patients to health. Finally, according to divine premonition, he himself was attacked with a severe fever, and an arrow of the pestilence was shot through his left leg. [The reference in the text to an 'arrow of the plague,' which struck Roch through the left leg, is a figurative expression which recalls to mind that many people in the Middle Ages believed plagues were due to the wrath of God. And they thronged the shrines of saints to make vows and to pray, especially to Saint Sebastian, whose arrows were supposed to represent the shafts of the plague. Albrecht Dürer evidently had this belief in mind when he represented the plague as a rider on a white horse, who, with a bow, sends plague-arrows over the land]. The pain and burning became so intense that he could not rest. He was driven out of the city and crawled into a forest nearby, where God restored him to health. He now returned to France, where war and turmoil raged. Coming to a little estate which he had given to his uncle, he was seized as a spy. He was condemned to imprisonment by his uncle, who no longer recognized him, and to whom he did not disclose his identity. He remained in prison for five years, like that other Roman, Alexius. Having received the Holy Sacrament, he journeyed to the Lord in the Year of the Lord 1327 at the age of 32, having first offered up a prayer to God that all persons invoking his name be protected against the plague; which is attested by a writing found beside him. Then the news reached his noble uncle, who as judge had sentenced him. His uncle then realized that this was Roch, son of his brother; and he arranged for the burial of the body with great pomp. He also built a church in which Roch was illustrious for his miracles for many years. The merits of this holy man were unknown to the Italians until the year 1415, when he relieved of a great plague the city of Constance in which a council was held. In the year 1485 this holy man's remains were stolen and carried to Venice, where a church was erected to him at great cost: and there he was held in great veneration. [According to legend (and everything about this figure is legendary, since his life appears to be a hagiographic doublet of the life of Saint Racho of Autun, who died c. 660), Roch was born at Montpellier, in Languedoc, the son of noble parents. Various authors place his birth in 1280, others in 1295. His father's name was John, his mother's Liberia. His early desire was to imitate the actual virtues of Jesus, while treading humbly in his footsteps in regard to the purity and sanctity of his life. When his father and mother died, he came into the possession of vast riches in money and land. He sold all the law enabled him to dispose of, and distributed the proceeds to the poor and to the hospitals. Leaving the administration of his lands to his father's brother, he put on the dress of a pilgrim, and journeyed on foot towards Rome. When he arrived at Aquapendente the plague was raging, and the sick and dying encumbered the streets. He went to the hospital, and such was the efficacy of his tender treatment, that the sick were healed merely by his prayers, or merely by the sign of the cross, as he stood over them. Hearing that the plague was desolating the province of Romagna, he went there, and in the cities of Cesena and Rimini devoted his services to the sick. From there he went to Rome, where a fearful pestilence had broken out, and spent three years in the same charitable ministry. Years passed. He traveled from city to city and healed the sick. At length he came to Piacenza, and presented himself at the hospital. But one night he found himself plague-stricken; a fever burned in every limb, and an ulcer had broken out on his left thigh. The pain was so great that he shrieked aloud, and, fearing to disturb the inmates of the hospital, he crawled into the street. But here the officers would not allow him to remain, lest he should spread infection. He dragged himself to the woods outside the gates of Piacenza, and here was healed by an angel or, as some say, by a man of that country named Gothard. He bent his steps toward his own home and country, and arrived at his own little village of Montpellier. But the people no longer knew him, and he was arrested as a spy and carried to prison. He meekly submitted without disclosing his identity. He endured all with patience for five years until he died. Beside his body the jailer found a writing which revealed his name, and these words: 'All those who are stricken by the plague, and who pray for aid through the merits and intercession of Roch, the servant of God, shall be healed.' When this writing was carried to his uncle (who, as judge, had committed him to prison, not recognizing his nephew), he was seized with grief and remorse, and gave his nephew honorable burial. The death of Roch is placed in the year 1327, when he was in his 32nd year. In 1414, when a council was held at Constance (the same which condemned Huss), the plague broke out in the city, and the prelates were about to separate and fly from the danger. Then a young German monk who had traveled in France reminded them that there was a saint of that country, through whose merits many had been redeemed from the plague. The council, following his advice, ordered the effigy of Roch carried through the streets with prayers and litanies; and immediately the plague ceased. In 1485 the Venetians, constantly exposed to the plague through commerce with the Levant, resolved to possess themselves of the relics of St. Roch. The conspirators sailed to Montpellier under pretense of a pilgrimage and carried the body off to Venice, where they were received with great joy. The magnificent church of Saint Roch was built to receive the body. This saint is usually portrayed as a pilgrim, a cockle-shell on his hat, a wallet at his side, and a pilgrim's staff. He lifts his robe to show the plague-spot on his thigh, or points to it].

Giovanni d'Andrea (Iohannes Andree) of Bologna, highly learned jurist and prodigious fountain of knowledge in the canon law, flourished at this time. Mentally fit, and possessing a clear understanding of the canon law, he was able to write commentaries on and interpretations of it, as well as other commendable things known to the learned. He died of the plague at Bologna in the Year of the Lord 1348. [Giovanni d'Andrea (Johannes Andree), canonist, was born at Mugello, near Florence, about 1275, and died in 1348. He was educated by his father and at the University of Bologna, where he later became professor of the canon law. He had previously taught at Padua and Pisa, and his period of teaching extended over 45 years. He died during the plague].

Cino da Pistola (Cynus Pistoriensis), born of the noble family of Sinibaldi, was private secretary to said Giovanni d'Andrea (Iohannis Andree), and was a very distinguished doctor of the civil law. He wrote books that proved very useful in the understanding and interpretation of the civil law.

Cino da Pistola (Cynus Pisteriensis), Italian poet and jurist (1270-1336), whose full name was Guittonicino de Sinibaldi, was born at Pistola of a noble family. He studied law at Bologna under Dinus Muggelanus and Franciscus Accursius, and, in 1307, is said to have been assessor of civil causes in his native city. In that year, Pistoia was disturbed by the Guelph-Ghibelline feud. Cino was a Ghibelline and had to leave. Pitecchio, a stronghold on the frontiers of Lombardy, was still in the hands of Filippo Vergiolesi, chief of the Pistoian Ghibellines. Selvaggio, his daughter, was loved by Cino, who betook himself to Pitecchio. In 1313, the emperor died and the Ghibellines lost their last hope. Cino appears to have thrown up his party and to have returned to Pistoia, where he devoted himself to law and letters. After filling several high judicial offices, a doctor of civil law of Bologna in his forty-fourth year, he lectured and taught from the professor's chair at the universities of Treviso, Siena, Florence, and Perugia, in succession.

Cino, master of Bartolus, and of Joannes Andree, the celebrated canonist, was long famed as a jurist. His commentary on the statutes of Pistoia is said to have great merit, while that on the code is considered by Savigny to exhibit more practical intelligence and more originality of thought than are found in any commentary on Roman law since the time of Accursius. He was the friend and correspondent of Dante's later years. Petrarch coupled Cino and Selvaggia with Dante and Beatrice in the fourth chapter of his Trionfi d'Amore.

Oldradus de Laude, a pupil of Dino and private secretary to Giovanni d'Andrea (Iohannis Andree), flourished at this time, noted for his knowledge of the civil law and for his virtuous life. He left many commentaries on the law and gave good counsel.

Giovanni (Iohannes) Calderini, a citizen of Bologna, was a distinguished disciple of Giovanni d'Andrea (Iohannis Andree). He was celebrated for his scriptural wisdom and commendable life, and threw much light on the canon law by means of his lectures, disputations and writings. He also gave much commendable advice. [Giovanni Andree Calderini, a celebrated jurist, taught at the University of Bologna, and, among other things, wrote a . He died in 1365].

John (Iohannes) Mandena, who by others (is called) de Monte Villa, a distinguished doctor of medicine, and a knight native to England, wandered over the greater part of the globe as a pilgrim. He acquired a knowledge of many wonderful things, especially in Asia and India; and these have been recorded in many languages. He died at this time.

Jehan de Mandeville (here called "Johannes Mandena," or "de Monte Villa" and known to the English as "Sir John Mandeville,") is the name assumed by the compiler of a singular book of travels, written in French and published between 1357 and 1371. By aid of translation into many other languages, it acquired extraordinary popularity, while a few interpolated words gained for Mandeville in modern times the certainly spurious credit of being the "father of English prose." In his preface the compiler calls himself a knight, and states that he was born and bred in England, of the town of St. Albans, and had crossed the sea on Michaelmas Day, 1322; had traveled by way of Turkey (Asia Minor), Armenia the Little (Cicilia) and the Great, Tartary, Persia, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, upper and lower, Libya, a great part of Ethiopia, Chaldea, Amazonia, India, and many countries about India; had often been to Jerusalem, and had written in Romance as more generally understood than Latin. In the body of the work we hear that he has been at Paris and Constantinople; had served the sultan of Egypt of a long time in his wars against Bedawin, had been vainly offered a princely marriage by him, and a great estate on condition of renouncing Christianity. He visited the Holy Land with letters under the great seal of the sultan; had been in Russia, Livonia, Cracow, Lithuania, and many other parts near Tartary; had drunk of the well of youth at Polombe (Quilon on the Malabar coast), and still seemed to feel the better; had taken astronomical observations on the way to Lamory (Sumatra), as well as in Brabant, Germany, and Bohemia, and still farther north; had been in China, where he served the emperor for fifteen months against the king of Manzi; had been among the rocks of adamant in the Indian Ocean; had been through a haunted valley in Armenia; had been driven home against his will in 1357 by arthritic gout; and had written his book as a consolation for his "wretched rest."

This personal history of Mandeville is mere invention. There is no doubt that the travels were in large part compiled by a Liege physician known as Jehan a la Barbe, otherwise known as Jehan de Bourgogne, who drew his information from the works of Odoric, Carpiny, Vincent de Beauvais, and others. Jehan a la Barbe is himself a man of mystery.

The account of Prester John is taken from the famous Epistle which was so widely diffused in the 13th century, and created that renown which made it incumbent on every traveler in Asia to find some new tale to tell of him. Many fabulous stories, again of monsters, such as Pliny had collected, are introduced here and there, derived no doubt from him, Solinus, the bestiaries, or the Speculum naturale. And, interspersed, especially in the chapters about the Levant, are the stories and legends that were retailed to every pilgrim, such as the legend of Seth and the grains of paradise from which grew the wood of the cross, that of the shooting of Cain with an arrow by Lamech, that of the castle of the sparrow-hawk (which appears in the tale of Melusina), and the origin of the dragon of Coa. Yet it is only fair to recognize Mandeville's imaginative powers, for it does not follow that the whole work is borrowed or fictitious. We find particulars not yet traced to other writers, and which may therefore be provisionally assigned either to the writer's own experience or to the knowledge acquired by colloquial intercourse in the East.

Francis of Mayrone (Franciscus Maronis), of the Barefoot Order, highly learned in the Holy Scriptures, wrote much pertaining to the Christian religion, as well as memorable interpretations of the Bible. [Francis of Mayrone (Franciscus de Mayronis) (c. 1280-1327), a French theologian, was a scholar of Duns Scotus. He was probably born at Meyronnes, Ubaye Valley, in the Department of Basses-Alpes in Provence. He was a professor at the Sorbonne, and died after 1327].

Michael of Cesena, a general of the Barefoot Order, wrote elegantly upon Ezekiel and a book of the higher criticism. He was accused of heresy by Pope John and deposed from his office of general; but he justified himself by explanations and reasons, and wrote much against Pope John. [Michael of Cesena (Michele Fuschi), Friar Minor, minister general of the Franciscan order and a theologian, was born at Cesena, a small town near Forlì in central Italy, about 1270. He studied in Paris and took a doctor's degree in theology; taught at Bologna, and wrote several commentaries on the Scriptures and the of Peter Lombard. He contended that Christ and his disciples possessed no property individually or collectively, and this contention, as applied to the Catholic Church, involved him in a controversy with the pope. In 1329, the general chapter of Paris condemned the conduct and writings of Michael and all who took part with him against Pope John XXII. The next year Michael and other schismatics followed Louis of Bavaria. In 1331 the chapter of Perpignan expelled Michael from the order and sentenced him to perpetual imprisonment. His remains lie buried in the Barfueserkerche at Munich].

At this time a cruel war broke out between King Philip of France and King Edward of England. Philip began his reign in France in the year 1328, and he reigned 22 years. He frequently fought with King Edward of England, and was often defeated by him. Although Pope Benedict XII applied himself with industry to make peace between these kings through his legates, no understanding could be reached. After they had inflicted losses upon each other in deadly combats, they encountered one another at sea not far from the ports of Flanders with such force that thirty-three thousand French were slain; and so much blood was spilled that it seemed that the sea of Flanders was stained with blood. [This great naval battle was one of the early engagements of the Hundred Years' War, which began in 1339 as a result of disputes between Edward III of England and Philip VI of France. On June 24th, 1340, the English fleet destroyed the French navy in the battle of Sluys off the coast of Flanders].

Francis Petrarch, an Etruscan of Florence, of ancient ancestry and honorable parents, was born in exile at Arezzo in the year of this age 1304. He was a man of great ingenuity, and adapted to all good and wholesome things. He was particularly qualified in ethics and poetry. He was not a very sturdy youth, but he was supple; of handsome figure and good carriage; of medium height though somewhat slender in youth; and full of face and round of limb. He was stout in his later years. For a long time and until his 60th year his eyesight was so keen that he could read the smallest print without spectacles. All his days and until his last he was of sound body. He first studied the liberal arts, and afterwards, much against his will, he was compelled to apply himself to the civil law. However, when his father learned that his son found more pleasure in poetry than in the study of the law, he left him to his choice. And so he became a highly renowned and versatile poet and orator. Later he journeyed through Gaul, France and Germany; and he saw Paris, and many principalities and kingdoms. And he came to Rome, where he was held in great esteem by Stephen (Stephano) of the house of Colonna; and in the Capitol he was crowned with a laurel wreath as a poet deserves. Then he retired from the life of the people into solitude; and there he wrote beautiful poems. Resuming public intercourse, he went first to King Robert at Naples; from there to the lords Della Scala at Verona; and then to Padua, and from Padua to Venice; at all of which places he was received and held in honor. After this he established his residence in a mountainous district, where he spent his life in contemplation and writing. Finally, worn out by his labors, he suffered a stroke and returned his spirit to Christ in the Year of the Lord 1374. His body was buried in a marble sarcophagus elevated on many columns. In every age he has been regarded as a noteworthy man. He wrote and left many artistic and commendable manuscripts and poems.

Francesco Petrarca, generally called Petrarch, the great Italian poet and humanist, was born at Arezzo on July 20th, 1304. His father, Ser Petracco, held a post as notary in a Florentine court; but having espoused the same cause as Dante during the quarrels of the Blacks and Whites, Petracco was expelled from Florence by the decree of January 27th, 1302, which condemned Dante to lifelong exile. With his wife, he took refuge in the Ghibelline township of Arezzo, where Dante was born. His mother, having obtained permission to return from banishment, settled in a little village above Florence, and here Petrarch acquired that pure Tuscan idiom which he used with such consummate mastery in ode and sonnet. In 1312, Petracco set up a house at Pisa, but in the following year removed to Avignon, then seat of the papal court; and there, and at Bologna, the boy devoted himself with enthusiasm to the study of the classics and the law. After his father's death in 1326, he returned to Avignon. Banishment and change of place had already diminished his father's fortune, which was never large; and a fraudulent administration of the estate left this two sons Francesco and Gherardo almost destitute. Being without means, Petrarch became a churchman, though perhaps never a priest, and lived on the small benefices conferred by his many patrons. It was at this period that Petrarch first saw Laura at the church of St. Clara at Avignon. Who she was remains uncertain, for Petrarch kept the secret zealously. The poet's inner life after this time was mainly occupied with the passion which he celebrated in his Italian poems and with the friendships which his Latin epistles dimly reveal. Now began also his friendship with the powerful Roman family of the Colonna. As the fame of his genius and learning grew, his position became one of unprecedented consideration. His presence at court was competed for by the most powerful sovereigns of the day. He lived mainly at Avignon until 1333, when he undertook the first of many long journeys. He was a great traveler and keen observer—one of the first Alpinists, and he loved the mountains for their own sake. On his return from travels in France, Germany and Flanders in search of manuscripts, he pleaded the cause of the Scaligers in their lawsuit with the Rossi for the lordship of Parma. His eloquence on behalf of the tyrants of Verona won him the friendship of their ambassador, Azzo di Correggio.

On September 1st, 1340, Petrarch received two invitations, one from the University of Paris, the other from King Robert of Naples. He accepted the latter, journeyed in February 1341 to Naples, was honorably entertained by the king, and sent with magnificent credentials to Rome. There, in April, he received the poet's crown at the Capitol from the hands of a Roman senator amid the plaudits of the people and the patricians. From this time on Petrarch ranked as a rhetorician and a poet of European celebrity. He rejected offers of a papal secretaryship. It was also at this time that he met Boccaccio. In May 1347, when Cola di Rienzi accomplished the revolution which, for a short space, revived the republic in Rome, Petrarch, who in politics was no less visionary than Rienzi, threw himself into the republican movement and sacrificed his old friends of the Colonna family to what he judged a patriotic duty.

In 1347, Petrarch built a house at Parma, where he hoped to pursue the tranquil avocations of a poet and of an idealistic politician. But the next two years brought a series of calamities. Laura died of the plague in 1348, and a number of his influential friends died in rapid succession. Friendship with him was a passion; he needed friends for the maintenance of his intellectual activity at the highest point of its effectiveness. Petrarch began to think of quitting the world and establishing a kind of humanistic convent, where he might dedicate himself, in the company of kindred spirits, to still severer studies and a closer communion with God. Though nothing came of the plan, a marked change was perceptible in his literary compositions.

At the same time, Petrarch's renown led to fresh relations with Italian despots. The noble houses of Gonzaga at Mantua, of Carrara at Padua, of Este at Ferrara, of Malatesta at Rimini, of Visconti at Milan, vied with Azzo di Coreggio in entertaining him. Petrarch remained an incurable rhetorician; and while he stigmatized the despots in his ode to Italy and in his epistles to the emperor, he accepted their hospitality, while they on their part seemed to have viewed his political theories as of no practical importance.

In 1350, Petrarch made a pilgrimage to Rome, passing through Florence, where he established a firm friendship with Boccaccio, who carried his admiration for Petrarch to the point of worship. Between the years 1353 and 1362 he was engaged in a number of diplomatic missions. In May 1362, he settled at Padua. In 1363 he visited Venice, making a donation of his library to the republic of St. Mark. Much of the last stage of his life was occupied in a controversy with the Averroists, whom he regarded as antagonists of religion and culture. In 1369, Petrarch retired to Arquà, a village in the Euganean hills, where he continued his unremitting study. On July 18th, 1374 his people found the old poet and scholar dead among his books.

Petrarch was one of the inaugurators of the Renaissance in Italy. He opened up for Europe a new sphere of mental activity. Standing within the threshold of the Middle Ages, he surveyed the kingdom of the modern spirit and by his own inexhaustible scholarship and study, he determined what we call the revival of learning. He was the first to collect libraries, to accumulate coins, to advocate the preservation of manuscripts. His friends knew that the most acceptable of all gifts to him was an addition to his collection of manuscripts. For him, the authors of the Greek and Latin world were living men. Having been eminently religious and orthodox, he did not seek to substitute a pagan for a Christian ideal. As an author, he is to be considered from two points of view – first as a writer of Latin verse and prose; secondly, as an Italian lyricist. His fame depends upon his Italian poetry. He was the first Italian poet of love to free himself from allegory and mysticism.

Yves (Yvo) of Brittany, a highly informed doctor of the written law, and renowned for his scriptural wisdom and marvelous goodness, and for his charity to the poor, at this time lived in angelic moderation, entirely abstaining from wine and meat. He wore a hair-shirt and devoted himself to fasting, prayer and watching. His lodging was the bare earth; his pillow, a hard stone. The Holy Bible always lay beside his head. All his efforts were humbly devoted to the poor, whom he protected. Although he received a large paternal inheritance, he placed his trust in God, always seeking to protect the poor and the widows and orphans. After he died he was ever illustrious for his miracles, and was therefore enrolled in the number of the saints.

Yves or Ives, of Brittany, was born in 1253 at Kermartin, near Tréguier. His father was Heloury, seigneur of Kermartin, and his mother, Azou de Quenquis. In 1267, he went to Paris to study law, and ten years later to Orleans to study canon law. On returning to Brittany, he was appointed ecclesiastical judge under the archdeacon of Rennes. In 1285, he was ordained priest and appointed first to the parish of Trédrez, and afterward to Louannec, where he died in May 1303. He was buried in the cathedral of Treguier, and was canonized by Clement VI in 1347. As a lawyer and judge, he was famed for his rectitude and wisdom and for his zeal in defending the causes of widows and orphans. His feast is celebrated on May 19th, the date of his death. He is the patron saint of lawyers, for he was advocatus et non latro, res miranda populo ('a lawyer and not a thief, a marvel to the people').

Ives is generally represented with a cat as his symbol; the cat being regarded as in some way symbolizing a lawyer, who watches for his prey, darts on it at the proper moment with alacrity, and when he has his victim, delights to play with him, but never lets him escape from his clutches; at least so observes S. Baring-Could in his Lives of the Saints.

But few saints have been made from the professional classes. There are one or two physicians, but their legends are apocryphal. Brittany has had the privilege of adopting a saintly lawyer, after whom the town of St. Ives, England, was named.

BEGINNING OF THE REIGN OF THE GONZAGA.

Luigi (Ludovicus) Gonzaga, a brave, powerful and renowned man, in these years, by stealth and cleverness, supplanted Passerino Bonacosso [Rinaldo Passerino Bonacolsi (misspelled in the Chronicle as Passerino Bonacosso) was the ruler of Mantua whom the Gonzagas overthrew on August 16, 1328]. in the lordship of the city of Mantua, retaining the same for himself and his heirs to the present time. Said Passerino and his forefathers had held this lordship for many years; but in these turbulent times it was a temptation to every thirsty aspirant to power. Because of their historic renown, popes and Roman emperors confirmed the lordship in the house of Gonzaga; although some say that this family of Gonzaga did not acquire the lordship through force and lust for power, but by popular choice. The citizens who previously lived at Mantua were Germans. [Gonzaga, an Italian princely family named after the town where it probably had its origin. Its known history begins with Luigi I (1267-1360), who, after fierce struggles, supplanted his brother-in-law, Rinaldo Bonacolsi as lord of Mantua in 1328, with the title of captain-general, and, afterwards of vicar-general of the empire, adding the designation of count Mirandola and Concordia, which fief the Gonzagas held from Scaligeri until the year 1371. Luigi was succeeded by Guido, who died in 1369 and was succeeded by his son, Luigi II, who died in 1382. Then came Giovan Francesco I, who died in 1407; then Giovan Francesco II (who died in 1444), who received for his military service to the emperor Sigismund the title of marquis of Mantua (1432), an investiture which legitimized the usurpations of the house of Gonzaga. His grandson, Federigo I, served under various foreign sovereigns, including Bona of Savoy and Lorenzo de' Medici. Subsequently, he upheld the rights of the house of Este against Pope Sixtus IV and the Venetians, whose claims were a menace to his own dominions of Ferrara and Mantova. His son, Giovan Francesco III, commanded the allied Italian forces against Charles VIII at the battle of Fornovo. He afterwards fought in the kingdom of Naples and in Tuscany, until captured by the Venetians in 1509. With the help of his wife, the famous Isabella d'Este, he promoted the fine arts and letters. He was succeeded by his son, Federigo II, captain-general of the papal forces. After the peace of Cambrai (1529), his ally and protector the emperor Charles V raised his title to Duke of Mantua. In 1536, the emperor decided the controversy for the succession of Monferrato between Federigo and the house of Savoy in favor of the former. His son, Guglielmo, subdued a revolt in Monferrato and was presented with that territory by the emperor Maximilian II. His grandson, Vincenzo II, appointed as his successor Charles, the son of Henriette, the heiress of the French family of Nevers-Rethel, who was only able to take possession of the ducal throne after a bloody struggle; his dominions were invaded, and he himself reduced to the sorest straits. His great grandson, Ferdinand Charles, acquired Guastalla by marriage in 1678, but lost it soon afterwards. He involved his country in useless warfare, with the result that in 1708, Austria annexed the duchy. On January 5th, 1708 he died in Venice, and with him the Gonzagas of Mantua came to an end].

BEGINNING OF THE KINGDOM OF THE OTTOMAN TURKS.

The Ottoman Turks were so called after Ottoman (Ottomanno), their first prince; and in our times they subjugated all of Asia Minor and Greece. They had their origin during the pontificate of Pope John (Iohanne). When dissension occurred among the Turkish princes, this Ottoman soon became very mighty and celebrated, and he brought a number of cities and castles under his dominion. After Ottoman's death, his son Orsan (Orchanes) succeeded him. He enlarged upon the plans of his father. After him reigned Murad (Amurates), his son. He was asked for help by one who was at war to conquer Greece. But Murad delayed in order that the war might continue. When the contenders were worn out, he made war upon them both, conquering much of Greece for himself. When Murad died he left two sons, Suleyman (Solomanno) and Bajazet; and upon the death of Suleyman everything passed to Bayezid (Pazaitem). Before he was taken prisoner by Tamerlane (as stated below), Bayezid performed great deeds in Greece. After his release from prison he died in Asia without honor or renown. He left many sons, the eldest of whom, Celebi (Calopinus), reigned; and after him came his son Orhan, who was slain by his uncle Musa (Moise) who reigned after Orhan, and died shortly without heirs. After him reigned Mohammed (Mahumethes), a son of Bayezid, and he initiated much evil against the Christians in Europe. Mohammed was succeeded by his son Murad. Murad had a son named Mohammed, who conquered two empires and twelve kingdoms. When he died he was succeeded by his eldest son Bayezid, who now reigns as Turkish sultan. And this is the race of the Ottomon Turks. The Turkish name has so augmented itself that what was formerly Asia, is now Turkey.

Odericus, a pious man of the Barefoot Order, wandered through Asia and India, preaching and enlightening by his miracles. He miraculously brought the remains of four saints from the city of Hormes, over the upper Indian sea, to the city of Cora.

Bartholomeus of Pisa, of the Preaching Order, a doctor of the Holy Scriptures and of the canon law, compiled many praiseworthy things at this time, and more particularly a compendium named Pisano after himself.

Albertus Brixianus (of Brescia), of the same Order, possessed of scriptural wisdom and of still greater sanctity, was at this time illustrious for his miracles. He also left excellent writings. It is said that St. Augustine and St. Thomas at one time appeared to him.

Ludolfus, a German of the Carthusian Order, prior of Strassburg, and illustrious for his learning and saintly ways, at this time, through divine revelation rather than by human industry, wrote an excellent book on the life of Christ in a heavenly manner. And thereby he indicated and gave proof of his ability and knowledge in all things divine and profane, and particularly of the life of Christ, so far as it is possible for any one person to have knowledge thereof.

Thomas of Strassburg, a general of the Augustinian Order, lived at this time. He wrote interpretations and expositions on the four books of higher criticism with such elegance that in Germany his work was given preference over all others.

Ubertino of Garrara in this year secured the rule of Padua through the efforts of his uncle Marsiglio; and he ruled for six years. But being much distressed by Mascino, the lord of Verona, he finally surrendered the city to him. But when the Venetians and the lord of Milan made a treaty of peace, the city of Padua was restored to him, and his sovereignty was confirmed by imperial and papal authority; and he ruled Padua in peace for the rest of his life. Upon his death, his son and successor, Marsilius, was slain by Jacopo, his uncle, and the rule passed to the said Jacopo.

Astesanus of Asti in Lombardy was of the Barefoot Order. He was a highly learned man and at this time wrote an excellent compendium of the Holy Scriptures and of the civil law.

Year of the World 6542 | Year of Christ 1343

Clement VI, previously called Pierre (Peter) a monk, afterward archbishop of Rouen, and finally, in the month of May, A.D. 1342, elected pope at Avignon, was a well educated, eloquent, mild, and whole-souled man. In the first year of his pontificate he consecrated eight cardinals and two deacons. However, after he learned that there was much dissension and turmoil in Italy, he confirmed only Luchinus and John as episcopal viscounts of Insubria, ignoring other princes in Italy, in the hope that these two might oppose the majesty of Emperor Louis, who was about to invade Italy. The emperor proceeded as far as Trent, and in the exercise of his imperial authority, to the distress of the pope he confirmed many governors of Italian cities which belonged to the Church. This antagonistic attitude greatly endangered the pope and his successors; for under the pretense of municipal government many cities were withdrawn from obedience to the Church. This pope sent a number of cardinals from Avignon to Rome to set aright the status and affairs of the Romans. Finally Clement died at Avignon in the eleventh year of his pontificate, and he was buried there.

The Jubilee, or Year of Grace, was fixed by Clement as A.D. 1350, at the request of the Romans; and every fiftieth year thereafter was to be a year of grace for absolution from all sins, for the benefit of those who should visit the churches and holy places at Rome. Although, according to the old law, every hundredth year had been a year of Jubilee, yet, as human life did not span that period it was thought best to make the pilgrimages to Rome not more than fifty years apart. In the same year a great number of people came to Rome from all parts of Christendom, a greater concourse than in any previous jubilee year.

In this same period there occurred at Milan an unheard of mortality from the plague; and a frightful pestilence raged continuously for three years over all Italy. Barely ten persons out of every thousand survived; and this is not to be marvelled at, for the great number of people who came to Italy in the course of the Jubilee Year infected and poisoned one another.

Innocent VI, formerly called Etienne (Stephen), highly learned in the canon and civil laws, firstly a procurator, and later bishop and cardinal, was elected pope in A.D. 1352. He was a man of righteousness, great firmness and earnestness. He conferred ecclesiastical benefices only upon pious learned priests who had led a good life. Soon after his coronation he ordained that all prelates and holders of benefices should repair to their churches on pain of excommunication; for he said that the pastures should be tended by their own shepherds and not by mercenaries. And thus he curtailed the household expenses which at that time were very great; he appointed pious persons to the offices and caused the cardinals to do likewise. He provided a fixed compensation for the judges of the papal court so that by reason of their own poverty they might not be diverted in their decisions by gifts and bribes. He was moderate in the matter of provisions, but liberal in military expenditures. He demanded restitution of what the tyrants had wrested from the church. He sent forth Aegidius of the noble family of Carilla, a native of Spain, who was a bishop of Sabina and a cardinal, and a distinguished, ingenious, and mighty man; and through him he soon brought all the cities and castles of the church, which had been incumbered by the tyrants, back under his dominion. This Innocent caused the Genoese and Venetians to enter into a treaty of peace; and he made peace between the Pisans and Florentines. He also silenced the dissensions which had occurred in the election of senators at Rome, and diligently sought to end the war between England and France. He caused ships to be prepared against the infidels. But he died in the tenth year of his pontificate in the face of such cares, labors and strife, and was buried in the Carthusian monastery at Avignon which he had built and endowed at his own expense.

Charles IV, son of King John of Bohemia, and grandson of Emperor Henry, was elected Roman emperor in A.D. 1347 by the electors of the empire, at the direction of Pope Clement VI, to the ignominy and exclusion of Emperor Louis; and he reigned thirty-two years. Charles was well educated and knew many languages, was just, pious and godfearing, loving the pious and hating evil. In furtherance of justice he made sundry laws, which are still current, and are called after him, Caroline. While his father still lived he fought against the infidels with good fortune; and with the sword he protected the cities in Lombardy, which his father had conquered. While a mere youth he fought and defeated those of Verona. In the same battle he was twice unhorsed, took the saddle a third time, and gave proof of his valor. He was baptized Wenceslaus, and at the time of his confirmation his name was changed by Charles the king of France, who reared him from youth. This Charles was a man of great deeds, who enlightened the kingdom of Bohemia by his service to and by virtue of good laws and customs. He established the school of liberal arts at Prague, enclosed the Neustadt with walls and towers, built a stately royal palace, founded many cloisters, erected marvelous castles, and gave peace to all Bohemia. When he attained to the Roman sovereignty he proceeded to Rome, tarried for a long time at Mantua, and restored unity among the Italian princes, who feared him. He then proceeded to Milan, where he received the iron crown according to custom. On his way to Rome he came to Pisa where he silenced the contending partisans. Those of Sienna, Volatarno, Miniatisensis and Florence also submitted to him. Finally he came to Rome, where he was crowned with the imperial crown by two cardinals, whom Pope Innocent sent there for that purpose. Thereafter he drove out the Ghibellines, replacing them by Guelphs. He brought the Lombards under his dominion, and gave law and order to the remaining regions of Etruria according to his will. After he was crowned at Rome he surrendered to the pope for judgment those who had opposed the church. Proceeding through Etruria and Lombardy, he returned to Germany. He gave Moravia to his brother John, and fortified Prague with new walls and defenses. He restored the bridges over the Moldau which had been ruined by the floods. He brought the remains of St. Vitus to Prague, and elevated to a bishopric the church there, which had been subject to the bishop of Mainz. He was a very highly renowned and praiseworthy man, except (as some write) that he was more diligent in behalf of Bohemia than in behalf of the Roman empire. He promised every elector 100,000 guilders to vote for his son Wenceslaus as his successor; but being unable to pay in cash, he pledged to them in common the revenues of the Roman empire. Several years thereafter Charles died at a good old age, in A.D. 1373.

Count Gunther of Schwartzburg, a magnanimous man, by the favor of certain electors, set himself up against the said Emperor Charles, and called himself Roman Emperor. After he had collected a large army, and was about to make war upon Charles, and no one could dissuade him therefrom by plea or threat, he was poisoned, and Charles was suspected of having instigated a physician to do the deed. After Gunther's death Charles reigned without opposition.

A comet appeared in the North in December 1351. This was followed by strong winds, and a burning beam was seen to fall from the sky. It is said that before the death of Pope Innocent VI, there was a greater eclipse of the sun than had ever been seen before.

A great overhanging horrible mist moved among the clouds, and fell to earth, and it is said that a great quantity of vermin fell from the heavens in the East.

Folio CCXXIX verso

Prague, capital city of the kingdom of Bohemia, is a very large city, whose description, in view of its age, should have been given ere now. But as Emperor Charles IV, the Bohemian king, performed many great and memorable things in this city, its description was held in abeyance until his deeds were told. This city (as the Bohemian historians say) originated after the time of Abraham the patriarch, and is a venerable royal episcopal see. It is divided into three parts, Little Prague, Old Prague, and New Prague. Little Prague embraces the left side of the Moldau and touches the elevation on which the royal court and the episcopal church of St. Vitus is located. Old Prague lies entirely in a plain, and is beautified with great and venerable buildings. The way from the old city to the new is by means of a stone bridge with 24 arches. The new city is separated from the old one by a deep moat, and is surrounded by walls. This city is extensive and reaches to the mount of Saint Charles and Saint Catherine, and as far as the Wyssehrad, built in the form of a citadel. There stands the college of the school. The city is celebrated and renowned in Bohemia, which belonged to Germany. The entire city lies exposed to the winds from the north, is rotund in form, and is a three days' journey from the villages. It is entirely surrounded by a forest, and is watered by rivers of which the Moldau is the largest and flows through the capital city of Prague. When a difference arose as to how this city was to be called, Libussa, the duchess, ordered that the first workman encountered should be asked what he is doing, and the first word of his answer should be the name of the city. The first man asked was a carpenter; and he said he was making a threshold, which in the Bohemian tongue is Praha; and thereafter the city was known by the abbreviated name of Prague. In this country the Amazons once ruled, and thereafter dukes reigned until the time of Wratislaus, the first king, who in A.D. 1086, in a council of the princes at Mainz, was declared king of Bohemia by Emperor Henry V; and Moravia, Silesia and Lausitz were added to the Bohemian kingdom.

Folio CCXXX recto

Thereupon Gilbertus, the archbishop of Trier, was sent to Prague with Wratislaus, to anoint him before the people as king and to crown him. With the consent of Pope Alexander III, Wratislaus set up in the castle at Prague an assembly of regular canons, wherein not only the provost, but also the dean and the priest, gospeller and epistolary, since they hold divine offices, enjoy episcopal honors; while the provost, called a chancellor of the kingdom, also enjoys princely honors. Some say that Bohemia was elevated from a duchy to a kingdom by Emperor Frederick I. Thereafter Count Ulrich of Kärnten, who had no male heirs, received money of Ottocar, the king of Bohemia, and in consideration thereof ceded to him Carinthia (Kärnten), Carniola (Krain or Crain), the march of Lusatia (Lausitz or Wendisches Marck), and Portunau (?Portu naonis?). Finally, in the time of Charles IV the kingdom of Bohemia attained to great power, glory and increase, until no kingdom in all Europe equaled it in the number, wealth, and elegance of its churches and godly houses, with their large, tall, costly, light and glorious buildings, and in rich silver and golden ornaments, jewels, precious stones, costumes and decorations; and this, not only in the cities, but also in the villages. Among others there was a costly cloister in Prague, situated on the Moldau, where the Bohemian kings were buried. In addition to its costly and memorable buildings, this cloister had a large elegant four-cornered cross-walk, wherein the Old and New Testaments, from the creation to the Revelation of St. John, were inscribed on tablets in such beautiful large letters that anyone could easily read them from top to bottom. This land of Bohemia was a flower of fragrance, which, under the princes, gave off a sweet savor. But now it is possessed by an overpowering stench. God grant that it may soon recover its sweet savor. The history of Bohemia and of its kings was elegantly written by Pope Pius II.

The miserable wretched Jews, in A.D. 1337, at Deckendorf, on the Danube, in Bavaria, in scorn and ignominy of the divine majesty and high veneration paid to our Lord Jesus Christ and to the holy Christian religion, stabbed the Holy Sacrament many times. They then threw it into a hot oven, and as it remained unconsumed, they finally placed it on an anvil and struck it with hammers. When this became known, the Jews were seized by Hartmann von Degenberg, the caretaker, and the citizens; and when the truth was established, they were deservedly condemned to death. And this same Host, being present at the Holy Sepulchre, is venerated for its many miracles.

Item: Thereafter, in the year A.D. 1348, all the Jews in Germany were burned, having been accused of poisoning the wells, as many of them confessed.

At this time locusts and vermin passed through the sky from east to west like a thick cloud, devastating all vegetation and fruits; and after they were dispersed the stench caused a horrible pestilence.

A pitiful and lamentable pestilence began in the year 1348 and endured for three years throughout the world. It resulted from the aforesaid locusts or vermin. It started in India and spread as far as England, ravaging Italy and France, and finally Germany and Hungary. The mortality was so rapid and great that barely ten persons out of every thousand survived. In some regions only about one third of the population escaped. Many cities, towns, marts and villages died out entirely and remained void. Some said that the Jews increased this calamity by poisoning the wells.

Gerhardus of Siena, of the Augustinian Order, an illustrious interpreter of the Holy Scriptures, an ingenious man, and a follower of St. Aegidius of Rome, died in old age at this time. He was highly educated, and wrote and left many useful and commendable manuscripts. Saint Bernardinus, his countryman, availed himself of writings; and he was also praised by Joannes Andreae.

Gerhardus, of the same Order, and teacher of the Holy Scriptures, bishop of Savoy, was held in esteem at this time. He was more devoted to promoting the welfare of his people than to ruling over them. He was also highly learned in the canon law, upon which he wrote a number of interpretations.

Thomas of Florence, a physician, and son of the deceased Dino, the physician, was of no less renown for his intelligence than his father before him.

Bartholus de Saxo Ferrato, a prince of jurists in time past, and an extraordinary interpreter of the law, and a disciple and hearer of Cinus and Jacobus Bothigarius, the doctors, was at this time held in great esteem by all the world for his scriptural knowledge, and his understanding and interpretations of the law. Excelling all other interpreters of the written law, he wrote excellent interpretations of the imperial and civil laws, as well as many exceptional and commendable things of good counsel. He died at the age of 56 years.

Franciscus Albergotus of Aretino, an able doctor and interpreter of the imperial law, was a confidant and follower of Bartolus.

Jacopino, a lord of Carrara, who slew Marsiglio, was, after he had ruled there for four years, slain by Guglielmo, his son, who was born to him by a concubine because he had called him a bastard. To do this he called his father to a secluded place and stabbed him with a sword, and caused him to be buried in St. Augustine's church. And therefore the Lord, in no idle words, nor in vain, said, "He who slays with the sword, by the sword shall he be slain."

Folio CCXXXI recto

Charles IV, a highly renowned emperor, together with his wife and sons, went to Pope Urban at Rome in A.D. 1368. He proceeded through Padua and Bologna and into Etruria. When he reached Pisa a number of cities submitted to him as part of the Roman Empire. He also secured various sums of money from the Florentines, who feared the opposition of certain of their subjects in Etruria and who would have proceeded against them if the Emperor had consented. While Charles was at Rome he requested Pope Urban to search for the heads of the holy apostles, Peter and Paul. Through divine sanction they were found and they were deposited in a visible place in the Church of St. John Lateran, ornamented with much silver and gold and precious stories. At one time Charles attended the University of Prague; and there he heard the masters of the liberal arts disputing for four hours. His attendants became impatient and reminded him that it was time for the evening meal. Whereupon Charles answered, It is time for you, but not for me; for this is my meal. At another time he ordered brought before him a man who wanted to take the emperor's life; and Charles handed him a thousand gliders with which to endow his eligible daughter, saying that he felt sorry for the daughter who, although the eldest, was destined to remain at home. The man thanked the king, and returned to those who had engaged him to slay the king, and said, I did not know who Charles was, but now I do not wish to slay or otherwise do away with this kind and merciful prince. During Charles' time serious dissension arose in the imperial city of Nuremberg because the members of the council and the heirs of Charles were attached to the emperor. This was contrary to the wishes of the community. The uproar was caused by one Geiszbart, a member of the guild of smiths; but the controversy silenced through the diligence of the emperor; the guild of the craftsmen was abolished, the city provided with better police protection, and the butchers who had adhered to the emperor and the council were perpetually privileged to celebrate carnivals at Shrovetide.

The Order of Jesuati (or Jesuates) had its origin at Siena in Etruria, under the hereinafter named Pope Urban. The members of this order wore lay dress according to the custom of the clergy, lived together in houses, with great affection and simple devotion, performed manual labor, and served God. When said pope summoned them before him he was greatly pleased with their mode of life, and he assigned to them a habit consisting of a white robe and a cowl; and he gave them as patron a brave and very holy man who was his kinsman, and who by virtue of the authority vested in him, prescribed for them a gray habit over the white coat; and they were to remain unshod. He also endowed them with many privileges, and they increased throughout Italy, and because of the good life of its members, they were held in high esteem.

The Order of the Regulated Canons, called the Scopetini, and which we call St. Salvatore, also originated at this time in the vicinity of Siena through certain fathers of the Augustinian Order. This congregation was later recognized by Pope Gregory XI, confirmed and chartered, and reckoned among the Regular Canons. These men, in memory of their original states, wore a white robe with a white scapular over a white linen shirt. They live off their revenues and rents, and do not preach, but they do hear confessions. Until now they have been held in great esteem and respect; for this order reared a large number of men highly renowned for their Scriptural wisdom and piety.

John, king of France, began to reign in A.D. 1350 on the death of his father Philip; and he reigned twenty-five years. He carried on the war begun by his father with Edward, the king of England. However, in the sixth year of his reign he was defeated by King Edward at Poitiers, and he and his son Philip were taken prisoners; and Gaulterus, the duke of Athens, and 20,000 Frenchmen were slain. Three years later King Edward freed John and all the prisoners on condition that he never again undertake a war against Edward; but John soon violated his pledge, causing Edward to take up arms anew. And Edward invaded France with a large and mighty army, inflicted a great defeat, and ravaged the country for a long time.

Urban V, previously called Wilhelmus Grisant, abbot of St. Victor's at Marseilles, was, while absent in Italy as a legate, unanimously elected pope at Avignon. He was a very virtuous man, and of strong character and upright life. He sent the Spanish cardinal Aegidius to Canis della Scala at Verona. To Verona Urban summoned the Italian lords and governors, and made an alliance with them against Bernabo Visconti of Milan, who was afterward defeated, driven to flight and peace restored to Italy. Thereafter, in the fourth year of his pontificate, Pope Urban came to Italy, determined to restore order in Italian affairs. But when Emperor Charles learned that Urban had gone to Rome, he also went there, as above stated. At that time (as heretofore stated) the heads of St. Peter and St. Paul were found. While Urban was at Rome, because of the Germans and other foreigners, he caused beautiful palaces to be built; and because of the depressing atmosphere at Rome in the summer, he also caused residences to be built in the Old City and on the Falisconian hill. He released from prison John Haucutgar, a distinguished soldier, and made him a captain over the men formerly under Aegidius. He then returned to France, and died at Marseilles in the ninth year of his pontificate.

Gregory XI, formerly called Belfort, a cardinal, was unanimously elected pope at Avignon. At the age of seventeen his uncle Pope Clement VI made him a cardinal, and in order to avoid criticism that he was more inclined to favor his own blood than the interests of the church, he sent his nephew for training and education to the most learned men, and above all, to Baldus of Paris. He was highly educated in all the arts of scriptural wisdom, and was of such innocent and unspotted life, and such a whole-souled and good man, that all loved him. As soon as he entered upon his pontificate he sent his legate to Italy to obtain information concerning the affairs of the church there, and to make peace with the Visconti of Milan; for everything was in a state of turmoil and chaos. Before this time Gregory had been in Italy for a long while, and now, while under the guidance of Baldus, the highly learned doctor of jurisprudence at Paris, he considered what benefits his entry into Italy and his presence at Rome might confer upon the church. On one occasion, when he admonished a bishop to return to his church at home, the bishop replied, Holy Father, why do you not return to your church at Rome? The pope gave way to the idea, and contrary to the wishes of his kinsmen, he hurried to Rome in A.D. 1376, in the seventh year of his pontificate, and after the papal court had been held in France for seventy years. And although the return of the papal court to Rome gave joy to the people there, it was obnoxious to the Florentines, who feared it. Many hoped that now the clergy would be elevated and tyranny suppressed. The city of Rome was in need of the return of the papal court, for the churches, the walls and towers, and particularly the buildings everywhere had fallen into a state of ruin; and civic morals had so departed that civic life was not felt there. But after the papal see was re-established there, the city increased from day to day in the number of its public and private buildings, as well as in the elegance of its civic status and government. And although the pope exhorted the Florentines to make peace, they were contrary; wherefore they were excommunicated. Nevertheless they compelled the priests to celebrate mass among them. Thereby they caused the pope to make war. However, in the course of those events the pope suffered unendurable pains of the bladder, and died in the ninth year of his pontificate.

Brigida or Brigitta (Saint Bridget), a devout Christian woman of German nationality, and a princess and noblewoman of Sweden, was born of illustrious, noble and devout parents. Her father, who through particular devotion to St. James had made a pilgrimage, went to confession every Friday in memory of the passion of Christ. While pregnant with Bridget, her mother became involved in a shipwreck, but was preserved for the sake of her fruit. For three years after her birth Bridget was unable to talk, but thereafter she was fully able to speak. On the death of her mother she was placed in charge of her mother's sister. She grew up in devotion and every virtue. Her father espoused her to a noble and intelligent youth; and with him she lived for many years in honor, and in incredible abstemiousness, humility, gentleness and industry. When her husband died she divided all her possessions among her children and the poor, changing her dress and mode of life. She made no use of linen raiment except upon her head, but wore a dress of coarse hair to castigate her body. At the command of Christ she journeyed to Rome with a devout companion, and disclosed to Pope Urban her revelation that he should not go to Avignon. So also, she sent a letter to Pope Gregory urging him to return the papal see to Rome. From thence she made pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and then returned to Rome. Thereafter she was seriously ill for an entire year, and the Lord revealed to her the time of her death; and she died in blessedness. In the course of her life God granted her many revelations of things to come.

The Order of Saint Bridget had its origin with this same highly renowned woman; and it was also called the Order of our Saviour (St. Salvatore). And thus this holy woman, through the promptings of the Holy Ghost, originated and established a new clerical order with a dual cloister for men and women, an order which St. Basil is said to have founded in Greece. But thereafter, from time to time, the Church, in order to silence evil tongues, dissolved this cloister so that they should remain separate and apart. However, it is said that St. Bridget through the promptings of the Holy Ghost, revived and re-established the order, so that men and women lived side by side, although separated, making access from one to the other difficult, except in cases of necessity, as when the Sacrament was to be brought to the sick. However, they had in common a church in which the brothers performed their devotions below, and the sisters above. The former were in care of an abbess, but only the brethren performed the divine service. The brethren were subject to one of their own number, called prior, or confessor. She also ordained that such cloisters should possess property and receive revenues, and that all the brothers and sisters should receive food and clothing at the hands of the abbess. Item: They were not to leave the cloister without urgent and apparent reasons, and then only by the permission of the abbess. They were to be admitted to the order and consecrated only by a bishop. Their habit consisted of a coat with a gray mantle, thereon a red cross inscribed with a small white circle. They were to wear no linen next to their bodies, and ate meat three days a week except during Lent. They observed the rule of St. Augustine, supplemented by regulations, which (as she said) were revealed to St. Bridget by God, and which the holy fathers, the popes, confirmed with exceptional privileges. There were but few of these cloisters in Italy; they were more numerous in Sweden and Germany. The brethren of this order hear confessions, preach on holy days, and employ lay brethren for the transaction of their external and worldly affairs.

Giovanni Boccaccio, a Florentine, a highly celebrated poet, philosopher, and astronomer, died at this time at the age of forty-two years. After he became well versed in the Latin and Italian tongues, and attained to wonderful ingenuity, he wrote many elegant and ingenious things in the Latin tongue, as well as many lovely stories in the Italian, such as Centonouvella, and others.

Urban VI, a Neapolitan, archbishop of Bari, was elected pope in this year to succeed Pope Gregory. He was a crafty and revengeful man, who gave more consideration to Joanna, the queen, and the cardinals, than satisfaction to the Christians. He absolved the excommunicated Florentines in order to gain their obedience to his will. Being by nature a man of bad character, he created new cardinals at Nocera, and imprisoned a number of the old ones. Thereafter he went to Genoa, and later returned to Rome, where, in order to avoid secret animosity, he created 29 cardinals, in a single day, most of whom were Neapolitans, and only three were Romans. Finally he died in the 12th year of his ill-conducted and unfortunate pontificate. Not many people mourned him.

The Twenty-Second Schism, and the most violent and mischievous, originated at this time, and endured for 29 years. After the death of Gregory XI the Roman citizens in a kindly manner requested the cardinals to elect an Italian or a Roman pope; but the 13 French cardinals undertook to elect a pope of their own nationality. Among four Italians, one of the Orsini craved the pontificate. Now it so happened that a Neapolitan was elected pope, and (as above stated), he was called Urban. He remained pope for three months. Thereafter the French cardinals, for the ostensible purpose of escaping the summer heat, left Rome. Among them were eight, who said that the election of Urban to the pontificate was irregular; and they therefore elected another one, of Geneva, whom they called Clement VII. They sent forth letters to all the world that said Clement was the true vicar of Christ. Thereupon a great schism occurred in the church. The Germans, Italians and Hungarians adhered to Urban; the French, Spanish, Catalanians and English, to Clement.

Clement (VII), after suffering many vicissitudes, proceeded to Avignon, in France, and there he set up his papal court, and was honored by the French as the true pope. He sat 15 years.

Boniface IX, a Neapolitan, previously called Piero Tomacelli, was unanimously elected pope at Rome in A.D. 1389. Although but 30 years of age when he entered upon the pontificate, he so conducted himself in the flower of his youth, that no charge of wantonness was made against him. He was so intelligent and of such wise counsel that as one supreme in power, he caused the Roman people to turn to him; and they elected a Roman senate according to his wishes, and fortified the castle Angelo and the bridges. In the tenth year of his pontificate he returned from Assisi, where he had lived for many years, to Rome, and held a Jubilee Year. In the same year, with money and renown, he attained to such power that he made of his descendants, lords of the Christian jurisdiction. He ordained that no one should attempt to attain a priestly benefice until he had obligated himself to the papal treasury for a sum equal to the first year's income thereof; and in this he was unopposed except by the English holders of small benefices. This Urban (should be Boniface) enrolled Bridget in the number of the saints. Finally he died in the 15th year of his pontificate.

Benedict XIII was regularly declared pope at Avignon in A.D. 1394; which was after Clement, and during the Schism; and he sat 21 years, until the Council of Constance. He was previously called Pedro de Luna, and was a highly learned man.

Wenceslaus, son of the aforesaid Emperor Charles, with whom he reigned for eight years, reigned alone after the death of his father for twenty-two years. Although at the age of fifteen, he, together with his spouse, Joanna, had received the royal Roman crown at Aix-la-Chapelle, he was never consecrated as emperor by the pope. Later, in the sixth year, the queen died and Sophia, a duchess of Bavaria, was espoused to Wenceslaus. He was unlike his father in every respect, fleeing from care and labor, and seeking pleasure. He was more addicted to wine than devoted to the sovereignty, consuming all his days in idleness and carnal pleasures; wherefore he was taken by the lords and held in custody for seventeen weeks. He was released by Duke John of Lausitz, and Duke Procopius of Moravia (Mähren). He was imprisoned a second time by King Sigismund of Hungary, and placed in the keeping of Duke Albrecht of Austria. He was maintained in beautiful houses and apartments at Vienna, but through the negligence of his keeper he escaped and returned to Germany. However, as he would not amend his bad morals and manners, he was deposed by the electors of the empire with the consent of the pope, while Rupert, palegrave of the Rhine, was, contrary to his own wishes, elected in his stead. The Hussite heresy had its origin under Wenceslaus. After sundry understandings with a nobleman, named Nicholas, the heretics violently attacked the royal palace, requesting the king to grant them more churches. The king asked Nicholas to return the next morning for his answer. Nicholas left, and more and more incited the people to revolt. Thereupon the king fled to the Wysehrad, and from thence, with a few people, to the new castle which he had built. He sent a call for assistance to his brother Sigismund. The raving heretics ran into the courthouse and seized seven councillors, (for eleven had already fled) and the judge of the city, as well as a number of other citizens, and threw them out of the windows of the courthouse. The royal chamberlain also fled. When the king was apprised of these matters, and those present were seized with fear and sympathy, the cup-bearer of the king said, I knew beforehand that this would happen. Whereupon the king, in anger, seized him and trampled him under foot, and drawing his sword, would have dispatched him, had those standing about not prevented him. Soon thereafter Wenceslaus suffered a stroke. He died at the age of fifty-seven, after having reigned in Bohemia for fifteen years. At this time it was the Bohemian custom to anoint the body of the king with costly herbs for eight days, and to carry it through the churches of the city in mourning. But as the queen feared the heretics and did not dare to enter the New City, this custom was not observed in the case of Wenceslaus. His body was carried to St. Vitus's church in the citadel, and the funeral held in the royal hall. When the cloister was later destroyed by the heretics, a workman secretly took away the body of Wenceslaus and kept it in his own house. When affairs took a better turn, and search was made for the corpse, the workman, on receipt of twenty guilders, gave it up.

Jobst, margrave of Moravia (Mähren) was, during the lifetime of Wenceslaus, elected king by the archbishops of Mainz and Cologne, while a number of others elected Sigismund. Jobst died in a short time without heirs, and was buried at Brunn, in Moravia, with a royal scepter. On one occasion, when Jobst came to Wenceslaus after his deposition, Wenceslaus took him to a remote place, and said, Although I know it is not because I was not entitled to the dignity, that the electors of the Roman empire deposed me, it is a delight to me that the dignity should pass to my uncle. And Jobst became frightened. Through fear he fell to his knees before the king, and bade him not to blame him. And King Wenceslaus said, Lay aside your fears, for I do not dislike to stand aside from the kingdom; but I regret to have injured the blood of my ancestors. But Jobst lived only six months thereafter, and he allowed Palsgrave Rupert to rule.

Breslau in Silesia, a noble city of renown among the Germans and the Poles, lies on the river Oder. This river waters the German province of Silesia and flows to the north. It is inhabited by Germans on both banks, although the Polish tongue is spoken chiefly on the farther side. Due to the concourse of people there, the city prospered remarkably from the beginning, and was improved by various and public buildings, as well as many beautiful churches. Of the latter the episcopal cathedral, dedicated to St. John, is the most attractive. The ancients called this the golden bishopric, but the Hussite wars have reduced it to one of earth and clay. However, John Roth, the bishop there at this time, a doctor of jurisprudence and highly informed in all manner of Scriptural learning and wisdom, advanced this bishopric in honor and size. The city possesses illustrious cloisters: The Order of St. Augustine at Saint Dorothea; the Franciscan (Barefoot) Order at St. James (St. Jacob) and Saint Bernardin, although under different rules; the Dominican (Preaching) Order at St. Albrecht; the Regulated Canons at Our Blessed Virgin Mary; and the Premonstratenses at St. Vincent outside the city. There also is a semi—foundation at Holy Cross. But among the foremost are the two parish churches of St. Elizabeth and St. Mary Magdalen. There are also a number of small churches St. Barbara, St. Christopher, St. Lazarus, and many others. Breslau has been governed by various princes. When the city of Eger was retaken by John, father of Emperor Charles IV, Breslau (which Duke Henry of Silesia held), Lignitz, and many other cities in Silesia were also subjugated by him in the war. In the time of King Wenceslaus the members of the council of this city were thrown out of the windows of the courthouse down into the market by the members of the community, and killed; but a few years later the originators and inciters of this affair were quartered at the command of Emperor Sigismund. When the news reached those of Prague (who had likewise misused their councillors), they became frightened, and despairing of mercy and pardon at the hands of Emperor Sigismund, they suffered the same penalty which had been inflicted on those of Breslau. At first Breslau was under Bohemian power and government. Later, after much strife and treachery on the part of the Bohemians, the city placed itself under the rule of Matthias, the king of Hungary. Upon his death it reverted to the kingdom of Bohemia, which is now ruled by Wladislaus, the most illustrious king of Hungary and Bohemia. This city is surrounded by wonderful walls, and where not bounded by the Oder, it is protected by a deep moat and with brick walls of such thickness that they cannot easily be breached by gunfire. Along the walls are many towers, bow-windows and defenses. Within the city are wide streets and cross-roads, lined with beautiful and decorative houses, side by side, and so situated that no building interferes with the other's prospect. There is also a spacious market, and a courthouse with a high tower, upon which the watch play their horns at mealtimes.

Wenceslaus, the king of Bohemia, according to the attendants upon his court, often said, If I am fortunate in the ravaging of the Italian cities, I will divide the spoils among the knights, but the wine I will keep myself. If anyone enters the wine cellar in my dominion, he shall be punished by the sword. On account of his misconduct and neglect, the electors deposed Wenceslaus from the Roman imperial sovereignty, and put Rupert the Bavarian in his stead. And all the German cities turned to Rupert, except Nuremberg, whose citizens, mindful of their obligation and oath to Wenceslaus, nevertheless feared the might of the newly elected sovereign. So they sent their court messengers to Wenceslaus, and offered him 10,000 guilders to release them of their obligation. And he released them, but upon the further condition that they send him four cart-loads of Fürstenberger, then regarded as the best Rhenish wine.

John of Rupecissa, of the Barefoot (Franciscan) Order, a renowned teacher of the Holy Scriptures and of natural philosophy, at this time, in addition to what he wrote about the books of the higher criticism, also said much about things to come. He was put into prison, and therein, as if a prophet, he wrote much concerning the future, namely, of two antichrists, of the prostration of the churches, of the devastation of the orders, of the conversion of all heathens to the Christian faith, and of many other things. And all this, he said, was revealed to him by the Lord Jesus. None of these things actually happened, but the contrary came to pass. Similar prophecies of hidden things proved deceptive, and it is better to remain silent than to speak of such matters.

Simon of Cassia, of the Augustinian Order, a distinguished teacher and preacher of the Holy Scriptures and of natural philosophy, in these times proved a medicinal collation to languishing souls for the attainment of the perfect life. As a correct interpreter of the Gospels and a true follower of he compiled the histories of our Saviour, and arranged them in orderly fashion in 15 books. He also wrote many other good Christian teachings and precepts. He flourished at Florence in the spirit of prophecy, and there erected a nunnery to his Order, filling it with noble women and maidens.

The Feast of the Visitation of the glorious Virgin Mary was established at this time by Pope Urban VI, to be celebrated for eight days in like manner as Corpus Christi. For through the intercession and offices of the Virgin Mary, consecrated Mother of God, unity had been granted to churches after the Schism.

Francesco of Carrara, the elder, received the paternal lordship, and governed for 11 years. He was an illustrious, virtuous and praiseworthy man. He beautified the city of Padua with towers and battlements, and with attractive public buildings and residences. In war he performed many commendable and memorable deeds, thereby prospering his dominion. However, after he undertook to free Bernabo, husband of his sister, from Galeazzo Maria, he not only failed in his purpose, but also lost his own life in consequence; for Galeazzo not only defeated him and took him prisoner, but kept him confined until he died.

Catherine of Siena, daughter of a dyer, scorning marriage, at the age of twelve, entered the convent of St. Dominick as a penitent of the Third Order. She was illustrious for her many miracles and her abstemious and strict life, in the course of which she had many visions and victories. Christ espoused her with a ring set with four pearls and a diamond. And the Lord took her heart and gave her his own, and the scar remained on her side. She was illustrious with the spirit of prophecy. After having performed many miracles she died at the age of 30 years at Rome, whither she had gone out of devout considerations. In the presence of many people her body was taken to the Dominican church, and buried with great devotion and honor. On the first day of May A.D. 1455 she was enrolled in the number of saintly virgins by her countryman, Pope Pius II, who wrote concerning her piety and virtue.

Gian Galeazzo (here called John Galeacius) son of Galeazzo Maria (Visconti), and first duke of Milan, captured the lordship of Milan three years after his Luther's death and the division of the sovereignty between himself and his uncle Bernabo; and he reigned ten years. Meanwhile he defeated and subjugated the lords of Scala, Verona, and Vicenza. Before long he seized Francesco, lord of Padua, as well as the city itself. Likewise Bologna, Siena and Perugia submitted to him. He was a highly renowned prince, erect in person, of handsome countenance, learned in letters, well spoken, cunning, ingenius, and prudent and wise in his affairs and dealings. He was married twice.

One of his wives, named Elizabeth, was a daughter of the king of Bohemia; and by her he had a daughter, Valentina, whom he espoused to Charles, king of France. His second wife Caterina, was his brother's daughter, and by her there was born to him Giovanni Maria and Filippo Maria (Visconti), the dukes. This Gian Galeazzo was great and mighty, and in the year A.D. 1395, in the month of September, through his ambassador, the archbishop of Milan, he secured the title of duke on payment of 100,000 florins, and this title he enjoyed for the remaining seven years of his life. He was so ambitious that he aspired to the Roman imperial sovereignty, and if death had not intervened, he might have secured it.

An eclipse of the sun, lasting for two hours, is said to have occurred at this time.

Ladislaus, son of King Charles, upon the death of his father (who was poisoned in Hungary by the Queen), inherited the kingdom of Apuleia, which his father had conquered; and he reigned 29 years. When he became of age he took possession of the kingdom of Hungary, and later he conquered the kingdom of Apuleia. Ladislaus was a prudent and magnanimous man, and by reason of his power, might and good fortune, he was held in awe by all. The Roman pope regarded him with suspicion, and the relations of his kingdom with succeeding popes were the subject of varying fortunes. But when this king undertook to subjugate the Florentines, he was poisoned at their instigation.

Sigismund, who later became Roman emperor, was hailed to the Hungarian throne after the expulsion of King Ladislaus. He reigned there for twenty-five years and then received the Roman imperial sovereignty. He was a warrior and earnest defender and protector of Christendom.

The Beghards, and those who flagellated themselves with knotted scourges, introduced serious heresies into Germany and other places; of which mention has already been made. So also, in this year, A.D. 1389, there occurred throughout Italy a marvelous movement of people within the mountains of Gaul, who wore white linen robes extending to their feet, with a cap resembling the cowl of a monk. Among them were noble men and women, as well as princes, bishops, priests, and monks of various orders, all of whom dressed in the same manner. These people, two abreast, formed processions to the adjacent cities, shouting and crying for peace and mercy; and this lasted for three months. Among them were 3,000 persons from the city of Lucca. The originator of this movement was a priest, so daring in word and countenance that all regarded him as holy. But Pope Boniface caused him to be seized at Viterbo, to be brought before him, and to be burnt.

A Jubilee year was held at Rome in the year 1400 at the command of Pope Boniface; and in consequence a countless number of people came to Rome. It is said that in the same year, because of the great number of people, and particularly of the aforesaid white spirits, who visited Rome, so great a plague raged that at Florence alone 30,000 people succumbed to it. Likewise in the fourth year of the reign of Ladislaus such a great mortality occurred in Bohemia that in St. Stephen's parish at Prague 3040 deaths occurred. Under such conditions the people of Prague rose up and fell upon the Jews, seized their possessions, burned their houses, and slew several thousand Jews; but the young children were kept for baptism.

Innocent VII, formerly called Cosinatus, a cardinal, elected pope at Rome after Boniface, was an old man, versed in many and great things. In some matters he followed in the footsteps of his predecessors, Urban and Boniface. He ruled in a turbulent manner; and the Romans, who came to him and requested him to discontinue the schism within the church, he sent to his uncle Ludovico, as to a stranger; and Ludovico threw eleven of them out of the window to their death. Under these circumstances the Roman people appealed to King Ladislaus for assistance against the pope, and took to arms. But the Pope and his uncle Ludovico promptly fled to Viterbo; and there the Romans entered the papal palace and the courts of the cardinals, and slew their attendants. But after the Romans had quarreled among themselves, they took the pope back into their good graces. Then he arrived at Rome, he created a number of cardinals, and appointed said Ludovico a margrave of Picenum. Not long thereafter he died at Rome in the second year of his pontificate.

Gregory XII, a Venetian, formerly called Angelo Coriario, a cardinal, and created pope in A.D. 1406, was an honorable bishop of great earnestness and extraordinary piety. Gregory obligated himself to abdicate in the event that Benedict, who held forth as a pope in France, would do likewise. And although, in the beginning, each exhorted the other to do so, and they had named a place of meeting for the purpose, yet neither carried out his promise; wherefore each was held to be a traitor by his own cardinals, and caused a greater schism and feud than before among the Christians. Thereafter a council was held in Pisa, in which both were declared deceivers and deposed from the pontificate; and Alexander was elected. While Gregory was absent from Rome, the city seethed with arms; and Gregory fled from the council to Ariminum (Rimini), while Benedict after the holding of a council at Perpignano (Perpignan) fled to the castle of Panischole. Although both had been deposed at the council of Pisa, yet, pretending to be true popes, they created several cardinals, particularly Gregory, who at Lucca, while his cardinals were still with him, made Gabriel Candelinarium a cardinal, who later became pope as Eugene IV.

Year of the World 6608 | Year of Christ 1409

Alexander V, of Candia, formerly called Peter Candianus, of the Franciscan (or Barefoot) Order, a doctor, and archbishop of Milan, a man highly renowned for his learning and teaching in scriptural wisdom, was, in this year, after the deposition of Gregory and Benedict, elected pope with the assent of all the cardinals present at the council of Pisa. In his youth he entered the Franciscan Order, and at Paris became so versed in the liberal arts that in a short time he conducted a public school, and wrote upon the books of the higher criticism. He was a great orator and preacher; wherefore the Duke of Milan appointed him his prime minister and bishop of Vicenza. He was later made archbishop of Milan. Pope Innocent VII created him a cardinal, and finally he was elected pope. He was so generous that he finally had nothing left. Wherefore he said, I was once a wealthy bishop, then a poor cardinal, and now I am a mendicant pope. He was so brave that he deposed King Ladislaus, who had distressed the churches. At the conclusion of the council he proceeded to Bologna, where, having become seriously ill, he called the cardinals to him to exhort them to righteousness, and, like the Lord Christ, he said, I give you my peace, my peace I leave with you. And he died shortly, in the eighth month of his pontificate. He was buried in the Franciscan monastery at Bologna, with great honor and well merited solemnity.

Rupert (Ruprecht), duke of Bavaria and palgrave of the Rhine, was elected Roman king in A.D. 1400 by the electors, to succeed Wenceslaus, king of Bohemia, who had been deposed as a worthless man; and he reigned ten years. He was crowned at Cologne by the archbishop there. He was a very Christian man, a lover of righteousness, stern in war, and a conscientious and zealous protector of the downtrodden. Therefore he was confirmed in the sovereignty by Pope Boniface. The Florentines asked Rupert to come to Italy to assist them against the duke of Milan; and for this they promised him a remarkable sum of money, on condition, however, that he was not to receive it until he had reached Milan with his army. In the late fall Rupert went forth, determined to receive the imperial crown from the pope; and in order to collect the promised sum of money he proceeded to the vicinity of Brescia. When he had received part payment, he gave battle to the Milanese; but his forces were dispersed, and he returned to Trent, while the bishop of Cologne and Duke Leopold of Austria, with a large force belonging to King Rupert, returned homeward. From Trent Rupert went through Treviso to Padua. And thence the Florentines sent their messengers, requesting him to resume the war; but since the Florentines offered him less money than he desired, he decided to leave. He sent his expeditionary forces to Treviso by land, while he went to Venice to see the city. There he was honorably and worthily received; and he told the Venetians of his defeat. But, when finally this king received no support from the Venetians nor from the pope, and the Florentines would not satisfy his demand, he returned to Germany without results. By his wife Elizabeth, daughter of the burgrave of Nuremberg, Rupert left many heirs: Rupert and Frederick, his sons, died before he did; but he left him surviving the dukes, Louis, Stephen, John and Otto, and three daughters. One daughter was espoused to Duke Frederick of Austria, on the Etsch; the second, to the count of Cleves, of whom Emperor Sigismund made a duke; and the third, Margaret, was married to the duke of Lorraine. The father and his sons, until their death, remained faithful to Pope Gregory, insisting that the council of Pisa was not properly nor regularly held. Finally, after worthy deeds in the empire and in Germany, Rupert died at Oppenheim, A.D. 1410; and he lies buried at Heidelberg.

As the schism between Gregory and Benedict (which has already been told to some extent) continued, a long disputation now took place at Florence as to whether a council should be called on account thereof; and the learned men concluded that this could be properly done. The cardinals of both popes, with the consent of the commune at Florence, decided to call a council at Pisa. By letters and messengers they summoned all the bishops, prelates, princes, and the people. To Pisa came a great many people of every nation, and in this council the aforesaid popes were accused and summoned to appear. But Benedict laughed at them in scorn, while Gregory said that the cardinals were powerless to call such a council. However, both popes were finally deposed, and Alexander was elected as above stated. But he did not live in his pontificate for long. As he lay on his deathbed he stated that he believed that the Pisan council was rightfully held and considerately conducted, free of all cunning and risk. And then he died. At that time occurred a great famine and mortality.

At this time came to Pisa, Louis, the duke of Angers, son of the Louis who contested the kingdom with Charles. And he received the kingdom of Apuleia from Alexander; for Ladislaw had done everything by which he might hinder the council.

ST. Vincent of Catalonia, of the Dominican (Preaching) Order, a highly renowned teacher of the Holy Scriptures, was born Valencia of noble parents, named Ferrier. His father was a notary. He had three sons: Peter, the elder, a pious man, was married. The second son, Boniface, was a doctor of both branches of the law, and, after the death of his wife, entered the Carthusian Order, of which he became a general. The third, Vincent, remained single, and was renowned at this time not only for his excellent and commendable teaching, but particularly for his piety. Illustrious for his gift of preaching throughout his life, he prospered the churches of God, not only by his teachings and exhortation, but also by his praiseworthy example; and this course he pursued for thirty years. Finally, in A.D. 1418, in the time of Pope Martin V and Emperor Sigismund, he passed away, and became illustrious for many miracles. For that reason Pope Calixtus III, his countryman, in A.D. 1455, enrolled him among the number of saintly confessors. During his lifetime he often preached so dreadfully upon the Last Judgment and of the Antichrist that he drove many people into fright; and he warned all sinners to flee from the future wrath of God.

Francis Martinus, of the Carmelite Order, an excellent teacher of the Holy Scriptures, who was in great esteem at this time, wrote a book upon the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary.

Gerardus Groet was illustrious for great skill and for the piety of his life at this time.

John Rüsbroch, a renowned, devout and enlightened man, wrote many things in the German language.

Henricus Yota, a teacher of the Holy Scriptures, and Henricus of Hesse, like teachers, were lights of the church at Vienna, in Austria.

Baldus of Perugia, highly distinguished teacher of the imperial and civil law, and Angelo and Peter, his brothers, were highly illustrious at this time. After Bartolus, his master, Baldus was given first rank in both branches of the law. He wrote an almost countless number of books, including an interpretation of the entire body of the civil law. He also left behind much excellent and commendable counsel. Finally, because of the excellence of his scriptural wisdom and ability, he was called to Pavia by Duke Philip of Milan, and engaged at a public expense. He died A.D. 1423.

Bartholomeus de Saliceto, very highly learned in the law, flourished at this time. He wrote a number of interpretations on the imperial law. After he had secured the esteem of Alberto, the margrave of Ferrara, Bartholomeus influenced him to prevail upon Pope Boniface to grant him the privilege of establishing a university there.

Nicholas of Florence, a renowned doctor of medicine, at this time wrote and left behind him a large book upon the entire subject of medicine. He died at Florence A.D. 1412.

Marsilius de St. Sophia, in Padua, also a physician, in his treatise on sundry medicines, excelled many others in subtlety and ingenuity, and brought credit to his native country.

John of Ravenna, an illustrious grammarian and rhetorician, and an ingenious and able man, flourished at this time. As Leonardo Aretino testifies, he restored to Italy the art and teaching of elocution, which had been dormant for a long time. After being well instructed by Francis Petrarch, he had a following of very distinguished disciples himself.

Emanuel Chrysoloras, of Constantinople, of noble birth, yet more noble in his knowledge of the Greek language, and in all forms of scriptural wisdom and virtue, came from his home in Constantinople to Venice. There he taught Greek, which had been dormant for about seven hundred years, but was revived by him. From Venice he went to Florence, where he won many scholars. Among them were Leonardo Aretino, Paul Strocia, Peter Paul Vergerius, Justinopolitanus, Franciscus Barbarus, Omnibonus Vincentius, Guarino da Verona, Carolinus Aretinus, Poggio Florentino, Franciscus Philelphus, and others. And when he went from there to Rome, and from Rome to the council at Constance, his scholars, by reason of the sweet savor of his words, followed him. He died at Constance and was honored by an eloquent eulogy by Poggio Florentino.

Tamerlane, the great king of the Tartars or Parthians, died in this year A.D. 1402. He was a Parthian, born of mean parents, and at first was a corporal. He so distinguished himself among his own people by his physical endowments and ability that he soon became a captain and a ruler of many peoples. And thus he secured dominion over the Parthians, and later over the Scythians, Iberians, Albanians, Persians and Medes. Mesopotamia and Armenia followed. He crossed the Euphrates with 40,000 horse and 600,000 foot, and ravaged entire Asia Minor. In Armenia he gave battle to Bajazet, the most mighty Turkish king, slaying 200,000 of his men, taking Bajazet prisoner, and carrying him through entire Asia in a cage like a curious animal. His camp was formed like a city, and every trade and industry had its place and function. There one found sufficiency of all things serviceable to human needs. There neither robbery nor murder found room. Thereafter he proceeded from the river Tanais (Don) as far as Egypt, passing through entire Asia, through Smyrna, Antiochia, Sebaste, Tripoli, Damascus, and many large, strong, and fortified cities, by force of arms, devastating and burning them. He also defeated the Egyptian sultan in battle. Having determined to attack Capua, then inhabited by the Genoese, he first sent there several merchants with costly raw materials, with orders to sell the wares below the customary price; for he knew that the gold could be hidden, but the raw materials could not. Thereafter he captured the city and took back the purchased wares; and so he got both money and wares. When Tamerlane besieged a city, he caused a white tent to be set up on the first day, on the second day a red tent, and on the third day a black one, indicating that those who surrendered on the first day would be spared; but the red tent meant death; and the black one, destruction of the city. It is said that at one time the people in a city which he was besieging for the second day, sent to Tamerlane all their children and maidens, clad in white and carrying olive branches, in order to appease the wrath of this prince by their innocence; but he caused all these children and maidens to be ground down by his cavalry and the city to be destroyed. When one of his trusted men asked him why he was so cruel, he looked at him in anger, with fixed countenance and blazing eyes, and answered, If you think I am a human being, you are mistaken. I am the wrath of God, and a devastator of the earth. Have a care that henceforth you do not meet me. Those who saw Tamerlane say that he was like Hannibal.

Paul of Venice, of the Augustinian Order, a natural philosopher, and a prince among teachers of the Holy Scriptures as well as a keen disputant, was at this time in great renown throughout Italy for the manifold scope of his scriptural ability.

Bartholomeo of Urbino, of the same order, a very diligent doctor, and bishop of Urbino, was also renowned at this time. Among other writings he compiled the sayings of Saint Augustine and Saint Ambrosius in alphabetical order; and he called the book Milleloquium.

Jordanus, a German, a teacher well grounded in the Holy Scriptures, was at this time held in great esteem because of his literary knowledge and research among the ancients.

Jacobus, also of the Augustinian order, a native of Toledo, and a teacher of the Holy Scriptures, flourished at this time. He interpreted the Holy Scriptures, and among others, compiled a book entitled Sophologium.

Verona, the highly renowned old city of Italy, which had been oppressed by the Carrarese, was in A.D. 1405, after surrender by Gian Maria, duke of Milan, brought under Venetian dominion by Francesco Gonzaga, Jacopo Ferme and Paul Savella. And up to the present it has remained in their dominion and has greatly prospered.

Pisa, the mighty and well built city of Etruria, and antagonistic to the Florentines, was subdued in this year by war and siege; and thus it came into the hands and might of the Florentines. For after the Pisans had driven the Florentines out of the city and regained their liberty, they were heavily beleaguered and all egress shut off. After suffering starvation they were surrendered by John Gambacurto, and were again subjected to the yoke of the Florentines.

Padua, the great and mighty illustrious city, came under Venetian dominion through siege, A.D. 1406. Francesco da Carrara, the younger, son of Francesco the older, overran Vicenza with an army. The Venetians sent their emissaries to him requesting that he do not distress the Vicenzans with war, as he would thereby offend the Venetians. He refused the request, and the disappointed Venetians entered into an alliance with Francesco Gonzaga, and appointed him their common captain against Francesco da Carrara. Through the aid of the duchess of Milan, he took the city of Verona, captured Jacopo da Carrara, and sent him to Venice in bonds. He next appeared before Padua. After the city had suffered for several months through siege, from starvation, and sustained serious damage by reason of repeated assaults, the Gate of the Holy Cross was opened by the citizens to Galeazzo Gonzaga, brother of the said Francesco Gonzaga, without the knowledge of Francesco da Carrara, and Galeazzo Gonzaga and his army were admitted to the city. Thereupon Carrara with his third son Francesco proceeded to Venice in humble raiment to plead for pardon and mercy. But pardon was not granted; father and son were imprisoned. Later the father was strangled, while the son disappeared, who knows how? Thus the city of Padua fell into the hands of the Venetians. And so also in consequence of their dissensions the mighty and illustrious houses of Scala and Carrara lost their power, and their ancestral lineage ended.

The Order of the White Monks of Monte Oliveto was originated during the time of the schism in the vicinity of Siena by a number of noble Sienese citizens. For many excellent and renowned citizens there, distressed to dissensions and wars, and being of the same mind, under the guidance of the Holy Ghost left the city and went to Mount Olivet. There they began to throw off their worldly cares, and as devout hermits they served the Lord by prayer, watching, and constant fasting. By their example many nobles and youths, seeking a celestial homeland, were moved to join the congregation. Incredible zeal in the service of God resulted in such an increase in membership that the fame of the congregation came to the cognizance of the pope. After he had summoned the foremost of the order, and informed himself as to their mode of life, he was so pleased that he confirmed the order and granted it many privileges.

A new Mendicant Order under the name of St. Jerome came to life in the city of Fiesole, in Etruria, in the time of Pope Innocent VII, springing out of the Third Order of Franciscans, through a certain count, named Redo. His associate in this pious enterprise was one Gualterus Marsis. These two holy men were the founders and augmenters of this order, and they prospered it wonderfully by pious regulations and example. Because of its distinguished membership, the order was confirmed and privileged under the Rule of St. Augustine by Gregory XII. Later Pope Eugene IV did likewise, adding further privileges. The members of the order were assigned a gray habit in remembrance of the aforesaid Third Order.

A second Regulated Order of St. George of Alga, near Venice, was begun at this time by the highly spiritual man, Lorenzo Justiniano (later a patriarch), and others. The order observed strict regulation and was looked upon with incredible favor. This congregation was confirmed by the aforesaid Gregory, with certain regulations, the most important among those of the Rule of St. Peter. The order soon grew in distinguished and learned men, among them, Antonius Corarius, Pope Gregory's uncle, afterwards a cardinal; and Gabriel, afterward Pope Eugenius IV, who from the beginning enlarged and beautified the cloister with his paternal inheritance. Among the members of this congregation are also others, commendable for their lives and morals, who have illuminated the order by their teachings and good example, according to their means.

OF THE HUSSITE HERESY AND ITS ORIGIN.

This secession, the unfaithful Hussite folly, had its origin under King Wenceslaus of Bohemia in the fiftieth year of his age; and they pursued the Germans at this time in a gruesome manner with war and weapons. At first the Germans ruled the university of Prague, which was very distressing to the Bohemians, by nature a free and undisciplined people. An English nobleman came to Prague, bringing with him a number of John Wycliffe's books, as a rare treasure from his homeland; and therein many questions were raised against the clergy. After he had absorbed a sufficiency of Wycliffe's poison, he poured it forth among the burghers, and loaned the books chiefly to those antagonistic and hateful of the Germans. Among them arose one called John of the village of Huss, which means goose. He was a keen and loquacious man, who took delight in narrow arguments and strange pleasures. He eagerly adopted the teachings of Wycliffe; and with these he vexed and distressed the German masters in the hope that the Germans, thus discredited, would be dismissed from the school. But as this did not happen, they obtained an order from the king that the school at Prague be governed in the same manner and form as that of Paris. In this way the mastery of the school passed out of German control. For that reason, on a single day, the German masters and students to the number of 2,000 left Prague. In a short time 3,000 followed them, and established a public school at the city of Leipzig, three days journey from Prague. This school was confirmed by Pope Alexander who also granted it certain privileges. It was favored by the illustrious duke of Saxony and adorned with buildings. And thus the Bohemians governed this school according to their own wishes; and John Huss was its head. When he thought he had sufficiently won the confidence of the Bohemians he began publicly to pour forth the poison which he had secretly imbibed, and to make use of the books and teachings of Wycliffe, representing that the entire truth was contained therein. In his sermons he often said that upon his death he wished to go where Wycliffe's soul had gone, for he had no doubt that Wycliffe was a good man and deserving of a place in heaven. But in his books, in the city of London, forty-four articles were found, that were condemned by the archbishop of Canterbury and other bishops and learned men; and Wycliffe's corpse was disinterred and burned. Yet this John was followed by all those of the clergy who were notorious debtors and miscreants. And they seceded from the Christian faith and took up the Waldensian folly. The damned heretics hold that the Roman bishop and other bishops are on a par; that there is no purgatory; that prayers for the dead are in vain, and that such prayers are the invention of ecclesiastical greed; that the images of God and the saints should be dispensed with; that the mendicant clergy invented the devil; that the priests should be poor and live on alms alone; that auricular confessions are false, for it is sufficient that one confess his sins to God in his own chamber; that the ritual of the church is an idle ceremony; that a priest might bless the Holy Body of Christ anywhere; that observance of the seven days is an idle waste of time; that there is no advantage in the feasts established by the church; and also many other errors. Thereafter one Peter of the city of Dresden on the Elbe, in Meissen, poured forth and urged upon the people a new poison, and preached the Holy Sacrament in the form of wine; and he drew into the same errors one Jacobellus of Meissen, who stated that in the old books of Dionysius and Ciprian he had found the taking of the Holy Sacrament in the form of wine commended; and he publicly exhorted the people that they should not idly take the sacrament in the form of bread. And the heretics became attached to him, rejoicing that they had discovered an article founded on the authority of the Gospels. Thereafter various measures were undertaken, but without result until the Council of Constance. The Hussite heretics destroyed and burned many Christian cloisters and other houses of in various places. At this time there came forth at Prague another false priest, called John, of the Premonstratensian Order. He was a fanatic devotee of every evil, and no mean augments and supporter of the grovelling Hussite heresy and fallacious secession.

John XXIII, of Naples, a well born man, previously called Baldassare Cossa, a cardinal, was elected pope at Bologna in this year, upon the death of Alexander; and he sat four years and ten months. Some write that he was elected under compulsion; for he was a Bolognese legate and had many armed men in the city and country, and had he not secured the pontificate by election, he might have obtained it by intimidation and force of arms. Many candidates were suggested to him but he accepted none. He said, Give me the mantle of St. Peter, and I will give it to the pope. Thereupon he placed the mantle on his own shoulders, saying, I am the pope. Although this did not please the cardinals, yet it is known that he was created pope, and had sought the pontificate by all means. He was highly informed and educated in the civil and the canon law. He was great in contemporary affairs, but was unskilled in ecclesiastical matters. He was more ingenious in worldly transactions, than endowed with piety of life. After receiving the pontificate he remained at Bologna for several days. Then he went to Rome, and sent a number of men-at-arms against Ladislaus. But in the following year Ladislaus made war against this Pope John. In fear, John left Rome for Florence, and from thence he went to Bologna. Before long he went to Gian Francesco Gonzaga at Mantua. There, and also at Cremona, he had a conference with Emperor Sigismund as to how he might drive off Ladislaus, who was distressing Rome and many other cities of the Church. Thereafter this John, with the consent of all the nations, was summoned to a council called to obviate the schism. He sent two cardinals to Germany, who, together with the princes of Germany and France, were to choose a convenient place for the council. The city of Constance was considered suitable. And they all went to Constance; and John went there also, although some advised him not to go. But when Emperor Sigismund thereafter also came to the council, this pope was charged with many misdeeds. Whereupon the pope, after having been in attendance upon the council for four months, changed his attire, and secretly fled from Constance by night to Schaffhausen, and while hastening toward Burgundy, he was intercepted by order of Duke Frederick and turned over to the emperor. He was confined in a cell in the monastery of St. Mark, convicted and deposed. He was then sent to Duke Louis of Bavaria, and held in confinement at Heidelberg for three years. He was released by Martin, his successor.

Year of the World 6616 | Year of Christ 1417

Martin V, a Roman, previously called Otto, and born of the noble Roman family of the Colonna, was at this time, on the day of St. Martin the bishop, elevated from cardinal to pope in the council of Constance by the consent of all the nations and the cardinals; for from youth his parents reared him in good morals and the arts. In the later years of his youth he was well educated in the canonical laws at Paris. From thence he went to Rome, where, because of his virtue and scriptural wisdom, he became referendary to Urban VI, and later a cardinal. Whenever disputes occurred in the council of Constance, he always held to a middle course for the common good; wherefore he was acceptable to Emperor Sigismund and the cardinals. He did not permit his papal office too to fall into desuetude, but labored and acted with solicitude. Although not world-wise, and lacking in initiative, and esteemed for his goodness and gentleness, yet when he became pontiff, he was worldly prudent and not over gentle. At the conclusion of the council he returned to Italy, remained at Florence for two years, and then went to Rome, where the whole city came forth to meet him and received him as its father. Through his efforts, Rome, which in buildings and morals had lost the appearance of a municipality, was restored to civic life. At last he died in the 15th year of his pontificate, at the age of seventy-three years. He was mourned by the Roman people and the clergy as though the churches of God and the city of Rome had been left fatherless by his death.

Sigismund, son of the Roman emperor Charles IV, a Bohemian, was of German ancestry and king of Hungary and Bohemia. While a king of Bohemia, and upon the death of the Roman emperor Ruprecht, in A.D. 1410, he was chosen Roman emperor by the electors at Frankfurt. He was a stern man and prepared to accomplish all things; he possessed initiative, courage, liberality, beneficence and gentleness. He was lordly in manner and of elegant physique; of chaste countenance, well built in body, magnanimous in peace and war, and profligate in expenditures. As soon as he entered upon the office of Roman emperor, he proceeded with a large army through all of France lying beyond the mountains of Lombardy, because of the direction which the war had taken. And although as a most Christian prince he performed many excellent and celebrated deeds, yet his most illustrious, most celebrated, and most memorable deed was that without sparing himself any labor and expense in travelling through Italy, France, Spain and England, he brought all the nations together at the council of Constance, and, that after the putting down of the schism, and the deposition of the schismatic popes, and the election of Pope Martin V, he devoted himself with all possible diligence to the unification of Christendom, which had seriously declined because of the Schism. And by his exhortations and virtue he improved the status of temporal and spiritual morals. He made a king of Vitoldus, the duke of Littau. Prussia, which the king of Poland had by force of arms taken from the Teutonic Knights, he restored to them. He imprisoned his brother Wenceslaus, a man of no value to the Roman Empire; for he had been neglectful of the common welfare, to the great damage of Bohemia; and by such imprisonment Bohemia was relieved therefrom. But he was not very fortunate either in his wars against the Turks, or the Bohemians. King Louis's daughter was his first spouse. She was crowned with him. Because he had undertaken to punish 32 rebellious Hungarian lords, he was imprisoned and for security placed in the custody of a widow whose husband he had slain; but being reconciled to him, she released him. And he married Barbara, daughter of the Count of Cilli. Before long he again secured the sovereignty and punished the traitors; and the sons of the widow he provided with dignities and riches, on a par with the foremost of the kingdom. After much strife he recovered Bohemia. He gave Moravia to his son-in-law, Duke Albert of Austria; and the March of Brandenburg, to Frederick of Nuremberg. With varying fortune he reigned over 50 years. In his old age he made another journey to Italy in order to secure the imperial crown; and he was crowned by Pope Eugenius. From thence he proceeded to Mantua, and there made of Gian Francesco Gonzaga a Mantuan margrave. He made peace with the Venetians. From thence he went to Basle, thence to Ulm, and from Ulm to Regensburg. There the Bohemians came to him in great numbers, acknowledged him as their lord and king. Thereupon, at the solicitation of the Hungarians, he shipped down the Danube to Ofen (Budapest). There he summoned the princes of the Bohemian kingdom for the purpose of improving conditions. And at Stulweissenburg he distributed among them 60,000 florins, fixing the day of his advent into Bohemia. Thereafter he reached Iglau, and after entering into a treaty of peace and unity, he entered Prague in A.D. 1436. The Bohemians received him with great honor, and the nobility and the cities did him homage. Thereupon the clergy returned to Prague, to the joy of all Christian kings and nations. And Pope Eugenius, as a symbol of his elation, sent him a golden rose. In the course of these events Emperor Sigismund became ill and weak; and he began to experience the burdens of old age. Thereupon Barbara considered how she might remain in power and in possession of the sovereignty; and although along in years, she decided to remarry upon the death of her lord. When the emperor noted the proposal of his mad wife, he caused himself to be carried to Moravia to once more see his daughter before he died. And his daughter, together with her husband, Albert, came to him in the city of Znaim; and there he named Albert, his son-in-law, as his successor; and he bade the nobles of Hungary and Bohemia to carry out his last will. He left the kingdoms to his son-in-law, saying that a kingdom governed by Albert would be blessed. Thereupon he died, and was buried at Grosswardein, as he had commanded.

A CRUSADE AGAINST THE BOHEMIAN HERETICS IN THE TIME OF EMPEROR SIGISMUND.

When Pope Martin observed that the Bohemian heresy was growing, not only in numbers, but also in military strength from day to day, he sent word to the Vitoniensian cardinal of England, born of royal lineage in Germany, to assemble an army against the Bohemian contagion. With the assistance and support of Emperor Sigismund three armies were raised. The duke of Saxony and the maritime cities furnished the first army; the margrave of Brandenburg, with the Franks, the second; and Ort, archbishop of Trier, and the Rhenish lords and the Bavarians, together with the imperial Swabian cities, the third. They proceeded through the Bohemian Forest from three directions, met, and formed a wagon fort. But the Bohemians soon rose up in opposition, and marched against them. When it became known to our people that the Bohemians were coming on by force of arms, they fled before they had obtained sight of the enemy. The cardinal met the fugitives and vainly exhorted them to return from their flight. Every man fled, and the Bohemians captured the military equipment of our people. Thereafter they overran Meissen; and when they turned toward the margraviate and Nuremberg, they were pacified with money and returned homeward, rich in booty. When the news reached Emperor Sigismund, he proceeded to Nuremberg and collected another army against the Bohemians. For the same purpose Pope Martin sent a cardinal, as legate to Germany, to arrange for another war against the Bohemians. And the cardinal came to Emperor Sigismund at Nuremberg, where a large assembly of the princes was held, and a new expedition against the Bohemians was decided upon. Assistance was furnished by John and Albert, the margraves of Brandenburg, and their father; also by the bishops of Würzburg, Bamberg, and Eichstädt, and by the imperial cities, as well as the archbishops of Trier and Cologne. It is said that with those foremost men of the land there was an expeditionary force of 40,000. And so they proceeded into Bohemia, devastating many heretical cities and villages. In the meantime through treachery (as many believe) or through fear, there arose among our forces such turmoil that they took to flight even before they had seen the enemy. When Duke Albert of Austria observed that the papal legate had proceeded into Bohemia with an army, he also proceeded against the heretics with an armed force; however, having learned of the retreat, he swept through Moravia, which had formerly been disobedient to him, and he burned about 500 villages, conquering the region by force of arms. He slew many people, and frightened the Moravians into surrender, on condition, however, that Albert allow them to retain the faith according to a council at Basle. Thereafter the papal legate left Bohemia and proceeded to Basle, where he held the council.

A New Order of Regulated Canons had its inception in the monastery of Frisonaria in the Lucensian fields in Etruria. It was endowed with many privileges by Pope Eugenius, and reckoned among the Regulated Canons of St. Augustine. The brothers of this order were given a black mantle and a black biretta by the first founder. They discarded the white scapular and donned a linen shirt. In this order were many men renowned for their scriptural wisdom, eloquence and piety.

The Congregation of Saint Justine, a Benedictine Order, also had its origin or was revived at this time by Louis Barbus, a Venetian councillor, in the Trevisian region, near the city of Padua. It was confirmed by Pope Eugenius IV and endowed with great privileges. In it were reared many distinguished and highly learned men.

The Order of Jeronimites which had almost died out and been forgotten was reestablished by the worthy Lupo Hispalensis, general of the order, with new regulations and statutes taken from the sayings of St. Jerome. It was confirmed by the papal see under the Rule of St. Benedict, except that its members wore a gray habit and performed their offices according to the customs of the Roman see.

Once upon a time 40,000 florins were brought to Emperor Sigismund from Hungary, and were placed in his chamber at a late hour. Then the emperor was about to retire, thoughts of what use to make of the money interfered with his sleep. So he awakened his chamberlain and ordered him to summon his counsellors and the captains and corporals of his army to the emperor's presence. The counsellors, thus called at midnight, fearing that some evil had befallen the emperor, hastened to him, inquiring the cause of the sudden summons. The emperor opened the treasure chest and divided the money among them, saying, Now go forth, for now we may sleep, securely and in peace; that which has interfered with my sleep has gone out with you.

Through the diligence and management of Emperor Sigismund an ecumenical council was held at Constance, in Swabia, in 1414, to dispose of the schism which had endured for thirty-nine years. Five nations appeared in the council, namely, Italy, France, Germany, Spain and England; and what was there ordained with the cognizance of these five nations had the same force and effect as if all mankind had confirmed it. Pope John also came there, although some had advised him not to do so. And although, by sharp disputation, he kept the Germans in doubt, yet when Emperor Sigismund afterward entered the council, and all were given authority to speak freely as they saw fit, John involuntarily abdicated from the pontificate. Gregory voluntarily abdicated, while Benedict was deposed. The Wycliffite heresy was condemned, and John Huss and Jerome, heretics of that erroneous belief, were burned. And after many prelates and princes had spent four years there in the transaction of Christian affairs, and the deposition of the schismatic popes, it was decided to elect a new pope. Thereupon six pious men were chosen from among the nations, who together with the cardinals were to elect a Roman pope. And so, in A.D. 1417, with the consent of 32 cardinals and all the nations (after the church had been without a pope for four years) Otto, the Roman Colonna, a cardinal, was elected pope, to the joy of Emperor Sigismund, who thanked them all; and falling on his knees before the pope, with merited honor, kissed his feet. And the pope embraced the emperor, and holding him like a brother, thanked him for his diligence in restoring peace to the church. And thus the council ended in A.D. 1418.

John Gerson, chancellor at Paris, at this time transacted sundry business for the king of France, as well as other affairs at the council of Constance. He was a learned man and a great doctor in the Holy Scriptures. He left many writings of benefit to the church, and died in A.D. 1429.

Caspar Schlick, called a lord among the princes, was born of an Italian countess and a German of the family of Lazan, in Franconia. He was a becoming man, of agreeable speech, a lover of scriptural wisdom, and well adapted to all his undertakings. Good fortune and fitness so promoted him that he became the head of the chancery of three successive Roman kings, something never before heard of. His wife was a daughter of the duke of Silesia. Emperor Sigismund gave him Eger and Ellenbogen, while King Albert of Hungary gave him Calesum and Weisskirchen. This man must have possessed very useful qualifications and good nature in order to serve emperors of different habits with equal grace and favor. Through his friendship Aeneas Pius was called to episcopal office, from which sprang successive honors.

Constance (Kostnitz), a city of Germany, though not very large, is wealthy and well constituted. Beside it the Rhine flows out of the Lake and resumes its course. A bridge from the city gate crosses the Rhine. Beyond the bridge, on the bank of the river, are many buildings. And there is a most pleasing lake, on the shores of which castles and approaches appear everywhere. The water is pure and transparent to its gravelly bottom. It abounds in various kinds of fish, but, taking into consideration the size of the lake, they are not over-abundant. The lake is 22,000 paces in length, its breadth ranging from 10 to 18 paces. The Rhine flows through the Curiensian region, and when it reaches the vicinity of Constance it creates two seas. One of these is called the Bodensee (Lake Constance), and this is the Upper Lake; the other is called the Lower or Cellar. Between them lies Constance, on the lower part of the Upper Sea. As an indication of the age and origin of this city one finds there a marble tablet with ancient inscriptions, by which it appears that the city was named after Constantius, father of Constantinus, whom Diocletian and Maximianus named as emperor. Before that time it was called Vitudura. This same tablet very few people of Constance were able to read, and the common people considered it a sacred relic. Maidens and other ignorant people, by touching the tablet with their hands and then rubbing their countenances, have by now completely obliterated the inscription, although the names were not those of Christ's holy ones, but of persecutors of the Christian faith. Annually there is elected from among the burghers one who exercises supreme authority and power. He does not reside in a public place, but has his own particular residence. When he passes through the city he carries in his hand a disciplinary rod. He has power and authority to punish anyone. In cases of murder, theft, robbery, adultery, and other crimes, there sit with him those whom the city delegates to the purpose. When the accused is brought forth, accuser and defender of the accused are given the privilege of speaking against and for him. After hearing all the evidence judgment is rendered. The art and skill of the orators employed at this point is very remarkable and agreeable. And where excellent speakers develop, they are made advocates and assistants in civic and important matters, and are held in great esteem. The city is divided into two classes of people—those of noble knighthood, and the commons. The latter are merchants and craftsmen. The nobles live on their ancestral estates, and confine themselves to their own class. Where one of the commons, through wealth and good living, aspires to the noble class, the nobility will not tolerate him. And so for a long time each class remained within its own limits. However, the community is governed by both classes in common. Seven miles from Constance and 20,000 paces from the mountains lies a rich and beautiful city, named Feldkirchen. It has beautiful and well developed buildings, vineyards, and orchards. The Rhine has its source in the mountains not far from this region, and lies to the left as one leaves Italy; but it soon flows to the right. By its own power and through its tributaries it becomes large and strong. Between the east and north it takes a straight course. The water ranges in color from green to black-elder, and has a quick rapid course, and a sandy bottom so firm that foot prints are not noticeable thereon.

It is said that at the time of the council at Constance a great multitude of people from all Christian nations assembled here, and particularly the foremost of Italy, France, Germany, Spain and England, who transacted the business of the council. There were present Pope John XXIII and Emperor Sigismund; five bishop-cardinals, sixteen priest-cardinals, seven deacon-cardinals, seven patriarchs, thirty-four archbishops, one hundred and four bishops, sixty distinguished abbots, the generals of the four orders, twenty-four dukes, one hundred forty counts, and the emissaries of the cities of Italy and Upper and Lower Germany, in remarkable numbers.

John Hus (Huss), born in the village bearing his surname, which means goose, was a sharp-witted and eloquent man who took pleasure in warped speeches and in searching out strange matters. Said John adopted the erroneous teachings of Wycliffe; and the eloquent Jerome was his disciple. At the Council of Constance, Emperor Sigismund invoked measures for the suppression of heresy in Bohemia. John Huss and Jerome, as the most learned men in Bohemia, and as princes of said heresy, were summoned to the council. They came there determined to teach others, but not to be taught. They were heard in an assembly of the fathers, and many doctors and teachers of the divine and profane scriptures admonished them for their errors as contrary to the laws of God and good morals. They were exhorted no longer to regard themselves as wiser than the Church; to desist from their errors and not to besmirch their ingenuity and mentality with the Wycliffite folly; to devote themselves to teaching and refrain from perverting the people; and thus attain to higher dignity before God and his militant church. But these obdurate Bohemians stood by their resolution, insisting that they were followers of the holy evangelists and disciples of Christ; that the Roman church had departed far from the teachings and precepts of the apostles, seeking riches, pleasure and power, maintaining dogs and horses, and licentiously consuming the property of the church which belonged to the poor of Christ. When the foremost of the council noted the obduracy and persistency of these lost men, and observed that the foul members were not to be healed, it was adjudged that as scorners of the teachings of Christ they be burned so that the rest of the body might not be poisoned. Thereupon Huss (and Jerome 340 days later) were burned; for they would not return to the church. Their ashes, in order that the Bohemians might not take them away, were thrown into the sea. But their disciples brought to Bohemia some of the earth from the place where they were burned; and this earth the heretics regarded as a sacred relic. The said John and Jerome are venerated as saintly martyrs by the Bohemians, and regarded as no less than are Peter and Paul among the Romans; and for them a feast day is observed annually.

John Rockzan, of the village of Rochezana, is so called because he was a native of that place. He was born of mean and not very wealthy parents. He came to Prague, and there by begging he learned the first two liberal arts. Thereafter he became the preceptor of a noble. When he had become virtuously minded, and of good speech, he was taken into the college of the poor; and he heard the heretic Jacobellus. Later he was consecrated as a priest. He accompanied the Bohemian delegation which with three hundred horse, appeared at the council of Constance pursuant to summons. But when Emperor Sigismund sat in judgment in the marketplace, Rockzan, with four priests, in view of the presence of the entire clergy, offered to render obedience to the Roman church. Thereupon he was absolved of the curse by the legates of the council, released from excommunication, and taken into the church. Nevertheless he adhered to his faithlessness; for while holding mass he gave a layman the sacrament out of the chalice, although a legate of the council had told him that this was improper. He persisted in this error through his old age, and he died therein.

Leonardo Aretino, a very distinguished philosopher, orator, and valued historian, flourished at this time. He filled the office of secretary to popes Innocent VII, Gregory XII, Alexander, and John XXIII, up to the time of the council of Constance, with great fidelity and faith. Thereafter he became a chancellor at Florence. Because of the ingenuity and excellence of his poetry he is to be considered of first rank among men of renown. Although burdened with many matters and affairs, yet, being a man highly learned in the Greek and Latin tongues, he not only translated many writings from Greek into Latin, but also, as a product of his great ingenuity and enlightened understanding, composed and left behind many manuscripts and good and praiseworthy poems, demonstrating the virtue and strength of his ingenuity and his high understanding. He died in A.D. 1443 at the age of seventy-four years.

Poggio Florentino, an eloquent orator and experienced composer and writer of papal letters, was at this time held in great esteem for his scriptural wisdom and his eloquence, at Rome, at the Council of Constance, and at other places. While attending the Council, he found the ancient masterful orations of Quintilian, and which had been lost, in a monastery at Constance. Because of his scriptural wisdom and art, practiced for forty years while he lived at the Roman court, he was sent for by the Florentines, and honorably received and esteemed by them. He wrote beautiful poems, a book of letters, and a book of humorous stories and tables. He also translated several Greek manuscripts into Latin.

Guasperinus Bergomensis, born in the little village of Barziza, a highly renowned grammarian and rhetorician, at this time residing at Venice, revived the Latin tongue, which was about half dead; and there because of the praise and esteem accorded him, he attracted many disciples and made them accomplished men. When this man's fame came to the notice of Duke Philip at Milan, he summoned him from Padua and Venice to his duchy. Guasperinus retrieved and brought back into circulation several books of Cicero, which had been lost. He also left very fine speeches and epistles.

Christophorus (de Bergamo) Barzizius, a highly renowned and celebrated physician, being a learned man, also left a number of treatises.

Antonio de Butrio, of Bologna, a highly educated man, renowned for his pious life, at this time wrote good commentaries on the canon law and compiled two registers of both the civil and the canon law, and gave good counsel.

Francesco Zarbarella, of Padua, a cardinal, highly learned in the canon law, at this time wrote much in the interpretation thereof; and he compiled other memorable material.

Raphael Fulgosio, of Placenzia, a distinguished jurist, at time also wrote much in the interpretation of the civil law. Raphael Cumanus, his contemporary, also a highly learned jurist in the civil law, did likewise.

John de Ymola, an extraordinary and renowned doctor of both branches of the law, at this time wrote much concerning the civil, and canon laws.

Jacobus de Folivio, a distinguished physician, flourished at this time; and, as they say, he excelled all the physicians and natural philosophers. As the product of his high intelligence he wrote a number of treatises in the interpretation and exposition of the books of the ancient physicians.

Hugo of Siena, renowned physician, is said to have been endowed with such intelligence and medical skill that he excelled all others who had flourished in Etruria before him, except the said Jacobus. He also wrote books about the ancient physicians, and left much good counsel.

Abbas Siculus, illustrious at this time for his scriptural wisdom and skill, was highly educated in the canon law, which he publicly taught and on which he lectured at Siena. He wrote many commentaries on the canon law, and gave much good counsel.

Barbara, queen of Emperor Sigismund and countess of Cilli, although well advanced in years, thought that after the death of her husband (which was impending) she would contract another marriage. But after his death she and his corpse were taken to prison as a definite warning and example to all. The mourning Hungarians congregated about, and in view of this lamentable condition no one could withhold his tears. Here they mourned the death of the king; there they showed compassion and sympathy for the imprisoned queen. After her release she went to Bohemia, and there she became aged in a licentious life. She was noble by birth and ancestry, but her career was subject to calumny and suspicion. She sank into such blind folly that she publicly called the holy virgins, who had suffered for Christ, fools and simpletons. She said there is no life beyond the present, and that body and soul die together. After her unhallowed death by the plague this shameless and evil woman was carried to Prague by the terrible Hussite priests, and there buried in the royal sepulchre beside their sacred relics; for nothing is impossible in Bohemia. This was a woman of insatiable passion, and an evil-smelling vat of all the vices.

Year of the World 6630 | Year of Christ 1331

Eugenius IV, a Venetian of a common but old family, previously called Gabriel, was elected pope on March 7th of this year. He was the nephew of Pope Gregory XII, and a canon of the Celestine Order of St. George in Aliga, of the Venetian Congregation, who took him along to Rome and made him a treasurer, next a bishop of Sienna, and then a cardinal. Finally he became pope; but he did not overestimate himself on that account, and left his former mode of life unchanged in all respects. However, in the inception of his pontificate, misled by evil counsel, he caused such distress in all matters profane and divine that the Roman people took to arms. He confirmed the proceedings of the Council of Basle, from which endless evils arose. Later, however, taking matters into his own hands, he acted wisely and firmly. He was man of remarkable countenance, worthy, more daring than talkative, not very learned, but of considerable experience, kind to the people, and particularly toward the learned whom he loved to have about him. He was not easily moved to anger, and furthered the interests of the universities, particularly those at Rome. He loved the clergy beyond moderation, favoring them with estates and privileges. His devotion to war made one wonder that he was a pope. He moved the Dauphin, son of King Charles of France, to proceed to Basis with a large army, by which the council was dispersed. He kept his promises, provided a good table for his servants, but was frugal in his own requirements. He abstained from the use of wine entirely. He had but few servants, and employed very learned men of whose counsel he availed himself in difficult matters, Eugenius crowned Sigismund as emperor, and after the latter's death and the election of Duke Albert of Austria as Roman king, he called the council of Ferrara; and with him was present the Greek emperor. The council was transferred to Florence. Thereafter Eugenius embellished the Church of God with houses of worship and other structures. This pontiff died at the age of sixty-four years, in the 16th year of his pontificate. He enrolled Nicholaus of Tolentina in the number of the holy confessors. He was buried at St. Peter's church in Rome, in a marble sepulchre with a beautiful epitaph, which sets forth the occurrences and history of his pontificate.

Felix V was elected pope on November 18, 1438, after Pope Eugenius, who was elected during the Schism, had been deposed by Duke Philip at the Council of Basle; and he sat nine years. Soon after his election turmoil and dissension arose in the Church of God, Christendom falling into three parts: Some adhered to Eugenius, some to Felix, while others recognized neither. Felix was the first duke of Savoy, the duchy having first been a county. Upon his father's death he governed the country for forty years, bringing peace to the land. Thereafter he left the vanity and pomp of the world, and with six elderly men entered upon a spiritual and contemplative life. After this he was elected pope by the Council of Basle. He caused his beard to be removed, and left his duchy to his first born son, and learned church customs and manners. With a large retinue he proceeded to Basle, where, between his two sons, he was crowned Roman pope. After Eugenius died, Felix, as a lover of peace and humility, of his own accord abdicated the papacy in favor of Martin. He relinquished his papal name, but retained the office of cardinal.

The schism between Eugenius and Felix endured not without aggravation to the Christian status, until the time of Pope Nicholas V, resulting in various disputes and quarrels as to whether the pope was supreme over the council, or the council over the pope.

An eclipse of the sun occurred at this time, and was followed by a number of wars and rebellions. A comet also appeared, followed by a great battle and slaughter at Liege.

Albert (II), duke of Austria, son-in-law of the aforesaid Emperor Sigismund, and king of Bohemia and Hungary, was made Roman emperor March 20, A.D. 1438; and he reigned two years. He was endowed with every virtue, a spiritual prince, kind and upright, bold, and of a ready hand in war. This Duke Albert, together with his spouse, Elizabeth, was with the consent and to the great joy of the people, crowned king of Hungary at Stuhlweissenburg, and later of Bohemia. In the meantime the electors of the empire met at Frankfurt, and decided to make him Roman emperor also; but this was not agreeable to him without the consent of the landed lords of Hungary; for in the time of Emperor Sigismund, who was also a Hungarian king, the Turks fell upon the kingdom of Hungary when, to please the Italians, he had gone to Italy; wherefore the Hungarians in accepting Albert as their king exacted an oath that he would not accept the Roman sovereignty without their authority and consent. Yet the Hungarians were summoned to the king at Vienna, and after sundry deliberations, they were moved by Duke Frederick of Austria, then still a youth, to give their consent. And so, to the great joy of the Germans, he accepted the Roman sovereignty, and with the consent of the empire he went to Hungary to proceed against the Turks. In the meantime Bishop George died at Gran. He had kept the Hungarian crown at the castle. Thereupon King Albert proceeded to the castle; and the castle was given to the queen. When the lords, as they were ordered, permitted the queen to see the crown jewels, she secretly purloined the holy crown of St. Stephen and passed it on to an old woman. Thereafter King Albert, without assistance and without delay, proceeded against the Turks with his army; and he surrounded himself with a wagon-fort between the Danube and the river Theiss. In the meantime the Turkish sultan captured the castle, blinded the son of the despot whose sister he had espoused, and returned home. When the news reached the king, he left his army and came to Ofen (Budapest); but feeling the heat of the warm month of August, he sought refreshment in melons so immoderately that he contracted a flux. Finding himself in precarious condition he determined to go to Vienna in order to recover his health in the climate in which he was reared, or to die among his own people. But when he reached Gran, and his illness became worse, he left his pregnant wife, ordered his affairs, and died in the village of Langendorf. He was buried in Stuhlweissenburg after he had reigned not quite two years as Roman emperor. All had hoped for and looked forward to much future benefit at his hands; but his time was too brief.

The Council of Basle was held in A.D. 1438 at the behest of Pope Martin. The beginning was slow, but later the assembly increased in numbers through the attendance of bishops and other prelates, and of the various cardinals who had seceded from Pope Eugenius. As Eugenius was threatened with war on every hand, and observed that the council increased in numbers daily, and that many princes from many Christian countries and places went there, placing all matters concerning Christendom at the disposal of council, he, with the common consent of all the cardinals who still adhered to him, sought to divert the council to Bologna. But the emperor and other princes, and prelates then present at Basle, would not follow the pope, but admonished him to come to Basle with his cardinals, threatening action against him if he disobeyed. Eugenius did not appear but sent a legate in his stead. Thereupon, through the instrumentality of Duke Philip of Milan, he was deposed, and Amadeus, duke of Savoy, was elected in his stead, and named Felix. This council had a good beginning but a bad end on account of the schism that followed; for Eugenius influenced the Dauphin of King Charles of France to proceed to Basle with a large army, which quickly dispersed the council.

Folio CCXLIII verso

Basle, a large and renowned city of Switzerland, was built as an imperial residence, and hence it received its Latin name, which in the Greek tongue signifies royal or princely (Basilea). But it may have derived its name from its insecure foundations due to repeated earthquakes. It is said that at one time a basilisk lay hidden there; and that from this the name of the city was derived; and so it has remained. The Rhine flows through the very heart of Basle, but there is a bridge from one part of the city to the other. The Rhine rises in the mountains, and because of the resistance which it encounters between sharp crags, it emits an awful roar. It flows by Schaffhausen, overleaping itself with great turbulence. Below the city of Lauffenberg it is so hemmed in by mountains that by reason of its confinement and beating against the rocks a white foam is given off. From there with a terrible rush it runs in a wide channel as far as Basle, doing unseen damage to the city and the bridge; for it dashes along its banks seeking new outlets, hollowing out the earth, and filling it with air and water. This is why the city was damaged by earthquakes on a number of occasions. From the Rhine which gives passage to Basle, and upon which much merchandise is shipped, the city derives great advantages. St. Ursula, the holy virgin, and her fellow wayfarers (as the historians relate), sailed on the Rhine from Cologne to Basle. And although the Rhine has done much damage at times to those living along its course, it has given them a fertile soil. In our own time the city is fortified with brick walls, and it has many beautiful residences, large monasteries, churches, hospitals, and other things needful to a city. It is surrounded by walls and towers and protected by deep moats. Among the mountains are large fields, abounding in grain and producing good wine. And although in this ancient and venerable city there are many evidences and remains of very ancient buildings, they are so ruined and affected by earthquakes and old age that one does not know what was their original form or use. But Basle was rebuilt and greatly prospered after the earthquakes. In our own time a university was erected here. The city lies in Alsace, at one time called Switzerland; at another time it was in France; and now it belongs to Germany.

Folio CCXLIII

When Louis, the Dauphin of Vienne, attacked this city with a French army, the Swiss sent 4,000 able-bodied confederates to its aid. Of this more will be said hereafter. The city has two sides. On the greater side are three hills: On one stands the cathedral of the Holy Virgin Mary, adorned by the help of the blessed Emperor Henry II. On the second reside the Regulated Canons of St. Leonard; on the third is St. Peter's Church. The first cloister, with the abbey of St. Alban, lies at the foremost point of the city. On the same side the Franciscans, Augustinians and Dominicans also have their monasteries, and the Templars and Teutonic Knights their houses; and the nuns of St. Catherine, St. Clara, and St. Mary Magdalen have their convents there. On the smaller side is an excellent Carthusian cloister, and the churches of St. Theodora and St. Nicholas, as well as other houses of worship. The city also possesses no small number of sacred relics.

Frederick, duke of Austria, and thereafter Roman emperor, was offered in marriage the daughter (a handsome widow) of Amadeus, duke of Savoy, who had been elected pope in the Council of Basle, and had been called Felix. Amadeus also offered him a dowry of 200,000 florins, provided Frederick would abandon Eugenius and recognize Amadeus as the successor of St. Peter. But Frederick rejected the offer, for he did not wish to besmirch the sacrament of the church with his own dealing. Turning to his courtiers, he said, Others desire to sell their episcopal offices; but this Amadeus would like to have bought one, could he but find a seller.

Leonello (or Lionello) d'Este, margrave of Ferrara, first born and illegitimate son of Stella, the noble maiden, received the margraviate upon the death of his father Niccolo, at Milan; and he governed it for nine years in peace and righteousness. He provided the city of Ferrara with new walls along the river Padus (Po), and erected many high buildings there; also a Dominican monastery, in which he elected to be buried. He was a whole-souled, good, wise, and gentle man, and highly learned in good literature. He espoused the daughter of Gian Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua.

Folio CCXLIII verso

Albert, the aforesaid duke of Austria, ere and before he was elected Roman king, ordered slain all the Jews in his dominions, who refused to be converted to Christ the true and only God; and through fear many accepted baptism. Duke Frederick of Austria before he was elected Roman king, took one of these (baptized) Jews for his chamberlain, and became fond of him as a companion. But after a number of years the Jew became remorseful and decided to return to the faith of his ancestors. Although Frederick urged him to adhere to his present life he could not influence him to do so. Thereupon Frederick called upon the teachers of the Holy Scriptures at the university of Vienna to instruct the youth therein; but neither pleading, compensation, promises nor threats influenced the Jew to abstain from his resolution. Nothing else availing, Frederick caused him to be brought in court; and when the Jew, without being bound (for such was his desire) was led to his death, and saw the burning fire, he began to sing a Hebrew hymn, and fearlessly sprang into the midst of the flame.

Once upon a time King Albert, rather of Ladislaus, was seated at a sermon preached by a Dominican monk at Vienna. And when the king fell asleep, the preacher cried out in a loud voice, I ask all you who are standing here whether the princes also are to be remembered. And when the preacher had cast doubt upon the question, the king awoke, and being cognizant of what had been said, he remarked, When the princes die, after having been baptized in the cradle, there can be no doubt of their salvation.

Peter Paul Vergerius, natural philosopher, orator and jurist, highly versed in the Latin and Greek tongues, a disciple of Chrysoloras of Constantinople, and a privy counsellor of the house of Carrara, was at this time held in great esteem for his skill and cleverness; and he executed many commendable writings.

Mapheus Vegius, an orator and poet not to be ignored, and a member of the court of Pope Martin, at this time while at Rome, wrote various poems known to the learned.

Franciscus Barbarus of Vienna, also a disciple of Chrysoloras in Greek letters, and a man of extraordinary ingenuity and wisdom, was held in high esteem at this time for his literary ability, eloquence and worldly prudence. He wrote a fine book on matters concerning the housewife; also many elegant letters and epistles.

Leonardus Justinianus, likewise a very learned and renowned man, lived at this time.

Carolus Aretinus, a poet in the Greek and Latin tongues and a versatile, eloquent and distinguished writer, was at this time, in view of his fitness and virtuous life, taken into the chancery of Florence, and awarded compensation and privileges.

Gaetano of Vicenza, a canon of Padua, distinguished teacher of the Holy Scriptures and natural philosopher, at this time held first rank as a lecturer and debater in the University of Padua. He wrote with distinction and excellence upon several books of Aristotle, and also compiled other works.

The Council of Florence was held by Pope Eugenius in A.D. 1439 in opposition to the Council of Basic. For after the death of Emperor Sigismund, who had furthered the Council of Basle, and the accession of Duke Albert of Austria as Roman emperor, the cardinal of St. Croix opened the Council of Ferrara at the behest of Pope Eugenius. Eugenius went there, for he understood that the Greek emperor would be present; and he was received in no other manner than it was customary to receive Roman emperors. But Death came to Ferrara, and the council was transferred to Florence. And there, after divers and sufficient hearings of the Greeks and Latins, pro and con, it was acknowledged upon rational grounds that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and Son; that the body of Christ may be blessed in the form of unleavened bread; and that there is a purgatory. They also assented that the Roman bishop is the vicar of Christ and the true successor of St. Peter, who first held the office on earth, and to whom the Eastern and Western Churches are duly obedient. And although the Greeks left the council in contentment and returned home, ere long the Greek nation reverted to their old customs and usages.

Filippo, duke of Milan, after taking the city of Genoa, maintained a large army; wherefore the Florentines made war upon him. This lasted for twenty-five years, until his death, although at intervals there was peace, interspersed with treachery and deceit.

France had flourished, but at this time was in a state of gloom and depression; for it was overrun and devastated beyond all measure by Henry, the English king, who, although he himself brought on the war, also sustained no small measure of loss, and had an unhappy end.

John, duke of Burgundy, also attacked the same kingdom; but he was slain soon thereafter, and this was the cause of many evils. The cardinal of St. Croix finally made peace, and the Burgundians accepted it; but the English would not consent. However, when Duke John after the peace, took the Holy Sacrament with the king of France, he was wickedly slain in the presence of the French king; and in consequence thereof that same kingdom suffered much evil.

Two lovers lived in Italy at this time: a knight named Eurialus, who was the personal attendant of Emperor Sigismund, and Lucretia, of the city of Siena. Both were handsome and well built, but Lucretia excelled in her marvelous beauty. As soon as they saw one another they were seized with a blind passion. Finally they attained their desires, which happened after Emperor Sigismund had been at Siena for some time. But when the emperor was about to proceed further, the two lovers had to part, and in consequence they were very sad. Lucretia, after shedding many tears, became ill, and died in her mother's arms. When Eurialus learned of her death he became sad and depressed; and he so remained until the emperor gave him for wife a chaste virgin of ducal lineage.

OF THE DAUPHIN'S EXPEDITION INTO ALSACE.

In these days Louis of Vienne, the Dauphin, eldest son of the king of France, passed over the threshold of the Roman empire with a large army and besieged the city of Mömpelgard, which the dukes of Würtemberg held as a fee of the Roman empire. After the Dauphin had continued the siege for some time, he entered upon an understanding with those in the city to surrender the city to him for a specified time, upon the expiration of which he would voluntarily restore it to them. When they refused to do this he determined to take the city by force so that he might have it for his residence; for it is not seemly that the son of a king should be in the field without a shelter. When he had taken Montbeliard he disclosed and made known the purpose of his coming; but he did not give the same reason to everyone. Presently he said that he had come to assist the German nobility which was being oppressed by the counts. Then he said that the Roman emperor sent him against the Swiss. To some he represented that he had come to recover the land belonging to the house of France, and which extended to the Rhine. At other times he pretended to be there in behalf of Duke Sigismund, with the siege of Strassburg in view. He gave all these rumors currency, not because they were true, but hoping thereby to secure the good will and support of many people.

At this time the Swiss were besieging a castle at Basle, and the Dauphin's people, called the Armagnacs (Armagnaken or Armegecken), wished to proceed to the relief of the castle. When the Swiss observed this they went forth to meet the "Arme Gecken" (literally "Poor Fools"); and they beat them back. While retreating step by step they collected a larger army and fell upon the Swiss at St. Jacob's Hospital, hardly four "Roszlauff" from Basle. Here occurred a gruesome and terrible battle in which many dead were left on both sides. It lasted from dawn to night; and finally the still undefeated Swiss, although victorious, were so fatigued that they left the field to the "Arms Gecken," not by reason of the latter's strength, but because of their numbers. Some say that the "Arme Gecken" suffered a greater loss than the Swiss. While these things were transpiring, the Roman emperor sent his emissaries, namely the Bishop of Augsburg, and Dr. John von Eich, and several knights, to the Dauphin to inquire why he had entered the empire with his army. In the meantime, the council being held there, two cardinals and many doctors, together with the burghers of Basle, were sent to the Dauphin requesting him not to interfere with the council, nor to damage the city. Thereupon the Dauphin sent his emissaries back with them to Basle. The legate of Pope Felix also came to the city; also the emissaries of the Duke of Savoy, and the entire Swiss confederation; and they transacted much business in the matter of a treaty. The emissaries of Nuremberg said that the Dauphin had proceeded against the Swiss at the request of the king. After the "Arme Gecken" had overrun Alsace, they returned home in A.D. 1444, though not without losses.

Brescia (Brixia) at one time a very noble city of the Cenomani in Gaul, and erstwhile mighty among the cities of Lombardy, at this time came into the possession of the Venetians in this manner: Duke Philip of Milan there appointed an evil man as toll-gatherer. He imposed such insupportable burdens upon the citizens that the people of Brescia, weary of the load, gave the city over to the Venetians. When the Venetians had taken possession of the city, the cardinal of St. Croix sent his emissaries back and forth frequently, and made a peace between Duke Philip and the Venetians to the effect that the Venetians were to retain the city of Brescia and the little villages which the Brescians and Cremonians, and the margrave of Mantua have taken possession of. By this treaty the said cardinal also accredited to the Venetians the city of Bergamo and its province upon condition that the Venetian and Florentine confederates should refrain from war against it. Thereafter a war began between Lucca and the Florentines, and this lasted for three years, both parties suffering heavy losses.

Cosimo de Medici, a mighty citizen of Florence, was at first driven out of Florence, and later recalled. Through his management the affairs and government of the city were soon reformed and restored, and many antagonistic and disobedient citizens were sent into exile. He was the foremost citizen among the Florentines, and not only among the Italians but probably also among the nations, the most powerful in the accumulation of wealth; and in addition thereto he excelled all others in worldly prudence, goodness and gentleness, as well as in literature and history. His riches were so great that with his help Francesco Sforza attained to the duchy of Milan. He also beautified and improved many church edifices. He also erected two cloisters, one to the Dominican Order within the city, and another outside the city and not far removed therefrom; and he endowed them with libraries containing many costly Latin and Greek books. He also erected other cloisters and remarkable buildings in the city. He died at a good old age, and left as his heir a son named Piero.

Nicholas Euboicus, bishop of Saguritus, highly renowned for his knowledge of the Greek and Latin tongue, was present at the assembly of a great number of highly learned and distinguished men at the Council of Florence; and there he speedily, accurately, and elegantly interpreted and translated all that was spoken in Latin and Greek.

Ambrose of Florence, a general of the Camaldulian Order, renowned as a teacher of the Holy Scriptures, versed in the Latin and Greek tongues, and endowed with every good virtue, was also of renown in the same council. Among the proofs of his ingenuity are his translations from the Greek into the Latin tongue, of the writings of Diogenes Laertius, the Greek scholar, treating of the lives and conduct of the natural philosophers.

John Tortellius Aretinus, the pope's subdeacon and chamberlain, no less learned in the Greek and Latin tongues and in the Holy Scriptures, flourished at this time; and among other works of his learning and skill is an elegant book, wherein he set forth the correct method and manner in which Latin words are to be written and composed.

Antonius Cermisanus, a singular prince of medicine, lectured on medicine for a long time in the schools, and posterity was unlimited in his praise. He was of a happy and delightful disposition, pleasantly plump, and of good complexion, and in his old age he left beautiful boys. Out of his good understanding he gave posterity sundry advice beneficial against every ailment. He died at Padua in A.D. 1441.

Bartolomeo Montagnano, distinguished natural philosopher and physician, and versed in many things, excelled all other physicians of his time in the subtlety of his writings. This appears by the books which he wrote on the preservation of health. In addition thereto he also gave much good advice.

Hugo of Siena, a very renowned physician of this time, by grace of God (as it is said), and by virtue of his skill and medical experience, excelled all those of renown who had preceded him in Etruria; and he gave much valuable advice.

Nicholas da Tolentino, a father of the Order of St. Augustine, was canonized A.D. 1446, and because of his miracles he was enrolled in the number of the holy confessors by Pope Eugenius in the presence of all the Roman people and an assembly of all the cardinals.

Although Pope John XXII specially recognized his sanctity, and would have canonized Nicholas ere then, he was hindered from doing so by turmoil and wars resulting from the Schism, and finally by his death; and in consequence the matter was delayed until this time. This saint was born of parents in moderate circumstances in a village in Picenum, called St. Angelo, just below the city of Fermo. On becoming of age he devoted his body and soul to the Lord, retired from the world, and entered the Augustinian Order. There he fasted, watched, and flagellated himself, and gave himself up entirely to contemplation. He spoke seldom, and only when it was necessary, dwelling upon good morals, piety, goodness, and the heavenly fatherland, and scorning the world. He wore a hair shirt and a rough iron girdle next his body, and fought the devilish temptations from which he suffered. He possessed the spirit of prophecy. When the sick and the evil-possessed were brought to him, he relieved them. While in his monastery, for 30 years he ate no meat, eggs, fish or other fat foods. In recognition of his piety a bright star appeared to him in his sleep, proceeding from his home to his cloister; and there, in the choir, behind the altar, the star stood still. There, by divine revelation, Nicholas chose to be buried. He died in blessedness, and his day is September 10th.

Laurentius of Valenza, no less a philosopher and teacher than an orator and grammarian, was held in great esteem and renown at this time. For the instruction of posterity he wrote many elegant and useful manuscripts, epistles and letters in Latin.

Matheus Palmerius, a highly informed Florentine historian, natural philosopher and orator, flourished in his art at this time. He was present among the number of celebrated men at the Council of Florence.

Blondus Flavius of Forli, a highly learned man and in favor with Pope Eugenius because of his eloquence, was at this time held in great esteem for his skill and beneficence. In addition to his countless orations and letters, he brought great honor and glory to Italy, for with great industry he reached back into historical accounts which had lain buried for over a thousand years, and brought them together in thirty-two large volumes, wherein he elegantly treated not only of Italy, but of the entire Roman empire, its provinces and regions. He also wrote and left a number of books on other subjects.

Guarino of Verona, a student of the Greek master, Chrysoloras, mentioned a long time ago, was a highly informed and able grammarian, orator and natural philosopher, and versed in the Greek and Latin tongues. He lectured at Ferrara in the presence of countless students, and by his teachings earned great renown and praise. He translated a number of books from Greek into Latin, and wrote elegant epistles and letters. He died at a good old age and was buried in the Carmelite monastery at Ferrara.

George of Trebizond, a highly learned man, and papal secretary, was in renown and esteem at this time. At the instance of Pope Eugenius he conducted a public school at Rome for many years, and taught the Spaniards, French, Italians and Germans the art of oratory, poetry and writing.

Gregory Tiphernas, an orator, versed in Greek and Latin, translated the Asia of Strabo into Latin. So also John Aurispa, the papal secretary and orator, was held in honor and renown at this time.

Antonius Guaynerius, a renowned physician, was also illustrious at this time for his ability and scriptural wisdom. As the physicians know, he wrote and compiled many commendable and useful things concerning ailments of every nature and the remedies therefor.

Year of the World 6646 | Year of Christ 1447

Nicholas V, previously called Tomaso Sarzana, born of low estate and of humble family, and son of a physician, was elected pope by common consent in March A.D. 1447. He was very worthy of this high papal office and honor. He was so gentle, and loved the learned so much, that he appointed them to offices and benefices with great pleasure, and liberally compensated them for their translations and transcriptions from the Greek into the Latin tongue. And so Greek writings, which had remained buried for six hundred years, came to light again. He also sent learned men into all parts of Europe to search for the books, which through the neglect of the ancients and the devastations of the Tartars and coarse pagan people, had disappeared. And after this man, highly endowed in all the virtues, had rendered good service to God and to man, he attained to the office of bishop, cardinal and pope in a single year. When he had entered upon the pontificate, all men looked up to him and all princes of the world were favorable to him. For that reason and pursuant to the exhortations of Emperor Frederick, Pope Felix was influenced to abdicate. Thereupon Pope Nicholas sent him a cardinal's hat, and appointed him a legate to Germany. Such unanimity caused great peace and joy, not only among the Roman people, but throughout the world. From this pope Nicholas, the emperor, Frederick, together with his spouse Lenora, received the imperial crown and consecration. This pope erected many magnificent and costly buildings within and without the city of Rome, consisting not only of churches but also of residences. He planned and erected walls, fortifications, towers and other structures; and also caused church ornaments to be made of gold, silver and precious stones. He caused beautiful books, handsomely embellished, to be written before the art of printing was discovered. He gave many alms to the poor and needy maidens. He was so averse to avarice that he neither sold an office, nor granted a benefice through simony. He was grateful to those who served him, and loved righteousness. He was an augmentor and instrument of peace. He held a jubilee, or year of grace, and inscribed the blessed Bernardin in the number of the saints. At last he died, either of grief over the loss of the city of Constantinople, or as the result of a fever and the gout, in A.D. 1455, in the eighth year of his pontificate.

Year of the World 6656 | Year of Christ 1455

Calixtus III, a Spaniard of the city of Valencia, was born of noble parents. He was previously called Alphonso Borgia. At an advanced age he was elected pope by the cardinals in the month of April of this year. He was a man of great counsel and ingenuity, a keen doctor in both branches of the law, and secretary to King Alphonso. Shortly after the inception of his pontificate he undertook a war against the Turks, which he advocated in his writings before he became pontiff. To further this war he promptly sent ever so many preachers throughout Europe to incite the Christians against the Turks, and to secure their aid against them. By such assistance he was enabled to send a great fleet, and with it the patriarch of Aquileia, who spent three years at sea with the fleet, fighting the Asiatic enemy, capturing many islands and causing the enemy much damage. King Alphonso and the Duke of Burgundy took up the cross, agreeing to proceed against the enemy or to send their armed men. In the meantime the priests held a number of litanies, with admonitions to the people that when they heard the bells ringing at noon, they were to make their devotions and pray to God for those who would undertake to fight against the Turks. In the same matter this Calixtus ordered the office of the transfiguration of our Lord Jesus Christ. On the same account he sent Louis of Bologna, a member of the Franciscan Order, to Usucassanus, the prince of Persia and Armenia, and to the king of the Tartars, with presents and gifts as an inducement to proceed against the Turks; and through incitations and gifts they were aroused against the Turks, causing them much damage. This pope enrolled the blessed Vincentius, his countryman, and Edmund, an Englishman, in the number of the holy confessors. Calixtus was a man of upright life, generous in alms, daring in speech, and partook of food but moderately. He died in the fourth year of his pontificate, leaving 115,000 florins, which he had collected for the war against the Turks.

Frederick III, son of Duke Ernst of Austria, and duke of Austria, Styria and Carinthia, and count of Tyrol, was, upon the demise of King Albert, in A.D. 1440, elected Roman king by unanimous vote. He was crowned in high honor at Aix-la-Chapelle with the crown of the German kingdom, and ruled the Roman Empire for almost fifty three years. When Frederick attained to years of discretion, he soon recognized the duty and obligation due to God; and urged on by his good nature and his heritage of noble blood, he determined to further the service and honor of God above all else; for the princes of the Austrian house (of whom ever so many reigned as kings and emperors), hoped for good fortune as long as they served and honored God. And thus Frederick, following in the footsteps of his ancestors, and while still young, sailed across the sea and visited the city of our salvation; the places where our Saviour was born and where the sacrifice in the Temple was made; and the places of his temptation, Last Supper, trial, crucifixion, burial and ascension; and he kissed the earth where our Saviour had been. He enjoyed a safe return voyage. In the flower of his youth he was a good Christian prince, wise, brave, and full of life. He developed in strength of body, was stern, patient and skilled in his work, of a strong and firm disposition, and loved sobriety. To his credit we may speak of his gentleness, piety, righteousness, and worldly wisdom; as well as of the manner in which he removed from our nation the pernicious schism in the Roman Church, and by great labor, and at still greater expense and zeal, brought the German people to obedience to popes Eugenius and Nicholas; and therefrom originated the unity of the church, which we now enjoy. But we dread to row upon a great sea in a small boat. For who, in so short a history as this one is, can adequately speak of the majesty, glory, power, nobility, and virtue of such a great and mighty prince? I opine it were better to remain silent than to remember such a prince's majesty, esteem, praise, and renown, in a brief notation. But as it is impossible for us to speak but briefly of the praiseworthy and memorable history and accomplishments of this most illustrious prince as ruler of the Roman Empire for a period of fifty-three years, we are obliged to forego a complete account; and we will therefore scan the life of Frederick as an example of virtue and piety. Because of the schism the imperial coronation of Frederick was delayed until the time of Pope Nicholas V. In the meantime the affairs of the German nation were pacified. Thereafter Emperor Frederick placed a governor over Austria, and went to St. Veit, where he celebrated Christmas. And there he summoned King Ladislaus to come to him. From thence he proceeded to Villach. And there the Bohemians and Hungarians came to him, expressing their desire to attend his coronation at Rome, to observe the manners and customs of Italy, and to earn the girdle of knighthood. Duke Albert, the emperor's brother, was also present, having brought with him a brilliant retinue from Swabia. The emperor left Villach and proceeding over the mountains, sent Duke Albert on ahead with a portion of the retinue. The emperor took King Ladislaus with him, and during the holy days in the first year after the Jubilee, they arrived in Italy. There he was received with great joy, reverence and honor by an embassy of Venetian counsellors, sent on to meet him, and by the clergy with the relics. Throughout the Venetian country he was kept free of expenses. At every place many Italian people came to meet him, praising the brilliant imperial retinue, the shining armor, the handsome youths and their beautiful countenances, their bright yellow hair, and white necks; and they marvelled at Frederick's well-formed figure, his brave countenance, and intelligence; as well as at Ladislaus's angelic countenance, his quiet and well regulated manners, and his gallantry beyond his years. Those of Treviso looked upon Frederick with eagerness, recalling that they were once subject to this lord of Austria, whose shield and emblem are still in the courthouse there. The same occurred at Padua, for the people well knew that they were subjects of the Roman Empire. In the meantime many Germans came from Swabia, Franconia and from the Rhine, through Trient, Verona and Mantua to Ferrara, where they awaited the coming of the Roman king. King Frederick then proceeded to Padua, and from Padua to Ferrara; thence to Bologna; and from there to Florence, and from Florence to Siena; at all of which places he was received with great honor and elegance by the nobility, legates, and cardinals who came forth to meet him.

Folio CCXLVII verso

While he was at Siena his betrothed, Leonora, daughter of the king of Portugal, came to Pisa. She was a person of medium height, 16 years of age, happy countenance, lustrous black eyes, small mouth, rosy cheeks, white neck and countenance, and very well built. On the second day of the Fast she was led to Siena. There came forth to meet her, firstly the foremost citizens there, then King Ladislaus and Duke Albert, and the clergy followed. Frederick, the Roman king, and the papal legates awaited her at the two gates of the city. When they saw each other they embraced. After those events those of erected a marble monument. When Frederick went upon his way to Rome, he was accorded great and over-whelming honors at the command of the pope. When he approached Rome there came forth to meet him the entire nobility, a most distinguished assembly of papal councillors and cardinals, the bishop of Spoleto who was the pope's vicar, and many other bishops and abbots, bearing the sacred relics. And thus Frederick, with an elegant and wonderfully ordered retinue, proceeded to Rome, the naked sword and two banners—one of St. George, the other with the eagle of the Roman Empire—being carried before him. Beside him were his royal spouse and King Ladislaus; also Duke Albert; all in proper order according to rank. King Frederick, under a cloth of gold, was led to the steps of St. Peter's Church. There, on an ivory chair, surrounded by the assembled cardinals, sat Pope Nicholas in his papal vestments. He received Frederick with fatherly and exceptional speech; and after Frederick had kissed his feet, he gave him an orb of gold. Thereafter Ladislaus and Albrecht, and finally Leonora kissed the feet of the pope. Thereupon Frederick bade Pope Nicholas to crown him with the Lombard crown; and this Frederick received from the pope; and thus Frederick was crowned king of the Lombards on the 15th day of the month of March. And Leonora, under the office of the mass, was again espoused, and the marriage consecrated. After three days the imperial coronation took place. The pope sat before the high altar, on an elevated throne. Two seats were provided, one for Frederick, the future emperor, and another for Leonora, his spouse. Frederick having taken the oath of fealty to St. Peter and to Pope Nicholas in the usual manner, he was clothed in a white robe, and accepted as a regular canon of Peter. Thereafter he was invested with the imperial robe, led to the center of the church, and consecrated three times. Then he was anointed at the altar of St. Maurice (likewise Leonora also), and thereafter, under the office of the mass (which the pope himself began), he was crowned Emperor with a golden crown set with pearls and precious stones, and honored with the sceptre, orb and sword—the sceptre as a symbol of his royal authority, the orb as a symbol of his sovereignty over the world, and the sword as a symbol of armament and war. And so, after the emperor, Leonora received at the hands of the pope the crown which had belonged to the wife of Emperor Sigismund. And although Emperor Frederick at great expense to himself, had provided costly ornaments and decorations, he also ordered the mantle, sword, sceptre and orb of Charlemagne to be brought from Nuremberg to Rome for the solemnities of his coronation. After the performance of the holy office, Leonora retired to her lodging, while the pope and the king rode together to St. Mary's Church; and there they parted. And the Emperor rode upon the bridge of Hadrian, across the Tiber, and there (with the sword) he struck his brother Albert and many dukes and counts, to the number of about three hundred, conferring knighthood upon them. And so Emperor Frederick was endowed with the imperial crown on March 18, A.D. 1452. Thereafter the emperor, together with the empress, was invited to Naples by Alphonso, the king of Aragon. Then they were received with great honor; and they remained there for the week of the holy martyrs, and eight days thereafter, when King Alphonso showed his treasures and what costly things he possessed. The Emperor returned to Rome, but the empress remained with her father, the king, for another eight days. Thereafter she proceeded to Manfredonia (Siponto), and hence by sea to Venice. The emperor left Rome and made Borsius d'Este a duke of the cities of Mutina (modern Modena) and Regium Lepidi; for which he gave the emperor a jewel which his father had purchased for about 21,000 florins. Then the emperor sailed to Venice. There the duke, accompanied by 300 councillors, and a countless number of nobles and common people, came forth to meet him. And they entertained him with rare and wonderful water sports, and indulged in festivities rare and unheard of. There the emperor remained for ten days; and he and the empress were kept free of all expenses, not only in the city of Venice, but in all the Venetian possessions. Now when Emperor Frederick came from Italy back into German territory, there arose a terrific and prodigious storm, and a change in the atmosphere, portending future misfortune, which followed. The princes of Hungary and Germany undertook new measures concerning the young king Ladislaus; for when Frederick planned to go to Italy, the Austrians bade him to leave Ladislaus with them in the land of his paternal heritage. But when the emperor denied this request, the Austrians, under the leadership of Count Ulrich of Cilli and his confederates, became hostile to the emperor, and they besieged him at Neustadt upon his return from Italy. Thereupon the emperor allowed them to extend allegiance to the young king Ladislaus. This glorious emperor Frederick had three heirs by his imperial spouse, Leonora: Christopher, who died an untimely death; Maximilian, duke of Burgundy, and now Roman king; and Margaret, wife of Albert, duke of Bavaria. And although the Austrians with the help of the Bohemians besieged Emperor Frederick at Neustadt and at Vienna, yet as victors they were induced to seek peace with the defeated emperor; and according thereto they were compelled to pay him an annual tribute of 6000 gulden. This emperor finally conducted various wars against Matthias, the king of Hungary; and Matthias inflicted sundry losses upon the emperor, and more particularly upon the Austrians, taking from them the cities of Vienna and Neustadt. But Maximilian recovered the same cities for his father after the death of Matthias. In order to allay the hostility of the Christian princes and of the people, and to establish peace among them, and to rescue our Christian faith in many parts of the Roman Empire, the emperor held public sessions, and particularly at Regensburg, in 1471, and several years thereafter at Nuremberg. In 1486 he took his son Maximilian into the sovereignty as a co-ruler; for his royal person was in such condition, through the burdens of old age, that he was unable to do that which his son might accomplish. This most illustrious emperor Frederick III went to his rest at Lintz, in Austria, about noon on the 19th day of August, A.D. 1493, at the age of 78 years, after devoutly receiving the Holy Sacrament of Christ. His body was taken to Vienna, and buried in St. Stephen's Church. May God comfort his soul and the souls of all the faithful.

Bernardin of Siena, of the Franciscan Order, an augmentor thereof, and a distinguished preacher of his time, was born of honorable parents. He was learned in the canon law. His paternal and maternal inheritance, not small to begin with, he distributed to the poor, forsook worldly honors and pomp, and entered this order. He re-established and improved the order, which in many places had become unstable, and exhorted his brethren to live according to the rule of St. Francis, and the holy Gospels. He wandered all over Italy, preaching for 30 years, and thereby augmented the order, erecting over fifty cloisters throughout Italy and filling them with brethren. When preaching it was his custom to exhibit to the people a tablet inscribed with the name of Jesus in golden letters. Without question, he healed the sick and performed miracles in the name of Jesus. He died at the age of 63 years, illustrious for his miracles; and therefore he was enrolled in the number of the saints by Pope Nicholas in A.D. 1450.

A Jubilee was celebrated at Rome in the year 1450, and this was the great year of grace; for, as according to the old law all servitude in body and soul were to end in the fiftieth year, so also all guilt and sinful burdens of those who visited the threshold of the holy apostles in devout and youthful spirit were to be remitted. Therefore, in this year countless numbers of people from all parts of Christendom came to home, 40,000 people passing back and forth through the city daily. But before the year had passed, a great catastrophe occurred at Rome. There was such a crowd of people passing back and forth with asses, horses and mules, over the bridge across the Tiber, that the walls of the bridge collapsed; and many people fell into the Tiber and were drowned, while others were crushed on the bridge.

In the preceding year a plague occurred in Asia, which crept into the land of the Wends, through Dalmatia and Italy, and then appeared in Germany and France. And in consequence of this plague, as well as an eclipse of the sun and many earthquakes, a great famine followed.

Alphonso, son of King Ferdinand of Aragon, whose father John, a king of remote Spain, met death by a fall from his horse, ruled the kingdom of Naples for 32 years from 1442, after Rhenus was defeated and expelled. Alphonso had previously ruled Aragon, Sardinia, and Spain for a long time. His rather, a pious man, left him surviving four sons, namely: Alphonso, John, Henry and Peter. As the oldest, Alphonso retained possession of the kingdom of his father. He cast his eye about therein and ruled with great power. He incited the governor of the castle to treacherously surrender the same to him. This castle was situated in the sea; and from there he made war upon the Neapolitans, so heavily besieging the city of Naples and for so long, that many people died. At last, by means of hidden underground passages he introduced soldiers into the city by night and captured it. Not long thereafter he subdued the nobility of the entire kingdom and brought everything under his power. He caused himself to be carried into the city in triumph in a golden vehicle. Having performed many great deeds, he died, leaving no legitimate son. To Ferdinand, his son by a concubine, he willed the kingdom of Apulia; and so his brother John succeeded to the kingdom of Aragon. Alphonso left more estates and greater wealth than had any of his ancestors before him. Without contradiction he is considered the most wise and powerful sovereign among all the kings and princes of our time, moderate in his pleasures, firm in the presence of flattery and praise, and in the face of the vanities and customs common to princes, his zeal for learning is not to be forgotten.

Julianus Cesarinus, a cardinal, zealous lover of the Christian faith, and endowed with every divine and human virtue, was, in these times, sent to Hungary by Pope Eugenius as a legate to make peace between the Polish king Ladislaus and the spouse of Albert, the Roman king; and peace was made in A.D. 1444. The cardinal also influenced the same king and the Hungarians to proceed against the Turks with a large army. They slew 40,000 Turks and 18 princes. King Ladislaus was wounded in the same battle and died; likewise this cardinal.

Francesco Sforza, son-in-law of Filippo Maria, duke of Milan, was created fourth duke of Milan in the year 1448, and with Bianca Maria he reigned 17 years. He was a very brave and well-spoken man, who excelled the old kings in oratory, magnanimity, strength, gentleness, wisdom and worldly knowledge. He was also successful in knightly affairs and undertakings. In his younger days he withstood and was victorious against the Brescians, Florentines, Venetians, Milanese, Italians, and the pope; all of which mighty accomplishments have been celebrated by poets and writers, and are still apparent. So not only at Milan, but also in other cities, he erected great and mighty attractive buildings; namely, a palace at Milan, another at Lauda; a mighty hospital at Rome, and before the same city a cloister in honor of Nicholas of Tolentino. He died in A.D. 1466, and by his wife Bianca he left six sons and two daughters.

An eclipse of the sun occurred at six o'clock on the first day of September, A.D. 1448. In the same year great and terrible wars were fought in England, France, Germany, Flanders and Apulia, and throughout Italy, murder, robbery, devastation, fire and much evil occurred. The Greeks suffered great damage at the hands of the Turks, Two years later so many deaths occurred that few people survived.

THE SIEGE OF CONSTANTINOPLE IN THE YEAR 1453.

Constantinople, seat of the Oriental Empire and a singular residence of Christian wisdom, was besieged on the second day of June in this year by Mohammed, the prince of the Turks. It was beleaguered for 50 days, and attacked with force and arms, devastated and defiled in the third year of said Mohammed. He surrounded the city by land and water; and he brought with him countless baskets woven of willow, with which the enemy protected itself as they approached the moat. With a great and mighty gun they shot down and destroyed the tower at St. Roman's gate, so that the wreckage filled in the moat, levelling it, and enabling the enemy to pass over it. And after the Turks had damaged the walls in three places, but despaired (of taking the city), he took the advice of a treacherous and faithless Christian to bring ships overland and launch them from a hill. The city had a long and narrow gate on the East, secured by ships tied to one another and by a chain; wherefore it was impossible to get to it. But in order to more securely hem in and besiege the city, the Turk caused the way on the hill to be levelled off, and the ships to be shoved over underlying barrels for a distance of fully 70 roazlaufe; and from the shore opposite Constantinople he made a wooden bridge supported by wine barrels and 300 roszaufe in length, over which the army might pass to the walls. And thus the city of Constantinople, and Pera also, were stormed, the walls and the gate attacked, and the upper wall scaled. The enemy caused much injury to the inhabitants by throwing stones. While entering the gates they slew about 800 Greek and Roman knights, and captured the city. The Greek emperor, Constantinus Paleologus was beheaded, and all persons six years of age, or over, were slain. The priests and inmates of the cloisters were murdered by various forms of martyrdom, while the rest of the people were slain by the sword. So much blood was spilled that it ran through the city in rivulets. The churches and other houses of God were shamefully and horribly defiled and dishonored, while many inhuman misdeeds were practiced by the raving Turks upon those of Christian blood. This happened about 1130 years after the building of the city of Constantinople.

Folio CCXLIX verso

Suncassianus, the fortunate king of Persia and Armenia, whose personal name was Assimbeus, began his rule over the Persians in the year 1454, after he had defeated and slain Zenza, the Persian king. He was at first a petty king of Armenia, courageous, a mighty warrior and hunter. He often fought large armies with a small body of men. After he had slain King Zenza he let it appear that he intended to crown that king's son, then a prisoner, as king of Persia. He now proceeded as far as Tauris, into the capital city of Persia, conquering all the cities and castles; and when he felt that he had sufficiently secured himself, he slew the new king, and took possession of Persia. This Suncassianus (which signifies a great man) afterward brought the Bactrians, Medes and Persians and a large part of the East under his dominion. Pope Calixtus entered upon friendly relationship with this king, and the king showed the pope much respect. At the pope's instigation he subjected the Turks to heavy losses. On the appeal of the Venetians (when Negropont was lost), he made war against Ottoman, the Turk, with a large army, and slew 30,000 Turks. Before long he and the Turk arranged a marriage between their children.

John Capistrano, a native of the village of Abruzzi not far from the city of Aquileia, and of the Franciscan Order, was at this time a convincing preacher of the Christian faith. At the command of the pope he went to Germany; and passing through Carinthia and Styria, he came to Austria. He was received as a papal legate and messenger of God by the people and by the clergy who came forth to meet him with the sacred relics. Many sick people were laid at his feet; and many among them (as it is said) were restored to health. He remained in Germany many days, teaching the ways of the Lord, and calling the people to penance. He was also invited to Nuremberg; and because of his teachings and works many people came there from the vicinity to see this man; and they wept for joy and out of devotion, raising their hands to heaven, blessing him, praising God, and touching and kissing his raiment. They looked upon him as heaven sent, and as an angel. This was his mode of life: He slept in his habit; rose before daybreak and prayed at Matins Lauds, and the First and Third Hours, and thereafter he held mass. Then he preached in Latin, translated into German by an interpreter. After the sermon he retired to a monastery of his order. He then prayed at the Sixth and Ninth Hours. He then visited the sick, remaining with them a long time, and placing his hands upon them. The beret of St. Bernardin and the blood which is said to have flowed from his nostrils after death, he also laid upon the sick; and in tears he prayed for all mankind. He then took his evening meal, and finally gave audience to those of his own order who came to see him. He prayed at vespers. He then again visited the sick; and these were his practices until night time. After Compline he did not seek rest and sleep, but devoted himself to reading the Holy Scriptures as far as fleeting time would permit. And thus he led a heavenly life. This man we saw at Nuremberg, at the age of 65 years, small, lean, withered, and a body made up of skin, veins and bones; yet he was happy and strong in his labors. He preached every day without cessation, and practiced martyrdom in greater or less degree. Emperor Frederick loved to hear this man; and thereafter the emperor went to Hungary, collected a large army against the Turks, and slew about 6,000 of them.

Francesco Filelfo of Ancona, a knightly man, laureated poet and writer, highly learned in the Latin and Greek, lived until this time in great esteem and renown. He constantly practiced in Greek and Latin composition. He was a student of the master Chrysoloras of Constantinople, and was his son-in-law. Chrysoloras educated him to such an extent that he was able to instruct many people at Venice, and later at Florence, Siena, Bologna, and finally at Milan, in Greek and Latin. He was in the pay of four dukes, and wrote many excellent books. He died in A.D. 1481 at the age of ninety years.

Leonardo de Utino, Preaching Order, teacher of the Holy Scriptures, well spoken, highly learned, prudent and agreeable, as the product of his high intelligence preached many sermons and gave much instruction to the people, and prepared and left (a book of) the saints throughout the year.

Folio CCL recto

As far as is known, Emperor Frederick never took an oath, except at the time of his coronation at Aix-la-Chapelle and at Rome; and these oaths he firmly kept. And as by such oath he had obligated himself not to make any change in the estates of the Church, therefore when a demand was made upon him to the contrary, he denied the request, preferring to appear niggardly rather than commit perjury. Accordingly he delayed acting upon the numerous requests of Borsius, marquis of Ferrara, for the granting of the cities of Modena and Reggio to him as a fief, until it was demonstrated to him that the granting of these duchies in consideration of the payment of an annual tribute was really more of a benefit than a detriment in the status of the Empire. Those at his court once told him how disparagingly a number of persons had spoken of him; and he replied, Do you not know that princes, like targets, are set up to be shot at? Lightning strikes the high towers and spares the lower structures. All is well with us as long as we are assailed with words alone."

Ladislus, king of Hungary and Bohemia, and also duke of Austria, a son of King Albert and grandson of Emperor Sigismund, was born after the death of his father, and as soon as he saw the light of day he was baptized at Stuhlweissenburg, receiving the girdle of knighthood and the crown jewels of Hungary (which his mother had by her), all on the same day. He was taken from hence and (together with the crown) placed in the care and wardship of Emperor Frederick by his mother; and there he remained for twelve years. When Ladislus, the king of Poland (who had undertaken the rule of the kingdom of Hungary), was shot to death in battle, this Ladislus was made king by common consent and by the absolute will of the nobility and the landed lords. He undertook to fight against the Turks. Not long thereafter he proceeded to Prague with a large and magnificent retinue, and there, with great honor and dignity, received the crown of the Bohemian kingdom. He remained there for some time, but never entered the heretical churches. He went to Breslau before returning to Austria. Thereafter the Count of Cilli was slain in the royal palace by Ladislaus, the son of Hunyadi. News thereof was received by King Ladislaus with great sorrow; and he went to Ofen (Buda-Pest) and ordered the sons of Hunyadi to be imprisoned, the slayer of Ladislaus to be beheaded, and Matthias apprehended and taken to Austria. In Austria it was decided to give the king a wife; and from among the noble and high born maidens Margaret, daughter of King Charles of France, was chosen to be his spouse; and a distinguished embassy was sent to her in France. Discord and dissension arose as to the place where the marriage should be celebrated. The Hungarians said Ofen (Buda-Pest); the Austrians, Vienna; the Bohemians, Prague, each preferring a different place as the proper one for such festive pomp; but through the management of George Podiebrad, the city of Prague was chosen. Having put affairs in order in Austria, the king, with a large retinue, proceeded to Bohemia. From hence two embassies were sent forth: One to Emperor Frederick on the subject of peace, the other to King Charles of France, consisting of 800 horse and golden wagons loaded with women and maidens to accompany the bride. To this wedding were invited the emperor and empress, the two sisters of the king and all German princes. But the enterprise was interrupted, by the sudden death of the king; for he succumbed to an illness whereof the physician despaired. He had a long secret conference with George Podiebrad, after which he was given the Sacrament. And when he felt death approaching he took a consecrated candle in his hand and began to recite the Lord's Prayer. When he had spoken the words 'deliver us from evil,' he passed away at the age of 18 years. Some say he died of an illness, others that he was poisoned. O, honor, dignity, and power of this world, how vain, fleeting, uncertain, unstable, and impotent you are!

Various monsters appeared in the month of February, 1456; for instance, a double-headed calf in Sabina. In Rome it is said to have rained blood, and in Liguria flesh. And a child was born with large face and six teeth.

A comet is said to have appeared in the month of June, and a year later another appeared; and the people were greatly distressed thereby.

Mohammed, the Turkish sultan, was dispersed and driven into flight at Weissenburg, at the confluence of the Save and the Danube, by a small number of Crusaders. This occurred on St. Sixtus Day, while John Capistrano was present. Therefore Pope Calixtus fixed upon that day as the day of the transfiguration of the Lord.

In A.D. 1456, earthquakes occurred on the 15th day of December, at the eleventh hour of the night, and again on the 30th day of the same month at the sixteenth hour, particularly at Apuleia, Naples, and Benevento, and in other cities. The like of these is not within the memory of man, nor to be found in history. Many churches and buildings, as well as the palace at Naples, were destroyed, and many people and animals were killed.

Pius II, previously called Aeneas Piccolomini, an Italian of Siena, surnamed Silvius after his father, was elected pope in this year, on the 20th day of the month of August, at a general election held by all the cardinals. He was a man worthy of every praise, a good speaker, and of exceptional intelligence and worldly prudence. He was not given to idleness, and was called upon to handle important affairs. He first learned grammar, later the art of poetry, and then the art of oratory. These he grasped with such ingenuity that in a short time he wrote many elegant Latin poems. Finally he devoted himself to the study of imperial civil law. He went to Basle, firstly with Dominico Capranica, subsequently with Bartholomew, the Novarian bishop, and afterward with Nicholas, the cardinal of Saint Croix, and was always held in esteem by everyone. He was a secretary in the same council, and prepared the papal letters. In the council he made many speeches, and was often employed as an emissary on the business of the council. Finally he was sent to Frederick, the Roman king, by Pope Felix; and he transacted the business delegated to him with such ingenuity that the king laureated him with the crown of a poet, created him a protonotary, and thereafter adopted him as a councillor, following his advice in serious and trying transactions. After the election of Pope Nicholas and the death of the bishop of Trieste, Aeneas, without his knowledge, was appointed to the bishopric by the pope and the Roman king. Later Pope Calixtus made him a cardinal, and when Calixtus died, he was elected pope. After receiving the papal tiara he devoted himself entirely to the care of Christendom. He excommunicated Duke Sigismund of Austria because of his proceedings against a cardinal. He deposed the archbishops of Mainz and Benevento. Unmoved by fear or avarice he conferred no benefits on kings or other people. He enrolled Catherine of Siena in the number of the saints. He rejected certain measures undertaken in France, and opened several mines at Tolpha. He brought about a truce between King Ferdinand and Sigismund Malatesta in order to facilitate access to Mantua, where he had ordered a general council of the Christians to be held. In mid-winter this pope left Rome and came to Mantua. And there in the assembly of many princes and delegates, a crusade against the Turks was ordered by common consent. This pope erected many beautiful and renowned buildings, not only at Rome, but also at Siena. He was a person of moderate life, and wasted no time. He was short in stature, gray before his time, of earnest countenance, but moderated by ease, and strong in body. He was wearied by long journeys and constant work, and often pained by coughing, the stone, and the gout. He made twelve cardinals during his pontificate. He finally died of a fever at Ancona, in the sixth year of his pontificate. His remains were taken to Rome, and buried in St. Peter's Church.

Paul II, a Venetian, previously called Pietro Barbo, nephew of Pope Eugenius, and a cardinal of St. Mark, was elected pope in this year, on the last day of the month of August. He was a great, lordly and dauntless man. While still young he decided to join the merchant class then held in esteem at Venice. But when he learned that his mother's brother, Gabriel, was elected pope, and called Eugenius, he went away at the suggestion of his brother Paul Barbo, and being now more grown up, he devoted himself to the study of the Scriptures. Thereafter, Eugenius, his mother's brother, advanced him from one position to another, until he finally became a cardinal. He was by nature a kind and wholesome man, and succeeded Pius when he died. He was so addicted to gathering up money that he always exacted a payment for the benefices which he conferred. But such moneys he at times expended generously, for he loved to help the poor cardinals, bishops, needy nobility, spinsters, widows, and the sick. He also arranged that the grain and other necessities of life were obtainable at Rome at a cheaper price than theretofore. At Rome he erected many magnificent and noble buildings, and was regarded as a just, gentle, proud and serious man. He reinstated the regular canons who had been driven out of St. John Lateran. When this pope Paul became aware of King George's faithlessness, he incited the Germans and Hungarians against him. This Paul outdid his predecessors in papal customs and pomp, and for use in his papal tiara, he accumulated many precious stones and pearls. During his term as pontiff he made ten cardinals. Although he thought to live for a long time, he died of a stroke in the month of July A.D. 1471, in the second hour of the night after having joyfully eaten his evening meal in a happy gathering, in the seventh year of his pontificate. He found great pleasure in eating melons, crabs, filled cakes, and fish, and this (it is said) caused the stroke. The day before the night on which he died, he had eaten two large melons. On the following day his remains were buried at an early hour at St. Peter's minster; and the pontifical chair rested for nine days.

Antoninus, archbishop of Florence, a Dominican father, erstwhile a judge in legal matters and transactions at Rome, of a pious life and good morals, and highly learned in the Holy Scriptures, was at this time held in great esteem and renown by the Italians because of his scriptural wisdom. He left to posterity numerous large books, produced with great labor, and containing lengthy commentaries. Among these is an elegant and excellent summa, touching matters of conscience, and of great service to the priests, and necessary to them. He also compiled many historical works for the instruction of mortals. He finally died in the month of May A.D. 1459, not without the great blessings of piety, and illustrious for many miracles. His remains were carried with great honors from the bishop's residence in St. Mark's cloister.

Borso, marquis and first duke of Ferrara, brother of Lionello, the marquis, and son of Nicholas d'Este, took over the marquisate of Ferrara upon the death of his brother Lionello; and he governed for twenty-two years. He was an ingenious man, but not crafty or deceitful. His words were pregnant with wisdom, his actions brave and lordly. When Emperor Frederick came to him and observed his magnificence and magnanimity, he made him (as heretofore stated) a duke of the cities of Modena and Reggio; to which dignity he was confirmed by Pope Paul after a number of years. But as his father Nicholas had born this Borso and other sons by concubines, and had now become aged, he begot two other sons by a lawful wife, namely, Ercole and Sigismund; and to them he left the inheritance, under the guardianship of Lionello, his brother, who sent them to Naples and took over the government. Lionello had but one son, named Nicholas, shortly after whose birth Lionello died; and as Nicholas was then incompetent to rule, the sovereignty passed to Borso on condition that upon his death the sovereignty descend to Nicholas. When Borso entered upon the sovereignty he recalled Ercole and Sigismund; and he loved them and Nicholas as his own sons. Borso was highly learned in sacred and profane literature, and was fond of learned men. He built a widely celebrated Carthusian monastery, and died in the twenty-second year of his rule.

Ferdinand II, son of King Alphonso, by a concubine, at this time secured the kingdom of Naples by inheritance under the will and testament of his father. But since King Alphonso died without lawful heirs of his body, and the kingdom was regarded as having escheated to the Roman See as a fief, Pope Calixtus undertook to recover it by force of arms; but in the course of these events he died; and thereafter Ferdinand secured confirmation from Pope Pius, contrary to the wishes of the French. After having secured the kingdom by peaceable means, he defeated many enemies in war, and with the assistance and cooperation of Pope John, he drove the son of the duke of Anjou, named Renatus (Rene), out of Apuleia. After the death of Pope Pius he was at enmity with Pope Paul and his successors, and fought against the Venetians at the instance of the Cyprians. It is said that he incited the Turks against the Venetians; but thereafter the Venetians made peace with the Turks, and with an army proceeded against Ferdinand, taking from him the Italian maritime city of Hydruntum (Otranto).

In A.D. 1446, discord arose between the Teutonic Brothers and Ladislaus, the king of Poland, concerning boundaries and extent of the kingdom; and both sides became involved in war, employing great and mighty armies. The Prussians (contented in the great number of their warriors, or moved by their combative spirit) first sent a herald to the king with two swords, one for peace, the other for war, so that he might choose either. The king chose the sword of war, caused it to be blessed, and girded it on for battle. And when the parties went to war, the king first sent on ahead into battle his allies, the Lithuanians. And when the Prussians were weary from battle with the Lithuanians, the Poles pressed on after them, inflicting a heavy and bloody defeat on the Prussians; and on the same day about 400 brethren of the Order, together with their grandmaster, on horse, were killed; and thousands of men were slain, and the rest taken prisoner. And thus Prussia, with the exception of Marienburg, passed into the hands of the Poles. And thereafter the cities of Danzig and Thorn were also taken from them by Casimir, the king of Poland, who claimed Prussia as a part of his kingdom.

Albert, margrave of Brandenburg, before this time waged a great war against the city of Nuremberg; and with a military force he stormed the little city of Greifenburg, which was protected by a wall and moat and lay about four miles from Nuremberg. After both aides had sustained heavy losses and damage, this war was finally silenced and ended through the diligence and daily efforts of Duke Ludwig of Bavaria. Several years later a war occurred between the same Duke Ludwig and the said Margrave Albert, both mighty princes. But after both sides had fought many battles with great bravery, peace was made through the efforts of the other princes of Germany.

Louis, son of King Charles of France, at this time secured the kingdom on the death of his father. Said King Charles was a kind man, but of a dull mind. After he had brought on a war against King Henry of England and Duke John of Burgundy, and had slain many men, he was finally defeated in a great and mighty battle; and many cities were taken from him. And if God, through a young maiden had not miraculously supported him, he would have lost his entire kingdom. Finally Nicholas, a cardinal of the Carthusian Order, made peace with the Duke of Burgundy; but later he caused him to be put to death by stealth; and this was the cause of the many evils that followed. Now when said Louis secured the kingdom and the sovereignty over it, he drove many of the supporters of his father out of the kingdom; and when he later attempted to lessen the privileges of the Church, he incurred the enmity of many popes. When the people wanted Duke Charles of Aquitaine and Normandy as a ruler, because of his wisdom, he was slain at the instigation of said King Louis; but when the nobility of the kingdom and the Duke of Burgundy learned of this, they renewed their old hatreds and enmity, formed an alliance, and overcame King Louis by force of arms. The Duke of Burgundy proceeded into Picardy, and captured and sacked the city of Poitiers. The king, deserted by his people, fled to Paris. Later the pope pacified the affair through Bessarion, the cardinal of Nice, King Louis died at Rheims in A.D. 1484, leaving his 15 year old son, who still lives, as his successor in the kingdom.

George podiebrad, a Bohemian, after the death of Ladislaus, king of Hungary and Bohemia, caused himself to be advanced at an assembly of the nobles and landed lords to which they had been summoned; for his regency over the government did not end with the death of the king. Those of Prague at once submitted to his rule, and he was proclaimed king; for he was skilled both at home and in the field, and in the management of his affairs he lacked neither age nor judgment. Although he professed to be a good Christian, and had extended the hand of friendship to two bishops, and had taken an oath on the holy Gospels that upon his coronation he would be faithful and obedient to the holy Roman Church, and was thereupon confirmed by the Emperor Frederick, yet he was contrary and faithless in all these matters, and protected and fostered the Bohemian heresy. And therefore he and the entire Bohemian kingdom were cursed, excommunicated and interdicted by Popes Pius and Paul. He died A.D. 1471.

Mohammed, the Turkish Sultan, after driving out the Greek Emperor, Thomas Paleologus and his brother in 1460, captured Peloponnesus; and after imprisoning and slaying the king of Trebizond, he took Pontus, and later Mytilene. The Venetians besieged Corinth but the Turks came on with their forces and compelled the Christians to take to their ships. Finally the duke of Venice prepared for war with an excellent fleet and as he approached Ancona, and was seen from a distance by Pope Pius, who was still spiritually present in the heights, the pope passed away in glory.

Emperor Frederick used no wine except at mealtime. For his supper he drank the lightest of wines, mixed with water. The physicians advised Lenore, the empress, who had never used wine in her homeland, to drink it in Germany (where the climate is cold) if she would be fertile. But when this became known to the emperor, he summoned Aeneas Sylvius and said to him, Go and tell the empress that I would rather have a barren spouse than a guzzling one. If she loves me she will hate wine. And when the queen became aware of this matter, she said, Although I am as pleased to obey the commands of my husband as I am glad to live, yet if the king offered me wine to drink, I would rather die than appear obedient.

Matthias Janos Hunyadi, son of the governor of the kingdom of Hungary, by the consent of the nobility, the landed lords and those high in office, acquired the kingdom upon the death of King Ladislaus without heirs. His father had governed the kingdom with a rod of iron, and was considered no less than a king. He died not long after he had defeated the Turks at Weissenburg. But when (as already stated) the Count of Cilli was slain by Ladislaus, eldest son of said Janos Hunyadi, King Ladislaus ordered the same Ladislaus to be beheaded and Matthias to be taken to Austria as a prisoner, and from thence to Bohemia. Matthias came to Prague on the day the king died, and George Podiebrad, the Bohemian governor, took him under his care and protection. Not long thereafter, at the age of 18 years, he was chosen king. Having furnished substantial sureties and pledges he was released from prison, and conducted the affairs of the Hungarian kingdom. But later on the Roman emperor insisted that the same kingdom belonged to him; whereupon dissension and war took place between them. Yet the kingdom remained that of Matthias. He was an earnest, diligent, and sturdy defender of the Christian faith against the Turks, and withstood them in many great battles, took much away from them, and damaged and destroyed their land and regions by fire and sword, plunder and slaughter. He also made war in Bohemia against Casimir of Poland, but finally made peace with him, by which Pannonia, Hungary, Moravia and Silesia fell to Matthias and the kingdom of Bohemia remained with Ladislaus, the son of Casimir. When Matthias noted that Emperor Frederick was antagonistic toward him, he made peace with the Turks and opposed the emperor, from whom he took the city of Vienna. And there he died in the year 1490. He was taken to Stuhlweissenburg and buried there. His wife was the daughter of Ferdinand, the king of Naples.

Nicholas of Cusa, a German, called Petei ad vincula, was a distinguished and highly learned cardinal, and in high esteem and renown at this time. He was so good a man that few better ones were born in his time. He was a fervent enemy of all the vices, an antagonist of all forms of vainglory and worldly pomp, whole-souled and steadfast, conscientious in his labors and efforts, undismayed even unto old age, and illustrious for his goodness and gratitude. His scriptural wisdom was so abundant, that when any subject unexpectedly came up for discussion, he was able to speak thereon so ably, fully, and sufficiently as if he had made a special study thereof. He was a versatile man, a finished Latin scholar, and fully versed in all history, not only modern and contemporary, but in ancient history as well. His memory was always fresh, and he was highly informed in the liberal and other arts. He was also well educated in the papal and imperial laws, a keen interpreter of the Holy Scriptures, and wrote and left many distinguished and commendable books and manuscripts. Because he diligently protected his church at Brixen, Duke Sigismund of Austria kept him in prison. On that account the duke incurred the ill will of Pope Pius, who subjected the duke to severe spiritual penances. Finally Nicholas was liberated and the affair pacified. When Pope Pius passed out of this world at Ancona, said Nicholas, the cardinal, died at Rome.

Bessarion, cardinal and Sabiniari bishop, as well as a patriarch of Constantinople, was at this time so highly esteemed by Pope Paul and the people for his foresight, worldly wisdom, experience, ingenuity and reliability, that no matters of importance were transacted or concluded except in the presence and by the advice of this highly renowned man. He was enlightened in Scriptural knowledge, and it is believed that no one in his time read as much. Although burdened with matters and affairs touching the Christian weal, through his diligence of mind he also fostered the teachings of Plato the natural philosopher. When sent on an embassy to make peace in France, he died on the way.

The art of printing was first invented in A.D. 1440 in the city of Mainz, situated on the Rhine, in Germany, from whence it spread into all parts of the world. Through this art the precious literature and wisdom contained in the books of the ancients, long unknown to the world and buried in the sepulchre of ignorance, were again brought forth into the light. And thus many books, useful and necessary to mankind, and available at no small expense, became procurable in time for little money. If this art had been discovered and employed sooner, undoubtedly many books of Titus Livius, Tullius, Pliny, and other highly learned men, would not have been lost in the turbulence of the times. And as the inventors who from time to time made discoveries in the applied arts are entitled to no small amount of credit, who can say with what measure of praise, honor and renown are to be esteemed those Germans who, through their brilliant and ingenious skill, thought out and discovered the art of printing, by which the long closed fountain of untold wisdom of sacred and profane art was caused to again flow forth to all mankind?

Nicholaus Perotus of Sassoferrato, bishop of Siponto, a distinguished teacher of the Holy Scriptures, and a skilled orator, flourished at this time. He compiled a number of commendable things concerning the Holy Scriptures and wrote a book for the proper instruction and rearing of children. He also wrote a number of manuscripts, and made translations from the Greek into Latin.

Robert of Lycia, of the Franciscan Order, bishop of Aquileia, highly learned in the Holy Scriptures, well versed in ecclesiastical learning, a doctor, and a teacher of all preachers, was held in great honor and esteem at this time by all the Italians for his brilliant and marvelous learning and preaching. He left many elegant sermons and teachings for the instruction of the faithful.

Matheolus Perusinus, a highly learned doctor, flourished at this time as a prince among physicians and natural philosophers and those learned in the liberal and other arts. He was a whole-souled, virtuous, intelligent, and highly informed man, worldly wise, truthful, and versed in the arts of poetry and eloquence. He was also experienced in astronomy, geometry, arithmetic, and music; and not content with all these, he assiduously studied the Holy Scriptures. Through his literary wisdom and ingenuity he influenced his scholars to diligence, attentiveness, and a kindly feeling toward their studies. He was gifted with keen senses, versatility in the arts, and ability of expression, and withal, was a praiseworthy man. To this testifies Doctor Hartmann Schedel, man highly learned in medicine, and a citizen of Nuremberg, who for three years regularly heard him lecture on the art of medicine at the University of Padua, thus receiving the benefit of his good instruction, Matheolus died of old age, and was buried at Padua.

Battista, surnamed Platina, a composer of papal letters, a magnanimous and able man, and not the least among his contemporaries as a writer and orator, was held in honor and esteem during this time. On various charges Pope Paul deprived him of all his possessions and dignities, and lodged him in prison. There he remained until the death of Pope Paul, whose successor, Pope Sixtus, liberated him after he had suffered many hardships, and restored him to his former status as a man of scriptural wisdom and experience. He wrote and left behind many excellent works. He died of the plague, at Rome, in A.D. 1481.

Dominicus Calderinus of Verona, an eloquent orator, versed in no small measure in the Greek and Latin tongues, and distinguished for his skill in poetry, wrote many excellent manuscripts that attest his ingenuity and art, and which are well known to the learned. He died in A.D. 1477.

Marius Philelphus, son of Franciscus Philelphides, orator and knight, was a laureated poet and a doctor of philosophy and the liberal arts, and was famed and renowned throughout Italy at this time. He composed and left many beautiful poems in metric and free verse; and because of his art he was in the regular pay of Frederick, Margrave of Mantua. He died in A.D. 1480.

Liege, the renowned and mighty city, was taken by Duke Charles of Burgundy in a great battle, involving much bloodshed, in the year A.D. 1468. For a long time discord and misunderstanding had existed between the Duke and those of Liege. Then the bishop of Liege undertook to arbitrate and allay this discord he was driven out of the city by the burghers. Thereupon the pope sent the Bishop of Tricariensis there as a legate; but he was imprisoned. Whereupon the duke became so angry that he stormed and devastated the city in the presence of King Louis of France.

Mathias, the illustrious king of Hungary, at this time attacked the kingdom of Bosnia, and through surrender he acquired the castle of Jaytza that was naturally well fortified by reason of its location, and was well protected with high embattlements. Before this castle he put to flight the Turkish sultan Mohammed, who, in a disgraceful retreat, left behind all his munitions and implements of war. Sometime thereafter, in the winter, King Mathias besieged the Turkish fortress of Sabatz that was protected with wood and earth works, surrounded with towers and moats (as the following illustration shows), and manned with many people. It was surrounded with wooden hedges and sharp posts, and the walls were built of wood. While the king was industriously engaged about the fortress, the Turks captured Count John of Witibitz before the king's camp; and taking him into the fortress of Sabatz, beheaded him, and hung his head, with his long yellow hair, on a pole over the castle, to terrify the besiegers. Thereupon the king, in anger, directed his forces against the castle, capturing it with great honor to himself. In the passing year, 1492, the Turks again attacked the fortress, but they were driven back by the Hungarians, and marched home.

Sixtus IV of Liguria, a native of the city of Savona, and previously called Franciscus, a general of the Barefoot Order, was, after the death of Pope Paul, chosen pontiff by the cardinals on the 9th day of August in this year. From childhood his parents consecrated him to the service of God, and he entered upon it with the brothers of the Franciscan Order. When he had grown up he went to Padua; and there he remained almost twenty years, reading, studying, and writing, becoming illustrious throughout the world for his wisdom. He wrote a book on the power and majesty of God, one about the blood of Christ, another on the conception of the Virgin Mary, and others. In the Franciscan Order he passed through all the offices, and he became a cardinal. Before and during his pontificate he was a mild man, of moderate retired life, and generous and helpful to the poor, but most of all to the clergy, to whom he extended privileges. He was kind to his friends and servants; lenient toward the guilty who deserved punishment. He assisted with funds and lent a hand to the poor princes and noblemen, particularly the sons of the emperor of Constantinople, and the queen of Posen, who had been dispersed by the Turks. By incredible goodness he also protected the Knights of Rhodes, and Ferdinand, who had been attacked by the Turks. He also improved the city of Rome which had fallen into decay; built a bridge across the Tiber at great cost, and extended countless benefits to the city of Rome. During his pontificate he did nothing culpable, except, that as usually happens, he loved his own too much—an error into which many of his predecessors had fallen. In the fourth year of his pontificate he celebrated the Jubilee, or Year of Grace, instituted by Paul, his predecessor. He enrolled the blessed Bona Ventura in the number of holy confessors. And although he had detractors and columniators, he was a very pious pope and a diligent shepherd and pastor, an enemy of avarice, a moderator of anger, and an extirpator of evil. During his pontificate he made twenty cardinals. He finally died in the thirteenth year of his pontificate.

Innocent VIII, a Genoese, of middle class but honorable family, previously called Giovanni Battista, a cardinal, was elected pope on the 13th day of the month of August in this year. His parents were of noble family and bore a good reputation in the conduct of their affairs. They came from Genoa by the sea—a city that outshines all other Italian cities in elegance, in the beauty and size of its buildings, and in the abundance of all those things which arrive there by land and sea. And as Innocent distinguished himself among all the cardinals for his humility, ingenuity, virtue, resignation and ability, he was chosen from among the rest as a pope. He was a man of prudence and worldly experience, and at Siena and Rome performed the duties of his office of legate so wisely that the cardinals placed great faith in him. The inception of his pontificate was fraught with wars with the citizenry; for what he was able to attain from princes and communities, he was unable to obtain from his own people. When emissaries were sent to him in Germany and Italy, he diligently urged peace, asking all mankind to lay down their arms and end the wars. But not long thereafter some evil-disposed person took it upon himself to hinder and defeat the pope in his good intentions, and to bring about his illness; and soon he incited discord between the Orsini and the Columna, the two noble and mighty Roman families. This greatly distressed the pope; yet he did not attempt to allay contention by threats or force of arms. Although Innocent set himself many tasks involving his papal office, the common good of Christendom, and the needs of the Church, he was not able to accomplish these things for lack of time, and because of his illness and the prevalence of wars. Yet he showed himself beneficent toward his friends, and thankful toward God. When he recovered his health, he endowed the Church of Santa Maria del Popolo. He enrolled in the number of holy confessors the name of Duke Leopold of Austria, for the many miracles to his credit. He adorned the city of Rome with buildings and with paintings valued at 45,000 ducats. In 1490 he held a diet, attended by emissaries of the Christian kings, princes and cities, to take action against the Turks. Through the help of Raymundus Peraudus, the archdeacon, he raised a large sum of money by the sale of indulgences, which extended not only to the living, but also to the dead. Finally he turned his attention to the welfare of his subjects and to the protection of the church and its dignities. He was a promoter of righteousness, a zealous lover of peace, and an industrious administrator of surplus produce; a generous patron of learned and pious men, merciful to the poor, a comforter of the distressed, kind to the princes, and devoted to God and his saints. Finally he died in A.D. 1492, in the eighth year of his pontificate.

Emperor Frederick, in mid-winter A.D. 1469, for devotional reasons made a journey to Rome, where he was magnificently received by the pope. On the bridge across the Tiber he made 122 knights. Later on, when the town of Trieste became antagonistic toward him, he ravaged it through the dukes.

Mohammed, the Turkish sultan, invaded Euboea with a great and mighty fleet and 100,000 horse; and he stormed the city of Chalcis for thirty days, and destroyed it; but he lost many of his men. The Venetians also sent a large fleet against the Turks.

A great comet appeared in the month of January 1472. It was flame-colored and had a black tail. It proceeded westward but veered to the north. It was seen for eighty days, and before it vanished, another comet with a fiery tail appeared, proceeding eastward. Then followed an unprecedented drought; and later the plague broke out in a number of places, and there arose many dissensions, revolts and cruel wars.

Christian (Christiernus), king of Denmark, Norway and Sweden, duke of Holsatz Stormar in Oldenburg, and count of Delmenhorst, a very Christian man, and endowed with many virtues, in A.D. 1474, in fulfillment of a vow proceeded to Rome through Lombardy and Tuscany, and was received with great honor and decorum by all the princes, lords, and the rulers of the cities. At Rome a dignified delegation of cardinals came to meet him. Later he was received very honorably by Pope Sixtus IV, who gave him a golden rose that according to custom the pope annually bestowed upon some Christian prince on Sunday in mid-Lent. The king began to treat of a general peace to be observed by Christian princes, and urged a general crusade against the Turks. However, finding that nothing could be accomplished, he returned homeward through the Italian cities. He lived a number of years, leading a good and virtuous life, an image of piety to the end. His spouse was the illustrious Dorothea, born margravine of Brandenburg, who still lives.

Charles, duke of Burgundy, besieged the city of Neuss, situated on the Rhine below Cologne. But when Emperor Frederick with the entire forces of the Roman empire came to the aid of the city, the duke made peace and withdrew his army.

The Jubilee or Year of Grace, Instituted by Pope Paul, was celebrated by Pope Sixtus in 1475. King Ferdinand came to Rome at this time, and with the consent of the pope negotiated a treaty between the Italian princes and the cities, to which the emperor was the first signatory.

Ercole (Hercules) d'Este, son of the Marquis Niccolo, and brother of Borso, second duke of Ferrara, who succeeded his father in the government, not without great opposition ruled up to the present. He was a good and intelligent man, and experienced in military affairs. He espoused the kind hearted woman Eleanora, daughter of King Ferdinand; and by her he begot four sons and two daughters. At the instigation and pursuant to the advice of his brother-in-law, he was influenced to turn away from the Venetians and to ally himself with his brother-in-law and other relatives, thereby jeopardizing the alliance and privileges of the Venetians. Thereupon the latter made war against him by land and sea, depriving him of much of his dominions. Fortunately, however, Alphonso, duke of Calabria, son of King Ferdinand, and a very good warrior, came to his assistance with an army while the pope supported him with the ban. After the restoration of peace Ercole improved the city of Ferrara with beautiful buildings.

Simon, the blessed child of Trent, was murdered by the Jews on the 21st day of March, A.D. 1475, during the week of the holy martyrs, and became a martyr to Christ. When the Jews residing in this city were about to celebrate Easter (the Passover) according to their customs, but lacked Christian blood with which to prepare their unleavened bread, they took this child, which they had stolen, to the house of Samuel the Jew, in this manner: On the third day before Easter, at the time of vespers, this child, in the absence of its parents, sat before the door of its father's house. Tobias, a Jewish traitor, betook himself to the child, which was only 30 months old. He talked to the child in endearing terms, and soon carried it off to the house of Samuel. At nightfall Samuel, Tobias, Vital, Moses, Israel and Meyer, before the synagogue, were elated about the spilling of Christian blood. And now they bared the child, and placed a pacifier about its neck so that it might not be heard crying; and they extended its arms. To begin with they cut off its genitals, and then cut a piece out of its right cheek. They stabbed it all over with sharp pointed pins, while one held the child's hands and another its feet. And now having gruesomely collected the blood, they began to sing a hymn of praise, and to speak to the child in sweet and in threatening words. Behold, you Jesus, who were hanged—thus our forefathers once did to you; and thus all Christians, in heaven and on earth and sea shall be mutilated. At that moment the innocent little martyr passed away. The Jews hurried to their evening meal, and ate of unleavened bread made with the blood, in scorn of Christ our Saviour. They threw the corpse into the river flowing by their house, and celebrated their Passover with joy. The distressed parents sought their child, and three days later they found it in the river. When this became known to John of Salis, noble burgher of Brixen, doctor of the imperial law and then the highest governor, he ordered the Jews to be seized and tortured; and they stated how they committed the deed. Whereupon they were extirpated by deserving punishment. And when the body was buried by order of John Hinderbach, the bishop there, the body soon began to manifest miracles; and people flocked to the grave of this holy child from all Christian regions; and thereby the city was prospered and increased in no small measure. The burghers there erected a beautiful church to the child.

A like crime was committed by the Jews five years later in the village of Mota, situated in Forli, where they murdered a child. Wherefore three of the evil-doers were brought to Venice as prisoners, and, after cruel tortures, were burned.

The Turks invaded lower Moesia, but were defeated in a great battle. Thereafter the Genoese captured the great city of Capua, which was still in the possession of the Turks; but because of treachery and surrender on the part of a Genoese citizen, the city again passed into the power of the Turks.

An abnormal girl was born at this time in the vicinity of Verona. Although the child had but one head, it had two posteriors and two organs of generation; also four arms, of which two were large and useful, and the other two small and useless. Also two abdomens in the region of the stomach. The parents led the child about in Italy, begging money of those who would see it.

The Padus (Po) and Tiber, and other rivers of Italy were so swollen by rains in the month of November that they overflowed, doing much damage to those inhabiting their banks. Then the waters receded they carried with them many dead animals which became putrefied and polluted the air, causing a great plague.

On the death of King Henry in Spain the dominions were divided between Ferdinand, son of John the king of Aragon (who had espoused Elizabeth, sister of Henry), and Alphonso, king of Portugal, who then acted as guardian for said Henry and his sister's daughter. In the following year King Ferdinand of Spain gave battle to the king of Portugal, compelling him to flee from the field at Numantia.

Johannes Königsberger (Regiomontanus), a German, not inferior to Anaximander of Miletus, or the Syracusan Archimedes, highly informed, and experienced in the Greek and Latin tongues, and an ornament and a credit to the Germans, was at this time engaged by Matthias, the Hungarian king, and by those of Nuremberg, because of his superior skill in astronomy and other scriptural knowledge. He was held in great honor and esteem in Germany, Hungary and Rome. As a result of his commendable and brilliant ingenuity and enlightened understanding, he made an excellent calendar, and wrote sundry other things pertaining to astronomy. He also introduced a number of new tables, and perfected the theories of Gerard of Cremona. Finally Pope Sixtus called him from Nuremberg to Rome to reform certain matters pertaining to astronomy. There he died, leaving certain tables that were published and are still available.

Niccolo d'Este, who fought against Ercole for the control of Ferrara, was driven out of the city, imprisoned, and finally slain.

In A.D. 1476, in the village of Nicholas Hausen, in the noble land of Franconia, a herdsman and disturber took it upon himself to preach against the papacy and the clergy, stating that their life was shameful, and that the people should pay them neither tithes nor tolls, and that the rivers and forests were free to every man. He also made other unseemly statements, and claimed that the Virgin Mary had revealed all these things to him. In consequence he attracted a great concourse of people who came there to hear this disturber, who preached long sermons against the clergy on the holidays. Rudolph, bishop of Würtemberg, sent several spies to Nicholashausen, who took him to Würtzburg and burned him. And thus these pilgrimages were put to a stop. When the movement was revived the authorities of Nuremberg, under severe penalties, compelled their people to discontinue these pilgrimages to Nicholashausen. This action on the part of the authorities met with particular favor at the hands of Pope Sixtus according to a papal letter sent to them on the subject.

Galeazzo Maria, duke of Milan, was stabbed to death without warning on the day of St. Stephen, the first martyr, in A.D. 1477, at the high altar of St. Stephen's Church at Milan, by the Milanese nobleman, Giovanni Andrea Lamprogniano. Galeazzo Maria was chosen duke to succeed Francesco Sforza, and he ruled for 9 years and 10 months. He was a quick witted and proud prince; erected many buildings in the city of Milan and paved its streets with cut stone. He replenished his father's empty treasury with riches, and with exceptional zeal and industry and at great expense engaged the best singers for divine services. But after he began to indulge an unbridled desire for women, without regard for his nobility, dignity, majesty and high princely office, he was stabbed to death, pursuant to a sworn pact, at the age of thirty-three, in the presence of all the people and his retainers; and so he died in disgrace and was buried with his ancestors. By his wife Bona, duchess of Savoy, he left two sons and a daughter. Giovanni Maria, his son, was made duke at the age of nine years on the holy day of the three kings.

Charles, duke of Burgundy, son of Duke Philip the Good, and last of the illustrious and royal French line, was a powerful, earnest, proud and forbidding looking man; yet he was just and kind, devoted to the giving of alms and to divine service. Then he reached the age of twenty years, and those of Ghent had exacted charter of liberties from his father, he collected an army against them, captured the city, and ordered the charter burned in the market-place. Thereafter he became involved in animosities with King Louis of France. After these were pacified he proceeded against those of Liege with a military force, captured and subdued it, and after much slaughter and plundering, razed it to the ground. He then mustered another army in support of the English king Edward, his brother-in-law, who had been driven out of Britain by Count Doverich and King Henry of Portugal, and began a war against them and King Having succeeded in restoring Edward to his native country, he next directed his forces against King Louis, subjecting him to much damage and mischief. After this matter was ended by a peace, he proceeded with a great force against the city of Neuss on the Rhine. But when Emperor Frederik came to the city's rescue, Charles withdrew homeward. Having subjugated many cities and lands in great battles, Charles proceeded against the city of Nancy in Lorraine, intending to make war against the Swiss; but the Swiss fell upon his army with such vigor that Charles retreated, and was slain and lost in the flight. He left an only daughter, who became his heir. She was espoused to Maximilian, son of Emperor Frederick and now Roman emperor. To this Charles three cities were dangerous—Granson, to his estate; Morat, to his army; and Nancy, to his person.

Ferdinand, king of Naples, in 1473, undertook to disturb the peace of Italy. He sent Count Jerome, the uncle of Pope Sixtus, and Cardinal Raphael, nephew of the same count, and Francesco Silvatus, the archbishop of Pisa, accompanied by 300 men, to Florence. Together with their partisans they caused a revolt, wherein Giuliano de Medici was stabbed to death, and Lorenzo de Medici was severely wounded. But to some extent the revolt was wisely silenced. Thereafter many of the instigators were slain, and many others, including the archbishop of Pisa, were hanged. In the meantime the Florentines detained Cardinal Raphael until the enterprise subsided.

and was abandoned.

Locusts, flying over Italy in the same year, devastated the country about Brescia; and if Marquis Louis of Mantua had not interfered, they would have eaten up all the regions of Lombardy.

A great and gruesome plague prevailed throughout Italy in this year. At Brescia 20,000 persons succumbed to it; at Venice 30,000. This was caused by the locusts and by an eclipse of the sun, that occurred in July of the same year.

The venetians were oppressed by the great Ottoman invasion of Etruria, Macedonia and Forli. Being unable to move the pope, and having been harassed for 27 years by the long and daily wars of the Turks in Greece, Macedonia and Forli, they entered into a treaty with the Mohammedan sultan, restoring what had formerly belonged to him, and obligating themselves to pay him the sum of 100,000 florins for two years.

Although the Rhodians suffered no small measure of distress at the hands of the Turks, they were subjected to still greater wars after the siege and capture of Constantinople. After the Turks, in a period of twenty-four years, had subjugated ever so many neighboring cities and lands, yet Mohammed was hurt in his pride because Rhodes, although near at hand, was still free and not subject to his rule; and accordingly, the Mohammedan Sultan appeared before Rhodes, whither he had sailed with a large and mighty army. On the 23rd day of the month of May, A.D. 1480 he made his camp on Mt. St. Stephen and thereabout; and for three months he attacked the city without cessation. But Peter Dabuson, the grand-master of Rhodes, wise and courageous man, gave proof of his firmness by fearless and manly resistance; in consequence whereof, and by divine aid, the Turks were dispersed by the Christian knights, driven off, defeated, and forced to flee in such confusion that they succumbed in the crush. It is said that the Turks saw an apparition, and became so alarmed that they took to flight; wherefore it is proper to affirm that this victory was given from heaven to the Christian knights, who with such small numbers were able to withstand the mighty enemy which had reached the very walls. And the Mohammedan Sultan, on the 89th day after the siege of the City of Rhodes had begun, sailed away with his fleet in disgrace and dishonor. Peter, the grand-master received funds and assistance from Pope Sixtus and other Christian persons in Europe, and was thus enabled to rehabilitate the invaded and devastated island.

At this time an aged old man, leading a retired and secluded life in a vast hermitage near Lucerne, in Switzerland, maintained himself for twenty years without bodily sustenance. They called him Brother Nicholas. His body was lean and exhausted, just skin, veins and bones. And although these hermits live an inactive life in the shade, and do not fully digest their food, thus causing damp, cold and raw accumulations in their bodies, which enables them to fast longer; yet this man throughout this long period of time led a spotless and heavenly existence. And although many accused Brother Nicholas of possessing an inordinate desire for fame, and interpreted his life as vainglorious, stating that therein he found his reward, yet they judge unjustly. Why do they speak ill of this man after he has spent such a long life in poverty and seclusion, and consumed so many years comforting those who sought him, and maintaining the utmost and strictest resignation and humility. He craved nothing and molested no one. Had he sought human praise for his great labors, such praise would have been but small reward for his pains. He is a fool, who for worldly renown afflicts his body. But this was a pious and righteous man. He repressed covetousness and scorned worldly honors; nor did he manifest a spark of pride. He fixed his hopes in future blessedness; and as a recompense for the strictness of his life awaited the immortal riches of heavenly treasures. His constant gladness of heart manifested the unwavering certainty of his hopes; for he was never sad, but always observed to be in a happy state of mind. He was innocent of mortal sin and devoted himself to good works and to contemplation; so that with St. Paul he might say, Our glory and renown are the testimony of our conscience. For me is laid up the crown of righteousness which shall be given me by the righteous judge when my time comes. This Nicholas was also protected by the bishop of Constance. Finally he died of old age, and a quiet sleep released his old soul. His remains were buried in his parish church, and there he rested, not without manifesting miracles. To the people there he prophesied a number of future events, and left to posterity proof of the great joy found in piety.

Hydruntum, a large maritime city in Apuleia, was besieged, attacked, and finally taken by the Turkish forces in this year of 1480. The archbishop there was slain and all the people beheaded. Francesco Lurgus, the duke there, was captured and sawed in twain. Over 12,000 persons were killed, and not over 22 escaped. Evil days would have fallen upon Apuleia had the Turkish sultan continued to live. When he died, Alphonso, the duke of Calabria, besieged the city; and when the Turks learned of the death of their sultan they surrendered to the duke and secured safe conduct.

Antonius Rosellus, a native of Etruria, highly versed in the canon and civil laws and in the fine arts, taught and lectured for many years on the common law at Padua with great renown. He died at this time and was buried in St. Anthony's church at Padua. Being a highly learned man, he wrote and left several books.

Marsilio Ficino of Florence, a man of extraordinary intelligence, well grounded in the Greek and Latin tongues, and versed in the arts, and now a prince among Platonic doctors, with great industry translated into Latin the 33 books of Plato (theretofore not easily understood in the Greek); and still not satisfied with these labors, he also interpreted the meaning and beauties of Plato by various arguments and elucidations. He also wrote many useful things.

Mohammed the Great, eighth Turkish sultan, born of Ottoman ancestry, and the son of Amurath, reigned in Asia and Greece for thirty-two years. He died in May A.D. 1471, at the age of fifty-eight years, not without suspicion of having been poisoned. His remains were taken to Constantinople and buried there. At the age of twenty-four years he had succeeded his father in the Asiatic Empire, aiming to excel him in all things. Following the inclination of his high spirit, he strengthened his father's empire in power and might. With a great military force he sailed from Asia through the Hellespont into Europe, besieging and capturing many Greek cities. Not far from the shores of the Bosphorus he built a castle. Thereafter, due to the infirmity of the Greek states and their failure to lend support, due to their own avarice, he took Constantinople. Having declared himself Greek emperor, he soon took possession of the entire Peloponnesus, subjugating and carrying off the entire Christian population. Later he also subjugated Achaea, Arcadia, and Cyprus, the greater part of Macedonia, as well as Bulgaria, Rascia and the Servia, followed by the city of Adrianople, which lies between the Save and the Danube. He also caused Wallachia to obey him. He overran and reduced Bosnia, took the noble Genoese island of Mytilene (Lesbos), devastated the very ancient cities of Sinope and Trebizond, carrying off their inhabitants, as well as their emperor, as prisoners, and ravaging the island of Euboea and its city of Chalcis. In Asia he subjugated 12 kingdoms, namely Pontus, Bithynia, Cappadocia, Paphlagonia, Cilicia, Pamphylia, Lycia, Lydia, Caria, Phrygia, and practically all of Hellespontus or Morea, and many other regions to whom may God be merciful.

Bajazet, first born of the aforesaid Turkish sultan, became sultan in A.D. 1481; and he still reigns, Zaliabus (Zizim?), his brother, caused much disturbance in Asia in order to secure the empire, and he took possession of Bursa, and there set himself up as a king. But Bajazet defeated him, and secured the empire of Asia, and drowned himself in carnality and drunkenness. But, when in the year 1492, he undertook to attack and devastate the kingdom of Hungary, he encountered much opposition, loss, and defeat. Zaliabus, his brother, up to this day is held in custody at Rome, in order that through him the rest of Europe might be relieved of the servitude to the infidels.

A great plague prevailed in Italy and Germany in the year 1483 and in the year 1484; in consequence whereof 4,000 persons died at Nuremberg in six months, while at Venice a number of senators and dukes died.

Frederick, the Roman king, held a great imperial diet at Nuremberg in the year 1487 to secure aid against his enemy, and in behalf of the Christian faith. Various matters were considered. Among other things the emperor awarded the crown to Conrad Celtis, a man highly informed, in literature. At this time also the war between Sigismund, the duke of Austria, and the Venetians was settled, while our gracious lord, the Roman king Maximilian, held a great assembly at Nuremberg in 1491.

Meles, king of the Moors, and of the Mohammedan faith, ruled the kingdom of Granada up to the present time. In this land are to be found gold, silver, grain, pasturage, and all things necessary to satisfy human needs. In that kingdom lies a city, also called Granada, which was besieged by Alphonso, the king of Portugal and Spain, and his spouse Elizabeth, and surrendered by the inhabitants with 10,000 horse and 1,000 foot in the year 1492.

In the royal city of Constantinople, on the 12th day of the month of July A.D. 1490, occurred a great and unprecedented storm; and when the fire of the three upper constellations (which is called the falling ray of fire) intermingled with the moisture and heat, and the accumulated moisture in the disturbed atmosphere became excessive, and the wind or vapor agitated the clouds, great thunder-claps were heard, followed by long fiery flashes of lightning. Although the unbelievers said that this proceeded from the planet Saturn (as erstwhile happened when the wealthy province of Tuscya was entirely burned by lightning emanating from the planet Mars), the Christians attributed it to divine providence and vengeance; for the thunder-clap, lightning and storm not only struck down a portion of the Column of Constantine, but also (as the trustworthy Venetians and other merchants said) burned about 800 houses and destroyed about 3,000 people in a single area, as appears by the following illustration.

Mention has already been made of many rare and unusual signs in the sky, and particularly concerning a stone, marked with a cross that fell from the sky in the time of Frederick II; and so in these times, on the 7th day of November A.D. 1492, at noon, in the time of Emperor Frederick III, a large triangular stone, weighing a hundred pounds and slightly smaller than a "saltzscheibe," shaped like the Greek letter "D", fell from the sky at Ensisheim, in Sundgau, as an omen of unusual things to come.

At this time much strife occurred between Maximilian, the Roman emperor, and the king of France, because of the duke of Brittany; but the situation was later pacified through the bishop of Eichstaedt and others.

Year of the World 6691 | Year of Christ 1492

Alexander VI, a Spaniard, a native of the city of Valencia, previously called Rodrigo Borgia, and a bishop of Portua (Porto or Oporto), was elected pope by common consent in this year upon the death of Innocent VIII. He was crowned with the papal tiara on August 26, in the church of St. John Lateran. He is a man of magnanimous disposition, and of great intelligence, prudence, and worldly wisdom. During his youth he studied at the University of Bologna, and so developed in reputation and renown for learning and general adaptability, that his mother's brother, Pope Calixtus III, made him a cardinal. Public recognition of his virtue and ingenuity is to be found in the fact that, although very young, he was admitted into the college of the most worthy and distinguished cardinals, and rose to the office of vice-chancellor. In view of his experience and knowledge of these matters he was fitly chosen above all others to control and pilot St. Peter's ship. Although a man of lordly countenance, he deserves first praise on account of his Spanish nationality; for, firstly, among all the countries of the whole world, Spain excels in the healthfulness of its moderate and agreeable climate, and in the special virtue of all things. It has produced men who have always ranked highest and have been the most renowned in physical qualifications, in ingenuity, and in all the virtues. Secondly, Valencia, his native city, excels all others in Spain in age, beauty of location, population, and commerce. Thirdly, he was born of illustrious family of the Borgia which truly distinguished his nation, his fatherland, and his race. He is the successor of Pope Calixtus, his uncle of blessed memory, in scriptural wisdom, acquaintance with the arts, and uprightness of life. He is a man of amiability, veracity, good counsel, and devotion to God, and is versed in all things incident to his high office and status. Blessed is he who is endowed with so many virtues and is elevated to such supremacy. We hope that he will prove beneficial and useful to the common Christian status, and will overcome the attacks of the raging torrents, surmount the high and perilous crags of the sea, and attain the stairs of heavenly glory. In short, we ask posterity to record the worthy future transactions and deeds of this pope. When he secured the see he undertook to augment his majesty with glory; and although he first encountered opposition, he undertook great things. God grant that he accomplish all things for the benefit and advancement of the common Christian status.

Although the foolish, miserable and comfortless people, the Jews, in time past, in many parts of Germany and elsewhere, and particularly at Breslau, Passau, Regensburg, etc, treated the most Holy Sacrament with scorn and contempt, and their misdeeds remained not unavenged, yet, on the 22nd day of October A.D. 1492, in the city of Sternberg, then under the dukes of the principality of Mecklenburg, Eleazar, a Jew, and his relatives, through a priest named Peter, secured the most Holy Sacrament of the Body of Christ, which was brought to them in the form of a large and a small host. And they stabbed the same until it bled and the white linen cloth was discolored. The Jews, frightened by the miracle, returned the host to Peter the priest. When the matter was reported to the two brothers, the illustrious dukes Balthasar and Mangen, and they inquired into it and saw the wounds caused by the stabs, they ordered the Jews seized and burned as scorers of our faith and of the divine majesty of Christ. Hence all doubts on the part of disbelievers should be removed, and no one should doubt that the first creatures, through the power of the divine will and in the presence of the highest majesty, may pass into the body of our Lord; for what may not be easy to him who readily formed a man out of a clump of earth in his own image? and to whom it is possible to recall man from the dead, to remove him from damnation, to remake him of the ashes, to raise him from earth to heaven, and to elevate his image into the company of his kingdom. To that place may we be assisted by our God, who lives and reigns in everlasting eternity. Amen.

Maximilian, archduke of Austria and duke of Burgundy, son of Emperor Frederick III, was elected Roman emperor at Frankfurt in A.D. 1486, by the electors, during the life of his father; and he reigned with him for seven years. He is a man endowed with every virtue, physically active, a skilled knight, and second to none in morals. He excels all other kings in amiability, kindness, gentleness and mildness—a king worthy of every honor, fortunate in war, strong of mind, unspotted by vice, magnanimous, and powerful in arms. In his younger days he went to Burgundy, where he espoused Mary, an illustrious maiden and daughter of Duke Charles. By this marriage he acquired the duchy of Burgundy over which he reigned in happiness and righteousness for some time, although King Louis of France deprived him of several districts that had belonged to his father. All Burgundy, Brabant, Limburg, Luxemburg, Gelderland, Flanders, Artois, Namur, Hainaut, Holland, Zeeland, Mecklen, Human (?), Salina (?), and Friesland rejoiced in the presence and in the future prospects of this praiseworthy prince Maximilian. While his wife still lived he reigned in peace and happiness; and by her he had a son, named Philip, and a daughter named Margaret. Not long thereafter she died by falling from a running horse. On the 20th day of January A.D. 1486 this most illustrious Maximilian went to Frankfurt with his father; and on the 16th day of February following, after divine service at St. Bartholomew's church, he was unanimously elected king by the electors of the Roman Empire according to the provisions of the Golden Bull. On April 10th, in the city of Aix-la-Chapelle, he was crowned with great pomp and solemnity with the crown of Charlemagne, brought there by a distinguished embassy from Nuremberg. In him are observed unprecedented skill and wisdom, mental activity, speedy performance, eagerness and zeal for justice, extraordinary discretion, great goodness and gentleness, praiseworthy living, and good morals. After the death of his wife he was not only opposed by the nobility which would not obey him, but was taken prisoner by those of Bruges, in Flanders, and held in honorable custody for some time; out of which circumstance countless evils befell those of Flanders after his liberation, and have not yet ceased. This all-victorious king Maximilian, the most Christian of all Christian princes, well considered how the Christians who were once the mightiest lords and possessors of the world, are now surrounded by the infidels and driven into a corner of the earth; and how such an empire, and so many noble cities and rich countries were plundered; namely, Judea, that noble and holy land in which the flowers of our faith first appeared; Alexandria, Cairo, and all Egypt now withdrawn from us; and Antioch, in which the name of Christian was first heard. The very fount and origin of our salvation has fallen into the hands of our enemies; so also Jerusalem, the mother of the Old and New Testament; and Constantinople, the capital of Greece. And the Jews, after they had lost the Ark of the Covenant, shunned none of the dangers of war to recover it. For the rape and seduction of Helen, the Greeks conducted a ten years' war. In order to but slightly enlarge their territory, the Carthaginians fought a bloody war against the Cyrenians; while the Romans often took up arms in behalf of their allies and confederates. And so this most Christian prince, Maximilian, took to heart the great decline of Christendom, and resolved to take up arms against the infidels in possession of cities, countries and lands formerly Christian, and stoutly to avenge the damage and insult inflicted by the enemy upon our faith; and to elevate and augment the Christian name. In order to carry out his pious Christian resolution, and to remove all obstacles thereto, His Royal Majesty, in A.D. 1491, called a great council of the princes, which sat for many days at Nuremberg. There were present prelates, princes, and the councilors and emissaries of cities, in great and remarkable numbers from Germany, Italy, France, and many other places, as well as from White Russia, to honor His Royal Roman Majesty, who exhorted them to lay aside their differences and wars, and to give aid to a crusade against the infidels with earnestness and diligence. What Matthias, the Hungarian king, had taken from the House of Austria, was recovered, and peace was restored in the kingdom of Hungary. But after this had endured for two years, the remnant of the Hungarian king's forces, called the Black Army, dissatisfied with the long peace, spread out into various regions in Hungary and Austria, and about 2,000 of them proceeded into certain places in Moravia and Austria, and the vicinity, and encamped in a fortified place from which they raided the vicinity. At the command of Emperor Frederick they were besieged, and their camp was stormed. Many of them were slain, and about 700 were taken prisoners. Of these, 300 were hanged by the Viennese. The rest were turned over to the Eytzinger, some being tortured, some roasted, and some suffocated in the furnace. Had the unfortunate wenching of the French king with the duchess of Brittany, previously married to King Maximilian, not intervened, the king's pious resolution would have had results. May the vengeance of the good and Almighty God put an end to all obstacles in the way of this royal Christian undertaking, so that His Royal Majesty may protect the churches, the Christian status, and the faith; for we see that the raging Turks have overrun and devastated and brought under their cruel subjection all Asia from Phoenicia and Media to the Hollespont; all of Thrace, Greece, Aetholia, Epirus, and the Wendic March as far as inner Dalmatia; and all the islands from the Adriatic to the Pontus, with the further intention of attacking and subjugating German and Hungarian lands and people as their nearest neighbors. But we trust that through God's agency victory will unquestionably come to our king Maximilian if the other nations will follow this king and foremost military leader—if wealthy Italy, noble France, sturdy Spain, and warlike and well populated Germany, who excel the infidels in troops, money and strength, will give aid and support. In addition, we may trust in God, who will undoubtedly stand by in matters touching himself, and will lend his aid to the warriors who appeal to him for assistance, in order that the enemy may be defeated. These infidels were defeated a number of times by the foremost princes; for the strength of the unbelievers is less than represented. There is no doubt that when this king arrives in the Orient the people there will be more apt to surrender to him if his army is stronger. And when this invincible king, Maximilian, returns home after having defeated the Turks, and has recovered Thrace, Greece, and the Holy Land, the departed German princes will express their immortal gratitude to him before the eternal God. O, how Italy and Germany will prepare a chariot for him; what gratitude the Church will show; what rejoicing there will be in every Christian community! The kings of the West and North will greet the returning great Roman king as a preserver of Christendom. The cardinals and bishops of the church, and the Roman senators, carrying the sacred relics, will come to meet him far beyond the city, and lay the purple carpet in his path. Noble matrons and maidens will pelt him with roses and lilies, and place garlands of various flowers on his anointed head. From on high in his chariot he will scatter golden coins among the people; and in all places and markets new games will be seen. The people will greet the victor with shouts of long life and praise. Having thus triumphed he will be escorted, not into the capitol or false temple of Jupiter, but into the church of St. Peter, prince of apostles, and be kindly received and blessed by Pope Alexander as a true vicar of Christ; and will then be conducted into the inner chamber of the palace, where they will converse at length about the victory and the affairs of Germany and Italy. Later the poems of the laureated Conrad Celtis will be resurrected, as from the dead, and M. Antonius Sabellicus will write the history thereof, and immortality given to the mortal king.

The Seventh Age of the World

Folio CCLXII recto

Now having related the history, which in the Sixth Age of the World extended into the 53rd year of the reign of Frederick III and into the 7th year of the reign of his illustrious son, Maximilian, at which we have arrived with the assistance and power of divine grace, it is fitting that we now say something of the last age and of the end of the world, so that this work may be complete and have a commendable conclusion.

In the beginning of this work we said, as the Holy Scriptures instruct us, that the world will have an end. Although Plato, the prince of philosophers, was enlightened with great wisdom and understanding of that which had, been written, and more particularly in natural philosophy, yet this heavenly and hidden interpretation, which can be learned only from the prophets and from God, was unknown to him. Consequently he said that the world was created for eternity. But it is otherwise; for that which has a concrete and physical body must necessarily have an end, just as it had a beginning. But as Aristotle could not conceive how a thing so immense could perish, yet would not entirely concede Plato's a view, he held that the world always had existed, and would continue to exist, although earth, water, and fire, which are a part of the world, may perish, be consumed, or extinguished; and so the matter is considered entirely from a mortal viewpoint. All things are considered mortal, whose parts or members are mortal; and that which is born may perish. Everything that may be seen is corporeal, and (as Plato says) is subject to dissolution. Therefore the master, Epicurius, (as Demitritus states) uttered the truth in this matter when he said that the world at one time had a beginning, and therefore will come to an end sometime. When the end of the world approaches, a change must necessarily take place in the human status, and when evil gains the ascendancy, that status must decay; so that our present time, in which sin and evil have reached the highest stage, will be regarded as blessed and golden in comparison to that unhallowed time. Righteousness will be a stranger; unkindness, greed, avarice and licentiousness will multiply and spread, so that the just (if any be found) will be a prey to the evil ones, and be intimidated by them. The wicked alone will prosper, while the pious will be dishonored and suffer want. Justice, law, and equity will find no refuge. No one will be able to acquire or retain possession of anything, except by force, wickedness, or greed. There will be no faith in humanity, no peace, no good will, no mercy, no shame, no virtue, no truth, no fidelity, and consequently no security; no order, no government, and no rest or repose from the wicked. The whole world will be in revolt, and the people will take up arms and rage against one another. States will war against each other to extermination. The sword will force its way through the world, devastating everything, reducing all to refuse. And finally will come such a period of horror and cruelty that no man will find pleasure in life. The cities will be razed to the ground and perish, not by fire and sword alone, but by constant earthquakes, floods, manifold plagues, famine and death. The air will be charged with rain-storms, followed by drought, then frost, and finally by excessive heat; and the soil, and the trees and vineyards will bring forth no fruit. Although their blossoms may give promise thereof, they will deceive us in the harvest. The springs and rivers will subside and dry up, and the water will be turned to blood and bitterness, and in consequence the beasts of the earth, the fowls in the air, and the fish in the sea will perish; and wonders and signs will appear in the sky, to the great fear and consternation of the people. O you exalted rulers, you prelates, you emperors, you kings, you princes, you lords, you knights, you superiors, you subjects, you aged, you youthful, you rich, you poor, you mortals, open your eyes and your ears, and think of the departed, and consider the future so that the sleep of death may not seize you, nor sudden changes of fortune ruin you; for no human suggestion or counsel can protect you against the same. Children of the world, consider how slippery is the path upon which you tread, and temper your avarice, your impurity, your wrath, your boasting, and your vainglory. And therefore, O you mortals, as you observe the approach of the day on which you must depart from hence, honor God on high and love him with all your heart; be wise and accept virtue; honor the worthy; hold your friends in great fidelity and faith; follow the advice of the learned and the sensible, and let virtue, mercy and righteousness manifest itself in you, so that you may appear in innocence at the judgment, and attain the reward promised to the just and virtuous by God, the just judge.

God created the world (as was stated in the beginning of this book) and the wonderful works of nature, in six days, and in the manner set forth in the Holy Scriptures; and he sanctified the seventh day, on which he rested from his labors. Seven is a perfect number; for there are seven days in the week, seven stars which never set, and seven stars, called the erring ones, whose irregular course and movements cause variations in time and matter. And as the Sixth Age has been completed, we shall now speak, firstly of the antichrist, and secondly of death and the end of all things; and finally of the Last Judgment and of the Seventh Age, or the repose of the souls.

Of the Antichrist

We have two definite indications that the end of time is now at hand: firstly, the opposing view of the Jews, of which there is no sign; and secondly, of the reign of and persecution by the antichrist. This persecution, as the belief of the Church holds, will endure for four and a half years. But in order that this may not come as a surprise, ensnaring those who are unprepared, Enoch and Elijah, the great prophets and teachers, will, as it is said, come before it begins, and convert the Israelites to grace, and make the chosen ones invulnerable to the pressure of this great fury. And when they have preached for four and a half years, and (as the prophet Malachy prophesied of Elijah) have converted the hearts of the fathers, and through atonement have reconciled them to the ancient faith, and have implanted love for the saints into the minds of those then living, this cruel and furious persecution will first of all crown Enoch and Elijah with the power and virtue of martyrdom, and will then disperse the rest of the faithful, either as glorious martyrs to Christ, or as condemned apostates. The antichrist will come out of Syria or, as others have said, out of Babylonia, of the tribe of Dan, and will be conceived of the Evil Spirit a perverter and destroyer of mankind, a most wicked being and a prophet of lies, who will name and set up a god of his own and demand that he himself be worshipped as his son. He will claim that power was given him to perform miracles and through employment of black arts and by devilish intercourse he will seduce the people to worship him. He will command fire to descend from the heavens, and the sun to stand still, and will destroy the images; and all of this is to happen at his command. And by such wonders he will incite wise men. He will then undertake to destroy the temples of God, and to persecute the righteous. There will be such oppression and bruising as has not been known since the beginning of the world. Those who believe in him and come to him will be branded like cattle, while those who refuse to be branded will be compelled to flee to the mountains, or suffer death by extraordinary tortures. He will confine and place in bondage the righteous, together with the books of the prophets, and will have the power to devastate the earth for forty-two months. This will be the time when righteousness will be abandoned and scorned, and innocence despised. The evil will war against the good. There will be no law, no order, no knightly discipline; and all things will be dispersed and intermingled contrary to nature and decency. Neither age, youth, childhood, sex, dignity, honor or office will be spared, and the entire earth will be overrun and reduced to naught by general plunder and murder. When these things occur, the righteous and the followers of truth will sever themselves from the wicked, and flee to the hermitages and the wilderness. When antichrist comes to Jerusalem he will circumcise himself and show himself to the Jews as Christ. They will adhere to him and rebuild his temple. He will present many gifts to the deceived, and by avarice bring some to subjection. He will send forth into the world legates and emissaries; while Enoch and Elijah, who will have lived in Paradise until then, will, as heretofore stated, pay the penalty of death. Finally, according to the vision of Daniel, this antichrist will appear upon the top of the Mount of Olives, from which the Saviour ascended to heaven, and from thence he will vanish. And when the son of perdition is slain by the Lord (as some say) or by the archangel Michael, and condemned to eternal wrath, it is not credible that the day of judgment will be at hand; otherwise mankind would know the time of the Last Judgment, which is to come four and a half years after this persecution by the antichrist. No one is privileged to know how long after the devastation by the antichrist the judgment day will come. The hour of its advent is fittingly looked forward to by all the pious, and they crave its early arrival. But those who presume to know or preach that this hour is near or remote are on perilous ground; for Christ, the Son of God, our Saviour in speaking of the Last Judgment said that no one, not even the angels in heaven, but God alone, knows the hour. And so St. Jerome says, "Blessed are those who, beyond the death of the antichrist, 1290, that is four and a half years, will tarry 45 days, in which time the Lord and Saviour will return to his sovereignty.

Of Death and the End of Things

Adam, the ancestor of all mankind, was so constituted that as time passed he continued to live on, at no time cognizant of that termination of life which we, in consequence of Satanic temptation, have come to know as death. However, by transgressing the divine command, he soon encountered in the flesh a law, which he discovered to be contrary to the dictates of his own mind. And so he was compelled to live his life by the sweat of his brow; to exile himself from bliss; to suffer want in fear and trembling, stinking of sin. He suffered as an offender according to the offense given his Creator. Having ignored the obligation of obedience, he himself was reduced to fear the fury of beasts and unreasoning brutes. Through satisfaction of his carnal desires, he found himself in a state of confusion. Having trifled away his innocence, he was compelled to suffer from its loss. He declined with age; for having lost his immortality, he decayed. In maturing he hastened his own end. And so also, we who descended from him are subject to insurmountable cares, temptations, and vexations, and finally are linked to fearsome death. From him we inherited the natural tendencies and characteristics which caused the dispersion of the human race. What pleasure and joy do men seek in these times in this vale of tears, in which we find nothing but natural imbecility, fickleness of fortune, inconstancy of mind, the stain of sensual pleasures, and constantly recurring vexations and wars? When we enter this world we are without the power of speech, not understanding what we see or hear. From thence we creep into childhood, during which period we lack in perseverance. From childhood we attain to the growing period, wherein we crave pleasures according to age, which develop with the spirit. From the growing period we reach the age of youth, becoming involved in numerous and greater cares, as we venture upon greater things beyond our youthful knowledge and confidence. After youth we became established, in manhood, consumed by distressing combats with worldly pomp, avarice, envy, hate, covetousness, and divers tears. From manhood we depart into old age, with its fill of ills. From old age we fall into the spent life of resignation, during which we are kept in constant dread through fear of immediate or approaching death. O, you poor beings, naked and ungainly, born in the midst of uncertainties and tears, with but little milk to nourish you; trembling and creeping, and deserving of extraneous assistance; surrounded by various ills, and subject to countless pains, counsel and aid being of no avail; tossed about in an admixture of joy and sorrow, your will powerless, unconscious of the purpose of your being, and not knowing what you eat or drink. Bodily sustenance, which other animals find at hand, you are obliged to seek with great effort and labor. Sleep pales you; food bloats you and drink overwhelms you. Waking dulls you, while hunger and thirst famish you. You are worried by past, present and future events. In spite of want you strut about and carry on with pride, realizing your weakness, - a future carcass for worms. Your life is brief, the term of your existence doubtful, and you are subject to thousands of forms of death; to say nothing of the fact that you are so constituted that you languish in idleness, are fatigued by your labors, depressed by gluttony, exhausted by hunger, and suffer through excess. You are at all times influenced and limited by the course of the heavens, and subject to the fickleness of fortune. The course of your life is filled with fear, misery, need and treachery. But when we take up the weapons of love and the shield of faith, and adopt a course preparatory to a future life, we will undoubtedly overcome all obstacles that we may encounter. Our pains are dissolved by death, which our ills cannot surmount, and which will restore us to that peace which prevailed before our birth. For to him who dies in blessedness, death is life; wherefore those who have lived in righteousness, yearn for death so that they may be with Christ and receive the reward of a well conducted life. If we take a more exalted view, we will find that death is but the termination of sin. For when Adam transgressed the commandment of God and lapsed into guilt and sin, God restored to the earth the body of Adam, which was created from it, not to make an end of the creatures themselves, but of the sin which they had committed. Therefore God is the beginning and the end. When he so wills we are born; and when he so wills we die. These matters are entirely within his divine power, and not in our control. But one thing he left to our own free will, namely, that by living a good and righteous life we may attain a good end, Therefore, to die in Christ, our Lord, should be the sole object of our greatest zeal. Those who do so, do not die, but simply pass from destructibility to indestructability, from mortality to immortality; from restlessness to rest. Accordingly some have not inaptly said that death is not an evil thing, but the greatest of all blessings. And as neither the day nor the hour of our call from hence is known to us, it is to our salvation that we live according to the will of God, keep his commandments, always be prepared, and do not postpone our preparedness; for we have seen many who in the best of health and strength did not concern themselves with such matters, and were suddenly carried off; while, on the other hand, some, of whose recovery physicians had despaired, returned to health. Now as all these matters are in the power of God alone, it behooves us to say no more, except that (as already stated) we remain obedient to God's commandments throughout our lives and to the end. We firmly believe that God created man in his own image. What lighter task, then, could we encounter than that of shaking off this earthly frame, this mortal coil, and returning to him who did not scorn to make us in his own image; so that the human spirit, filled with the spirit of God, may live on forever among the angels and the choirs of the saints as a participant in the Divinity and its blessings?

The Last Age of the World

OF THE LAST JUDGMENT AND THE END OF THE WORLD.

Folio CCLXV recto

By the providence of the most exalted God it was ordained that at the end of time this unjust world should cease, and that after the extirpation of all evil, and the call of the kindly disposed to a blessed life, a quiet, peaceful, and golden age should begin and flourish under the Lord God. Therefore, after fulfillment of the time which he fixed for death, mortality will cease; and so, when temporal death follows temporal life, we may conclude that the souls will be resurrected to eternal life; for death will have an end. Moreover, the life of the soul being eternal, it will receive the divine and ineffable fruits of its immortality; and so it is also necessary that its death be eternal, inasmuch as it suffers everlasting punishment and torture for its sin. Now when the end of the world approaches, wonders will appear in all the elements as a sign of the impending end of mankind. St. Jerome speaks of 15 signs, that will appear for 15 days before the day of the Last Judgment. On the first day the sea will rise 40 cubits above the highest mountain, replacing it like a wall. On the second day it will recede to a level where it may barely be seen. On the third day the monsters of the sea will appear on the waters, and their cries and howls will reach to the heavens. On the fourth day the sea will be aflame. On the fifth day the shrubs and trees will give forth a bloody dew. On the sixth day the houses will fall down. On the seventh day the mountains will crush and grind one another. On the eighth day a general earthquake will take place. On the ninth day the earth will be leveled. On the tenth day the people will come out of the caves and demean themselves as though insensible and speechless. On the eleventh day the skeletons of the dead will rise and stand upon their graves. On the twelfth day the stars will fall. On the thirteenth day the living will die in order that they may be resurrected with the dead. On the fourteenth day heaven and earth will be in flames. On the fifteenth day the earth and the heavens will renew themselves, and all the people will rise again. And then will come the Son of the most exalted God to judge the living and the dead. The Lord will appear in the air above the city from which he ascended, and with him the signs of his martyrdom and death as banners of his victory the cross, the nails, and the spear; and the scars of his five wounds will be seen. And in the valley of Jehosaphat all the people will be judged. When the judgment of the world and of mortals takes place, and God judges the good and the evil, he will finally consign the wicked to fire and darkness, but bestow honor and life upon the good; which has been prophesied by the prophets through divine inspiration, as well as by a number of natural philosophers, such as Hidaspes, through the inspiration of the devil. But no one should inquire how this may come to pass, for no one can explain the reasons for God's works, except to say that inasmuch as God, the Lord, in the beginning, created man by ineffable means, we should believe that he may also bring back the departed. Yet the unbelievers cry and say, How can flesh which has become putrid after dissolution or turned to dust and ashes, or submerged in the depths of the sea and dispersed by the waves, be collected and formed into a being endowed with its former soul? This we will answer in the words of Paul: "Senseless man, that which thou sowest is not quickened except it die first. And that which thou sowest, thou sowest not the body that shall be; but bare grain, as of wheat, or of some of the rest. But God giveth it a body as he will." What you see happen to the seed that you scatter upon the earth every year, that you believe in your flesh; but that which is sown upon the earth according to God's law, will not become apparent to you. He who does not believe that God can bring together in proper form the scattered ashes of every man's remains, is but a poor observer of the power and might of the Lord. Since even mortal man, in the exercise of his ingenuity, digs into the depths of the earth for veins of metal, and distinguishes all the metals in the materials of the earth, and knows how to separate them, who will then not believe that the divine power can again find scattered parts of every corporeal body and distinguish them. This matter is also comprehensible on natural grounds; for if one holds in his hand a mixture of seeds, and without separating them, or singly, sows them upon the earth, wherever the seed is cast it brings forth in proper time and according to its nature, fruit for the reproduction of its kind; and so also, the body and substance of every man's flesh, in which, according to the will of God who was the first sower, reason is immortal, will be reassembled and reunited in that form which death erstwhile dissolved. Every corporeal body, together with its soul, is either crowned for its service, or punished for its guilt; however, it is not reborn, but resurrected; and it is clothed with a body which will possess a memory of its former life. And in the celestial domains, it will give thanks with ineffable joy to God, there present, for the rooting out of all evil, and for admission to the eternal life. These things (as the prophets say) are all foretold, and it is not necessary that the testimony thereof be here set forth; moreover, no single book could comprehend it. He who would study these matters more diligently may draw them forth from the spring; and there he may search for many other wonderful things which we have not been able to include in this book. Now when such a dispersion occurs upon the earth, and the Almighty comes, and he is seated upon his majestic throne, to judge all the souls and the entire world, there will take place a general resurrection of all mankind. The bodies of the resurrected will become immortal, those of the sinners as well as of the righteous,- the righteous, so that they may remain with Christ; the sinners, so they may not perish but suffer the pains and penalties of their sins. Finally the just judge will endow the righteous with eternal glory, but inflict pain and sorrow on the wicked whose bodies will remain immortal so they may suffer eternal crucifixion, martyrdom, and the tortures of fire,- a fire that is otherwise constituted than our own, which is extinguished if not supplied with fuel; but their fire lives forever and burns of itself without fuel, supplying itself with material, and bringing with it the throes of agony. But what ineffable joy and pleasure the good and righteous will feel when, after fleeing from this everlasting agony, misery and torture, they join their just judge and most kindly father, receiving rest from their labors, light instead of darkness, and enter the eternal heavenly estate in lieu of their brief and earthly one! Therefore all men should diligently and to their utmost devote themselves to the pursuit of a righteous course, to the practice of virtue, and to the completion of an industrious life, and await with patience God's comfort and reward. For our Father and Lord (who made and secured the heavens, illuminated the planets with other stars, encompassed the earth with mountains and surrounded it with the sea, divided the earth by means of rivers, and created all things upon the earth out of nothing), in consideration of human frailty, also sent us a leader and guide to conduct us upon the way of righteousness; and him we will follow, we will hear, and obey in the flesh; and to him we will be devoutly obedient. We will battle with the ancient enemy of human salvation (whom we know); and having triumphed over our enemy, we will confidently await the reward of virtue which God has promised us. Through the great gates beyond the starry heavens, we will ascend into the uppermost heaven. There, in the midst of the fields of heaven will appear to us Jerusalem, the City of God, and our mother, bright as a costly jewel. Its walls are huge and mighty, and are provided with 12 gates, inscribed with the names of the 12 tribes of Israel. It has four sides, symbolizing the four quarters of the earth. The walls of the city, which form a square, have 12 foundations, inscribed with the names of the 12 apostles, and enriched with precious stones. Therefore, when we re-enter this true fatherland, we will be filled with ineffable joy, jubilation, and exultation; for from this fatherland we originated, and of it we are natives. O how we will exult when we look upon our happy fatherland of eternal bliss, glory and honor, after this long, sorrowful and perilous exile. Therefore let us pray that the Lord preserve us, and those who hear this, in the security of our faith, so that after the time is come we may by patient waiting secure the crown of righteousness that has been prepared and laid up for us; and that we may find ourselves among those restored to life everlasting, liberated from eternal shame and punishment by our Lord Jesus Christ, through whom eternal praise, honor, benediction, clarity, wisdom, power, salvation, might, virtue and glory, be unto God, the Almighty Father, together with the Holy Ghost, in eternal gratitude, forever and forever. Amen.

BY DIVINE ASSISTANCE IS NOW HERE ENDED THE BOOK OF HISTORIES OF THE AGES OF THE WORLD, AND THE DESCRIPTIONS OF THE MOST CELEBRATED AND RENOWNED CITIES, TRANSLATED FROM THE LATIN INTO THE GERMAN BY GEORGE ALT, A LOSUNGSCREIBER OF THE IMPERIAL CITY OF NUREMBERG, AND CONCLUDED ON THE 5TH DAY OF THE MONTH OF OCTOBER, A.D. 1493.

Folio CCLXVI verso & Folio CCLXVII recto

The ancient historians have written very little about Germany, as though this nation lay beyond the circumference of the earth, and have said fanciful things about it. In reading of ancient times we learn that at one time the Germans lived according to coarse barbarian customs, wearing inferior and dilapidated raiment, and sustaining themselves by the capture of wild game, and by the fruits of the earth. They were a free and warlike people, but lacked gold, and used no wine. Germany, called Germania in the Latin, at one time embraced the territory from the sea to the Danube, and from the Rhine to the river Elbe, or Albis. Just how far the Germans overstepped their boundary is not known to us; but in addition to the territory they originally occupied, they also extended themselves into Gaul, Upper Rhaetia, Nordgau (Noricum), Lechfeld, and toward Poland. As we look upon the noble, highly renowned, and illustrious cities, the magnificent houses of God, the mighty and powerful princes and prelates of the German nation, we note that all things considered, no country excels Germany; so that, should one of the Germans living in the time of Emperor Augustus arise and make a pilgrimage through Germany (like Ariovistus), he would say that it is not the same soil which he once knew, and he would not recognize as his fatherland this country with its vineyards and fruit trees, the dress of the people, the hospitality of the burghers, the brilliance of the cities, the neatness of the police, and the general administration of the government. This change is to be attributed to nothing other than the acceptance of the Christian faith; for by it the Germans were relieved of their barbarian coarseness and became so refined that now the Greeks are considered coarse, while the Germans are regarded as Latins (in refinement). As we consider the new, or recollect the old, it appears that of all the nations fitted for war none are more capable or zealous than the Germans; for in this German nation are to be found horses, weapons, and money; many illustrious princes, many highborn nobles, many sturdy knights and courtiers; many mighty cities, much wealth, much gold, much silver, much iron ore; a large population, a great army, as well as great courage, power and strength. Although the boundaries of Germany, (as the ancients state), at one time were the Vistula on the east, the Rhine on the west, the Danube on the south, and the Prussian Sea on the north, we see how far the German nation has now expanded itself. The Germans conquered England after the Britons were driven out. They also secured the Netherlands and the Swiss or Alsatian countries after the Gauls or French had been ejected; and they overran Upper Rhaetia and Noricum, and extended their dominions into Italy. The Germans also withdrew the people called the Hulmigeros, or Prussians, from the grip of idolatry. The Bohemians, a mighty and noble people, are the only foreigners located in the German domain; but they call themselves subjects of the German empire. Among the electors of the Empire their king is the most distinguished. The Germans are great, strong, warlike, and acceptable to God; and thus they have enlarged their dominions. They resisted the Roman power and might more than any other nation; for although Julius Caesar, the oppressor of the entire world, and the people within its circumference, after fighting and crushing the Gauls and French, led a number of expeditions across the Rhine, performing great feats in Germany, yet he was obliged to leave unconquered and untamed the free, warlike, and courageous Swabian people. Augustus Octavius, who above all Roman emperors was considered the most fortunate and universally favored, and whom the kings of Parthia and those of India sent gifts and presents, was never defeated in battle except by the Germans. It would require too much space to describe here all the mischief, the losses, and the distress which the Germans inflicted upon the Romans; for although the Germans were at times obliged to retreat in the face of Roman successes, they later frequently gave battle to the Romans, Gauls, French, Spaniards, Hungarians, and various other peoples, and triumphed over them. The Romans also after attaining great power, performed notable deeds with the help and assistance of the Germans, who proved themselves very fit in military matters, and so trustworthy and faithful in private affairs that they were selected from among many as the body guard of the emperor. We also know that Godfrey of Lorraine, with only the Rhenish Germans, a number of Gauls and a few Italians, defeated the Hungarians, forced his way through Greece, marched through Hellespontus, traversed Asia, relieved Jerusalem from the power of the infidels; and, although the Turks and Saracens opposed him in great number, he subjugated all the people on his way. His army is said to have consisted of 200,000 warriors; but Germany can collect a much larger body of men; for during the reign of King Conrad the Swabian, when Pope Eugenius incited the Christians against the Saracens for the succor of the Holy Land, and the Prussians with other people of the hinterland worshipped idolatrous gods, and the Saxons and their neighbors overran the Christians, King Conrad left the Saxons and their neighbors, and the Prussians and other unbelievers behind; and he proceeded to Jerusalem with the Rhinelanders, Swabians, Franks and Bavarians. How long and how broad this country; how devout, how truthful, how righteous, how loyal, and how rich in people and possessions is this German nation; how noble, how strong, how versed and experienced in war; how elegant its churches, and how celebrated and distinguished its clergy; how magnanimous its princes; how illustrious and brilliant its cities; how beautiful its skies, how fertile its soil, and how neat the countryside,- all these we would rather marvel at than relate. But since this work, entitled the book of histories, is now about to go forth in the imperial city of Nuremberg, which is located in the very heart of Germany, we will, in conclusion, make a few brief references to Germany and, in connection therewith, to the history (of Europe) by Aeneas Silvius (Pope Pius II) and of the times of Emperor Frederick III comprehended therein, and which we have drawn upon and condensed, not giving the text as fully as the Latin from which it is taken; for in various parts of this book matters have already been related whereof the history of Aeneas makes mention. Moreover, the German text could not proceed beyond the scope of the Latin.

Folio CCLXVII verso & Folio CCLXVIII recto

A narration of the historical events transpiring throughout Germany and Europe under Emperor Frederick III, together with a description of the places, written by the most worthy in God, Aeneas Piccolomini, cardinal of St. Sabine, to Cardinal Antonio of Hilerda.

To Antonio, priest of the holy Roman Church, Cardinal of Hilerda, his most beloved father, Aeneas, Cardinal of Sienna, of the same order though not as worthy, wishes much happiness. The other night, although suffering from gout and rheumatism, I was at work as is my custom; and a German book dealer or collector submitted to me a booklet, giving the names and histories of the Roman emperors, as well as certain customs, up to the time of Wenceslaus, son of Charles IV. And as in this same booklet four emperors were omitted because Benevenustus Himolensis, the author of the booklet, died under Wenceslaus, the German asked me to extend the work by supplying what it lacked. Not wishing to disappoint the man, I completed the emperors down to our own time, following the abbreviated style of my predecessor. But when I realized how many great historical events occurred among the Christians from the time of the Roman rule of Emperor Frederick down to our own day, I determined to write a separate book, briefly preserving for posterity certain memorable things that occurred in this period. And so I have written a short history, and have inscribed it to you. And as you too are laboring, though subject to the same ailment as I, I hope that while you are down with the gout you will leisurely read and judge my writing. It would have been more fitting, I admit, to have written a history of events from the beginning of our time to the present, a task which I of ten felt inclined to undertake, but it did not appear possible, in view of my gout, and particularly because of the forty days' fast and the approaching nightly vigils. The gout loves our houses. It frequently disappears, and often reappears. Yet it may prove serviceable to this undertaking. Fare you well, and if you find that I have written anything provocative, or too severe, against any one, you may attribute it to my nature and the pangs of the gout, and with your pen delete what is incorrect, improper, and incongruous. From Rome, March 29, A.D. 1458.

OF HUNGARY AND THE HISTORY THEREOF.

Folio CCLXVIII verso

We begin our history with Hungary which adjoins and lies to the east of Austria, the fatherland of Emperor Frederick. Some call this country Pannonia. But Hungary does not reach the regions of Pannonia; nor was it as extensive as in our time. Hungary was limited to the Danube and the river Inn, and by the mountains toward Italy, and bordered on the Adriatic Sea. Pannonia was bounded on the west by Noricum and the Inn; on the east by the Moesians and the Triballi, and by the river Save (or Sau). Within this region is comprehended a large part of Austria, which is inhabited by Germans. Within this area Styria (once called Valeria) is also included. And although Hungary embraces lower Pannonia, from the river Leitha as far as the Save, yet it extended over the Danube and reached into Poland, and into the territory which the Gepidae once possessed, and which is now occupied by the Dacians. The power and dominion of the Hungarians is more extensive than Hungary itself, for under their rule are the Dalmatians, or Wends, the Bosnians, the Triballi, or Moesians, or Rascians, and the Getae, who in part are called Wallachians, Transylvanians and Siebenburghers; although, in our own time, some of these have been driven out by the Turks. The Romans under Emperor Octavian conquered these provinces as far as the Danube, and fought Bachonus, the Pannonian king, and the Armantiners between the Save and the Drave. But Trajan, the emperor, subjugated Dacia on the farther side of the Danube, which is a part of Hungary, and made a province of this barbarian territory. After Galienus lost the province it was recovered by Aurelian. Thereafter the land was warred upon and taken by the Huns, a Scythian people. At times it was overrun by the Goths from the islands in the Baltic or Prussian Sea; thereafter by the Saxons from Germany, who came through Pannonia. Finally the Hungarians gained the ascendancy over the Scythians, and have maintained a kingdom to this day, extending their rule to both sides of the Danube. Not far from the source of the river Thanai lies another Hungary, the mother of the present province, and like it in language and custom; although this Hungary, being a more devout Christian land, is more civil and disciplined than the other, where the people live in idolatry and observe rude barbarian customs. In Hungary, through which the Danube flows, Emperor Sigismund, son of Charles IV, a native Bohemian, but of German ancestry, reigned for fifty years with varying fortune; and he espoused his daughter Elizabeth to Albert, the duke of Austria, to whom he gave his entire sovereignty (as heretofore stated in this book where each man is considered at length according to his title and other matters; wherefore repetition is avoided). Once when Albert was at Ofen (Budapest) this occurred: The Judge of the city, a German, drowned a Hungarian for an offense. This angered the Hungarians who already hated the Germans very much; and a revolt ensued in which the Hungarians took up arms, slaying the Germans wherever they met them. Then followed a flight to the king at his castle. The houses of the merchants, most of whom were Germans, were destroyed. At this time there preached at Ofen one Jacobus Marchianus, a lecturer of the Franciscan Order, renowned for his scriptural wisdom and the piety of his life. In order to silence and squelch the revolt, he ran forth, crucifix in hand, to encounter the raging and armed people in order to deter them from murder and robbery. In tears he exhorted them to lay down their arms. Not understanding his words, but thinking that Christ had become their leader, they raised Jacobus and the crucifix on high, and raged through the city, plundering this house and that. However, through the opposition of Brother Jacobus they refrained from murder, for with pleadings and lamentations he sought to pacify the cruelties of the excited people. Not long thereafter King Albert passed away in death, leaving Elizabeth, his pregnant widow. The Hungarians considered it improper and dangerous that such a large kingdom should be subject to the rule and decisions of a woman; wherefore they strongly urged the queen to marry Wladislaus, the Polish king. She agreed, on condition however, that the step should not prejudice her son, should she bear one. Thereupon the prelates of the kingdom, and the foremost princes by birth and faith were sent to Poland. While on their way, Ladislaus was born, baptized at Stuhlweissenburg, invested with the girdle of knighthood, and crowned with the Hungarian crown, all on the same day. Thereafter his mother placed him and the Hungarian crown in the custody and care of Emperor Frederick; and Frederick kept Ladislaus for twelve years.

Folio CCLXIX verso

But the Hungarians, contrary to the queen's wishes, nevertheless sent their embassy to King Wladislaus in Poland. By much encouragement and flattery they induced him to come to Hungary, where they placed a diadem upon his head and saluted him as king. After the mother of Ladislaus had fought said Wladislaus in various engagements, Count Ulrich of Cilli, who had protected the kingdom of Ladislaus all too well through the course of the Hungarian dissensions, was captured by the Poles and imprisoned for a long time. Dionysius, archbishop of Gran, thereafter invested with the dignity of cardinal, and by ancestry and culture an illustrious man, had placed the royal diadem upon the head of every king, at times willingly, at times under compulsion. And although, in response to summons, and upon public assurances of safe conduct, he came to Ofen, he was not released until he had crowned Wladislaus at Stuhlweissenburg. However, as soon as he returned home he employed his greatest zeal in opposing the Poles. Although Cardinal St. Angelus, who was sent to Hungary by Pope Eugenius, brought about a suspension of hostilities for a certain length of time, he was not able to effect peace between Wladislaus and Elizabeth. On the queen's death almost all the best and foremost of the Hungarian kingdom turned to the Poles, except Giskra, the Bohemian, an experienced warrior, who remained in Hungary and took the part of Ladislaus. Frequently, but with a few men, he triumphed over great numbers of Hungarians and Poles, dispersing or destroying them. On two occasions he surrounded Janos Hunyadi and his army, depriving him of his wagon-forts. Janos was a Wallachian, and although not of high birth, was a good man, resourceful, highly intelligent, and a lover of virtue. With great success he fought many engagements with the Turks, enriching the houses of God with the booty taken from the enemy. He was the first to show the Hungarians that the Turkish lances could be broken and overcome. This also encouraged Wladislaus to undertake a war against Amurate, the Turkish sultan. Through Julianus the cardinal, an alliance was formed between Emperor Frederick and Wladislaus, who called himself King of Hungary, with the understanding that the emperor might punish the Hungarians for any losses they might inflict on Austria or Styria, and that Wladislaus, on the other hand, might punish the subjects of the emperor for all depredations in Hungary. A small village, Güntz, on the border of Styria and Austria, in Hungary, together with several castles in the vicinity, was in the possession of robbers, who proceeded from thence into Austria, carrying off people and cattle. Emperor Frederick speedily collected an army with which he proceeded into Hungary, captured the wagon-forts and defenses of the robbers, and hanged eighty of their number. When Wladislaus fell in the war with the Turks, Ladislaus, King Albert's son, was elected king by common consent of the lords; and Janos Hunyadi was installed as governor of the Hungarian kingdom. He ruled (as it is said) with an iron rod in the absence of the king, but even in his presence was considered not less than the king himself. Janos died of an illness shortly after the defeat of the Turks at Stuhlweissenburg; and it is said that during his illness he would not permit the body of Christ (Sacrament) to be brought to him, saying that it is unseemly that the king should be brought into the house of his servant. And so, in his weakened condition he caused himself to be carried to the church, where he made his confession according to the Christian custom. Thereupon he received the sacrament; and while in the hands of the priests he gave up his soul to the Lord God,- truly a blessed spirit that on its own accord brought to heaven news of its great deeds at Stuhlweissenburg. Thereafter the Count of Cilli was slain by Ladislaus, the elder son of Hunyadi; wherefore, on the order of King Ladislaus, he was beheaded at Ofen, and his brother Matthias was imprisoned. And said King Ladislaus died at Prague as heretofore stated in this book. Thereupon the Hungarians assembled at Ofen to elect another king. Among other landed lords came Michael Zylagi (Milhaly Sczilagy) with a retinue of 13,000 horse and 7,000 foot. He was the brother of Hunyadi's wife and uncle of Matthias. He was hostile to many Hungarian lords because of the execution of Ladislaus, the son of his sister. His power and might caused the Hungarians no small amount of concern, and they feared that no free election of a king could be held. Thereupon Michael appeared before the assembly, stating that he had not brought these armed men with him in order to bring force to bear at the election, but to intimidate those who might attempt to interfere with the freedom of the princes and the people in the election of a king; and merely to remind them of the good deeds of Janos Hunyadi, who alone drove the Turkish arms from the kingdom of Hungary, and gave the honor of victory to the Hungarian people; against which, he was unworthily and unjustly compensated by the cruel death of one of his sons and by the imprisonment of the other in Bohemia; wherefore the lords should deservedly raise up the memory of Janos Hunyadi and liberate his son Matthias from imprisonment and elevate him to the kingship of Hungary, which his father had held through his power and virtue; for it is not to be tolerated that this regal power should pass to strangers. This done, he would spare all those who were opposed to Matthias, the son of his sister. And although the matter was in doubt for some time as each lord weighed the consequences, yet Matthias, a youth of 18 years, was on the 24th day of January, while impatiently awaiting the result of the election with 40,000 men, icebound in the middle of the Danube, proclaimed king. And here we must marvel at the surprising uncertainty of human affairs. Of two youths of the same age and culture, one (King Ladislaus) was carried from the royal palace just after his marriage, to his grave; while another (Matthias), although imprisoned and fearing death, was called from his cell to the sovereignty. It is a wonder that such a sudden and unexpected joy did not strengthen the mother, as with so much grief and care, she would rather have heard her son called a king than be liberated from prison(?). In the Hungarian marches on the further side of the Danube, toward the north, now called Sepusium (which the people, called the Gepide, once occupied), was a noted robber, called Examites, a Bohemian and Hussite heretic, who hospitably received robbers wherever they came from, and called them brothers. And he made the same region tributary to himself by building and erecting a number of fortifications and wagon-forts, from which he sallied forth hither and thither, attacking the people. Every month he distributed the loot from person to person, a full brother receiving no more than one who had served but a few days. He said he was commanded to do this by the Gospels; for the Lord had promised all those who worked in his Father the same reward whether they come in the first hour or in the eleventh. Now when this organization had committed robbery far and wide, and had reached the number of 5,000, and was increasing daily, they could not be dispersed in any other manner than by enrolling its chief, Examites, in the pay of King Ladislaus. The region called Siebenbürgen is situated on the other side of the Danube, in which lived a number of Dacians, the free people, who has. been victorious against the Romans. In our own time three classes of people live there - the Germans, Siculi, and Wallachians. The Germans came from Saxony, and are strong and experienced warriors, and are called Siebenbürgers because of the seven cities in which they live. The Siculi are the Hungarians, the first to come into this region from ancient Hungary. Although they till the fields with their hands and live in the country tending their cattle, they are nevertheless called noble; and when they meet they greet one another as high born lords. They pay tribute to no one except when a king of Hungary is crowned, when they give the king as many oxen as there are householders, the number of whom exceeds 60,000. But when they are summoned to go to wars and do not obey, they are punished by death and their estates are forfeited to the public treasury. The Wallachians are an Italian people, as we will soon relate; but among the Siebenbürgers few men are to be found not versed in the Hungarian tongue. In this region was a little city, called Bistricum, subject to the royal crown, which King Ladislaus, while at Vienna, gave to Janos Hunyadi for his own. To this the inhabitants were opposed, but they were compelled to submit. But after the death of Hunyadi and the death of his son Ladislaus at Ofen, they scornfully ejected Michael Zylagi, who desired the kingdom for Matthias, the other son of Hunyadi. But as soon as he learned of the death of King Ladislaus, he returned with an army and attacked the little city; and he tore out the eyes of some of the hostile burghers; some he deprived of their hands; and others he beheaded. He destroyed the little city by fire. Not long thereafter about 3000 Turks came into this region and carried off a great amount of booty. The Sabinians and the Germans pursued them, slew many, and triumphantly returned home with the plunder they had taken. They had hardly returned to the city when Michael appeared with no mean force on the opposite side of the city, planning the destruction of Bistricum which had given aid against him. But as the Sabinians remained within their well fortified city, he was checked in his undertaking, and departed from hence with great threats.

Folio CCLXX recto

WALLACHIA

WALLACHIA is a very extensive country, beginning at Siebenburgen and extending to the Euxine Sea. It is a level land and in need of water. To the south is the Danube, to the north are the Russians, and across the river Tyrus (Dniester) are the nomadic Scythians, called the Tartars. In this land at one time lived the Getae, who reduced Darius, the son of Hystaspis to flight, and subjugated the country of Thrace through many victories. Finally they were crushed and wiped out by the Romans, who, through their general, Flaccus, established a residential city there, by which the Dacians were overcome. The city was named Flaccia after the general. After the lapse of a long time the name was corrupted to Wallachia. The language of this people is still Roman, although greatly changed, and hardly intelligible to an Italian. In our own times two revolts occurred among the Wallachians, one by the Dacians, the other by the Dragulari. But after the Dragulari found themselves unequal to the Dacians and were oppressed by them in various ways, they called the Turks to their aid and wiped out the Dacians. But Janos Hunyadi, wielding the power of Hungary, gave aid to the Dacians, not only restoring them to their country, but earning renown and riches for himself thereby. The Wallachians also inhabit the islands of the Danube, among which is the island of Peuceni, which I note is mentioned by the ancient historians. They also have habitations in Thrace. One part of Wallachia is subject to the Turks, another to the Hungarians. It is apparent to me that it is difficult to describe the provinces, inasmuch as the historians, whom one must follow, not only have various versions, but contradict each other and, are not clear. They frequently confuse the location of the provinces; for some that were extensive in former times are now small,

Folio CCLXXI recto

while others which were small now appear large and flourishing. Lombardy, Romandiola, Insubria, Lemilia, and Flamina, the Italian regions, being unrenowned, were not recognized. And so also Macedonia, once under a king called Aemathione, and by him named Aemathia, was insignificant; but later it expanded through the power of its rulers and the skill of its people, and by the attraction of its neighbors. Therefore, if those who read my account do not here find them in the order to which they are accustomed, or in which they find them among other writers, I hope they will not blame me, but keep in mind the reason above mentioned, namely, the changing character of these regions.

THRACE

THRACE (Thracia), as many distinguished writers state, is a vast province or country. To the East is the Euxine Sea, to the South the Aegean, the river Strymon and the Macedonian plains; to the North is the Danube, and to the West the Paeonian Mountains, Hungary and the Save. So said the historians, Pliny and Strabo, who stated that Mt. Remus divides Thrace through the middle, and that the Dardani, Tribaili, and Moesians live in Thrace; that the Triballi lived in the plains, now inhabited by the Rascini or Haiti, or Servi; but the Moesians, after the Triballi, spread out to the East as far as the Euxine, between the Danube and Mt. Hemus, and these we now call the Bulgarians. Beyond this, to the South, and as far as Hellespontum lies Roumania, a Greek nation, though somewhat barbarian; and in our time, after the destruction of the Greek Empire, they again became barbarian under the rule of the Turks. The principal city of this country is Constantinople, formerly called Agios. This city was built by the Lacedaemonians under their leader Pausanius. Of this city, its origin, name and existence, sufficient mention has already been made in this book in the form in which these were described by Aeneas; wherefore his writings have not been repeated here.

Folio CCLXXI verso

In this city many general councils were held under the emperors, and many heresies which arose against the Christian faith were discovered and suppressed. Of these heresies the one that endured the longest was that concerning the exit of the Holy Ghost, which was condemned and rejected under Pope Eugenius IV in the Council at Florence, not only by the Latin, but also by the Greek Church. And although John the patriarch of Constantinople and John the Greek emperor were in unison with the Latin Church on the articles of faith, yet the Church at Constantinople would not accept them. The patriarch who acceded thereto died at Florence, and the emperor did not live long after his home journey. Constantius, the emperor who succeeded him, was either misled or wilfully refused to accede thereto, and he expelled Gregory the patriarch because he followed the true faith. Therefore Pope Nicholas V sent there Isidorus, the Sabinian cardinal, a very excellent man who had for a long time ruled the Hussian church, to ascertain why the Greeks disregarded the agreements which their legates had made with the Latins in the council of Florence. This cardinal influenced the emperor of Constantinople and his advisers to the right course, when the war of Mohammed suddenly threatened them. I see that many in our time, not only credible teachers and poets, but also historians, commit the error of calling the Turks Teucros, due, I believe, to the fact that the Turks are in possession of Troy, which was once occupied by the Teucros; but their origin is of Crete or Candia and Italy. The Turks are from Scythia, and have so expanded that they flow possess Asia and Greece, to the dismay of the Latin and Christian name. Of this mention will be made later.

OF THE TURKS

Folio CCLXXII recto

If we would follow the order observed by Aeneas Pius in his history of Europe, it would now behoove us to tell about the Turkish people and to relate their history, as well as the attack upon Constantinople by the Turks and its loss in the time of Aeneas; but since the capture of the city has already been recorded in this book at Folio CCXLIX (recto), together with a special illustration; and as in many other parts of this book the invasions, violence and oppressions frequently visited upon the Christians by the Turks, within our own memory, as well as theretofore, not only in Hungary but also in other countries, have already been noted and related, it is best not to repeat those matters at this time, as such repetition is not only useless and unnecessary, but might distress the reader.

Folio CCLXXIII verso & Folio CCLXXV recto

MACEDONIA

Folio CCLXXV verso

MACEDONIA, the country that once ruled the world, borders on Thrace from the west and south, and extends from the Aegean Sea to the Adriatic. To the south, at its back, are Thessaly and Magnesia; and to the north Paeonia and Paphlagonia. These regions were later added to Macedonia. Epirus and Illyricum also border on Macedonia, one on the south, the other on the north. On the shores of the Adriatic lies the ancient city of Dyrrachium (now Durazzo) of the Cheronese (Peniscola) in which it is located, and from whence it derived its name. It was formerly called Epidamnus, and was first built by those of Corcyra (Corfu). Not far below was the city of Apollonia (Polina), established under good laws, and memorable for the fact that the emperor Augustus studied Greek there. On the other shore is Thessalonica, once a mighty city, celebrated through the epistles of St. Paul, and by the devastations and irreconcilable wrath of Theodosius the Great; for, although at times he was a most kind emperor, he was so enraged by the slaying of the judges in the city that he ordered all the inhabitants put to death; and thus about 11,000 men perished. St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan, would not permit such an inhuman deed to pass unpunished; and he forbade the emperor's entry into the churches, and compelled him to do penance. From henceforth a law was enforced that a sentence of death should not be carried out for thirty days. Pliny states that this was a free city. Strabo says that Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, built it. Both ascribe this city to Macedonia. Andronicus, son of Emanuel, the Constantinopolitan emperor, acquired this city as a portion of his inheritance, but later, through hatred of his brother John, who succeeded his father as emperor, he surrendered it to the Venetians, from whom it was taken by the Turkish sultan Amurath. This sultan also brought under his sway the remaining Macedonian districts as far as the Paeonian mountains, a region now called Albania. O what wonderful changes have taken place in worldly affairs, and how transitory man's authority has been! At one time this Macedonian region, while under the two kings, Philip and Alexander, (and after the subjection of Greece and Thrace), extended into Asia, Armenia, Iberia, Albania, Cappadocia, Syria, Egypt, and as far as Mount Taurus and the Caucasus, and over the Bactrians, Medes and Persians. But in our time it is unfortunately subject to the vile Turks, to whom it has become tributary and subservient.

MAGNESIA AND THESSALY

Magnesia and Thessaly were overrun by the Turks in our time. The most noble mountains, Olympus, Pieris, Pindus, Ossa and Othrys, once belonging to the Lapithae, are now subject to the power of the Turks. Here, Pliny states there were once upon a time seventy cities. The Justeagoniphus is the most celebrated river of Thessaly. It arises between mounts Ossa and Olympus in a wooded valley, and is navigable in various places. Through this region, also flows in the same direction the river Peneus, passing through a green swamp. Grass is abundant on its banks and there the sweet notes of birds are heard. It approaches the rivulet of Orchon, but does not reach it. Once upon a time there lived in Thessaly a king named Grecus from whom Greece derived its name; also king called Helenus, after whom Helen was named. Homer, the poet and historian, called this land by three names - Mirmidona, Helena and Achaia. And although these people withstood the might of Persia, they were unable to hinder the Turks from passing through the Philarian narrows.

BOEOTIA

After Thessaly comes Boeotia, extending from east to west, touching the Euboean Sea (on the east), and the Crissaeon Gulf (on the west). Boeotia is renowned among historians, and was the native land of Pater Liber and of Hercules. Therein lay a city called Epaminundum, of no less renown than Athens; but in our time it is just a small citadel and, together with other Boeotian districts, in the possession of the Turks.

HELLAS OR ATTICA

Hellas, by us called Greece, was called Acte by our forefathers, and later the name was changed to Atice. Homer called all the inhabitants of Attica Athenians; for at that time the city of Megara had not yet been built. Attica extended from Boeotia to the mountains, where there is a district called Megaris. By these same Corinthian mountains was a column, and on the side thereof toward the Peloponnesus were inscribed the words: This is Peloponnesus and not Ionia; while on the side toward Megara were the words: This is not Peloponnesus, but Ionia. The Atticans and the Ionians are one people; and as they very often quarreled with the Peloponnesians as to the extent of their lands, they finally reached a common accord and erected this column. Although Attica is mountainous, rocky, and unproductive, many have praised it and have called it a household god. In this region was the once most celebrated city of Athens, lacking neither in praise nor renown; but in our own time it has the appearance of a small insignificant village. On the elevation on which the ancient temple of Minerva stood, is now a castle or fortress, celebrated throughout Greece for its dimensions, structure, and defenses against attack. This city was surrendered to the Turks by a Florentine after his calls for assistance were ignored by the Latins; wherefore he was given several villages in which to spend his time ignobly.

THE PELOPONNESUS

The Peloponnesus lies in the vicinity of Attica, once the citadel of all Greece; for in addition to the nobility and might of its people, the location of its towns and regions prove it a principality and sovereignty. There are many valleys and mountains in this country. It has a breadth from east to west of 1400 stadia, and a circumference of 4,000. Two seas, the Ionian and the Aegean, adjoin it. According to Anthemidorus, in this region lay the noble city of Corinth. At present the Latins call this region Morea; and therein lie Achaia, Messinia, Laconia, Argolis, and, in the midst of these, Arcadia. After making war on Thessalonica, Boeotia, and Attica, Somirates proceeded as far as the city of Examilium, whose walls he destroyed; and when the Peloponnesians surrendered, he subjected them to an annual tribute. When the Hungarians, at the instigation of Cardinal Julianus, took up arms against the Turks, and for a time were successful, the Greek emperor Constantine was slain there. The despot of these provinces refused to pay the tribute demanded by the Turks; and he built the city of Examilium. In consequence he was later fined a huge sum of money.

Folio CCLXXVI recto

ACHAIA

Achaia, as Ptolemy writes, has Epirus to the west; Macedonia to the north; and a portion of the Aegean Sea toward the east, on whose shores it extends to the highest mountains. To the south is the Adriatic; and if this is true, then Achaia includes Attica, Boeotia, Phocis, Thessaly, Magnesia, Aetolia, and Acarnania. But in another place Ptolemy states that the cities of Elix (Helice), Bura, Helena, and Pherecia are in Achaia. The district of Acarnania, between Epirus and Boeotia, is now absorbed in Aetolia, at present a duchy. John Vintimilius, a native of Sicily, espoused his daughter to the despot of Acarnania. Later, when the Turks brought distress upon Arcanania and besieged the son-in-law, John came over the sea with a small expeditionary force, pursued the besiegers, and secured a memorable victory over the Turks, thus relieving his son-in-law, who however, was later taken prisoner by the Turks through treachery and deprived of his sovereignty.

Folio CCLXXVI verso

EPIRUS

This region begins at the Acroceraunii, the mountains on the west, and extends eastward to the Ambracian valley for a distance of 1300 stadia. It borders on Macedonia on the north, and on Achaia on the east to the river Achelous. On the west it extends to the Ionian Sea. Theopompus writes that there were 24 tribes in this region, and historians state that this land sea was prosperous and productive, and once possessed many secure cities and castles. However, because of the enmity of these people against the Romans, the province was destroyed. And as Polybius states, 20 cities of Epirus were leveled to the ground by the emperor Aemilius Paulus, after the defeat of the Macedonians and the king of Persia. In this region occurred the widely celebrated naval battle of Actium, wherein the emperor Augustus triumphed over Mark Anthony and Cleopatra, the queen of Egypt. In commemoration thereof Augustus built in the Ambracian valley the city of Nicopolus, which name signifies victory.

ALBANIA

Albania at one time belonged to and was part of Macedonia, wherein the two aforesaid cities of Dyrrachium and Apollonia were situated. The language of this people is understood neither by the Greeks nor the Wends. We believe that the people at one time came from the Albania near Chalcide, in Asiatic Scythia, when the barbarian nations overran Greece and Italy. In this country was the mighty Chamusa, who, though born of Christian parents, denied the Christian faith and turned to the Mohammedan folly. But just as readily as he forsook Christ, so he scorned the Mohammedan idolatry and returned to the ancestral law. Although he ignored both beliefs, he preferred to die as a Christian rather than as a Turk. He died soon after the fall of Constantinople. George Skanderbeg, born of noble parents, and his successor, devoted all his days to arms and war in defense of Christianity. He defeated and destroyed vast hordes of Turks, and alone maintained this land in the Gospels of Christ. But it is said that the greater part of this region has now been devastated by hostile arms. King Alphonso often sent troops into Albania. He took the city of Kroja, and protected it against the Turks. The aforesaid Skanderbeg's brother's son, who favored the Turks, was captured by his said uncle, sent to King Alphonso, and placed in a cell. Pope Calixtus gave Skanderbeg much financial assistance.

ILLYRIA OR THE WENDIC LAND

After Albania come the Illyrians, to the west and north. We now call these people Wends. Some are called Bosnians, some Dalmatians, some Croats, some Istrians, and some Carniolans. The Bosnians are in the interior, near Hungary, toward the north, while the others, situated on the sea, extend as far as the Timavian springs, facing Ansonia on one side and Hungary on the other. But the river Timavus runs into it as far as the innermost gulf of the Adriatic. Although King Stephen of Bosnia followed the Christian faith, he held himself aloof from the sacrament of baptism for a long time. Later he summoned John, Cardinal of St. Angelo, from whom he received holy baptism; and then he began a war against the Turks. In this region live many Manichaeian heretics, who hold that there were two beginnings, one good, the other evil; and they have no regard for the supremacy of the Roman Church. Nor do they recognize that Christ is of the same nature as God, and coexistent with him. Their cloisters are in remote and secluded places between the mountains. When the women become ill, they obligate themselves to serve these same monks as holy men for a certain period. And when they are restored to health, they fulfill their vow, with the consent of their husbands, by living in promiscuity with the monks for a fixed period of time. Neither the laws of the Roman See nor Christian arms have been able to remove this blot; for the Almighty God permits this heresy to prevail for our discipline.

THE REGION OF DALMATIA

Folio CCLXXVII recto

In Dalmatia King Stephen harassed those of Ragusa with great battles; for he had a duchy between the Bosnians and the Dalmatians. He was tainted with the poison of the Manichaeian heresy, and secretly kidnapped Christians and sold them to the Turks; yet he sent emissaries to Rome asking assistance from the papal see, thus seeking from Christians the funds he expended in making war against the Christians.

CROATIA

In the land of Croatia an Austrian woman of mean birth, but excellent morals and good standing, was recompensed in being espoused by a count. While riding from one castle to another, she was surprised by the rapid approach of the Turks; she was taken prisoner and detained by them for a long time. Her husband, becoming impatient, secured her release from imprisonment by the payment of a large sum of money. Now some one may ask where we have left the country of Liburnia; but the boundaries and extent of the lands, provinces and regions are so doubtful and confused that it is impossible to distinguish the modern regions from one another, and the possibility of distinguishing and locating the very ancient ones is still more remote. Pliny, the historian, says that Liburnia ends where Dalmatia begins.

ISTRIA OR HISTRIA

The ancient teachers say that Istria is a part of Italy, and in it are situated the cities of Parentium and Pola. Justinianopolis is the capital. It borders on Italy in a recess of the Adriatic, extending into the sea in the form of an island. This region is mountainous and rocky. The ancients call it Albania. Pliny said that Istria borders on Liburnia. In consequence it is apparent that the Croats came into the land of the Liburnians. The Istrians are now Wendic, but the cities on the seacoast speak Italian, and know both languages. That part of the country which lies along the seacoast and is now subject to the Venetians, is the beSt. The interior is in the possession of the Austrians. There also is the city of St. Veit, 1,000 stadia from Aquileia. In our times nothing memorable occurred in this country, although the Austrians and Venetians often warred with one another in consequence of boundary disputes. From time to time the emperor sent emissaries to settle these controversies, and although new truces were made, the wars never ceased entirely.

CARNIOLA

The Carniolans follow the Istrians. The Wends, whose language the country retains, divide the land into two parts. One is arid and in need of moisture, and therein, between Laibach and Triest live the Istrians and the Carsii, inhabiting the mountains as far as the river Timavus. The other is well watered by various rivers, particularly by the Save and the Laibach, from which the city took its name. While Emperor Frederick was on his way to be crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle, the city of Laibach was besieged and attacked by Count Ulrich of Cilli and Duke Albert, the emperor's brother, and their allies; but the siege was finally raised by the knights of the emperor and many valuable weapons and implements of war were captured.

CARINTHIA (KARNTEN)

Folio CCLXXVII verso

CARINTHIA, also a mountainous country, borders on Carniola (Krain, or Crain). To the east and north is Styria; to the west and south, the Italian mountains and Friaul. The country has many valleys and hills, productive of grain; also many seas, rivers and brooks, of which the Drave (Drau) is the most important. It flows through Styria and Hungary into the Danube. The country is subject to the Austrian Duchy. Whenever a new prince is about to begin his reign, it is the custom to have a peasant mount a block of marble in a spacious valley not far from the city of St. Veit. The office is hereditary in him. To his right is placed a lean black ox, to his left a lean ill-favored horse. Round about stand the people and the entire peasantry. From the opposite side comes the prince and the nobility, the latter well clad and carrying the banner and coat of arms of the principality. The Count of Görtz, between 12 small banners, leads the procession, and the nobility follow. In this gathering no one is less conspicuous than the prince, who appears as a peasant, in coarse dress, hat and shoes, carrying the staff of a shepherd. When the peasant seated on the stone sees the prince approach, he cries out in the Wendic tongue (for the Carinthians are Wends), "Who is it that over yonder parades forth so proudly?" And the people standing about say, "The prince of the land is coming." Then the peasant asks, "Is he also a just judge, a lover of our country's welfare, and independent and worthy of honor? Is he also an augments and protector of the Christian faith?" And they all answer, "Yes, he is, and will be." And again the peasant asks, "How, or by what right may he induce me to leave this seat?" Whereupon the Count of Görtz answers, "You will be bought off with sixty pennies, and the head of this ox and the head of this horse will be yours; and you may have the raiment of the prince, and your house shall be free and untaxable. Whereupon the peasant gives the prince a mild slap on the cheek, urging him to be a just judge. He then rises and carries off his cattle. And now the prince, his sword bared, mounts the stone, and turning hither and thither, vows fairness and impartial judgment to the people. It is also said that cold water is brought to the peasant, which he drinks out of a felt hat, as though he scorned the use of wine. Thereupon the prince proceeds to St. Peter's church on a bill in the vicinity, and which was once a bishopric. When divine services have been completed he casts off his peasant dress and dons his princely raiment. After a brilliant entertainment with his nobles and knights, he rides back into the field, and there, seated on the judgment seat, he administers justice to those who desire it, and grants tenures to his vassals. It is said that in A.D. 790, in the time of Charlemagne, Igno, a duke of this country, provided a great entertainment for the peasantry. He caused the peasants to be seated near him, and to be served from dishes of gold and silver; but the nobles and foremost he seated far away, and they were served from earthenware. When asked what this signified, he answered, that those who live in costly palaces in large cities are not as clean as those who live in humble cottages in the country; that the peasants, after accepting the gospel and the purification of holy baptism, have beautiful souls, while the souls of the mighty are befouled and blackened with idolatry; and so he had arranged the entertainment according to the rank of the souls. Soon thereafter the nobles, in large numbers, accepted the Christian faith and received baptism from Virgilius and Arnonis, the bishops of Salzburg. Henceforth the honor of installing a prince was conceded to the peasantry. duke of Carinthia was game-warden of the empire, to whom were submitted the misdemeanors of the hunters; and when called upon to answer the complainants in court before the emperor, he was not obliged to do so except in the Wendic tongue. In this country is a city called Clagenfurt (Klagenfurt), in which hard usages were invoked against thieves; for when any man fell under the suspicion of theft, he was promptly arrested and hanged. After the expiration of three days, those of Clagenfurt investigated the theft, and if they found him guilty and deserving of death, they left the corpse of the thief hang until it was entirely wasted away; but if they found that injustice had been done to the person who was hanged, they took the corpse from the gallows, and gave the soul a public funeral. In this land lived Count Ulrich of Görtz, destroyer of men, for whom a woman awakened his immature daughter to drink with him at midnight. He had more dealings and associations with shepherds than nobles; although aged he played with the children on the ice, often lived with common women, and seldom took his meals at court. He went to the cook, and all by himself ate soup in the kitchen. He wore filthy clothes and spotted his bosom. His eyes always watered. At one time when Emperor Frederick saw the count approaching him, he asked me to come to him and said, "Aeneas, come and see this prince who is hurrying to us. If ever you have seen a cleaner and handsomer prince, say so." This count had a Hungarian wife whose greed brought him to prison. He was liberated by the help of Count Ulrich of Cilli, drove away his wife and left able sons as heirs. In good morals they resembled than their father.

STYRIA, A REGION OF GERMANY

STYRIA, at one time called Valeria, borders on Hungary to the east, on Austria to the north, and on Carniola and Carinthia to the west and south. This region is also mountainous, although toward the east it is level to no small extent. The Drave (Drau) and the Mur, two noted rivers, water this region. The Mur flows into the Drave, and the Drave into the Danube. The people in the cities are usually German, while the peasants on this side of the Drave are Wendic. This region is subject to the Austrian house. Herein is a small town that some call Cilli, in which are many indications of antiquity, including marble tombs of Roman princes. Here ruled, in our own time, Count Frederick, who, fired with carnal passion for a concubine, with his own hand slew his lawful wife, a born countess of Croatia. Thereupon his father, in the exercise of that judgment which is the right of the mighty, drowned the concubine. And thereupon the son took wives away from their husbands, enticed the maidens to his court, reduced the country people to servitude, destroyed the estates of the church, and gathered about him counterfeiters, criminals, soothsayers and necromancers. And although, at the age of ninety, he proceeded to Rome in the year of the jubilee to obtain absolution, yet he showed no improvement after his return. When he was asked what advantage the pilgrimage to Rome had been to him, since he had not modified his old habits, he answered and said, "My cobbler, since his return from Rome, still makes boots." Upon his death he left as heir his son Ulrich, who resembled his father in some respects, but was of better address. When he was slain, 24 claimants to his estate appeared. And just as during his lifetime he had stirred up revolt and war on every hand, so by his death he aroused dissension and opposition. But the highest and foremost of the land decided to give up possession of the country to Emperor Frederick upon condition that according to custom, they would answer the claimants in court. The widow of Count Ulrich undertook to protect the inheritance. But Emperor Frederick, after taking many castles by force, was finally able to establish himself at Cilli through its surrender by a Bohemian, who was the count's captain and received money from the emperor, and abandoned the countess. But he soon regretted this, undertaking to cover up one coarse misdeed by another. With a small force he undertook to surround the emperor during the night. A number of the burghers took to arms and admitted him with 800 horsemen. But divine goodness sustained Emperor Frederick, and, contrary to custom, he was thus advised to sleep in the upper castle on this night. His retainers, who remained in the city, were all taken prisoners, and John Ungnadius, the wealthiest man in Styria, together with his brother Jorgen and Ulrich, the Austrian chancellor, were carried off, although Ulrich was a bishop and had fled to the church. It is said that there was a nobleman in Styria to whom it often occurred to hang himself; therefore he sought the counsel of a learned man against these temptations; and he was advised to engage a certain priest to read mass to him daily. This advice the nobleman followed, and had the priest hold mass for him for an entire year, during which period he never thought of hanging himself. Finally this priest asked the nobleman to grant him the privilege of serving him as parish priest in a church to be consecrated in the vicinity. To this the nobleman assented, with the intention of following him there and of being present during the holy office. Although he was undecided for a long time, he left at noon, and in the forest he met a peasant, who told him that the divine office had been completed and all the people had gone away. This distressed the nobleman very much, and he said that he was unhappy because he had not seen the body of Christ on this day. Therefore he urged the peasant to sell him the benefit which the peasant had secured by his attendance upon the divine office; whereupon the peasant asked the nobleman to give him an humble garment. After this purchase the nobleman nevertheless went to the church and prayed. On his way home he found the peasant hanging on a tree; after which he no longer found himself troubled with distressing thoughts. In this country much salt is obtained, which is shipped to other countries; there are also many rich mines of iron and silver.

AUSTRIA

We do not consider it necessary to describe Austria at this point, for we have already extensively written its history. However, we will here briefly explain its location. Austria, once called Upper Pannonia, has Hungary to the east, Bavaria to the west, Bohemia and Moravia to the south, and the Styrian mountains to the north. Austria is a three days' journey or a little less, in breadth, and a six days' journey in length. Its soil is rich, well watered, planted with vineyards, wealthy in timber, productive in farm products, teeming in fish, and its vineyards are so abundant that it adequately supplies Moravia, Bohemia, Silesia and Bavaria with wine, and receives large revenues and riches thereby. The Danube flows through the middle of this country. Vienna is its most distinguished city and the great merchandise mart of the Pannonians. It is surrounded by walls two thousand paces in length, and is adorned with moats, bow windows, towers and spacious suburbs. Upon the death of King Albert, the feudatory lords of the country chose Duke Frederick, thereafter Roman emperor, as their king, upon condition that should King Albert's widow give birth to a boy, Frederick should be his guardian; but should she bring forth a girl, Frederick should be the country's ruler. Now when the queen gave birth to Ladislaus, Frederick undertook his guardianship. The knights and men at arms who had served under King Albert and had not yet received their pay, seized the country, committing murder and arson; but Frederick bought them off with 40,000 florins. The sister of the elder King Ladislaus was the spouse of Duke William of Saxony. Janos Hunyadi sought the crown of Hungary from Emperor Frederick; and when this was denied him, Hunyadi, with 12,000 horse overran all that part of Austria lying between Vienna and the Styrian mountains, destroying and burning it. And now such great discord and hostility arose between Emperor Frederick and the Hungarians and Bohemians, that a diet was called to settle the matter, to be held at Vienna. This was attended by the dukes, Ludwig of Bavaria, and William of Saxony, and the margraves, Albert of Brandenburg and Charles of Baden, and many barons from Hungary and Bohemia. And the emperor sent his emissaries, of which I was one; and although many and sundry matters of justice were considered, nothing was finally concluded. In the same assembly King Ladislaus elevated to princely honor Janos Hunyadi, who had saved his kingdom from the Turks; and although the Count of Cilli influenced the king to his own will, drawing all things unto himself, and ignoring one Eytzinger and those of Vienna, and elevated to honors becoming a queen, his concubine, whom he seduced after her husband was slain, yet he finally fell into disfavor with the king, and by the management of Eytzinger, was driven from the royal court. In order to avoid his stoning by the scornful people, the margrave, Albert of Brandenburg, accompanied him to the city gate, insuring his safety. But as mean and disgraceful as was his departure, so his return was magnificent, pompous and favorable; for more than a year later, when the king of Bohemia came to Vienna, the count was recalled at the instigation of the Austrian lords, and proceeded to Vienna with 1,000 horse, where he was met at the gate by the king and the rejoicing nobles. Thereafter said Eytzinger lost the king's grace and favor, and returned home to his castle. He then became reconciled to the emperor, whom he had sorely offended. Ere long those adhering to King Ladislaus became so despotic and haughty that they undertook to seize and plunder the suburbs of Neustadt, where the empress lay in child-bed; and failing in this, to fire the city. Negotiations for peace between the emperor and the king were frequent, but futile. The Count of Cidas was of the opinion that the Austrian princes were not in harmony on his account. After his death said Eytzinger of Bohemia was sent to the emperor and peace was discussed on both sides; but meanwhile the king died, and the negotiations were not only disrupted, but all hope of great accomplishments as well as the welfare of all Christendom were postponed. The emperor and Duke Albert, his brother requested the Austrians to surrender and give up the sovereignty. They held a council of the lords, to which the emperor submitted the proposition that the country should descend to the elder prince of Austria; and so Duke Albert expressed the opinion that the royal inheritance should descend upon him and his cousin Duke Sigismund. And the lords answered, saying that if the two brothers would agree, they would be more tolerant and considerate. In the meantime robbers on the far side of the Danube, in Austria, took possession of a well fortified city on the banks of a river in Moravia, and began to distress the entire vicinity with plunder and arson. Against these devastators Duke Albert took up arms, captured them by force, slew many, carried off 650 as prisoners, and of these caused 80 to be hanged. By this course he obtained great favor and acclaim among the Austrians. Now after Ulrich von Eytzinger had visited the emperor, at Neustadt, and on his return came to Vienna, and unsuspectingly answered the summons of Duke Albert, the latter took him prisoner and confined him in a special cell. The burghers looked upon this action with disfavor and there was much murmuring; yet no one undertook to help the poor prisoner. The emperor was asked to go to Vienna, but having his suspicions, he delayed the journey for a long time. Meanwhile Duke Sigismund came down the Etsch to Vienna, and went first of all to Neustadt, where, according to ancient custom, and in the presence of Duke Albert, he received the fief from the emperor and took the oath of homage. Ere long Albert returned to Vienna with Sigismund, and they confederated against the emperor in order to bring Austria under their power. When the emperor noted these things he decided to go to Vienna, summoning to him Duke Ludwig of Bavaria, the great and renowned prince. He went to Vienna with the emperor and empress. The people came out of the city to meet them; and Dukes Albert and Sigismund also came with their nobles. Duke Albert had placed under arms about 3,000 horse, and these made themselves visible to the emperor on a hill not far from Vienna, causing the emperor great concern. Duke Albert increased the emperor's suspicions by frequently riding to these troops and by holding secret conferences there. The captain of the troops is said to have remarked to Duke Albert, "If it pleases you, I can easily make you the master of Vienna and Austria on this day. No one can prevent it. I will capture the emperor and his retinue." But Duke Albert hesitated, and later he said, "Had you done this without my knowledge, I might have overlooked it in you, but it does not become me to ask you to do it. Dukes Albert and Sigmund were in a lodging called Praghof, while the emperor lodged in the houses of certain burghers; but the people guarded the castle. The dukes conspired together and took an oath to attack the castle by night and not to return home until they had taken it. This proposal became known to the burghers, who flew to arms and fortified the castle more strongly. Now a great battle took place with cruel slaughter, and the defeat of the dukes and the consequences might be conjectured. For a long time the outcome was in doubt. The burghers remained firm in their defense of the castle, while the princes would not give way to them in view of their oath not to return home until they had captured it. At last the matter was compromised so that the princes might enter the castle and tarry there until they had drunk their wine, whereupon they were to come out again. Three days later the lords of the country divided the castle into three parts, two to the dukes, the third to the emperor. A number of lords were chosen to arbitrate the differences between the brothers, and therein they were given full power and authority. But it is difficult to pass judgment against the mighty. The nobility and the princes of the church favored the emperor, but the common people adhered to Duke Albert.

Folio CCLXXIX recto

MORAVIA (MÄHREN)

MORAVIA lies to the north of Austria, and therein, between Hungary and Bohemia, north of the Danube, lives a free and predatory people. In this country the cities and villages observe the customs of the Roman church, adhering to the true Christian faith. The nobility and the Estates are nearly all tainted with the Hussite heresy. While John Capistrano there preached the word of God and zealously refuted the Hussite follies, one Ezernaboram, a landed lord of no mean estate, together with 2,000 subjects, was converted from the heretical errors to the true faith of the Roman Church. Protasius, his son, a good man of scriptural wisdom and habits, soon thereafter secured the bishopric of Olmutz. This is the only episcopal city in Moravia. Once upon a time the sovereignty of Moravia was very mighty and extensive, and so remained until the time of the son of Snatocupi, of whose career and affairs we have spoken in the history of Bohemia. But when the son of Snatocupi began to scorn the churches of God, the government of these people was taken from them and by the Roman emperors thereafter transferred to Bohemia.

SILESIA (SCHLESINGEN)

SILESIA, which follows Moravia (Mähren) is not a mean region. The noted river, called the Oder, which has its source in the Hungarian mountains on the eastern boundary of Silesia, flows through this region, discharging into the Baltic or German Sea. The length of this region is about 80 stadia. The capital of this people is Breslau, situated on the Oder. The heirs and rulers of this land were numerous, and the country was divided into many parts; and in consequence thereof it suffered serious loss on number of occasions. Among its rulers was a duke, named Bulco, who had his seat at Glogau. He was so addicted to bodily pleasures and carnality that he thoughtlessly said that there are neither angels nor devils, and that the body and soul die and pass away together. He never, or at least infrequently, went to church, and withheld himself from the Christian sacrament. He abused the marriage status, leaving his wife, who was not agreeable to him, and taking another. The language of this people is chiefly German, although Polish is spoken to a greater extent on the further side of the Oder; wherefore some have not improperly said that the Oder is the boundary of the German nation.

Folio CCLXXIX verso

POLAND

We will now permit the regions of Germany to rest, and consider the Sarmatian or Polish people, to the East and North. Poland is a large extensive region, bordering on Silesia on the West, and also on Hungary, Lithuania, and Prussia. Therein lies Cracow, most distinguished city of the kingdom. With this exception the cities of Poland are not illustrious, nearly all the houses being built of wood and coated with lime; and there are other characteristics already noted in this book. The antecedent kings divided this country into four parts. The king makes the circuit of these four parts every year, holding court in each, free of expense to himself; but if he remains in one place more than three months, he does so at his own expense. When the Polish king died, before our time, he left a daughter who was espoused to Duke William of Austria; and this duke was made king. But the German king was not acceptable to the Poles, and they called in Ladislaus of Lithuania, ejected William, and gave his spouse and the kingdom to the new king. Ladislaus was a heathen and a worshipper of idolatrous gods, but he received baptism with the kingdom. After his conversion to Christ he conducted himself like a spiritual prince, drawing many Lithuanians to the Holy Gospel, erecting several episcopal churches, and conferring great honors on the bishops. If while out riding he saw a church steeple, he always removed his hat and bowed his head in honor of God. He success fully fought against the Tartars and other infidels, and won a great victory over the Prussians. By his second wife, who was almost ninety years of age, this Ladislaus begot two sons, Wladislaus and Casimir. Upon his death Wladislaus received the Polish kingdom, while Casimir secured the duchy of Lithuania. Before that time Ladislaus had been chosen king of Hungary. He was slain in the war against the Turks. The Estates of Poland called in as king, Frederick the margrave of Brandenburg, who had spent the days of his youth in the Polish kingdom, and knew the language and customs of the people. But it was asserted that since Casimir, duke of Lithuania, brother of the deceased king, had the first right as heir, it was only proper that he should be first consulted to ascertain his wishes and intentions; and should Casimir be willing to accept the kingdom as his brotherly and paternal inheritance, the margrave Frederick would not consider it proper to hinder him therein. The same prudence had been employed by Albert, duke of Bavaria, toward Ladislaus, in refusing the Bohemian kingdom whom offered to him. And so the emperor Frederick, when the Hungarians and Bohemians offered him the inheritance left by King Ladislaus, would hear no more of it. And although the Lithuanians were not willing to give up Casimir, he went to Poland, accepted the sovereignty, and ruled in peace. Ere long he espoused King Ladislaus' sister, and he became involved in much strife with the Teutonic Knights.

LITHUANIA

Folio CCLXXX recto

LITHUANIA is also an extensive region, with Poland on the east; and it has many lakes and forests; Vitoldus, a brother of Wladislaus, reigned there, and after giving up idolatry, he received the Sacrament of Christ, together with the kingdom of Poland. He attained to great fame. His subjects so greatly feared him that when he asked them to hang themselves, they preferred to appear obedient rather than incur his disfavor. Those who opposed him he caused to be sewed up in bear skins and to be thrown to the bears to be torn to pieces; and he persecuted them with other cruelties. Wherever he rode he carried a drawn bow, and when he encountered anyone who did not demean himself to his liking, he promptly shot him with an arrow; and by such sport this bloody tyrant slew many people. Sindrigal, his successor, maintained a she-bear that ate bread out of his hands. This bear often ran into the forest, but returned home; and when he was hungry, the bear would go to the prince's chamber, scratching on every door, and knocking thereon with his paws. The prince opened to him and fed him. A number of young noblemen conspired against the prince; and having armed themselves, came to the door of his chamber, knocking thereon as the bear was accustomed to do. Thinking the bear was there, Sindrigal opened the door, and was promptly stabbed to death by the nobles. Thereupon the sovereignty devolved upon Casimir. In the summer Lithuania is not readily accessible because of the waters, but in the winter one may travel over the frozen lakes. The merchants travel over the ice and snow, and carry food supplies for many days. No roads have been laid out, and there are but few cities and villages. Among the Lithuanians most of the trade is in raw materials. The use of money is not known, and in its stead raw materials, sable, and the like are used. With the consent of their husbands the noble-women openly have paramours whom they call assistants in wedlock; however, it is unbecoming and disgraceful for the married men to have concubines; but they easily relieve themselves of wedlock and take another wife. Among the Lithuanians much wax and honey is available, which the bees gather in the forests. The Lithuanians seldom use wine, and their bread is very black. They obtain much milk from their animals. The language of these people is Wendic, a very extensive language, which is divided into many dialects. A number of Wends, for instance the Dalmatians, Croatians, Carniolians and Poles, adhere to the Roman Catholic Church; others to the Greek heresy, such as the Bulgarians, Russians and many from Lithuania. Some have invented certain heresies, such as the Bohemians, the Moravians, and the Bosnians, among whom the majority adhere to the Manichaeian heresy. Some are still benighted by heathen blindness. This is true of many Lithuanians of whom a great number were converted to Christianity when Wladislaus, the Lithuanian, accepted the Polish sovereignty; for a number of Lithuanians before that time worshipped serpents, every household father having and maintaining a serpent in a niche. Some worshipped fire, some the sun, some an oversized hammer, and others the forests.

Folio CCLXXX verso

From all these errors and superstitions they were converted to Christianity by Jerome, a native of Prague, who at the time that the Hussite heresy originated fled from Bohemia to Poland, and received from Wladislaus, the Polish king, a letter of recommendation to Vitoldus, the Lithuanian prince, and rooted out the aforesaid heresies among the people.

RUSSIA

The Russians border on the Lithuanians, and are a coarse and unskilled people. In this country lies the city of Novgorod, to which the German merchants travel under great difficulty. It is rich in possessions, and much silver, and costly raw material are bought and sold there. Silver is weighed and not used in minted form. There is a square stone in this market. He who succeeds in mounting it, and is not thrown off, is invested with the government of the city.

ESTONIA

Estonia (German Esthland, or Eifland) is the last region and province of the Christians. It borders on Russia to the north. The Tartars often sally into this region. The Teutonic Knights conquered this country with the sword and converted it to the Christian faith. Before then it was heathen and idolatrous. To the west the region borders on the Baltic Sea. Although this region was not known to the Greeks and Italians as it is now, the Christian faith opened this part of the world to our people, removing the coarseness of these barbarians and introducing morals into their lives.

OF THE PEOPLE CALLED THE MASSAGETAE.

Between Estonia and Prussia lies a small country, probably only a day's journey in width, but very extensive from Prussia to Estonia. Therein live a people called the Massagetae. It is neither heathen nor really Christian; yet it is subject to the domination of Poland. From thence the Polish kingdom extends to the sea.

PRUSSIA

Folio CCLXXXI recto

After the Massagetae we encounter the Prussians. They live on both sides of the Vistula. It has its source in the mountains which separate Poland from Hungary, and waters a portion of the latter. It flows through Prussia from Dorn to Danzig, where it discharges into the sea. Inasmuch as the location of this country and the history of the wars between the Teutonic Knights and the Polish kings were noted at Folio CCX of this book, we will here avoid repetition of the same matters which were written at length by Aeneas.

Folio CCLXXXI verso

SAXONY

After the Prussians the Saxons loom up - an extensive people, whose possessions extend from the west to the river Weser, although some say as far as the Rhine, Saxony borders on Denmark to the north; Franconia, Bavaria and Bohemia to the south; Silesia and Prussia to the east. In this terrain are included Thuringia, Lausitz, and Pomerania, although the Thuringians are said to have been in this country before the Saxons. For it is said that the Saxons were Greeks who were brought to this country in ships by the Macedonians, who distressed the Thuringians with many wars and drove them out of their homeland; which to me does not appear to be the truth. For the Saxon name is very ancient in Germany, and is mentioned by all the old historians; however, those who speak of the German people do not mention the Thuringians. I find the Thuringians mentioned in connection with the first advent of the Franks, who came to Germany in the time of the emperor Valentinian. Emperor Charlemagne conducted many wars against the Saxons before they were converted to Christianity, and defeated them in great battles. But when, upon the termination of his lineage, the Roman imperial sovereignty passed to the Germans of the East, the Saxon influence increased; and among them were many kings celebrated for their exceptional intelligence and noble achievements. In the land of Pomerania, which adjoins Saxony to the east are many distinguished and renowned cities, - Wismar, Smidis, Grisvold (Greifswald?), Stettin, and Rostock. A university is situated by the sea, and many wealthy merchants live here. In the Saxon division lies an episcopal city, Cammin, whose bishopric is very extensive and no smaller than that of Mainz. The bishop there is subject to the Roman See alone. Brandenburg is divided into two Marks, one the old (Altmark) the other the new (Neumark). The Elbe runs through Altmark, and therein lie the cities of Stendal, Gadoin (Gardelegen?), Salzwedel, and Osterburg. Neumark is divided by the river Oder, and in this Mark lies Frankfurt, a wealthy commercial city. This region is also watered by the Spree, on whose banks the city of Berlin is situated. Item: Another river, called the Hortel (Havel?), divides the city of Brandenburg, from which city the Mark took its name, into two parts, one called the old city, the other the new. And therein is an episcopal seat and the court of the margrave's jurisdiction. On the banks of this river lies the episcopal city of Havelberg, surrounded by a terrain called Prignitz, containing a number of towns and a warlike population. Meissen is a capital city from which Meissen derived its name. The Elbe runs through this city, and here is a secure castle, and in it an episcopal church. There are many cities in this province, and many people skilled in arms. Of these we may name Merseburg, as well as Leipzig, an industrial city with a university. In Thuringia lies Erfurt, a noble capital city subject to the bishop of Mainz. It is adorned with a commendable university; also the city of Naumburg, which is subject to the duke of Saxony. They all avail themselves of Saxon laws, language and customs. The true Saxons are those of Magdeburg; also those of Bremen, Halberstadt, Hildesheim, Werden, Braunschweig, Hamburg, Lüneburg, and Lübeck. At Halberstadt is an episcopal church founded by Charlemagne. In this city, once a year, a person regarded as a great sinner, chosen from among the people, arrayed in wretched raiment, his head covered, is escorted to the church on the first day of Lent; and after the divine office has been performed, he is cast out again. Daily for the entire forty days of the fast he walks barefoot through the city and about the churches, but not into them. He speaks to no one, and, after midnight, sleeps in the streets. On holy Maundy Thursday, after the blessing of the oil, he is again escorted into the church, and, after prayer, is absolved of his sins and given money by the people; but this same money is left to the church. They call him Adam and now look upon him as freed of all sins. The soil in the vicinity of Halberstadt is very fertile, producing grain, whose stalks tower over a man on horseback. Braunschweig is a large city and renowned throughout Germany. It has a large population, and is fortified with battlements, moats, towers, and bow-windows.

It also has elegant houses, beautiful streets, and well adorned church edifices; also five markets, five town-halls, and as many councils. From this city the dukes of Braunschweig obtained their name and title, the noblest throughout Germany. I am content to mention the daring deed of just one person from this place,- a man named Cuntz von Kauffen, born in a noble region of Saxony. He was experienced in military affairs, quick in action, and unafraid. He felt that he had been unjustly deprived of his paternal inheritance through Duke Frederick of Saxony, and on that account committed an unbelievable offense in this manner: There is a castle in the country of Meissen situated on a sharp and craggy rock, called Altenburg, and below it lies a beautiful and secure little town of many people. In this castle, Ernest and Albert, the two young sons of Duke Frederick, were being reared. Pursuant to information given him by the preceptor of the two young princes, Cuntz von Kauffen entered the castle during the night by means of ladders and seized the two youths while asleep; and when they awoke he threatened them with death should they cry out. He secured them with cords and led them away, confident that once in Bohemia with them, he could sell them for a large sum of money and thus avenge himself. When he reached the Bohemian forest with the two lads, he believed himself beyond all danger. When the youngest of the two princes, weary and hungry, desired rest and food, the robber was so moved by his plea that he went to a charcoal burner and requested him to take bread and beer to the lad. In the meantime this new event caused a hue and cry at Altenburg. The burghers speedily followed the footprints of the robber and fortunately came upon the path which led directly to the charcoal burner. And there Cuntz von Kauffen was seized while handing the food to the youth; taken to the duke, and beheaded for his avaricious misdeed. Only a small part of Saxony proper is subject to the jurisdiction of the duke of Saxony; for in this province are many other princes, many imperial cities, and many bishops with their own estates. But Meissen and the greater part of Thuringia and many cities in Lausitz and Franconia are subject to this duke and prince. The right to vote as elector for a Roman emperor is vested in the dukes of Saxony through a small principality lying between Meissen and Silesia; and therein lies the capital city of Wittenberg or Weisberg. At Goslar, in Saxony, silver mines were discovered by the emperor Otto I. Saxony also has many salt springs, from which pure salt is obtained. Near Lüneburg are mines rich and abundant in salt, from which many abbots and prelates secured a living; but those of Lüneburg obtained control over them by force.

DENMARK

To the north are three kingdoms that adjoin one another, Denmark, Sweden and Norway. Denmark, a part of Germany, was at one time in the possession of the Saxons. Here originated the invasion of the barbarians, who were bent on overrunning Italy and destroying Rome. They were extirpated by Marius Arpinus.

SWEDEN

SWEDEN is surrounded by the sea on all sides and includes many islands, among which one called Scandania has been long remembered by the ancient historians. From this island a countless multitude of people at one time went forth, depressing all Europe with war. They fought against the Goths and Huns, besieged Pannonia, Moesia, Macedonia, and the entire region of Illyria, and devastated all Germany, Gaul and Italy. They finally settled down in Spain; and from hence was their origin.

NORWAY

NORWAY (which derived its name from north) extends northward into an unknown region, or as some conjecture, into the Frozen Sea. To the west and south is the German Sea, and to the east the English Sea. It is thought that those who took possession of the region and places in Saxony came from Norway. Before these times Valdemar (III) ruled in Sweden, while "the great Aquinus" reigned in Norway. Of the latter it is said that he was a devout person, and that he was honored by his subjects with remarkable affection and subservience. His wife Margrete was the daughter of Valdemar, and to her was born Olaf, who succeeded his father. But he did not live long, and he left the kingdom to his mother. When her father died, she also inherited his kingdom. But when "Aquinus" died in Sweden, "Albert the duke, of Naupolensis" received the crown at the behest of the people. He disdained the rule of his neighbor because the ruler was a woman, and undertook a war against Denmark and Norway. And Margrete mustered her forces and engaged Albert in a large field, fighting with the courage of a man. She defeated and captured Albert and deposed him from his throne. This illustrious woman, Margrete, reigned with honor for three years until her old age. Bowed down in years, and no longer able to govern alone, she chose Duke "Henry" of Pomerania, then fourteen years of age, as an adopted son and sovereign of the kingdom; and she espoused him to Philippa, daughter of the English king. When "Henry's" (Erik's) wife died without issue, and he would not remarry, and he had now reigned 55 years, he was deposed in a general revolt, and Christopher, a duke of Bavaria, a son of his sister, was chosen in his stead. But during the ten years he reigned he allowed his uncle to rule in the island of Gotland. When Christopher died the crown of Denmark and Norway passed to Christigerus. The Swedes were not unanimous in the election of a king, some favoring Charles, a very chivalrous man, while others preferred his younger brother Canute. During the course of the election Charles sent a number of armed men to Stockholm, the royal seat; and they took the city. Then Canute and his followers attacked the castle, and a war arose between the two brothers. The result was in doubt for a long time, and many were slain on both sides. Finally it was proposed that the people, to the exclusion of the nobility, elect a king. Charles, being more acceptable to the people, was chosen, while Canute went into seclusion. Charles drove "Henry" (Erik) from the island which had been given him. But the misdeeds of Charles did not remain unavenged; for he was defeated in battle, driven from the kingdom, and lived in exile for a long time on a small island not far from the mouth of the Vistula.

BOHEMIA

Folio CCLXXXIII verso

He who would learn something of the origin, character and location of Bohemia will find it in previous parts of this book at folios XXIV, CLXXVII, CLXXXIX, CCIII and CCLXXXIII.

FRIESLAND

FRIESLAND, situated on the sea, is bounded by Saxony on the east, Westphalia on the south, and Utrecht on the west. Some would have it that the inhabitants of Utrecht are Frisians, and among these I find Otto, bishop of the Church of Friesland, who, not without skill, wrote German history. Bishop Albert of Mainz, who erected the cloister at Fulda, and undertook to instruct the Frisians in the Christian faith, was slain by them and crowned with martyrdom. This is a liberty-loving people, skilled in arms, strong and erect in body, of a confident and fearless disposition, and pride themselves on their independence, although the duke of Burgundy calls himself a lord of this country. Nevertheless Friesland enjoys its own customs and usages, and will not submit to foreign domination. The Frisian does not hesitate to die for liberty. Knightly honors are not recognized by the people, and they will not tolerate a proud man who elevates himself above the rest. They annually elect a council for the general welfare on terms of equality. They severely punish female wantonness. In order that the priests may not pollute the marriage-bed, they do not readily admit those who have no wives; for they believe it difficult for a man to restrain himself. Their entire wealth is in their cattle. The country is flat and maritime, and has extensive fields. Wood is scarce, and the people maintain their fires in clay vessels, using dried cow-dung for fuel. Cornelius Tacitus writes that in the time of the emperor Nero, two emissaries came to Rome from this country; and after they had entered the council chamber of Pompey, and there saw a number of foreigners sitting among the councillors, and were told that such honors were due to the representatives of people who excelled in Roman virtue and friendship, they came forward, and seating themselves among the Roman councillors, cried out that none excel the Germans in arms, fidelity and faith; for which reason Nero endowed them with a city.

HOLLAND

HOLLAND is a province of Germany. To the north it lies on the sea. In other places it is formed like an island, enclosed by the branches of the Rhine. It is a maritime country, rich in meadows, and watered by many lakes and rivers from the sea. Some say that the noble city of Utrecht is in Holland, which we do not consider incredible. The principality of the Church of Utrecht is subject to the emperor alone. Its jurisdiction covers a large area watered by numerous branches of the Rhine. To the east are the Frieslanders; to the south is Westphalia; to the west the duchy of Gelders, separated by the Rhine. Utrecht is a wealthy and well populated city, of German manners and speech. In case of necessity the bishop there can muster 40,000 armed men for war. The men and women are well built and are able to protect themselves against invasion from the enemy by their own strength and by inundation. Beer is the drink of the people, and the merchants bring wine there.

ZEELAND

The last people of German nationality are to the north and west. These are the Zeelanders, who live on an island opposite the mouth of the Rhine. Among them are the Middelburgers. The place is very well fortified, wealthy, and devoted to manufacturing and commerce. Therein lies a small but not ignoble city called Brielle, surrounded by water, on which merchants do their shipping.

WESTPHALIA

Folio CCLXXXIII recto

WESTPHALIA extends to the Rhine on the west, the river Weser on the east, Friesland and the district of Utrecht on the north, the Hessian mountains on the south, in which mountains the Amisia (Ems) has its source. This river flows by the noble cities of Paderborn and Munster, dividing the country through the middle. It then passes through Friesland and into the sea. The river Saale also drains Westphalia. Between that river and the Rhine, Drusus Germanicus secured a victory over the enemy. Charlemagne fought many wars with the Westphalians, defeating them in battle, and compelling them to give up idolatry and to accept the Christian faith. But as they often denied Christianity and ignored the obligations of their oaths, he appointed secret judges so that he might end their hostility through fear of punishment. To these judges he gave the power to promptly punish, without interference or favor, those who violated their oaths, or committed any other offense. And for this purpose he chose brave men, lovers of justice, who could not be suspected of persecuting the innocent. But when respectable and middle-class men were later found hanging on trees in the forests, great fears seized the Westphalians; and thereby they were kept in the faith. The practices and usages of this Westphalian tribunal, which is called secret, are known throughout Germany; wherefore lengthy description is here avoided.

Folio CCLXXXIII verso

HESSE

HESSE, a mountainous country, lies between Westphalia and Franconia. It extends from the Rhine on the north to Thuringia. The prince of these people, a landgrave, during our own time was called to rule the empire, but considering himself unequal to the task, preferred to usefully govern a small principality left him by his parents, than to fail in a greater undertaking. He said that he considered his lack of knowledge of the letters hindrance in the management of Christian affairs; yet he was an augments and protector of the law, which he caused to be interpreted to him according to his father's tongue. Although matters were often heard before him, it has never been said of him that he pronounced an unjust judgment. This prince went to a cloister with the intention of reforming it. The cloister-people invited him to dine with them, and it has been suspected that by this means poison was administered to him and to the abbot who favored the reforms. They died soon thereafter.

FRANCONIA

FRANCONIA borders on Swabia and Bavaria on the south; on the Rhine to the west; on Bohemia and Thuringia on the east; and on Thuringia and Hesse to the north. Inasmuch as the origin of Franconia and its ancient government, particularly of the cities of Nuremberg, Bamberg and Wurtzburg have already been set forth in this hook, together with illustrations and sketches of their form, and descriptions and references largely taken from Aeneas Silvius, it is not fitting that we should place a double burden on the reader; and we therefore refer him to the earlier descriptions of each city, under its proper head, and will say nothing further of Franconia, except (as Aeneas Silvius in the conclusion of his history of Franconia states) that in this country Margrave Frederick of Brandenburg was in favor with Emperor Sigismund and his friends. To him four sons were born, John, Frederick, Albert, and yet another Frederick, John, being the eldest, was entitled to the electorate; but his father preferred Frederick over him, regarding him as more fitted, and this not without reason; for Frederick was an augments of justice and righteousness and was renowned among the German princes for his wisdom. Albert from the days of his youth had been reared in knightly conduct, and was not only gifted in the art of war, but also in horsemanship and jousting. He achieved many valorous and mighty deeds, not to forget those gifts and graces which he possessed by nature.

BAVARIA

Folio CCLXXXVI verso

BAVARIA is an extensive territory, bordering on Franconia on the north and Swabia to the west. It is bounded by the Italian mountains to the south, and by Austria and Bohemia on the east. The Danube flows very nearly through the middle of the country. Some have said that the river Iser, and others that the river Inn, separates Austria from Bavaria. The Lech separates Swabia from Bavaria. This region was at one time occupied by the Noricii; for the region to the north of the Danube, between Rogensburg and Nuremberg, was called Noricum. Historians differ as to the origin of the name Bavaria and of the Bavarian people. Although Strabo describes this region as a wilderness, and it may have been such in his time, it is now well built up and adorned with many wealthy, excellent and renowned cities; nor do we know of any in all Europe which excel them in appearance. In this country are five episcopal cities, and among these is Salzburg, which is an archbishopric. Before our time, in Bavaria, Ludwig der Höckerige (Hunchback) began an evil war against Louis, his father, an honorable and distinguished old man, once a governor in France, and besieged him in a secure castle; but through divine vengeance he was seized with a fever, and died before he had overcome his father.

Folio CCLXXXVII recto

Thereafter he fell into the power of Duke Henry, and died soon thereafter; nor did Henry live long after that; for when he forbade his subjects to make a pilgrimage to Rome in order that his country might not be relieved of its money, he died in the same year. His duchy was inherited by the son he begot by the sister of King Albert, - a youth of magnanimous disposition, zealous for honor and renown, and a scorner of money. By public proclamation he drove all the Jews out of his realm. He espoused a wife from Saxony, the daughter of Emperor Frederick's sister. He caused dissension and war in Germany.

RHINELAND

In the Rhineland (which flourished in our own time) constant dissension and discord prevailed between Dietrich, bishop of Mainz, and Louis, the palgrave of the Rhine; and they often took to arms, the entire region thereabout being devastated by robbery and fire. The margraves of Baden and Brandenburg gave assistance to those of Mainz, while the bishop of Trier and several other cities aided the palgrave. Now when Palgrave Louis (who had espoused the widow of King Louis of Sicily) died, his brother, Duke Frederick, with the consent of the country and the nobles, assumed the regency for his minor son, styling himself an elector, and engaging to remain single, so that the rights of his ward might not be prejudiced. When thereunto requested, Pope Nicholas V confirmed the guardianship; but Emperor Frederick, though often solicited on high authority, remained opposed thereto. Duke Albert, brother of Emperor Frederick, with varying fortune, carried on a war with many cities in Swabia. In the margraviate of Baden, margrave Jacob, a prince among the Germans and highly renowned for justice and intelligence, realizing that for the satisfaction of his human happiness he lacked nothing but a knowledge of letters, held his sons to the study of literature; and after he had espoused one of his sons, named Charles, a man of extraordinary bravery, to Emperor Frederick's sister, he died full of years, and not reluctantly.

THE TYROLESE

When the Tyrolese, who live in the valleys of the Inn and the Etsch, requested Emperor Frederick to restore to them Duke Sigismund, who was under his care and guardianship, and the emperor declined to do so, they took up arms and drove out the officials whom the emperor had appointed. Now when those of Trient, at the command of the bishop to whom they were subject, remained faithful and loyal to the emperor, the Tyrolese went to Trient, and with an army captured the city, and also forced the castle to capitulate. Thereafter they arrived at an understanding with the emperor and secured their lord with less good fortune than they had surmised.

SWITZERLAND

The Swiss, a liberty loving mountain people, with a large army, overran those of Zurich who had violated a treaty they had made with the Swiss; and they devastated their lands and fields. When those of Zurich chanced a battle with the Swiss, they were nearly all slain; and the Swiss raged against the vanquished with great cruelty, gathering up the bodies of the dead in the field, making tables and benches of them, opening their bodies, drinking their blood, and tearing their hearts out with their teeth.

ALSACE

Then Louis, the Dauphin of Vienne, in Alsace (the region which was erstwhile French, but now belongs to Germany, conducted a French expedition into the country of Basle, greatly frightening the people, their Swiss allies sent 4,000 able-bodied young fighting men to their assistance. When the Dauphin learned that these men were hastening to the city, he interposed himself between the city and the Swiss, whose numbers increased to 30,000 men, prepared for battle. Both sides fought with great energy. Finally the Swiss, whether vanquished or victorious, rested from fatigue; but few of them fled, and the rest were slain. Seldom did a Swiss die unavenged; for most of the French, who had been slain, were found pierced through with Swiss lances, the Swiss having charged into the very midst of the enemy spears to avenge themselves for wounds received.

SAVOY

Amadeus I, Duke of Savoy, prospered his country and secured peace by force of arms. After reigning 40 years he left his duchy, forsaking worldly renown and honor, and went into the wilderness with six knights. Finally he was elevated to the papacy in the manner already set forth in this book. Very few people acknowledged him as a vicar of Christ, the exceptions being his own subjects, the Swiss, those of Basle, those of Strassburg, and the adherents of Duke Albert of Bavaria.

SUPPLEMENTAL NOTE

Leneas Silvius Pius, in the beginning of his booklet, stated that he would bring European affairs into the light. But while he was concerning himself with the divisions of Upper and Lower Germany, he left the flowers of the nation by the wayside; for he wrote nothing of the Swabians, the most ancient people of Germany, whom Strabo, the historian, and Julius Caesar eulogized with wonderful praise in matters of war. Swabia is now well provided with many episcopal churches and has many excellent and highly celebrated cities. It is watered by many renowned rivers, is productive and rich in grain and wine, has very intelligent and well-informed people, as well as an able army. He has also foregone both banks of the Rhine, from its source down to Cologne, on both sides of which river may be seen a large number of great episcopal imperial and princely cities, located on fertile soil, rich in grain and fruits, particularly in wine. Practically all Germany and the northern regions idolize this Rhenish wine. Here also are the episcopal cities of Constance, Besle, Strassburg, Spires, Worms, Mainz, and Coblenz, all well fortified with defenses, battlements, moats and high bow-windows. And there live a happy friendly people, part of whom sustain themselves by cultivation of the fertile soil, and part by commerce. The nobility are devoted to the chase, most of them spending their lives in merriment and sensual pleasures. He also overlooked that part of Germany watered by the river called the Linth, which has its source in the Glarus mountains, flows into the Sea of Zurich, and runs through it. This region is defended by strong cities and castles, such as Berne, Lucerne, Zurich, and Solothurn, and by a very warlike people, called the Swiss Confederation, which is feared by all the principalities in the neighborhood, and in a short time marvelously extended its power. He has also foregone Flanders, Hennegau, as well as Brabant, a region illustrious for its wealth and merchandise; and therein lie Bruges, Ghent, Mechlin, and Antwerp. Although the region was considered to be part of Lower France, since the enlargement of the German Empire the people speak in the German tongue.

FRANCE

In the kingdom of France (which in our time was freed from the English, pursuant to divine premonition, as is believed, by Joan of Lorraine, who in male attire, and as first of the foremost fought at the head of the French lancers), serious dissension and hostility arose between King Charles and his son, the Dauphin of Vienne, when Philip the duke of Burgundy, after his father's violent death, turned from the English to the French. Charles the Angevin duke, uncle of the Dauphin, at this time had great power and influence with the king. However, John, the duke of Auvergne, chose not to submit to the power of Charles; nor did the Bourbon prince and his brother regard the Angevin rule without suspicion. Accordingly they advised the Dauphin to forsake his father; and by this means, through the king's inclination to his son, they hoped to influence the king to discard Charles and to rule his kingdom with better counsel. Under this influence the Dauphin, ignoring his father, went over to the Nivernians. And when the king learned of this, he speedily collected an army and appeared before Alençon; and with a small force he captured many fortifications, and the duke surrendered. He then proceeded against his son; but since the Nivernian cities did not dare protect the Dauphin against the power of his father, they requested the Dauphin to leave. And so he went to Bourbonais, and ere long, by reason of the hostility of the Bourbon princes, he became reconciled to his father; which, however, did not work to the advantage of his brother; for in a short time he was captured and drowned. Ere long René, who was driven out of the kingdom of Sicily, espoused his daughter to King Henry of England. And to this the French king was not opposed, for through this marriage he secured for himself and his kingdom a long and wholesome postponement of the war with the English. And flow that these matters had been adjusted, and the king was now secure at home, and his kingdom free from the plunder and incendiarism of by which it had been distressed for a long time, he sent the Dauphin (as heretofore stated) with a great army against those of Switzerland and Basle, while he himself with the rest of the army proceeded into Lorraine, harassing Metz and Toul. When the inhabitants of Spinal surrendered, he took that city away from the bishopric of Metz. Thereafter when Francis of Aragon by stealth took the city of Tosorsi(?) which is situated in Normandy and belonged to a duke of Brittany, he was regarded as a violator of the peace by the mighty kings of France and England; and many embassies were sent back and forth in the matter. Flothetus was sent there by the king of France with a fair sized military force; and he caused several wagons loaded with hay, in which soldiers were concealed, to be driven upon the bridge of the castle and to halt there at the gate, while he with his concealed troops awaited the signal.

Folio CCLXXXVIII verso

And now the men tumbled out of the hay, slew the gatekeepers, and held possession until Flothetus quickly came up and took the bridge and the castle by force. When the king learned of this he sent many men over the same bridge into Normandy, while Francis, the duke of Brittany led an army from the other side. The duke of Somerset had received this province from the king of England, and when this duke learned that this attack and engagement were taking place, he asked Talbot, the general at Rouen, to stand by him, hoping by his advice and assistance to maintain the city, which appeared to be wavering. But his advice was in vain; for when those of Rouen learned that the king was approaching, they sent their emissaries to him agreeing to the entry of the king's army into the city and to obey his commands. And so the city was given up to the king. But Talbot and the duke (of Somerset) and all their adherents fled into the castle. When the castle was about to be stormed, the duke of Somerset left his two step-sons in Talbot's care and secretly fled to England. Thereafter the castle was surrendered, and Talbot and the duke's step-sons were taken into custody by the king. But since Talbot had not acted with evil motives, as rumor would have it, but conducted open warfare, merely employing his physical strength and skill in the exercise of his best judgment, he was liberated, on condition, however, that henceforth he would not make war against the French. Some say that Talbot went to home in the Jubilee Year to seek absolution and release from his obligations; but to me this appears incredible. It is known, however, that when Talbot returned to England, and the king of France had reduced all Normandy and Bordeaux, Talbot was sent with a large army by the king of England to Vasconia, and that he recaptured Bordeaux and many other fortresses which had seceded from England. Some of these he took by force, others by capitulation. When the king of France heard of this, he hastily collected two armies. One of these, consisting of 15,000 men, he ordered directly to Bordeaux, and the other he commanded himself. And when the king came to a small castle seven miles from Bordeaux, he undertook to storm it. He also captured a tower between Bordeaux and said castle, and this he manned with archers. When Talbot saw that he had two armies to contend with, he decided to first engage the army which he might defeat with the least effort. Accordingly he set out with his army and reached the tower by night, captured it, and slew all the archers, 500 in number. When he moved on in the morning and observed that the royal forces were preparing to retreat, he began to fear that his quarry might escape him; and he ordered the rest to bring up the rear, while he with a force of 500 arquebuses and 800 archers speeded ahead to engage the enemy. For a long time the enemy considered whether to retreat; but fearing to disgrace the king, they decided to abide the fortunes of a battle. They placed 300 arquebuses to intercept Talbot, and placed many other implements of war here and there to injure the enemy. Now when the English unconsciously rushed into the wagon-fort of the French, the weapons were discharged, and in the first attack about 300 Englishmen were slain. When this was reported to Talbot, he exhorted his son, who was with him, to leave and to save himself for a better opportunity; but his son said he would not flee from a battle in which his father was involved. And the father said, My dear son, because of my many renowned deeds, I cannot die without renown, nor flee without disgracing myself; but you, as a novice in knightly affairs, will not be dishonored by flight, nor will death make you renowned. But the son refused to leave his father, and was slain with him.

ENGLAND

In ENGLAND, King Henry, a man addicted to retirement and idleness, ruled the kingdom on foreign advice rather than by the exercise of his own judgment. The duke of Suffolk was mighty and powerful with the king during this time, for he governed the common people as well as the nobility according to his own will. But when English influence in France declined, and French power became re-established, the duke of York, with no small number of men, as well as nobles, came to London with the intention of effecting a change in the king's council, and improving the status of the king and queen. But Suffolk did not tarry to await the consequences. He took to sea and fled from thence. But who can escape his fore-ordained death; for a number were ordered to hastily pursue him, and he was arrested and slain. The duke of Somerset who returned to England after the loss of Normandy was also mighty and powerful with the king; but he was imprisoned and many of the nobility were slain. A number of the clergy were not spared either, among them our friend Adam Molynes, secretary to the king, who was beheaded. Not long thereafter, when the duke of York returned home, the duke of Somerset, who had now been liberated with the consent of the king, began to govern the kingdom; this brought him to great grief, for he was slain by the duke of York.

SCOTLAND

Scotland is in the same island as England, and the last region to the north. It has small rivers and is separated from England by mountains. We were there during the winter, when the sun shone upon the earth for a little over three hours. At that time reigned James, a ponderous and obese man, who at one time was imprisoned in England, and was in custody for eleven years before he was liberated. He finally married, an English woman, then returned home and killed many by violence. At last he himself was slain by his household. We at one time heard of a tree in Scotland, that bore fruit shaped like ducks; and when it matured, a portion of the fruit fell into the water and a portion to the earth. That which fell to the ground rotted, while that which fell into the water became alive, and swam under the water, and then flew into the air. But when we eagerly inquired into the matter, learned that this tree was not in Scotland, but was found in the Olcades Islands. However, we did see this marvel in Scotland: The poor naked people, who begged alms of the churches, received white stones, for which they were very thankful; for these stones were of sulphurous or fatty substance, and they used them as wood, of which there was a great scarcity in Scotland.

IRELAND

At this time we should write something about Ireland, which is separated from England by a small sea, but not having found anything memorable during those times, we hasten on to Spain.

Folio CCLXXXVIII verso

SPAIN

SPAIN, an extensive country whose soil is comparable to the best, and which is mighty in arms, is in our own time divided among five kings. The first and greatest is called the King of Castile; the second, of Aragon; the third, of Portugal; the fourth, of Navarre; the fifth, of Granada. The last was established in Castile, the far reaching kingdom. These kings were of Gothic blood and never changed their lineage. Although Alvaro de Luna of Aragon, a man of noble ancestry, was born out of wedlock, Johanna at one time proclaimed him head over the consolidated kingdom, with the intention that he should be regarded as the embodiment of royal power. In ruling the kingdom he harassed with war John of Navarre and Henry, master of the knightly Order of Santiago. After he was deprived of his estates and driven from the court by the queen, he lived in retirement for some time. Ere long a feud arose between John of Navarre and Henry, in which many persons were slain on both sides. But Alvaro secured the victory, and in the course of the same battle Henry was wounded in the hand, and died a few days later. His authority and rule passed to Alvaro, and long thereafter he was called rather and constable of the kingdom. He finally succumbed to the envy of the mighty; for when he threw out of the window a noble, who at the king's command brought him a message, he was soon arrested and beheaded in the market place. He was a man of wholesome spirit, renowned at home and in the field, and whose mind was constantly charged with great matters. Henceforth John ruled the kingdom himself for a number of years. After his death his son Henry received the kingdom. He was a youth of great courage, and upright. He left his former wife and took another, the sister of the queen of Portugal. He conducted an expedition into the kingdom of Granada, devastating and destroying large part of the enemy country. In the kingdom of Navarre the father took up arms against the son, and the son against the father; finally the son was driven from the kingdom, and he fled to his uncle Alphonso, the king of Aragon and Sicily. In A.D. 1491, the entire kingdom of Betice, now called Granada, was overrun and taken possession of by the Christians after the defeat of the heathen inhabitants, the imprisonment of their kings and the capture of the city of Granada.

PORTUGAL

In Portugal is (Dom) Pedro, surnamed "the Speechless," (for so the sons of royal marriages are called before they begin to reign),- a prince of great renown, who traveled throughout Europe, giving proof of his moral training. After he had governed the kingdom as regent for some time with great credit, and had not in the least intentionally opposed (King) Alphonso, his nephew and son-in-law, he was finally shot to death in consequence of a growing hatred that culminated in a war. He had attained renown and credit as a man of great valor in fighting against the Turks under Emperor Sigismund. Thereafter Alphonso, a most gentle prince, magnanimous, and of extraordinary intelligence, quietly took over the kingdom. When his most beloved spouse died, no one could persuade him to take another, and he devoted himself to such matters as might bring him credit and bear fruit for Christianity. When his nobility and power were invoked, he took up the cross, and promised to conduct a crusade against the Turks. In the following year, (Prince) Henry (the Navigator of Portugal), realizing that his kingdom of Portugal covered but a small area, and being eager to enlarge the same, proceeded into the Spanish Sea with great daring; and by the counsel and wisdom of those possessing knowledge of land and sea, he discovered many and various islands, never inhabited by man. He sailed to one of these uninhabited islands. There he found a spring, fertile soil, and a forest, all well adapted to human habitation. He settled a number of people on this island. It yields so much sugar that all Europe can be supplied far beyond its needs. This island is called

Folio CCXC verso

Madeira, and after it the sugar is named. He also discovered other habitable islands, and gave them the names St. George, Fayal, and Pico. One of these islands he settled with "German people" from Flanders. It yields grain. Therefore, in A.D. 1483, King John of Portugal a man of lofty mind, provided several galleons, and fitted them all with the necessities of life. He despatched them on a voyage of discovery beyond the Pillars of Hercules, southward toward Ethiopia. Over those ships he appointed two patrons (captains), namely Jacobus Canus (Diego Cão), a Portuguese, and Martin Behaim, a German of Nuremberg, born there of good family, and highly informed as to the location of the land, and most patient of the sea, and who by experience and by navigation over a long period had acquired exceptional knowledge of the latitudes and longitudes of the WeSt. After completing the voyage they returned to Portugal in the sixteenth month; but they left behind many of their fellow-passengers, who died in consequence of the excessive heat.

ITALY

The history of events in Italy under Emperor Frederick, of blessed and praiseworthy memory, and which occurred in the time of Aeneas Silvius, might have been incorporated here. However, the most distinguished and renowned places (with illustrations), and the most illustrious persons in Italy (with remarks upon their accomplishments and history, not only in the time of Aeneas Silvius, but theretofore and thereafter) have already been described in various parts of this book. The history of Italy in the time of Aeneas has been expanded by him to great lengths; and duplication as well as lengthy text would distress the reader; and as much writing upon the same subject and the use of the unusual words and numerous names occurring therein would displease and burden the German reader, and result in no benefit to him, therefore such a history of Italy is considered unnecessary, and in view of previous notations is regarded as superfluous and should be avoided. For the same reasons the translation of Aeneas Silvius's Europe has not been made verbatim, but abridged.

GERMANY

In this statement of the location and nature of Germany, or the German nation, we note the observation of Strabo, who said: The Germans, like the Gauls, are erect in body, and of a white or ruddy complexion, and resemble them in stature, bearing and manners. Therefore the Romans did not call them Germans without reason, for they wished to describe them as brothers of the Gauls. According to the Roman tongue, Germani means true or lawful brother. Germania, or the German nation, has been much neglected by the ancient historians, for at that time their interior and their homeland, and the approaches thereto were rendered inaccessible by the rivers. Hemmed in by the forests and the sea, they remained fixed in their coarse pastoral manners, never making their abodes on the renowned and celebrated rivers. But after discarding idol worship, and adopting Christian ways, this German nation became more disciplined and prospered greatly. The country is very extensive. To the east lie Poland and Lower Hungary; to the south, the Algau, or the mountains; to the west, Gaul; and to the north, the German Sea. Germany has the most celebrated rivers of Europe, the Rhine, the Danube, the Elbe, and countless other memorable streams. The Rhine's source is in the highest peak of seven mountains, and in this vicinity also arises the Rhone which waters the regions of Lyons and Narbonne. The Padus or Po waters Italy. The "Tranus," (Ticinus, now Tesino) enters the Po at Pavia (Ticinum). The Etsch (Athesis, now Adige) flows through the region of Trent and Verona, and finally into the Adriatic Sea. But the Rhine runs through the valleys and the adjacent mountains, and where it passes through the Churian country, it becomes navigable. Soon thereafter it forms two lakes, called the Bodensee (Lake of Constance) and the Zeller Sea (Untersee) with the city of Constance between them. From hence it meanders here and there, tearing at its banks, and hemmed in by many a sharp and sudden crag, it gives off a terrific roar, making caverns along its banks. It flows through Basle, tearing away the banks which resist it, and seeking new channels, to the great damage of those along its shores. It flows by Strassburg, Spires, Worms, Coblenz and Cologne, the noble cities of Germany. It receives into itself many navigable streams, such as the Main, Neckar, Limnat, Moselle and Maas, and then discharges itself into the German (North) Sea in many places, creating large islands. Some of these are inhabited by Frisians, some by Geldrians, and some by Hollanders. Secondly: There is the Danube, the most celebrated river of Europe which has its source in the "Arnobian" mountains, where the Black Forest begins, in a village called Donaueschingen. It slowly flows from west to east to Ulm, a two days' journey; and there, reinforced by the Blau and the Iller, and other rivers, it becomes navigable, and with increased current flows from thence through many lands and along many cities. The Danube receives sixty streams, mostly navigable. Finally it flows into the Black Sea at six different places. Thirdly: The Elbe arises in the mountains which divides Silesia and Bohemia. With the Moldau, it flows into Bohemia, and hence through the Bohemian Forest; from there through Meissen, Magdeburg, and other cities of the Mark (Brandenburg) and Saxony, and finally into the German Sea at Hamburg. There are other renowned rivers, but for the sake of brevity I will not speak of those. Fourthly there is a forest called Hercynia (Silva), which at this time the inhabitants call the Schwarzwald (Black Forest), and which is the source of the Danube. According to Pomponius Mela this forest is 60 days' journey in length, and it is better known and larger than any other forest. It has many branches, which the inhabitants and others have given various names. From its beginning to the Neckar it retains the name Schwarzwald; from the Neckar to the Main it is called Odonwald (Adenwald); and from the Main to the Lahn (Lonam), near Coblenz, it is called Westerwald. From hence it extends to the east, and divides Franconia from Hesse and Thuringia. Then it divides, and encircles Bohemia, and reaches forth into the mountains of Moravia, extending between Hungary on the right, and Poland on the left as far as the tribes of the Daci and the Getae, under various names. Germany is a very extensive region of Europe. Through contact and association with the Romans, and with the holy faith it was brought to gentleness and good manners. Germany is a noble country, and is watered by rivers. There we find great happiness and bliss, a temperate climate, fertile fields, wonderful mountains, dense forests, and all manner of grain in abundance. The hills bear grapes, and there is a sufficiency of rivers and springs which water the whole country. Trade and commerce prevail everywhere. Germany is kind to its visitors and generous to the needy. In ingenuity, customs, might and men it yields to no other nation, and is foremost in matters of war. It excels in wealth of metals, for all the Italian, French, Spanish and other nations secure their silver from German merchants. Without external help the German nation can raise sufficient men, foot or horse, to readily defend itself against other nations. Many other excellent things might be said concerning its Christian life, its laws, faith, and fidelity, but these I must forego for the sake of brevity.

Final Colophon

HERE IS FINALLY CONCLUDED the Book of Chronicles and memorable histories, from the beginning of the world to our own time, collected in Latin with great industry and judgment by highly learned men, and by George Alt, erstwhile treasury scribe (Losungsschreiber) at Nuremberg, brought from the same Latin into this German, word for word, and occasionally (but not without reason) abridged and thereafter printed at Nuremberg by the honorable and respected Anthony Koberger, at the suggestion and according to the wishes of the wise and honorable Sebald Sohreyer and Sebastian Kameraister, citizens there, and with the co-operation of Michael Wolgemuth and William Pleydenwurff, artists and fellow citizens there, who ably adorned the work with illustrations. Completed on the 23rd day of the month of December, after the birth of Christ our Saviour 1493 years.

OF THE REGION OF EUROPE CALLED SARMATIA OR POLAND.

Although the following description of Poland, and of the cities of Cracow, Lübeck, and Neiss, did not come to us until this book had been finished, we decided to include this material, as well as other memorable matters.

Of the Kingdom of Poland and Its Origin.

Inasmuch as mention will be made soon hereafter of Boleslaus, the third Sarmatian or Polish king, I will first treat briefly of the country of Sarmatia or Poland, and of the manner in which it attained the royal sceptre. Sarmatia is a large and extensive land, but is located in a wilderness and not built up. It has a severe climate. To the east are the Moscovites, and the River Tanais (Don) is to the south. Dacia and Hungary are on the west, and Bohemia, Moravia, Silesia, Germany, and the German Sea, called Mare Germanicum, are on the north. That portion alone, which bears the name of kingdom, is called Poland, and this is divided into two parts: that in which Cracow is situated, and which is called Little Poland; and that in which Posen is located, and which is called Great Poland. Until the time of Boleslaus I the rulers at Cracow were dukes. In the time of Otto I, Boleslaus was a highly renowned duke, not the one or whom we will speak in the life of St. Stanislaus; for he was a grandson, who was born of a monk, the son of this Boleslaus. This Boleslaus pursued the French king and the Germans with a victorious hand; but finally, at the request of Emperor Otto, he abandoned the war, and made a treaty with the Germans and the French. When Emperor Otto became aware of the great fame of this prince throughout Germany and Sarmatia, he proceeded to Sarmatia in order more clearly to observe his reign, power and might. The illustrious duke received him with high honors in the city of Posen; and for a distance of 3,000 paces, or more, from the city, he caused silken, woolen and costly raiment, embroidered in gold and silver, to be spread over the way of the emperor; and after the emperor had entered the city of Posen, it was regarded as fitting for every man to gather the se up and to carry them away. There he honored the emperor with magnificent and brilliant entertainments - racing, tournaments, sports, and other pastimes. Only golden dishes were used, and after each course the duke ordered these thrown into a bottomless spring and loSt. Now when the emperor observed the kindness, magnificence, and abundant riches of this highly renowned duke, he regarded him as worthy of a royal crown; and so he invested him with a royal sceptre and crown, and with the dignities appertaining to a royal throne. Not to appear ungrateful toward the emperor for these favors, this illustrious king presented to the emperor as a gift the arm of Bishop Adelbert, whom the Prussians had wickedly slain. After this kingdom had prospered until the year 1400 A.D, or shortly before, and the king of Poland died without issue, the duke who ruled over Lithuania and Russia was elected king; and although this same duke had previously worshipped idols, yet, when the royal sceptre was entrusted to him, he and all his subjects accepted the Christian faith; and the people of Lithuania and Russia joined the Polish kingdom, on certain conditions, in order that they might not be separated from the king. This most illustrious prince subjugated the Prussians in a severe and cruel war, and thus enlarged his dominion. Therein are located the renowned cities of Danzig and Thorn, as well as the noted castle of Marienburg, fortified with many and various buildings, towers and moats, preventing the enemy from gaining access thereto. The like of these have never been seen before. number of years ago this kingdom was of greater extent and power, but in consequence of persecutions on the part of the treacherous Tartars and Turks, the entire land of Poland suffered shame and decline. The region lying behind Russia, and called Padolia, was completely ravished by fire, and so devastated that it could not sustain those passing through it with the necessities of life. Yet the soil is fertile; grass grows to the height of a man, and the region is so plentiful in bees and honey that the bees do not have sufficient places to which to carry the honey. They gather it under the trees and shrubs, and in the forests. Throughout Poland are great and noted woods, through which one may pass as far as Lithuania and Scythia. In the same forests much wild game abounds, and the northern part of the Polish Hercinian forest, among other game, has the roving Aurochs, which is antagonistic to man, but very good to eat. They have a broad forehead, and horns, and cannot be caught except by great effort and labor. This country because of the great cold, has no mines, except lead; but there is much salt, which is carried to far distant places, and from which the entire country receives much use and benefit. The king derives more revenue from this salt than from any other source. Below the surface of the earth great quantities of rock salt are mined, and in addition thereto much salt is derived from the water. This country is also very productive in fruits and in all things necessary to sustain human life. And now something is to be noted of the highly celebrated race of the most illustrious prince, Ladislaus, of whom we have already spoken. As some say, he had three wives, by whom he begot two sons. The elder was Ladislaus, the younger, Casimir. On the death of his father, Ladislaus secured the sovereignty; and he ruled over the kingdoms of Hungary, Bohemia, and Poland, and with a knightly hand performed celebrated deeds. He augmented his dominions and the Christian faith, depriving the Turkish sultan of much territory and proceeding with his army as far as Constantinople. He warred against the Turks; and they fought one another in gruesome battles; but the Hungarians fled, leaving the king with a small force of Poles in the midst of the great numbers of the enemy. But Casimir reigned as a duke over Lithuania and Russia, and after the death of his brother, the king, he was declared king of Sarmatia or Poland; and he espoused the daughter of the duke of Austria, who was a sister of king Ladislaus. By her he begot six sons and five daughters. The first was named Ladislaus. While still young he was elected king of Bohemia, and thereafter, upon the death of Matthias, the Hungarian king, he was also elected king of Hungary because of his wonderful magnanimity and good counsel. The second son, Casimir, named after his father, died of the plague. The third son, named John Albert, a future mirror of wonder for the entire world, performed many distinguished and noteworthy warlike deeds against the Turks and other peoples, and attained the royal sovereignty upon the death of his father. The fourth, Alexander, was accepted as duke by the Lithuanians in consideration of his courage and firmness. The fifth, Sigismund, followed in his father's footsteps in virtue. The sixth, Frederick, the youngest, was first made bishop of Cracow, later archbishop of Gnesen, and in 1493 was made a cardinal by Pope Alexander. Of the five daughters one is married to Duke George of Bavaria; the second to Frederick, margrave of Brandenburg; the third to the duke of Pomerania; while the remaining two daughters, still unmarried, are staying with their mother.

Of Saint Stanislaus, Bishop of Cracow and Patron of Poland.

SAINT STANISLAUS, a man rich in estates of the Lord, patron and banner-bearer of all Poland, was born in A.D. 1008 in the district of Sezepanow, of noble and distinguished parents, who attended divine services in the church and offered up their prayers to God. When he reached the age of discretion he went to the University of Paris at the request of his father, devoting himself with great zeal to the study of the arts, and more particularly to the canon law,- not (as our young sons now do) to earn much money, great honor and high standing, but to give counsel to the poor as well as the rich, and to see that every man obtained justice. Thereafter he returned home and went to Cracow, where, because of his virtue and skill he was given a canonry in the cathedral. Upon the death of the bishop there he was appointed to the episcopal see through divine providence, and with great zeal he undertook to augment the Christian faith and divine service. Once upon a time he bought a village of a knight; but upon the latter's death, a friend of the knight reclaimed the land from the bishop. Unable to prove his title for want of witnesses, this pious man fasted and prayed to God, trusting in the power and might of the most exalted Lord; and he went to the grove of the deceased knight, and removing from it the stone and sand, he appealed to God with his innermost devotion, and brought the deceased knight back to life. He took the knight before the tyrant Boleslaus, who was administering justice in the matter; and in the presence of his adversaries and Boleslaus's lords of the manor, he proved by this same knight that he had bought the village of him. This Boleslaus lived in baseness, practicing all manner of tyranny and perfidy toward his people, and punishing the worthy and distinguished men and respectable citizens with severe tortures. But this Christian man, Stanislaus, no longer willing to endure these conditions, took heart, and fearlessly appeared before this tyrant, admonishing him to discontinue these practices. But his wickedness increased more and more, and the bishop excommunicated him. Thereupon the tyrant despatched his court servants with instructions to slay Stanislaus wherever they might find him. At this time St. Stanislaus was performing the office of the mass in the little church of St. Michael which had been erected in the city by Casimir. Now when the servants of King Boleslaus arrived, they made three attempts to enter the church, but were three times driven off by divine intervention; and so they fell back. When the news reached Boleslaus he hastened to the said church in great wrath; and there he slew Stanislaus while performing mass at the altar. The body was hacked to pieces by the servants of Boleslaus, and thrown to the birds outside the city. But through divine providence the eagles gathered up the remains, which were preserved with great care until they received burial with highest honors. Thereafter Stanislaus was enrolled in the number of the saints, and translated to the royal chapel in St. Wenceslaus's Church, where, in a golden sarcophagus, he appears in many miracles.

Of Cracow, the Royal City of Poland.

CRACOW, a renowned and illustrious city of Poland, situated on the Vistula, was built by Craco (Krak), the first Polish duke, and was named after him. In the beginning this city was surrounded by battlements, bow-windows, bulwarks, and high towers; later by a small dilapidated ancient wall, and finally by earth works and a moat. Some of these moats were filled with fishingwaters, and others given up to shrubbery. A river, the Rudis (Rudawa), flows about the entire city and drives mill-wheels. By means of canals and conduits it is carried to all parts of the city. This city has seven gates and many beautiful and spacious residences; also many large church edifices, the mostdistinguished being that of Our Lady, which has two high towers and is located in the heart of the city. The city also has many cloisters, inhabited by many churchmen and devout fathers. The House of the Trinity is occupied by the Dominicans, and in the same house the blessed Jacintus flourishes in many miracles, although not enrolled in the number of the saints. In his lifetime he resurrected three dead. There is also a church to the Order of St. Francis (but not yet reformed), and many other cloisters. Not far from the mouth of the Vistula is another church, to Anna, where the blessed Cantus, a distinguished doctor of the University of this city, appears in many miracles, although he also is not enrolled in the number of the saints. Near this holy edifice is the great and distinguished University, provided with many illustrious and learned men; and there the liberal arts, learning and wisdom, flourish. Those houses of God were built by the pious Wladislaus, the illustrious Polish king, on the occasion of his triumph in the cruel and serious battle against the Prussians, of which battle many excellent and noteworthy accounts down to our own time, are at hand in the royal palace. And thereof we will speak shortly; and he endowed them with many great privileges and gifts. Although our parents regarded the Polish people as coarse, uncouth, and inept, the inhabitants of this city do not live according to Polish customs; for here we find respectable, well-mannered burghers, noted for their virtue, intelligence, and hospitality, and who are kind, obliging and friendly toward all who come there. Their table mariners are more seemly than those of other Poles. Of all pleasing viands, the drink most common among them is water boiled with barley and hops. This drink is most satisfying and nourishing when not consumed beyond one's normal requirements. Below the citadel of the city is a praiseworthy assembly of the school, in which instruction in the law is given. To the north of the city lies a little village, not surrounded by walls, called Clepardium. It contains nothing of note except the holy see of St. Florian, the Christian knight, which the aforesaid pious Wladislaus established as a canonry, and endowed with other dignities and gifts, as well as the authority to teach the arts. It is surrounded by mountain peaks so high that one might believe they support the heavens. In the city, toward the east, is a great and mighty hill made up of sand and accumulated soil. It faces the snowy heights of the Carpathians on the opposite side. The Vistula flows by this hill. It has its origin in a small spring in the Carpathians. The river increases in volume as it proceeds into the distance, being so strengthened by the waters flowing into it from the Hungarian mountains, that it carries great masses of timber, wood and other material. Further on it is so enlarged by rivers and rains that it carries large heavily laden vessels along its course as far as the German Sea. There it loses its name, and its foaming waters flow into that sea at three different places. On the same hill is a large edifice built in honor of Wenceslaus, the duke of Bohemia; and therein are to be seen the tombs of a number of illustrious men, built at great cost in varying types of architecture, and constructed of marble and alabaster, ornamented with great magnificence. In the center of this edifice is an elegant sarcophagus, wherein rests St. Florian, the celebrated knight of Christ. On the same hill or mount are the two holy churches of St. Michael and St. George, and beyond these the handsome courts of the nobility and the houses of the priests who serve the churches day and night. Beyond these is a royal seat consisting of great and various buildings,- the capitol of the entire kingdom, where all the treasures of the realm are kept. There the authority of the princes is defined, and the royal crown is preserved with great care. Beyond the hill is the cloister of the Dominican Order of Observance and, not far therefrom, a convent. On the opposite side, near the bridge, is the renowned hospital of St. Hedwig. On the other side of the Vistula lies the city of Casimir, built by the king of that name, and about which the Vistula flows after dividing into two branches below the royal palace. In the same city is St. Catherine's Church of the brothers of the Augustinian Order; also the Church of Corpus Christi, the houses of the Regulated Canons, and others. There are also other things of historical significance, attesting the deeds of the illustrious king; but it is impossible to speak of all these here.

LÜBECK, an illustrious and imperial city of Saxony, and very renowned throughout Germany, as well as beyond its borders, was originally built by Wickboldo Vitigio, the Saxon duke, in the region that the Wends, while still in the possession of a part of Saxony called Buku. It grew under the influence of the wrathful prince, Kyto, or Truto, in A.D. 1104. It is located in a beautiful spot between the duchies of Mecklenburg and Holstein, and is watered by the Wakenitz and the Trave. This same Kyto, a mighty and severe persecutor of the Christians, was of Marcomanian, or Martinopolitan ancestry, and slew the lords of Wageren, also called the lords of Stargard or Oldenburg, in battles at Ferner and Peldte; but one of them, Count Gottschalk's son Henry, escaped to Denmark. After some time he returned to his home, decapitated Kyto with an ax, and espoused his widow. In the time of emperor Henry IV all the churches and priests in this region were plundered and robbed, the churches laid in ruin, and the Christian faith suppressed. Lübeck was destroyed for a third time in a war of the princes, particularly in the war between Duke Henry the Lion and Count Adolph of Holstein, who, when the quarrel subsided, left the region in which the city now lies to Duke Henry. Before that time the city was located near Schwartau, and later near Horneberg, as master Helmuldus states. Thereafter this city grew wonderfully, being frequented by the merchants of upper and lower Germany, and those coming from Norway, Sweden, Iceland, Russia, Lithuania, Prussia, Poland, Pomerania, Mecklenburg, Denmark, England, Flanders, Scotland and France; and by land from Saxony, Westphalia and the Mark. Those versed in the operation and influence of the heavenly constellations, write that this city had its origin under the sign of the Scales, and was founded under the particular grace of God; for the inhabitants of this city, more than their neighbors, practice extraordinary devotion; and thus they found a sweet kernel in a bitter shell. Thereafter, in 1131, the lower Wendic lords destroyed the city of Lübeck; but Count Adolph rebuilt it and provided it with a castle, situated toward the north, where the brothers of the Dominican Order now live. In A.D. 1159, those of Lübeck, in order to avenge their losses, proceeded with military force to Rügen, where they inflicted serious damage upon the prince. In A.D. 1161, Geraldus, the 12th bishop of Oldenburg, or Stargard, with the help of Duke Henry the Lion at Wageren, was installed as the first bishop of Lübeck, 13 benefices were founded, and he was endowed therewith. And thus the city of Lübeck attained great power and riches, and Oldenburg declined. But when this city was afterwards besieged by Emperor Frederick I, those of Lübeck were finally reconciled to the emperor by their bishop, and with the consent of Duke Henry the Lion paid homage to the emperor. The same bishop consecrated the cathedral at Lübeck, and there built the cloister of St. John, formerly occupied by the Benedictines (who now reside at Cismar in Holstein by the sea), but now occupied by the nuns. At this time the city of Lübeck was exalted to the status of an imperial free city by Emperor Frederick, and endowed with privileges and exemptions, making it the foremost maritime city; which exemptions were also enjoyed in foreign lands - London, in England, Norway, Moscow, Novgorod, Russia, and in many other places, such as Flanders, Denmark, and Sweden. And the emperor confirmed to the council the privileges it enjoyed under Duke Henry; and by golden bull he granted the right to have 24 magistrates in the council. These he ennobled so that they might wear gold according to knightly custom, but not golden spurs. This city is sanitary and cleanly, sloping from the heights into a valley so that water and impurities flow off freely. The streets and lanes are kept clean by frequent rains. The cathedral at the north end of the city is spacious and beautiful. There are also four parish churches, with seven tall gilded spires, beautiful towers, and roofs covered with copper and lead; also two cloisters of the Dominican and Franciscan Orders, as well as the Hospital of the Holy GhoSt. The city is protected and fortified by water, walls, towers, and moats. It has two long and broad streets, bordered by beautiful spacious houses built of brick. These houses observe a uniform position, so that one does not project beyond the other. The other streets of the city are at right angles to these two. Here also the river Wakenitz flows from north to south, then veering to the west. The Trave flows along the city in the opposite direction, south to north, and with a strong current hastens to the sea. At present the bishop's chair is occupied by the most worthy Dietrich, a native of Hamburg.

NEISSE, a renowned episcopal city, located on the Neisse, in Silesia, derived its name from the same river, and is built up with various structures. Although now a plain, Silesia was at one time wooded, having been part of the great Hercynian forest. In time villages and human habitations developed; and after the inhabitants accepted the Christian faith, castles and cities sprang up, and the people were influenced to a better and more godly course. The renowned river Oder flows through Silesia, and after being augmented by the Olsna, Neisse, Ohlau, Lissa, Bartsch, Bober, and other rivers, it flows through Mark Brandenburg into the German Sea at Stettin. Silesia is a three days' journey in width and a nine days' journey in length, extending from Hungary to Mark Brandenburg. The episcopal see of this country was not originally at Breslau; but when Casimir I, on failure of royal male issue in Poland, left the Cluniac monastery through arrangement with the pope (whom he promised that every person in the kingdom would send a penny to Rome,) and went to Poland, and was accepted as king, he changed the bishop's seat to Breslau, which (as heretofore stated in the description of the city of Breslau) is now the principal city of Silesia. The episcopal chair is now occupied by Doctor John Rot von Wemding, of the bishopric of Eichstadt, erstwhile imperial protonotary; and being a distinguished man, through his intelligence and zeal he augmented the bishopric in a short time, rendering the episcopal household and court more productive, and improving it with buildings to an extent that had not occurred in the past 100 years. The land is productive in grain and fish and abounds in wild game and birds. In addition to Breslau there are other renowned cities in this country, namely Neisse, Great Glogau, Liegnitz, Oppeln, Schwednitz, Teschen, Oels, Frankenstein, Münsterberg, Sagan, and Brega; as well as many beautiful and well built cloisters and church edifices. It is subject to the king of Bohemia, who holds it as a fief of the Roman Empire. Many hereditary dukes and princes have overrun and devastated this country, disturbing its peace, so that through meagerness and lack of income and revenue it was unable to maintain a princely class; for which reason they resorted to robbery. But as the other houses died out, the land passed to a few lords who are possessed of no mean amount of riches and fortified cities. Divine service throughout Silesia is ample and great, and therefore the ecclesiastical houses are highly honored. There are a great number of spirituals of both sexes, who lead respectable and virtuous lives. The people are conversant and gracious, and are more devout than all the other inhabitants of Germany. There are also many nobles, zealous in arms and war. The female sex is handsome and cheerful, but virtuous. The peasant class, who speak Polish, devote themselves to work in the fields, and are given to drink; and in consequence they live in mean huts, while the improvements on their fields and farms are neglected. But the German farmers are more industrious and better housed. Living is less expensive than in the neighboring regions. But what will at some time bring irreparable injury and decline upon Silesia is this: that the money-lenders, according to the customs of the city and the condition of the owners, and with the consent of the authorities, collect a certain sum of money and also levy an annual interest charge; but after the owners have paid this interest for a number of years, they refuse to pay any longer; and so, from the nature of things, they are intimidated by spiritual ban, or their pledges are seized. To escape these hardships they leave home and field and flee elsewhere; and thus their manors, fields, grain, and plow-lands remain undeveloped and fallow, and deteriorate. On this account (where no care is taken), Silesia declines daily, although otherwise a praiseworthy land. The drink of the people is beer. Wine is imported from Moravia and Hungary, although some is produced in Silesia, near Crossen; however, the greater part of this is exported over the Oder to Prussia and elsewhere. Nothing else is exported from Silesia except inferior woolen cloth to Hungary, and fish to Moravia. Excessive use of gold and silver in the raiment of matrons and maidens is not unusual in this country.
